Too quiet, Zuko thought, silent behind a skull faceplate. Streets leading into mazes of streets, large as anything in the capital's great caldera. Streets he knew better than the capital itself, he realized with a shock, for when had a prince's son ever wandered the back alleys alone? Ranks of familiar tenements rose around them; he knew from the light and shadows they should be swarming with people coming off of night work or leaving late for the morning. Now they stood locked and barred, quieted by the thud of patrolling komodo-rhinos. The taste of wet-wood smoke clung to the back of his throat, tainted with the odd grate that was shattered rock dust in the breeze.

There were people in the streets, despite the troops. Shops were open, goods and coin exchanging hands. But he could hear the fear, in the wail of babies kept carefully out of sight.

Children. It made him want to snarl. Agni, what kind of monsters do they think we are?

What the rest of the Earth Kingdom tells them we are, a more practical part of him pointed out. The beasts the Dai Li - the ones they fear, and hate - wouldn't talk about. Except to imply they protect them from us. So we have to be worse.

Not rational. But Uncle had hammered home years ago that a lot of people weren't rational, and didn't check their facts against reality. Plenty of people just did what they wanted, and figured out reasons why it "made sense" later. The Fire Nation was invading. Of course people were afraid of them.

And they've got reason to be, he admitted grudgingly. These troops aren't under Uncle's command. They're under Azula's. She's not stupid, she won't execute people without cause-

But she'd find cause. Plenty of it. And... he knew, from what had happened to Ping, even some of his own people had no honor.

It hurt.

I'm going to change that, he swore. I will. One step at a... uh-oh.

They'd rounded a corner from just subdued into actively quiet, drifts of smoke still smoldering from what had been a shattered tenement. One floor had collapsed into another, charred remnants of the roof clawing at the sky like blackened bones. A few former residents huddled in numb clumps on other tenement stoops, rough blankets flung around them against shock. The street itself was cracked down the middle as if by a great earthquake, half of it inches above the other.

The master sergeant heading their way on foot was obviously tired, cranky, and about one good snarl away from finding someone to shred who truly deserved it. His hair was gray with ash as well as age, there were still traces of soot on his uniform, and he had both troops and Guards drawing near with one brusque, beckoning hand. Some of them, very familiar Guards.

Let them just see the armor.

"Master Sergeant Yakume," he identified himself. "A bit far from your ship, aren't you, marine?"

"Lieutenant Teruko, of Suzuran." She took off her faceplate; proper politeness of higher-ranked to lower. "No offense, but we could see from the water you'd had some trouble up here." She gestured toward torn rocks, smoking rubble, the faintly red wet stains on the street where someone had washed blood away. "Captain Jee asked us to take a look. And, orders permitting, offer our assistance."

Some of the Guards snorted at that. But not all. Especially not one mountain of a man in uniform just a bit more ornate than the rest.

Captain Lu-shan, Zuko realized, recognizing Huojin's description of the man. And it looks like...

Well. To be honest, it didn't look like he trusted the master sergeant. But the way he stood, casually confident that no attack was coming from Yakume's direction... it didn't look like he didn't, either.

Somehow, I don't think that's what the Earth King had in mind.

Despite his grumbling temper, despite the gnawing worry of what if Azula spots us, Zuko still felt sorry for Kuei. The Earth King knew the palace, his guards, and his Dai Li. Maybe some of his nobles as well. But that was it.

And that missed so much of the world, it wasn't funny.

He doesn't know ordinary people. Ordinary lives.

And the Dai Li, who could at least have given him an idea of what normal had been for them, had followed Long Feng's lead and kept the Earth King at a reverent distance. And they didn't talk about what they really did with people, and spirits. Or why.

Zuko had read Shirong's report, but he had to admit, he hadn't grasped all the implications. Not until now. Kuei had made, or approved, a plan to wreak havoc all over the city. To break some of the Earth Army loose, and otherwise mess with the Fire Nation's occupation. And it had worked.

...Except the Earth King didn't know what it was like to have your world burned down around you. Or what happened to people who fought to survive, together. Whether or not they liked each other.

Most places in the city, it wouldn't make a difference. The hatred would be too deep; Fire Nation officers and men would be careless, or arrogant enough to scorn their conquered foes as subjects instead of citizens. But here...

In the ashes and outrage, Zuko could taste potential.

"You'd help us, Lieutenant?" the captain said gracelessly. "I doubt we need any more fires set around here."

Zuko straightened, and held back a thoughtful nod. The master sergeant's found a crack. And he's going to keep tapping wedges into it.

Teruko let out a slow breath, that just steamed slightly. "Sir, Suzuran has no reports on what happened here, so I know the captain would want me to reserve judgment." Her eyes narrowed a little on that; slowly, relaxed. "We have trained field medics on board. Burn medications. People who can set a damn broken arm. Obviously, we can't send our medics into what may still be a hostile situation." She looked straight at Yakume. "But if it would be worthwhile to you for us to offload certain supplies, or for you to send civilians to the docks, if they've been cleared..."

Yakume arched a brow, considering that. "Suzuran. Captain Jee, isn't it? I hear he served under General Iroh."

Zuko kept himself from stiffening with an effort. I don't like this.

"Not quite accurate, sir," Teruko said politely. "I understand he chose to travel on the ship Captain Jee was master of, but the chain of command was... otherwise arranged."

"Rumor often exaggerates," Yakume mused. "I also hear your ship survived the North Pole."

Zuko listened to the sudden, attentive silence among troops and bystanders. And bit back a curse. I really don't like this.

"Yes, we did," Teruko said bluntly. "I almost feel sorry for the Water Tribe."

"You? Feel sorry for them?" Lu-shan looked caught between amusement and disgust. "I hear your precious fleet got wiped out."

He's pushing. And Yakume's letting him. Zuko scowled behind the mask, irritation bleeding into something darker. He's holding the occupation here, he's just gotten people working together - now he wants to see how we'll handle them.

Damn it. If he'd been trying to hold the city - in the long run, yes, this would be good for the soldiers stationed here. Even good for the civilians; if Yakume was trying to build a working relationship between soldiers and Guards, then he meant to carry out the obligations of an honorable soldier. But he really didn't need this. Not here, not now. Even if they'd been regular troops, this would be a bad idea, and marines were known for being testy on land...

You want to show the Guard you're standing with them no matter what idiots come onto shore leave here. Argh. We're an "object lesson"-

Rage shook him, then; he held onto it with finger and thumb pressed carefully together, focusing on that pressure-near-pain. Blow this, and everything failed. Everything.

I am so, so tired of being someone else's lesson.

Teruko smiled, just a little. It wasn't pretty. "Suzuran wasn't the only ship to sail away from that battle. Intact. So you might want to rethink any rumors you might have heard on how wiped out we were. Because if we had been wiped out, if we'd lost as many thousands of souls as I hear Earth Kingdom rumors say... well, I'd think any city that deals with spirits as much as Ba Sing Se would be a little more worried. After all, that would mean thousands of bodies in the water, condemned to sink without proper burial. People killed by a spirit. The Ocean himself, tainted by human rage." Her voice dropped, almost a whisper. "And Fire Nation ghosts don't fear the sun."

Face neutral again, she turned back to Yakume. "Did you need anything else, Master Sergeant?"

"Just for you to watch your step, Lieutenant," Yakume said dryly. "We had some unrest last night, and I'd hate to have to tell your captain you walked into another patch of it. Especially with a youngster tagging along."

"Newbies have to learn sometime," Teruko shrugged. "Move it, Private. We've got work to do."

She enjoyed that, Zuko thought grumpily, as they marched away. Rolled his eyes behind the faceplate, and set the irritation aside. It'd worked. That was all that mattered.

At least, he hoped it'd worked. Something about the way Yakume had said youngster...

That... can't have been what I think it was, Yakume thought to himself, making his way into Lu-shan's office with a feeling of relief. Carefully hidden relief; yes, the captain had been working with him so far, and yes, inside the Guard station was somewhat safer than out on the street. But this was still occupied territory, with all the hazards that implied.

"So marines are touchy on shore, are they?" Captain Lu-shan asked dryly.

Yakume kept his face neutral and alert, even if exhaustion dragged at him like iron chains. Damned if he'd show that in front of the Earth Kingdom.

And Lu-shan likely thinks the same of the Fire Nation, and we'll just keep going until one of us can find an excuse to collapse in private, Yakume thought wryly. "Usually, they are." That this Lieutenant Teruko wasn't... could mean many things. None of them good for those under his care.

"Would your people really do something like that?" Lu-shan sat down behind his desk, grimacing just a little as bruises and burns complained. "Leave unhallowed graves? That's-" He shrugged, a wordless movement of horror, disgust, and amazement that anyone could be that stupid.

Yakume claimed his own chair, sternly denying his own wincing. "That's difficult to say."

"Difficult?" Lu-shan repeated, incredulous. "Either you lay soldiers to rest, or you don't."

"And if we were Earth Kingdom, that would be the whole of it," Yakume agreed. "You have your military doctrine, and you hold to it. Ours... changes. Depending on the commander, on the troops - on many things." He paused. "I can attest that while General Iroh was in command, cremations were held whenever possible. Even under the most extreme battlefield conditions, we kept a ceremonial flame for ghosts to find their way home."

"Huh." Lu-shan weighed him in his gaze. "I hear a but."

"I have heard of other commanders less honorable," Yakume said bluntly. "I have heard - rumors, you understand - of certain battlefields Fire Lords wished to remain cursed." He sighed. "Though in this case, rumors may not make much difference. What do you know about the North Pole?"

"The Northern Water Tribe lives up there, and it's cold," Lu-shan said warily. "Why?"

Yakume inclined his head. "I'm Army. I've never been on any scouting missions into polar waters. But I've read our texts. Take the coldest winter you've ever felt in Ba Sing Se; when your breath frosts, and snow clings instead of melting, and you feel as though you'll never be warm again." He regarded Lu-shan steadily. "Take that, and realize that at the North Pole, that's a balmy summer's day."

"Spirits," Lu-shan muttered.

"The Water Tribe lives on ice as much as land," Yakume went on. "Their main city is on the edge of an island, so they can pasture their reindeer-yak inland. Not that it's easy to tell there's any dirt there, given all the ice... The charts we have indicate the sea floor drops away very quickly. If ships went down... They're in hundreds of feet of water, if not thousands. Even if the water were warm enough not to die in minutes - no one can dive for the bodies. Not even part of one."

"But there's still that... ceremonial flame," Lu-shan pointed out.

"And if anyone in command has a modicum of compassion and good sense, someone's infiltrated close enough to the North Pole to burn one," Yakume said soberly. "If the Water Tribe hasn't caught them at it, if the ghosts are willing to be pacified in the first place..."

Lu-shan's brows rose a little in surprise at that qualification, but he let it rest. "So why tell me this, Master Sergeant? I doubt your commanders would like conquered natives to know one of their soldiers has doubts."

Agni, he had a headache. "Captain Lu-shan, I am responsible for keeping the peace here." Be blunt. They never understand this, not at first. "The moment Ba Sing Se was taken by Princess Azula, this city became part of the Fire Nation. As a soldier in the Fire Army, I have a duty to protect the Fire Nation. And its citizens. All of them."

Lu-shan's brows were climbing toward his hair. He straightened, weariness banished by amazement.

"I may not like you, or your ways, or what your people think of mine," Yakume went on, almost growling. "I know damn well there are too many of my fellow soldiers who refuse to respect a defeated enemy. Far too many, since General Iroh retired. But none of what I know or like changes what is. I have my duty. I will carry it out. So long as I am ordered to hold here, you are under my protection." He let a breath pass, and a wry smile touch his face. "I'm an old soldier, Captain. I find I can't change my ways, simply because a new commander finds them... less than convenient."

"You didn't set those fires." Lu-shan chewed on that conclusion, evidently not liking the taste. "But why would- Oma and Shu, why am I even asking? If the Dai Li missed a general, he'd just keep doing what they always do. Fight the war, and shatter the rest of us." Another frown, and he eyed Yakume again. "Shame you're on the other side."

"I'd say the same for you," Yakume said dryly. "But in the Fire Nation... Well. Over the years, I've found that what we consider an honorable opponent does bear some resemblance to one of your kingdom's - limited aid agreements, I think is the correct term."

Lu-shan's attention fixed on him like a lodestone. "Keep talking."

"We recognize that we have a common goal, and agree to cooperate to make that goal possible," Yakume stated. "In our case, the peace and safety of this part of the Lower Ring. We trust that each of us puts that goal first - and if one of us no longer can, he will have the honor and decency to inform the other."

"You want to make a deal." Lu-shan looked troubled. "Fire Nation can't hold to deals."

"We aren't harmed by breaking them as you are," Yakume acknowledged. "Just as you aren't harmed by... well. You wouldn't believe me if I told you." He shrugged, as if it were of no consequence, stiff muscles complaining with every move. "But we can hold to them. Though only our honor and word binds us, not our very nature. So I would never demand you make a deal with me, Captain Lu-shan. But if you gave me your word we had common interests..."

"Huh." With a thoughtful frown, Lu-shan leaned back.

He's thinking. That's all I can ask for now. "Whatever you decide, we should both try to get some rest. Things are going to get very busy soon."

Lu-shan was good, very good; the result of decades keeping peace as a Guard. Unease barely flickered in his eyes. "You think that lieutenant might be back?" He snorted. "What are you people thinking, letting a woman in your army? What if she gets captured?"

"If she did, and her captors were determined to do anything inhumane, she would endure," Yakume said coldly. "And when we came for her - for we do not leave our people behind - she would have all the comrades she needed to burn them alive." He stared the man down. "Lieutenant Teruko would be the first to tell you, she is not a woman. She is a marine."

"...You people are crazy."

"Thank you," Yakume said, amused. "I'm apparently in good company."

"What?"

"Captain Lu-shan," Yakume said dryly, "we both know that you know, one of the line of Sozin is on that ship."

Surprise. Anger. Resignation. "So what are you going to do about it?" Lu-shan said flatly. "Just hand the boy over to that flame-witch who took our city? Oma and Shu, I wouldn't hand you over to her!"

Training, years on the battlefield, will and talent channeled to hold steady - despite it all, Yakume froze. He'd meant General Iroh. But what Lu-shan had said...

The prince is alive.

Prince Zuko. The exile. The heir claimed to have died a traitor's death, by his own sister's breath and word. Alive.

"Are you..." He didn't even recognize his own voice. "Are you sure?"

"Now you look like you've seen a ghost," Lu-shan muttered. "Huojin was sure. Though why anyone who got away from your princess would risk coming back... What are you going to do?"

Agni, what a question. If a firebender had broken loyalty and survived... "He didn't just work as an herb-healer with Healer Amaya, did he."

"No," Lu-shan said, puzzled. "Well, that too, of course, but - he's a bender. What did you think he was doing?"

"Field medicine," Yakume admitted, stunned. "General Iroh would have made certain he was trained in it... Agni. A fire-healer."

Lu-shan was watching him, very carefully. "Not just something we never heard of, I take it."

A hope. A legend. The heart your Avatar tried to tear from us.

My oaths or my people. Agni, what do I do?

"You know," Lu-shan said, almost casually, "you look like a man about to do something really stupid."

"Not before I've had some sleep," Yakume said firmly. I can't decide. Not now. I can't.

...I need to see the general. I need to know why he turned on the Fire Lord.

Well. He wasn't stupid enough to do that without sleep, either. "If I were you, Captain, I'd find a way to warn those under my command to keep those they care about away from the Inner Ring."

It took a minute for that to sink in; Lu-shan shook himself, like a lion-dog shedding water. "She beat Long Feng. She took over the Dai Li. She took the city!"

"Yes, she did," Yakume agreed.

"He's a damn healer!"

"That's right; you don't train your medics to fight," Yakume mused. "Healer, yes. He's also a trained imperial firebender, Captain. Rumor might paint him as less than skilled, but I know the general. I served under him. The Dragon of the West would not settle for less than the best from any of his men. If all he's capable of are the basic forms, then he knows those forms. And a man who knows his basics and uses them can be more deadly than even a rising star of a bender. If he has fewer options, he doesn't have to think."

He didn't need to say more than that. Lu-shan was just as experienced in melee as any soldier, if on a less lethal battlefield. Thinking in a fight could get you killed.

Lu-shan's expression wavered between sympathy and distaste. "In the Earth Kingdom, we back a man because he's in the right. Not because we think he might win."

Yakume shook away that first rush of rage. After all, by his own customs, the man was right. "And what do you do in one of your own villages, when the mayor's two heirs contest his will?"

"We take it to court," Lu-shan shot back.

"An Agni Kai is a court," Yakume stated. "It's asking Agni to make clear who is stronger. Who is more favored by the spirits. Who is right."

"Agni..." Lu-shan blinked. "A what?"

"A fire duel," Yakume informed him. "If he challenges the princess, and she accepts, we have no right to interfere." Relief made the room gray out for a moment. I need to find a bed. Soon. "The consequences may be grave, but no one will doubt the victory."

Lu-shan eyed him. "So what if she refuses?"

Yakume stared at the captain as if he'd announced, in perfect seriousness, that the moon was made of green cheese. "Refuse? With this much at stake? When she hasn't even captured her foe by force of arms? That would be dishonorable!"

"He's an exile," Lu-shan pointed out.

"He was born a great name, and he will die a great name," Yakume said with dignity. "It's true, he's been banished; if he set foot on the home islands, the least peasant would have the right and duty to execute him. But he hasn't. He's here. And if a great name can't see a threat from one of her own kind coming, she doesn't deserve to win."

The headache's gone.

Azula held herself limp as if she were still wrapped in slumber, listening for any trace of potential assassins. Just because she felt better didn't mean she was better. Just because she felt safe...

Nowhere's safe.

Smooth sheets, with the same softness and scent she'd noted in their guise as Kyoshi Warriors. A scent of noodles and rich sauce, with a fainter trace of limon in the air, as if someone had squeezed a glass just for her. Quiet, familiar breathing, as someone sat by the foot of her bed, where any fireblast would have to be telegraphed before it could land.

Ty Lee. Evidently wondering whether or not she'd be permitted to survive the morning.

Let her wonder a little longer.

Min was gone, of course. That was inevitable, given her last rage-clouded memory was of that loathsome waterbender touching her-

Min, and his link to the Earth resistance. Both of which Ty Lee had apparently traded away for the waterbender's... efforts.

Yesterday, I would have seared her for that.

Which, Azula coldly forced herself to admit, was the best argument of all in Ty Lee's favor. The little chi-blocker was dangerous to her foes precisely because she looked so fresh and innocent. Scars would have damaged her usefulness.

Beyond that, Ty Lee was useful because she feared Azula. Feared her; not, was paralyzed by utter terror. Emotional pain, mental pain - those could bind a servant stronger than steel chains. Physical pain might provoke a purely physical response. And given Ty Lee's heritage - once she started running, she might not stop.

You think you've hidden yourselves so well. Azula kept the amused smirk off her face. As if Zuzu was the only one who ever studied your ancestors' history.

Though she suspected Zuko might have read scrolls she'd never had a chance to steal for herself. Iroh had managed to inflict the oddest tomes on her brother in the years before his exile, and she'd lay odds the old busybody had only gotten worse afterward. Histories written not to favor the Fire Nation; what was wrong with the man?

What he taught Zuko doesn't matter.

And so what if a few families with Air Nomad blood had survived? The Avatar's generation was gone, and airbending with them. With the Avatar dead, they were no threat at all.

And if the next Water Tribe Avatar sought them out? All the better. Duty and honor chained Ty Lee's kin to the Fire Nation, and no child of Water would ever be able to move through their enemies' land without giving in to the urge for revenge.

And once the new Avatar had given himself away... with a united Fire Nation and the walls that'd been the Earth Kingdom's hope cast down, capture would be inevitable. A pity Zuko wouldn't be there to see it.

Stop thinking about Zuko!

But she couldn't, quite; and probing at that insistent thorn of a thought, together with the last not-quite-a-memory under Amaya's hands, told her why.

"Zuko loves you."

Words, she could have brushed aside. She'd heard her own mother lie, telling her little monster of a daughter she loved her too many times to count. Agni, she'd heard Father say it, and knew it was only another weapon in his arsenal. Look at everything Zuko had endured, just for the hope of the Fire Lord's approval.

Which he'd never get anyway. Fool.

But Amaya hadn't given her words. She'd given certainty.

He wanted to protect you.

Solid as the steel hull of a battleship. Pure and clear as the spark before the lightning.

Oh, there was hate there, too. With all she'd inflicted on him with Father's permission, Zuko would have been a fool not to hate her. And he might have been an idiot, but he wasn't that stupid.

It was the hate that had convinced her, at the last. Ursa had spoken of love and lied. Fire Lord Ozai had spoken of it and sneered. But Zuko...

He hated me. And Father. And himself.

Why else do what he had, and destroy himself to stop her? No; the hate Amaya had shown her was real. But if that was real...

He loved you, and he wanted to protect you from the worst threat the Fire Nation has ever known.
You.

Protect her from herself? As if she would ever threaten the Fire Nation. That was impossi-

Wait.

Zuko was an idiot. So her father said, and so everyone believed. Yet Zuko had survived in Ba Sing Se, in hiding, for over a month. When the Dai Li had been actively watching him.

That was either intelligence, or luck. And Zuko had no luck.

This needed more thought. And not on an empty stomach. Decided, Azula sat up.

Ty Lee blinked at her, then dropped in submission-

"You're a fool," Azula said bluntly. "I'll consider whether or not you're too much of a fool to live."

"I'm... what?" the acrobat managed.

"It's true that the occupation needs me more than I need to crush any particular rebel," Azula stated. "But you trusted a Water Tribe woman to actually keep her word to someone not in the tribe." She glared at the chi-blocker. "Did you sleep through history when they covered the barbarians? Even Zuko knew better than to trust the Water Tribe! How do you think I was able to retreat so easily when he turned on me with the Avatar's little warriors? He knew he couldn't trust them beyond the moment they thought they had me. I'm surprised he and Uncle managed to survive that particular bit of treachery. Uncle must have driven the waterbender off before she could kill my brother."

"Kill him?" Ty Lee said faintly, daring to look up. "But Sokka's so cute. And nice. Why would his sister want to do that?"

"Brothers and sisters aren't always alike," Azula said dryly. "Sokka may be pleasant, in a blockheaded stubborn sort of way. You can keep him, if you catch him. But his sister tried to take my head off with a razor of water."

"...Oh."

"Never trust Water," Azula said emphatically. "They're loyal to their tribes, and only their tribes. If you're not Water, you're not human. Not to them."

"Okay," Ty Lee whispered. "I'll remember."

"See that you do." Azula straightened. "Healer Amaya. Indeed." Though the Water Tribe woman must have had some experience with acting in good faith, or she'd never have lasted in the city this long. Good faith the Dai Li had apparently trusted as well; she'd be having words with Agent Chan. "Remember, we're the invaders. One hasty move on her part, one deliberate slip healing - and then where would I be?"

Slowly, Ty Lee rose. "Her aura said she wouldn't," the chi-blocker protested. "She doesn't like you. She really doesn't. But she meant what she said. She... I think she fostered Zuko, Azula. Like - in my family. She didn't do what she wanted to do. She did what he would have wanted."

"And Zuko wanted me alive." Azula raised an eyebrow, testing that idea. It seemed to fit the skeleton of the theory she was building, outlandish as that speculation had to be.

"Of course he would have!" Ty Lee almost vibrated with sincerity. "You're the heir now. What happens to the Fire Nation if you die? Like Lu Ten died. It'd be horrible!"

Like Lu Ten. Agni, that fit so well. Zuko had idolized his cousin. He'd been crushed when Iroh's heir died, denying all the possibilities now open to them. Azulon was too dried-up and cranky to sire another son; Iroh, too faithful to Natsu's memory. The Fire Nation had to have another heir, or risk civil war-

Oh.

Spirits, that was Zuko all over, he never saw the world from the same angle as the rest of the court, and he'd never figured out how to explain to those who did...

Azula brushed off Ty Lee's attempts to help her bathe and dress, going through morning ablutions in a furious haze of thought. With liberal use of cold water splashed on her face, because obviously she needed to wake up to something she'd been missing for years.

Assume Zuko was not an idiot.

Stupid about family, certainly; just as Iroh had been. Which hadn't prevented General Iroh from being one of the most effective, intelligent commanders in Fire Nation history. He'd outwitted and out-fought the Earth Kingdom for decades, until he'd hit the wall - literally - at Ba Sing Se.

But if you ignored all the idiocy Zuko had pulled in the name of family - granted, there was a lot of it to ignore - he was of the same blood as she. Sozin's line. Not just master firebenders, but tactical geniuses.

He saw something I missed.

A civil war in the Fire Nation? Ridiculous. Who would dare?

You know who would.

Frost it all, she did. There were still domains that clung to legends of the time before Kyoshi's edict; still great names that bowed to her father only because they had no choice. Domains like Byakko.

And Zuzu always was Mother's pet.

So. He could have known something the Fire Lord and Azula herself had not. If only hints, and not solid fact. And if he had, and if he hadn't been quite the idiot Father had always insisted he was-

That embarrassment in the war council took on an entirely different complexion.

No one would have taken Zuko seriously about an internal threat to the Fire Nation. Not when he didn't even have experience dealing with the obvious, external threat of the war. Zuko would have known that. And being Zuko - meaning, about as subtle as a fire-blast in dry grass - he would have tried to get some experience.

Oops.

"A good joke?" Ty Lee ventured, over the remains of breakfast.

"Not as a good as I first thought," Azula mused.

Well. At least she was warned now. Though why Zuko would have chosen that reason to act against her when she was the heir-

They don't think you can do it.

She wasn't blind, after all. She knew that Fire Lord Ozai had carefully measured out every drop of power he gave her. If the great names had the wits to see that as well, they might have drawn entirely the wrong conclusion.

Fools.

But perception had almost as much to do with power as reality. Just look at those idiots at the North Pole. They perceived that they'd defeated the Fire Nation, so they'd been willing to weaken their own defenses by sending waterbenders south; probably to aid the remnants of the Southern Water Tribe, given the navy's sightings of them.

They see the Avatar's victory as their victory, and his power as their power.

Come summer, she intended to make that a last, fatal mistake.

She savored that vengeance to come like the most delicate fruit tart. Almost enough to soothe the fury of her defeat.

Temporary defeat. They think they've won. And that overconfidence will kill them. "How much did we lose last night?" Azula said abruptly.

"I'm not sure," Ty Lee admitted.

Azula's eyes narrowed.

"That - that spirit came up through the floor, but you didn't see that, but..." Trembling, Ty Lee huddled on herself.

Terror, Azula saw in that pose. True, gut-wrenching fear. And not of her.

That won't do at all.

With an effort, she made her voice gentler, and touched a chilled hand. "Tell me."

"It - it hurt," Ty Lee managed. "Like it was all the sorrow in the world. You couldn't cheer it up, you couldn't talk to it..." She shivered. "I think I passed out."

An Earth Kingdom haunt. And earth opposes air, Azula calculated. Ty Lee wasn't lying. She might not even be stretching the truth.

"When I woke up - Agent Chan helped me put you to bed. And he said all the Dai Li who'd betray you were gone." Ty Lee smiled, still shaky. "And Kuei's library, too; but I guess we can live with that."

The Earth King's library? Azula blinked, bewildered. What could possibly be worth risking a life for in there? And - all the Dai Li who'd betray her? Damn it, she wanted hard numbers. "And what else?"

"Well... there were fires in the city," Ty Lee admitted. "Some people got killed."

Fires? Whoever was in charge of the rebels had nerve. She'd need to see to it that she enjoyed his execution.

"And," Ty Lee gulped, "I think some of the prisoners of war got away."

"Some?" Azula pointedly withdrew her hand.

"Maybe a lot?"

I'm trying to get hard numbers out of Ty Lee, Azula thought wryly. Obviously, I'm not awake yet. "And Suzuran?"

"They tied up early this morning," Ty Lee said, puzzled. "Why? They can't help Min get away. He already got away."

And earthbenders didn't run. Usually. But Min Wen was half Fire Nation, and Agni only knew what he'd try now. Especially with Mai prodding him along.

I gave you everything you wanted! Why betray me? Why?

Except she hadn't, had she? Mai had been a hawk trapped in a songbird's cage, bleeding from battered wings. She'd given Mai orders to fly, permission to use her deadly talents at her princess' command...

But some hawks would not fly to any falconer's fist. Some would have the skies, or perish.

You weren't supposed to know. You weren't supposed to ever realize there could be life free of me. How dare you fly from me!

A traitor would earn a traitor's death. She just had to arrange the pieces on the board properly. "Get me Agent Chan," Azula directed. "I want the full reports on what happened last night."

After all, Mai had heard her mention Suzuran. Which meant she might realize that any aid the ship could provide might well become Azula's trap.

As if a supply ship could do anything other than toss grain-sacks at a fire, Azula thought wryly. Granted, logistics were key to keeping the army fed and lethal. But right now? If she meant to survive, Mai needed soldiers, not soup.

Better yet, she needs a miracle, Azula thought darkly. I'll find you. All of you. And end you.

City first. Revenge for humiliation later.

Tapping crimson nails on the breakfast table, Azula waited for reports. And dreamed of blood and fire.

"I don't like this."

Hearing the sir Teruko carefully wasn't adding to that, Zuko winced. But he still followed her into the little walled garden, carefully shutting the pierced iron gate behind them. This wasn't a private garden, like Amaya's for herbs or a Middle Ring family's kitchen plot. This was a community garden, worked and protected by poor but proud tenants in the Lower Ring, and there should be people here. Picking greens, weeding the melon-cukes, or even stealing a quiet moment to rest in the greenery, away from war and invasion.

There should be, but there weren't. And with all this earth... an arranged meeting could also be an arranged ambush.

Teruko's glance was eloquent as words. We're being watched.

He knew. He could feel it. And here was the ultimate test.

Do I trust my people? Do I believe they managed to get past Azula? Do I believe we managed to?

A little bad luck. One moment of thoughtlessness. That was all it would take, for everything to fall apart. And the world's spirits hated his people.

So much hate. So much pain. How can any of us trust each other?

Bracing himself, Zuko took off his helmet.

"I knew you were crazy." Huojin stepped out from behind the suspect greenberry bush. "I didn't know you were this crazy."

For a moment, Zuko could only stare. He's here. He's real. I made it this far, we're all still alive-

"Ack! Lee! Armor! Ow!"

One last, fierce hug - checking for weapons or concealed blasting jelly, you could never be too careful - and Zuko stepped back, blinking furiously. Not going to cry. Stupid to cry out here, where anyone could sneak in. Stupid to cry, everything's all right... "You're alive," he rasped out. "That's - I-" Words slipped through his fingers like flames.

Oh, no. Oh no, not here, not now... have to hang on...

Because Huojin was giving him a worried look that suddenly edged over into alarm, and Huojin didn't know Teruko-

No threat. Safe. Us, here, now. Safe, glad to see you, worried...

He'd trapped Huojin's hand between his own. When had he done that? And why?

Huojin gave him the oddest look as Zuko let go, and glanced at Teruko. "So... you're a friend?"

"And we'd better get out of sight," Teruko said practically. "I'll explain. Underground."

"This had better be good," Huojin muttered, shaking out his hand as if it tingled.

No kidding. Dazed, Zuko followed the Guard down into the hole behind the bush. And brightened, even as earth closed overhead. "Suyin. Jia." And it was good to see them, even if they were staring at his armor, but... He glared at Huojin.

"The other earthbenders are busy," Huojin said defensively. "We've got all those Army guys to get settled, Quan's Dai Li are watching over the Earth King, and Tingzhe's in charge of keeping the evacuation moving, poor guy. And we needed somebody who wasn't just going to squash red armor on sight."

"And I came to help," Suyin stated, voice shaking a little as she glanced past him to Teruko's expressionless faceplate. "Jia doesn't like to fight, and - I don't like it either, but I can..." She glanced at her silent sister.

Jia had her hands lowered, studying Teruko with a look of stunned amazement. "You're a woman."

Oh no-

But Teruko was smiling as she took off her helmet. "Yes, ma'am. Lieutenant Teruko. I know Guard Huojin from the prince's description; you'd be Jia and Suyin Wen? Daughters of Meixiang, and Professor Tingzhe Wen?"

Both girls blinked at her. Swiveled their gazes, and gave him a look.

"Your families are already in the middle of everything," Zuko said defensively, uncertain how to read that expression. "Of course I told our marines who you are. In case... well. In case."

Huojin's brows shot up at that. But he kept quiet, as Jia shook her head. "It's just hard to believe," she said, uncertain. "You're fighting soldiers. If something goes wrong... Dad's got histories. Some of them, about prisoners - things can happen."

"That'd be why I'm a marine, not army," Teruko said practically. "Things going wrong usually mean the whole ship's sinking. We usually don't go into the army, to be honest. Home Guard; lots of us join up there. Special units like the Yu Yan, who aren't supposed to be right in the thick of the brawl. And there's always a few like me, who take on the marines. Just because we all learn to fight doesn't mean we're as thickheaded about risking our necks as the guys."

"Hey!" Zuko and Huojin sputtered.

"Private Fushi and I talked about this, sir," Teruko shrugged. "Any way you slice it, we're going to have a lot of girls realizing for the first time they might have to fight, and scared to death that means fighting the way they're heard about. And what do they know? Spirit-tales. Plays. And now a real invasion. They're probably all having nightmares about battles where everybody dies in a blaze of glory; you know what plays are like."

Zuko cringed. Oh boy, did he ever.

"And scared kids don't learn," Teruko went on. "So we need to tell them the truth any time we get a chance. Yes, the Fire Nation fights. Yes, it's scary. But there's no way any of us is going to shove them in the front lines and expect them to kill people. No clan does that. It's not just stupid, it's suicidal."

"But Zuko-" Suyin looked at him, and shut her mouth.

"That," Teruko said in tones that could have cut glass, "is just one of the things Suzuran would like to discuss with the Fire Lord." She caught Zuko's disbelieving look, and had the grace to look abashed. "Not that we'd make it past Azulon's Gates, but... Frost it, sir, we saw what happened at the North Pole. You weren't even old enough to recruit, and he sent you after that? We know your line's got guts. But for the Fire Lord's clan to be that careless of heirs' lives? It's an insult to the whole nation!"

"...Huh?" Zuko managed, utterly confused.

Teruko sighed. "Just think about it, sir. Later." She took a seabag off her shoulder. "Are you still sure about this?"

"Yes," Zuko nodded, already working on his armor ties. "The Earth King knows what we are. I don't want to rub who I am in his face." Unless I have to. "He doesn't wear armor. That's what Guards are for. And this is just a plain private's armor, and all the high officers he's ever dealt with are decked out like painted screens." He lifted the cuirass over his head, letting Teruko store it in the bag. "I don't like it either. But if I need it before we get out of there, everything's gone to Koh in a hand-basket anyway."

"Your call, sir," Teruko sighed.

Shedding armor, Zuko felt eyes on him. Suyin's and Jia's he'd expected. But Huojin's? "What?"

"I knew you had military training, but..." Huojin shook his head. "How long have you been wearing that stuff?"

Taking off a shin-guard, Zuko paused. Made himself keep moving. "Uncle had me in my first full set at eleven." He said I needed it.

"Most great names wait until an heir's twelve," Teruko said levelly, nesting armor together. "But given the circumstances of Lady Ursa's disappearance - specifically that no one seems to know those circumstances, officially - I understand the general's caution."

Treason, Zuko thought bleakly. And Fath- Fire Lord Ozai must have known. All along. Which, in a dark, awful way, made some of what the Fire Lord had done make sense. Prince Zuko took after his mother. Everyone whispered that. And if Ursa had committed treason...

And oh, look. Here I am, a traitor. A bitter smirk touched his face. It's almost funny.

Deep breath. Set it aside. They had to keep moving.

"I knew the Fire Nation was different," Huojin mused, as Zuko clasped a dark cloak over his gray under-tunic. "I just didn't know... I want my kids to grow up safe."

"I can't give you safe," Zuko said bluntly. "I wish I could. But there's a war out there. No one's safe." He sighed. "They're not great names, Huojin. No one's going to send assassins after them. It wouldn't be right." He picked up the seabag with a hidden groan; it was always easier to just wear armor than carry it. Damn politics. "Which way do we go?"

Eyebrows raised, Huojin led them onward, Jia blocking the way behind them with strategic falls of dirt and stone. Each of which set Zuko's teeth on edge.

Trust your people. Trust your skills. There's water in that earth. Not much, but you could use it to dig out if you had to. Teruko's holding it together. You're her leader. Lead.

"So..." Huojin glanced back at them. "You said something about an explanation, Lieutenant?"

"The prince takes after his grandfather," Teruko said simply. "Shidan has a way of getting people to know where they stand."

And where does he stand? Zuko wanted to ask. But not here. Not now. "How's the plan going?"

"Supplies are up in the warehouse already, set to move to a train when we grab it," Huojin told him. "The Earth King's ordered that to go ahead no matter what else gets decided. He wants that scroll cache out of the city. And I hear he thinks we're the best chance for getting earth-healing spread to the rest of the kingdom before some spirit can wipe it out again."

Zuko almost tripped over a crack in the tunnel, and heard Teruko swear under her breath. "Earth-healing?" the marine said in disbelief.

Jia smiled, a sweet echo of Suyin's wry grin. "We found it in the Dai Li's scrolls," she nodded. "It's hard, but... Oma and Shu, think what we can do now!"

Earth-healing. We'll have more healers! Which should be good news. But Zuko cast a glance at Suyin, whose grin had faded into worry. "What's wrong?"

"Wan Shi Tong's a knowledge spirit, but Dad and Amaya think he's the one who made the Dai Li keep forgetting those scrolls," Suyin said seriously. "And he's stealing other things. He tried to steal a letter Shirong says is important to the Avatar, and the war. The Earth King had to banish him from the kingdom!"

Teruko made a choked noise, and Zuko wished he could abandon pride long enough to join her. Granted, he'd heard the Earth King was the spiritual heart of the kingdom. But he'd never heard of any lone Fire Sage who could enforce his will on a spirit with that much power.

Should have kept the armor on.

Silly thought. Ordinary metal wasn't going to defend him against spirits. Or one who had the power to balk them.

Not without help. Zuko took a breath. You've faced the Avatar. You can face a shaman.

"I just don't get it," Suyin went on, worried. "Why would a knowledge spirit want to stop people from knowing things?"

"Wan Shi Tong? Power," Zuko said flatly. "He's all about power. He Who Knows Ten Thousand Things. That's his name. That's what he is. The more people know, the less power he has over them." And... why was everyone giving him odd looks?

Everyone but Teruko. Who'd started, and now smiled, as if running into an old friend.

"You know about this spirit?" Huojin frowned. "I don't think I'd ever heard of him before - well, before that mess with Tingzhe and the fox."

"A fox took Tingzhe's form?" Zuko bit back his own snarl. "Over-powered feather-duster... People hear knowledge spirit, they think sharing. Because that's what people do. What you don't know can really hurt you. And he knows that. He doesn't share, he hoards. He never steals it, oh no; he lets his foxes take the fall for that. But if you have a book on Koh, or anything on why only the Water Tribes never pay tithes to the Air Temples..." He shook his head, recalling a fox in Ran's shape, and exactly how fiercely he'd made his point that not so much as a fox's whisker would ever come near one of his clan again.

...Which didn't make any sense, because he knew he'd never seared the tail off a fox in his life.

And I don't know any Ran!

Amaya. He had to talk to Amaya. He'd been hit by lightning, even if he had redirected it. What if he'd missed something?

What if I didn't?

After all, yāorén were supposed to help the Avatar. And he couldn't think of anything more likely to make most people run back to "the world's a friendly place, really" Aang than feeling like something was dangerously unmoored in their heads.

Damn you, Yangchen. I know this is your fault. And it's not. Going. To work.

Water. Fire. Spirit. And now earth. Something ought to be able to fix what was wrong with him. Without going anywhere near Aang.

The Avatar's got the whole world pulling for him. My people need me.

Like Teruko says: Not. Expendable. Not anymore.

"Tithes?" Huojin was still frowning as they walked.

At least he could fall back on his studies for that. Thank Agni. "What, you think people can live on top of a mountain and be vegetarians?" Zuko said sourly. "I've climbed up there, Huojin. There's not a race of grain on the Eastern Continent that'll grow that high. Not much does, besides orchards. You can't live on just fruits and nuts. And they didn't. They had arrangements for everything else."

"Mostly, we watch for bad weather, you feed us," Teruko spoke up. "That's what they say in school, anyway. I don't know if it was the same over here in the east, but in the Fire Nation... if you don't know the story, you'll hear it soon enough. You want to get people worked up against airbenders even today? Say Joetsu. And heir to Kyoshi. Sozin did. And the rest is... history."

"Really didn't help that the Western elders showed up looking for their tithe a week after that hurricane hit," Zuko said darkly. "Saying they needed extra, they were having a lot of kids that year."

Huojin almost said something; looked at the two girls with them, and bit it back to, "Damn."

You can say that again, Zuko thought, worried. There was no way he should know that about the kids.

But I do.

He knew what had happened. And the worst of it was knowing that it didn't have to happen. Eastern grains wouldn't cut it, no; but Byakko had worked out millennia ago how to grow crops almost up into a snowcap. No hou e nohara. Plant a dozen different vines, herbs, blood-amaranth, teosinte-buckwheat, potato-chokes, and trees all together, varying the varieties by altitude. Separately they'd die; working together, they warmed and protected each other in alpine terraces.

With enough determination and work, everything thrived.

Volcanic soil doesn't hurt, either.

But the temples hadn't done it. They wouldn't do it. The mountain fields needed care, attention, and a clan working together, year after year. They needed attachment.

And Air Nomads can't get attached. To anything.

"Tithes," Huojin muttered. "Not what you think about when anybody talks about peaceful nomads."

"I don't know if they went to the temples, but there were tithes," Suyin said, troubled. "Dad says that's another part of how Chin got so far conquering the kingdom. He organized the tithe. So villages that'd had a bad year got help paying it."

"Still doesn't make sense," Huojin objected. "The Air Nomads were peaceful, right? Understanding types? They didn't fight. What did people think they'd do if someone just said no?"

"If you know Kyoshi's story," Teruko stated, "you already know what we thought they could do."

Silence. Only the scrape of shoes on stone, as they kept walking.

Zuko looked at too-quiet girls, and Huojin, and Teruko's stubborn face. And sighed. "Look. Whatever happened then, it's over now. Maybe between your father, and the Earth King's library, and Uncle - you wouldn't believe the scrolls Uncle can find - maybe we can figure out what really happened. Who we should all be angry at. If there is anybody. Someone hurt Kyoshi, Kyoshi hurt us, Fire Lord Sozin-" He had to swallow, hard. "My great-grandfather started a war that hurt everybody. Maybe it's his fault. Probably a lot of it's his fault. But he's dead, and we're not. And I'm going to try to keep us that way. And so's the lieutenant. I know she's scary-"

"Sir!"

"You're a marine," Zuko said practically, giving her a jaundiced look. "You want to tell me you're not scary? You don't eat fire and brimstone for breakfast, with a few Earth Kingdom soldiers for dessert?"

"Rather have melon-cukes, sir," Teruko said staunchly. "Save the soldiers for trawling for leopard-sharks." One hand near her mouth, she gave the girls a deliberate stage-whisper. "Though that's not really working too well anymore. The last leopard-shark damn near choked on one of those guys' beards, and I think he told his friends."

Dead silence.

"Um." Zuko looked at two faintly green girls, and one Guard blinking as if he'd finally seen a piece of idiocy that outdid everything else on the streets. "Not funny?"

"You know," Huojin sighed, "so much about you is painfully clear now..."

"I'm... sorry?" The betraying heat of embarrassment burned in his face, and Zuko briefly entertained thoughts of stomping Huojin's glow-lamp into welcome darkness.

"I'm not," Teruko muttered grumpily. "It was just a frosted joke."

"And I've heard worse out of Guards, and soldiers off the Wall," Huojin said soberly, patting Suyin on the shoulder. "Just not around kids."

Zuko winced. "...Oh."

"Kids?" Teruko glanced at her commander. "You said the little one was thirteen."

"I am!" Suyin fired back. "But we don't - nobody fights here, I-"

Jin caught her shoulder. "We didn't grow up with a war," the older girl said. Voice steady, even if she was still pale. "It was something you read about in books, or spirit-tales. And now it's here and it's real and it's so awful..." She took a ragged breath. "It's - it's just hard, Lieutenant. We're scared. All the time. I don't know how you can joke about it."

Now Teruko was red. "My fault," she said stiffly. "I didn't realize you'd be unblooded."

"Mine," Zuko corrected. "I'm the one who lived here." His heart sank. "This is going to be a lot harder than I thought."

Huojin gave him a searching look. Then, ruefully, smiled. "You'll make it work. If we can learn to trust some Dai Li enough to get Min back, we can handle a few firebenders. No matter how far they've got their boots stuck in their mouths."

Teruko snorted.

"So you did get him out," Zuko sighed, relieved. "The report Shirong sent was a little sketchy on that part..."

And the girls were definitely not looking at him.

Oh no. "What did you do?" Zuko asked warily.

"Stayed home with Jinhai," Suyin grumbled. "Somebody had to."

"Oh good- wait." Because if the girl he'd been training to fight had stayed home... Zuko glared at Jia. "What did you do?"

"N-nothing," the earthbender said uncertainly. "Much."

"I know that tone," Zuko mused, half to himself. "I've used that tone. On Uncle. He never looked very happy about it." Oh, Agni. "So. How badly did you risk your neck, and how many knives is your mother heating up to deal with me?"

"Um..."

"I'm dead," Zuko muttered.

"She's still alive, sir," Teruko observed. "Her mother should just make you wish you were dead."

"I think Meixiang thinks you'll have enough to worry about," Huojin grinned. "Jia trapped Azula in the throne room floor. I hear she wasn't too happy about it."

"You what?" Zuko yelped.

"It's a long story?" Jia tried.

"Start talking."

"Okay..."

Agni, Zuko thought some time later; not sure if it was a prayer or a curse. Oh, Agni.

It didn't help that Teruko was coughing. To cover her giggles.

"Something stuck in your throat, Lieutenant?" Huojin asked wryly.

"Just remembering an old marine curse," Teruko snickered. "May you have a dozen subordinates just like you."

"It isn't funny!" Jia gulped, almost in tears. Suyin linked hands with her, glaring daggers at them all. "There were spirits and we had to sneak into the palace and I had to pretend I was bringing a morning-after poem and I thought I was going to die..."

Zuko let out a breath, trying to push the terror and belated battle-rush aside. "Good work."

"I... what?"

"You stuck to the plan. You did your job. You didn't die," Zuko said bluntly. "You went up against my sister and walked away in one piece. That's amazing." He shivered, wishing he could breathe air that didn't taste like rock. "Do me a favor? Try not to do that ever again?"

"Not without some more training," Teruko put in. "It's not good to scare your lord if you can get around it. When dragon-children get jumpy, things get fried."

"Teruko," Zuko groaned, "I'm not-"

Damn. That was light ahead. Not theirs. "Are we supposed to be near the guards?"

"I think so. Darn tunnels all look alike..." Huojin glanced at Jia, who nodded. "I'll go clear the way."

Oh great. Earth Kingdom guards. This is going to be so much fun.

It wasn't.

Do not feed them their spears.

Granted, they were Earth Kingdom, and he and Teruko were obviously not. And granted, the half-dozen armed soldiers were tired, upset, and guarding people Zuko very much wanted safe. But Huojin and the girls were here to vouch for them both, and they were all running out of time.

And admit it, Zuko told himself. What really ticks you off is that they think six of them is enough to stop us.

Which, as Uncle kept trying to pound through his thick head, was just pride, pure and simple. And as silly as their spear-tipped posturing as they questioned Huojin. Sillier; he knew how much every minute counted, and how little they could afford to waste any of them.

Though even knowing how silly it was, he wanted to bristle. Did they think he wanted to be down here, in this cold cave-damp air that didn't taste anything like honest sun-touched breezes-

Wait a minute.

Zuko lifted an open hand, trying not to react to the sudden bristle of steel his way. Drew his fingers together, and down.

Wisping out of damp air, drops of water swirled together over his hand.

"I'm Lee," Zuko said levelly, meeting the wide-eyed gaze of the grizzled soldier in charge.

"Amaya's waterbending apprentice." He clenched his fingers, droplets freezing into a blade of ice.

"How much more proof do you need?"

"But she's-"

"A firebender," Zuko cut the sergeant off; from the way Teruko's eyes had narrowed, any whisper of the word woman would end in blood drawn. "She's here to help. At the Earth King's request."

"Help," the sergeant's younger partner scoffed. "Firebenders don't belong inside the Walls!"

"Or anybody who might whelp firebenders," a vicious whisper came from the back.

Jia paled, and Suyin glared.

Agni, it's good they've kept Jinhai undercover. "Don't worry," Zuko said grimly. "We're leaving as soon as we can shake the dust off."

Oh, look at that, he thought as the guards stiffened. Uncle's Earth Kingdom books were right; that is an insult.

Because there was wasting time, and then there was defending your people's honor. Which was never a waste of time.

"As he said, they're here on his majesty's business," Huojin stepped into the breach. "The sooner they take care of that, the sooner they'll be gone." He eyed one particular guard in the back. "And by the way, Fu? You're a jerk. And I'm glad I'm leaving. I never, ever want my daughters to meet any of your family."

"Spirits, man," the sergeant choked. "Luli's Fire Nation?"

"No, Sergeant Sung," Huojin bit out. "I am."

The guards recoiled. Zuko tried not to care. At least the spears were all out of their way...

But he could see the hurt the girls were trying to hide, as they walked out of the last tunnel into an echoing, shelter-stuffed cavern that smelled of damp stone and cooking food and people. "I wish I could change things," Zuko said quietly. "I wish the world wasn't this messed up. But... here we are."

"We'll be okay," Suyin said fiercely. "We will. We got Min back. Those guys - they don't matter."

"Yes, they do," Jia said, unhappy. "I hate it, but they do. That's why we have to go." She gave Zuko her own fierce look, that reminded him of a certain water-netted cat. "You'd better be as good as Dad thinks you are. I don't care if I never get to dress up for a party again. I'm not letting Jinhai grow up here." She looked at the ripple in the crowd as a small body darted around adults. "Even if he is a brat."

"Lee!"

Jinhai thumped into him like a mini-fireball, words a confused mix of where were you, where are we going, and we got Min back, everybody was so scared-

So much for a dignified entrance, Zuko thought ruefully, letting the young boy cling and hold and make sure he was really real.

Teruko peered around him to eye Jinhai carefully. "I take it this is Jinhai, sir?"

"Another of my students," Zuko said simply, resting a hand on brown hair. "Professor Wen's youngest."

"Your - oh." Teruko's face gentled, just a little. She stifled a laugh. "The captain's never going to know what hit him."

Jinhai lifted his head away from Zuko's robe, and green eyes widened. "Who are you?"

"She's Lieutenant Teruko," Jia told him, smiling as Suyin scanned the cavern for the rest of their family. "She's got an awful sense of humor. But she's trying."

Teruko grinned wryly.

"She's a marine from the supply ship Suzuran," Zuko stated, addressing the growing crowd as much as Jinhai. "She's here to help."

"What's a marine?" Jinhai wondered.

"Shipboard and littoral battle specialist," Teruko said crisply. "If someone tries to attack the captain's ship, we stop them."

"But... you're a girl," Jinhai protested.

Oh no. Zuko winced.

"I thought you knew better than to think that about your sisters, young man," Tingzhe said dryly, striding through the crowd. "You're a girl is precisely the mistake Princess Azula made, that let Jia strike to win us all free."

Handing over Jinhai to his father's welcoming arms, Zuko felt the blood drain from his face all over again. "Are you sure you're all okay?" he managed.

"Yes," Tingzhe said gravely. "Even the princess. The Earth King's decision, after due consideration on what the Fire Lord would likely do if she died here. Though that does leave us with the unavoidable problem of her here, and angry. I don't suppose you have ideas how we might handle that?"

She's alive. Zuko tried not to sigh in relief. Uneasy relief. Yes, she was cruel. Yes, sometimes he just hated her. Yes, her life might save Ba Sing Se in the short run, but what it could do to the Fire Nation in the long term...

But she was his sister. He didn't want her to die. No matter how... convenient it might have been.

Up against Azula. Not good.

Yet... it wasn't necessarily bad, either. Azula targeted her malice. If they planned things right, they could make certain that malice found a focus that was not Ba Sing Se.

Meaning us. Then we just have to survive it.

Details, details.

"I have some plans," Zuko stated. "Where can I find-"

The crowd parted like wind-blown grain, and Earth King Kuei regarded him.

He's got guards, Zuko saw, relieved. Good. And there were Bon, Shirong, and Quan; thank the spirits. If anyone could give Kuei the dose of reality he needed, they could. If anyone could keep him safe-

None of us are safe. They'll keep him a moving target.

"I would guess," Kuei said plainly, eyeing the mass of those kneeling and not, and clearly noting Zuko and Teruko hadn't even twitched away from standing, "your name isn't really Lee."

"Earth King Kuei." Zuko inclined his head, one great name to another. Huojin and the others had faded back with Tingzhe; good. "I am Zuko, son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai."

Kuei blanched. Bon and Quan looked like they wanted to be anywhere else. And Shirong, damn him, had a crinkle around his eyes like someone who wanted to break down giggling.

A sound like a gust of wind seemed to fill the cavern. Zuko kept his fingers from curling with an effort, ready to fight or flee-

Like a great wave, those refugees not already bowing kneeled.

I... what?

Kuei blinked. Glanced over the crowds, and turned a stunned look on Zuko. "You? You're the Fire Lord's...?"

Wait for it, Zuko told himself sardonically. Any minute now. Monster, traitor, spirit-cursed - which one are you going to pick?

"...Do you have any idea what your sister is doing up there?"

"She tried to fry me with lightning," Zuko said wryly. What's going on? They know I'm an exile, I know they do. They can't mean... Just keep going. "I think I can guess."

"Your sister," Kuei emphasized. "She is your responsibility. A family, a village, a city deals with its own problems. The actions she takes, the debts she incurs, are yours to bear."

"Maybe in the Earth Kingdom." Zuko's glare didn't yield. "In the Fire Nation, your actions reflect on those you honor, who you have loyalty to. She carries out the Fire Lord's will, for she is loyal to our father. I am not." He drew a breath. "Not anymore."

Another carrying whisper; surprise, this time. Yet still, no anger.

Why?

He couldn't ask. He couldn't risk losing momentum, as Kuei hesitated and those of both nations began to stand.

Kuei looked him over again. "You might notice that you're standing in the Earth Kingdom."

"I am standing on Earth Kingdom land," Zuko said, just as blunt. "But the Fire Nation, is the people." Deadlock, your majesty. We're going to start this on equal terms if I have to drag you there kicking and screaming.

Quiet. Green eyes met gold, gazes pushing...

I can take him. I'm stronger, more experienced-

I'm... out of my mind. I don't want this city, damn it!

It was hard to push back the fire. To hold at bay the water that said these people were his tribe, and anything that threatened them had to die.

Kuei is not a threat. Breathe.

"Your majesty," Zuko nodded slightly. "You want the Fire Nation out of your city, and Azula gone. But more than that, you want to help Avatar Aang restore balance to the world."

"Avatar Aang," Kuei said bleakly, "is dead."

"No," Zuko said simply. "He's not."

"What?"

"Katara of the Southern Water Tribe was carrying a gift of the spirits," Zuko stated. "She brought him back. He was gravely injured, Healer Amaya can tell you how bad lightning is, but he's alive." He looked over the crowd, taking in fear, wonder, hope. "Katara and I are healers. Right now, the Avatar's weak enough that I wouldn't put him up against a wet pygmy puma. But he will recover. He just needs time. We have to buy him that time." He fixed Kuei with his gaze again. "Aang's in no shape to save anybody right now. We have to do it ourselves. And we can."

Kuei blinked. But some of the tension eased out of his shoulders. "We?"

"This will only work if we do it together," Zuko said soberly. Damn it, he'd written a speech for this, agonized over it... and now it all seemed to fly out of his head.

Keep going. You can cross lava, if you just keep going.

"The heart of this war isn't the Fire Nation," Zuko began. "Not the war, not the army - not even the occupation. They're the symptoms, not the disease. You can try to bring down the fever all you want, but if you don't clean out the infection, it won't stop."

Kuei's brows went up. "And just what do you think is the disease, Prince Zuko?"

He's not sure about me. Why should he be? I'm not sure about me. I can say what I want about trying to fix the world, I can mean it - but I want my people to live. "The world's out of balance. We have to fix it."

"And how would this - proposed place of resistance you mean to build do that?" Kuei's face was stern. "Balance came from the four nations; the four elements. And the Air Nomads are gone." His eyes narrowed. "Your great-grandfather saw to that."

An uneasy murmur from the onlookers; Zuko hid a vindictive smile. You really haven't had to deal with court politics, have you, Kuei?

No, down. Bad prince. Do not hand him his head. Won't help your people.

...Though, as Toph would say, a little bit of slicey wouldn't hurt. "You're right," Zuko agreed. And saw Shirong flinch, ever so slightly.

Hey, he asked for it.

"Fire Lord Sozin created a horror, and none of us will ever be free of it," Zuko went on. "The Air Nomads are dead. That crime is on our heads. Even though no one here committed those crimes, even though no one here would ever want to, even though every bender who began the war is dead and ashes - the spirits still pour their blood on our hands. You think I don't know that? You think I haven't spent my life enduring the spirits' hate, just for who I was born? You think I didn't risk my life, risk challenging Avatar Kyoshi's own decree, just to break free of the Fire Lord's power? As everyone here has? Yes. We know. The Air Nomads are dead. And the world calls us guilty." He took a breath, gripping tight on a temper that threatened to slip free and burn. "The Nomads are dead. But airbending doesn't have to be."

Kuei didn't - quite - flinch. But he looked less certain. "How?"

He's willing to listen. Don't blow it. "The Northern Air Temple is inhabited."

Kuei started, and a wave of fierce whispers began.

"They're Earth Kingdom villagers," Zuko went on, hiding his surprise that Shirong hadn't mentioned it. Then again, he's got an idea how dangerous it is for them to be there. "Or, they were. Now they use gliders. They live with the sky." He shook his head. "They're not airbenders, not yet. But they could be."

"Could be is a thin wall to hold against the world," Kuei said quietly.

"That's why I have a backup plan," Zuko replied. "Adaptability. Perseverance. Will. Water, earth, and fire. Ba Sing Se has supported every element here. Except air. Because air is freedom." Breathe. "If we build a place for that, where any tribe and nation can live together... we'll find airbenders. And with your help, we'll have the scrolls to teach them." He held Kuei's gaze. "Avatar Yangchen thinks it could work."

"Avatar Yangchen?" Quan blurted in disbelief.

"You probably never got to see it," Zuko grimaced. "And I hope you never have to. When the Avatar's hurt... sometimes, one of the other Avatars can take over." He glanced at some of his own people in the crowd. "Yes, I told Avatar Roku what I thought of him. If he wanted me fried, it was already too late to run." He snickered. "I don't think he likes me much."

Toothy grins spread in half the crowd. Zuko stifled a laugh in a cough. Spirits, Kuei's face...

"Do you often go around angering great spirits?" the Earth King said, with an air of morbid curiosity.

"I have it on good authority that I give spirits a headache," Zuko said wryly. Sobered. "Your majesty, I have no choice. Avatar Kyoshi's decree bound the Fire Nation to serve the Fire Lord. To stop the war, to stop any of it - we must disobey the Avatar."

Kuei frowned. "Avatar Kyoshi's decree?"

"Yes, your majesty," Shirong spoke up. "The whole story is long, and ugly; I've had Madam Wen write it down so we can print it. In short... a little over three centuries ago, the Fire Nation was more like Kyoshi Island is today. Each island might have its own ruler, and there was no central government. When they went to war, they fought each other. Not us."

"We have to fight," Zuko said, at Kuei's incredulous look. "It's our nature. We are children of fire; we need it. Just as you need laws, and deals, and fortresses of stone. But Kyoshi..." He drew a sharp breath, forcing himself not to call fire. "Kyoshi thought she had the right to change all that." Breathe. Don't kill anyone. "And she killed half our people doing it."

Kuei paled. "You accuse Avatar Kyoshi-"

"Of the truth!" Now his fists did clench, fire blazing before he could snuff it. "She came, she killed, she chained us to the Fire Lord, and we've gone mad trying to escape. Look around you, Kuei! These are the people who ran. Who survived." Zuko opened his hands, heart aching. "These are my people as they should be."

Outside of the whole, "we all have to hide who we are" part. Let's not get into that.

"You need Azula out of the city," Zuko went on. "More than that, you need the Fire Army distracted, so the remaining Earth Kingdom forces stand a chance of regrouping." He looked Kuei straight in the eye. "Help us with this plan, and they'll definitely be distracted."

"Your sister hates you that much?" There was sorrow in Kuei's eyes. But not, thank the spirits, disbelief.

"Yes," Zuko admitted. "Yes, she does. But what she feels about me won't matter. Your majesty, I know who designed that drill. I know what else he's been helping the Fire Nation build, and why. And I know why he stopped." He looked over the crowd. "Believe it or not, that engineer is a good man. The Avatar helped him free himself. But he won't stay free. Not if the Fire Nation makes a determined assault." Another sweep of listening faces, and Zuko nodded. "Not unless we help him."

"You know," Kuei said into that listening silence, "Agent Shirong gave me the impression you were planning an evacuation. An escape."

Zuko smiled, and saw grown men flinch. "Earth and Fire have more in common than you think. Including a fighting retreat."

That seemed to strike home; Kuei rocked back on his heels, and gave him the slightest nod.

He believes me. Oh Agni, please let this work.

"If you're looking for safety, I can't give it to you," Zuko addressed the crowd. "All I can offer is another kind of danger. My people will try to keep you safe. Our object is to distract, build, and defend. But we will have to fight. Here, on the way, when we're building - any of these. Maybe all of them. You know what you risked to get here. Only you can decide what you're willing to risk now. I will not demand your loyalty." He softened his voice. "I'm not the one who should have the first claim."

Startled looks, and a murmur of dismay.

Zuko nodded toward Kuei. "The Earth King tends to the spirits of this city, just as our great names do. And no matter what else they've done, what Long Feng ordered them by their loyalty to do - the Dai Li hunt evil spirits, and track down malice. Just as our Fire Sages do." He straightened. "To wish this city as your home, this king as your lord, is not dishonorable."

...He really, really needs some court lessons, Zuko thought, watching Kuei gape. He looks like I slapped him with an octopus.

He kept a straight face; if he ignored Kuei's slip, everyone else would, too. Give them long enough, they'd convince themselves it'd never happened at all. "We need to do this together. I need people of every nation if this plan is going to work. And so do you. The Avatar has taught that the nations have to be separate? That's what let the Fire Lord get this far! The Air Nomads, the Southern Water Tribe, the western Earth cities... one after another they fall, and the rest of the world watches. Because it's not their problem. It's not their people." He swept a hand across. "How many of us here are alive because Amaya left the North Pole? Because she came to help?" He fixed Kuei with a glare that couldn't help but be angry. "How many Earth Kingdom soldiers would be alive, if the Northern Water Tribe had allied with you?"

Breathe. Hang on. Just a little longer.

"We think we're separate nations, but separation is an illusion," Zuko stated. "Strip away the elements, strip away the traditions - we're all people. People who can choose to stand aside and watch... or decide what's happening in the world is evil. And fight for our lives." He let out a slow breath. "I want us to fight together."

Kuei took off his glasses, polishing them on his sleeve. Put them back on, and shook his head. "You're not quite sane, are you?"

Sane people don't have their families trying to kill them. "Sane people don't spend years chasing an Avatar a century gone," Zuko said plainly. "But I was right, Kuei. He was out there. I found him." There's got to be something more I can say. Something better.

But his mind was blank. Wonderful. He could feel the silence stretching, and if it went on too long, everything he'd argued for could still go down in flames...

"With all due respect, your majesty," Teruko said into the silence, "all the great names are crazy." She nodded at Zuko. "They hold our loyalty. They protect us from spirits, as much as they can. They stand for us against other great names. And they have to be noble, upright, and honorable beyond reproach, when they know - they know - the quickest, most ruthless way to shatter a domain's resistance, is to shatter its lord." She paused, gold eyes searching Kuei's. "I learned to fight because I always wanted to be a marine. But we all learn to. Because if someone decides to tip over into Low War, the lord's children are targets."

Kuei blanched. "That's horrible."

"We're not nice people." Zuko tamped down a rush of sudden, weary anger. "We're honorable. We're decent. We keep our word. But we're fire, Kuei. When we get mad, things burn." He spread empty hands. "We're fire, and we're dangerous, and if you ever thought you could turn your back on a great name and be safe, I'd have to smack you for being an idiot. We are not safe. Fire makes you act, not think. A lot of us know that. A lot of us try to think our way out of things. But sometimes, we just don't." He drew in a breath, let it sigh out. "But we can be allies. We just have to find common ground. Not deals. Not loyalty. Just... some kind of promise both of us can keep." He glanced at Shirong. "I sent a proposal back with Agent Shirong's messenger."

"To carve out part of my kingdom and hand it over?" Kuei looked at him askance. "For one who claims to be going against Fire Lord Sozin's will, that looks awfully familiar."

Zuko raised a finger at a time. "First, there's hardly anyone up there anyway. It used to be close to Air Nomad territory, and your people still tend to stay clear. Second - the way the currents travel, right now it's probably getting hit almost as hard as the North Pole by angry spirits. I hope anybody who is there had sense to run. Third... Kuei. If this works, the mountain right next door is going to be full of airbenders. Do you want them right on the edge of your kingdom without a buffer?"

"No," Kuei admitted, after a moment's sober consideration. "No, I have to say I don't. I've read the Song of Li Feng. Some of my ancestors would never have been born of the desert winds if it wasn't for Monk Xiangchen." He smiled ruefully. "And if some were driven into the desert to sail the sands, who's to say some didn't hide among villages in the north, and forget the winds to live? To have some of their descendants seek it again, a millennium later. If the spirits like irony, it would serve that bloody-handed fanatic right."

"Monk Xiangchen?" Zuko said carefully. The name sounded familiar, almost. The way Ran's name was familiar, and the scent of burning fox fur. "Your majesty, are you saying there's Air Nomad blood in the Earth Kingdom?" From the shock on people's faces, he wasn't the only one who'd never heard this before.

"Oh, I'd imagine there's some everywhere." Kuei nudged his glasses up. "Not a lot; Xiangchen's followers held onto their scent like a shirshu. But-" He stopped himself, and shook his head. "We don't have time. I'll give Professor Wen a list of the scrolls I remember. I'm sure you can find more in the archive later." Behind glass, young eyes were intent. "Those records have to make it out with your ship, Prince Zuko. If Wan Shi Tong has been stealing from every unprotected library, and making the Dai Li themselves forget what they hold in their own keeping - you have no idea how much the world doesn't know."

"You have my word," Zuko promised. "I will care for them as I care for my people."

Which didn't mean he wouldn't sacrifice some to save the rest. If he had to. But if things went right...

Please let this work. Agni, if you're listening - I don't care if the truth does mean Sozin's a villain. If we can just find it, find some way to piece the world back together-

Wait. Somebody hadn't been surprised at Kuei's bombshell.

Teruko.

The lieutenant had known there was airbender blood in people who weren't Air Nomads. How? Why?

And why did even thinking about it make him feel angry and sick all at once? As if he'd pulled a man from a churning maelstrom... to realize a storm-wet hand had buried a dagger in his heart.

Spirits. He knew Amaya was busy with her own part of the evacuation, working with Meixiang; and, not coincidentally, keeping a careful eye on Min. Which was a good thing. Anybody who'd had Azula breathing down his neck needed some looking after. Just to be reminded the whole world wasn't knives and poison.

But I need to talk to you, Master Amaya. Soon.

"I believe you," Kuei said thoughtfully. And held out a hand. "I accept the word of Zuko, son of Ursa and Fire Lord Ozai."

Zuko clasped it, and shook.

"And Lee," Kuei added, smiling, "Amaya's apprentice. You're a yāorén?"

He knows? Zuko tried not to freeze. Oh, no.

Deep breath. Aang wasn't coming back to Ba Sing Se anytime soon. What Kuei knew shouldn't matter. He hoped.

"That must be incredible; if we have time-" Kuei cut himself off, and chuckled a little. "But first, we need to double-check a map. I have it on good authority I can't just tell a great name to go ahead, and then turn my back on him."

"Damn right," Teruko muttered, satisfied.

Zuko felt himself smile in pure relief. We can do this. We can. "Big enough to hold us, and have defensible borders. That's all I'm asking."

"We'll see," Kuei said, with just a touch of amused haughtiness. Raised his eyebrows, and looked around the cavern. "Well? Shouldn't some of us be moving?"

"Hail his majesty!" went up from the center of the crowd.

"Hail Earth King Kuei!"

Listening to that thunderous cheer, Zuko straightened his shoulders. Even if everything else went wrong right now, even if Azula fell on their heads - Kuei's people were behind him.

You bit off Ba Sing Se, Azula. Now let's see if you can chew it.

"Hail Prince Zuko!"

...Wait. What?

Grinning, Teruko steered him by the shoulder out of the cheering crowd, falling into step with the Dai Li and Kuei as they headed for Kuei's maps. "Come on, sir. Let's go see how much damage a pair of great names can do to some borders."

A/N: No hou e nohara - "In the direction of the field" - adaptation of the Mexican Spanish milpa.

All right. About the North Pole. I am not trying to tell anyone what to think about whether what Aang did there was right or not. That, you have to decide for yourselves. I'm writing the characters' points of view. Zuko thinks the results of the North Pole were horrific; what else can he think, when his people died? The Northern Water Tribe, on the other hand, probably thinks it was the best thing since the invention of blubber jerky. And in the canon universe, the rest of the world (minus the Fire Nation) likely thinks that as well.

Here's my interpretation of the whole North Pole situation. In the canon universe, not Embers.

The Fire Navy aggressively and deliberately attacked the North Pole. And Zhao, who ordered it, and probably most of the higher-ups answering to him, deserved to get smashed to bits. (Your average sailor didn't, but given the situation - war is hell.)

Ignore that Aang could have come up with other solutions. (I thought of at least three, including 1) Use wind and water to "blow the fleet away", 2) Use wind and water to create a massive ice fortification around the Pole just like he did to divert lava from the volcano; this at the very least would buy them more time for a better plan, 3) Fly cover while the waterbenders used ice to gut the Fire Navy ships under the waterline.) Aang's a teenage boy under incredible pressure, it was a last-ditch situation, and you use the weapons you have to hand. So. Invasion fleet wiped out. Massive cheering. Yay, go good guys.

Except.

Except the Avatar is leaving. Has to leave, to master earthbending. And everyone knows that. And the Fire Nation still has more ships.

This is what gets to me about Aang in general, and the North Pole in specific. In the real world, actions have consequences.

A charge sometimes leveled at the Fire Nation, particularly in regard to the Siege of the North, is "genocidal". With respect to the Air Nomads, in canon, this is accurate. It's also a hundred years old, and there's no reason to believe anyone involved in that attack is still alive today. Still, the past is prelude, and Sozin is held up as a hero, meaning it's reasonable to consider that if they did it once, they'd do it again. But what happened to the Southern Water Tribe, while horrible, is not genocide. The Fire Nation is specifically shown going after waterbenders. Non-benders are fought, but wiping them out is not the objective. It may be the eventual result, but Fire Lord Sozin's (and so, it's implied, the Fire Nation's) goal was to subjugate the rest of the world. Subjugate: to forcibly impose obedience or servitude. Dead people aren't subjugated. Zhao's stated goal at the North Pole (before he led that raid on the Spirit Oasis) was to destroy the Northern Water Tribe's "greatest city". Not to kill them all.

Another charge leveled at the Fire Nation is "war criminals". Nice. Let's not belabor the point of how what constitutes a war criminal has changed over the centuries, or that the Avatar world doesn't seem to have ever had a Geneva Convention. Let's even gloss over that little incident with Earth Kingdom soldiers attempting to crush Iroh's hands while he was a POW, after he tried to escape.

Instead, let's take it as a given that many of the Fire Nation are war criminals. Let's even throw in genocidal. Zhao's intentions were certainly close enough (killing the Moon? Beyond Idiot Ball), and while Zhao is not a good sample of the Fire Nation as a whole, you can definitely argue that the Northern Water Tribe has no reason to know that.

So. You're the Northern Water Tribe, and you believe the Fire Nation are genocidal war criminals.

If that is the case, why would anybody approve of a defensive plan for the North Pole that assumes they're not?

If the Fire Navy is made up of reasonable, rational military men - then yes, Koizilla will stop them. For a while. The HSQ (Holy S Quotient) alone of that level of losses will make any sane admiral think twice. No matter what Ozai threatens them with.

If, however, the Fire Nation are war criminals bent on genocide - no. They won't stop. They'll barely even be slowed down. History shows that, over and over again. Genocides go on until there's no one left to kill... or someone stops the perpetrators with force. And makes it clear they will repeat said force, as often as it takes.

A person commits a criminal act for one overriding reason: because he thinks he can. The Fire Navy attacked the North Pole because they thought the Northern Water Tribe was weak enough that they could do it, and get away with it. They were wrong about the second part - but they were right about the first. And Koizilla has done nothing to change that impression. So the Fire Nation lost a whole fleet of the navy? They lost it to the Avatar. And they know that.

Which means, if anybody on Ozai's side is using any common sense at all, come the next new moon near the summer solstice (or even more likely, the return of Sozin's Comet), the Northern Water Tribe would get an extremely unpleasant surprise. When the firebenders come back to finish the job.

Because given Koizilla, the Fire Nation is not afraid of the Northern Water Tribe. They're afraid of the Avatar.

And Aang won't be there.

The Fire Nation has been fighting this war for a hundred years, and searching for the Avatar just as long. They know what the Avatar's capable of, and what he's going to try to do; restore balance and defeat the Fire Lord. And they know exactly what destructive capability the comet's return is going to give them. In that coming summer, the Fire Nation knows Aang has one of three options. First, hide. He did it for a hundred years, after all. And if he does that... well, the Fire Nation has already proven someone can get into the middle of the Water Tribe's city itself to steal the Avatar away. So he probably won't hide there. Second, keep working on mastering earthbending or firebending; both of which, again, imply he won't be at the North Pole. Third, face Ozai and/or the Fire Nation forces, no matter what his training level, to try and stop the destruction to come. Again, very unlikely to be at the North Pole.

Plus the Fire Nation is running a war, and that implies scouts and spies. Aang's not exactly inconspicuous. No matter where he's likely to be, the Fire Nation stands a good chance of knowing where he is at any given point in time. Or at the very least, of knowing where he was a few days ago. They know how fast Appa flies; they know the bison's effective range without stopping for food, water, and rest. Given that, they know exactly what kind of window of time they'll have.

Ironically, genocidal or not, if the Fire Nation didn't have strategically sound reasons to attack the North Pole before Aang went there, they definitely do now. Aang won't be there. They have days of evidence that head to head, they can take the waterbenders as long as the daylight holds out. Crushing the Northern Water Tribe deprives Aang of powerful allies. The Water Tribes are supporting Aang's invasion of the Fire Nation itself; their own backyard. Add to the mix that the Fire Nation is incredibly angry over what happened to their fleet... oh yes. They might not be out for genocide, but they will be out to destroy any vestige of Water Tribe power. With extreme prejudice.

And if their object really is genocide, it won't matter what kind of vengeance Aang wreaks on them afterward. Because the Northern Water Tribe will still be dead... and Avatars are mortal. With the Northern Tribe gone, the Southern stripped of its waterbenders, and the Foggy Swambers roped into Sokka's invasion plan and about to get captured - Water is about to go the same route as Air.

"You have to; you're the Avatar!" Nice as a statement of idealistic faith, Yue. Utterly, totally wrong when it comes to saving your people. Because - as we see in canon with Kyoshi, and Roku, and Kuruk - if ordinary people believe they can't save themselves, then all a would-be conqueror has to do is get the Avatar out of the way, and your bad guys will think they can do anything. And if they think they can, someone will.

So why do I think Koizilla was both immoral and a terrible mistake? Because the point of a Weapon of Mass Destruction is deterrence. The only moral reason to have one, or to use one, is to prevent worse loss of life. Bluntly, "do not do X, or we will fry your butt with Extreme Prejudice... and if you do X, we will fry you."

Which, by the way, implies that you have control of your weapon. Which the Water Tribe - and Aang - did not. Aang in the Avatar State may not have control, but at least he's in the hands of every other Avatar before him, who were humans, and therefore have a chance of figuring out when to stop. Aang swept up in the Ocean Spirit's vengeance had no control, and turned all the power of an Avatar over to something that isn't human. That doesn't want what a human wants.

That has an IFF (Identify Friend or Foe) based purely on someone having the presence of mind to hit the ground kowtowing.

If you're in the middle of fighting for your life, you might not be able to think clearly enough to do that. And then what?

Koizilla unleashed mass destruction. Without restraint, without morality, and - unless someone's enough of an idiot to go threaten the Moon again - without the Water Tribe being able to repeat it. And given any survivors of Koizilla saw the Avatar in the middle of the fish-monster, even if Zhao took the secret of the Moon fish to his watery grave (and so far as we know from canon, Iroh and Zuko aren't talking about it), the Fire Nation knows it took the Avatar to summon Koizilla in the first place.

Meaning there is nothing to deter the Fire Nation from striking when Aang is somewhere else.

The morality of WMD revolves around "do not make us use this". But the Northern Water Tribe has nothing to use. They're sitting at the site of the worst disaster in Fire Nation naval history - I don't even want to think about how many widows and orphans that fleet must have left behind - and the Fire Nation has already shown that the Water Tribe is toast without the Avatar. On top of that, the tribe has stripped part of the defenses they did have, sending benders to the Southern Water Tribe. Aang has left them sitting ducks. Sitting ducks the Fire Nation now wants seared to ashes.

Stop looking at the morality of what Aang did to the Fire Navy, and start looking at the morality of what he did to his allies.

This is the interpretation I'm using to create the Embers AU.

And given the spirits are a lot more active in Embers than we saw in canon, anyone who has some historical background, or has studied spirits (which includes a lot of the characters Zuko has run into), has an idea of just what spiritual mess has been unleashed at the North Pole. It's not pretty.

By the way, if Zhao had let on to the fleet what he was about to do in Embers, he would have been sleeping with the fishes, not killing them. Someone would have had the guts to do it, whether it meant breaking loyalty or not. You do not mess with Agni's sister.

And just my personal opinion... if a twelve-year-old boy having mystical tacnuke capabilities doesn't qualify as High Octane Nightmare Fuel to you - when the Zombie Apocalypse comes, please hide in any bunker but mine.

Chapter 36

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Sitting quietly in a corner of Suzuran's bridge, Iroh sorted and checked lists and contingencies for their task. Part of him longed to be sneaking into the city himself, to play the proper hero and carry out his beloved over his shoulder, fireballs flying, gallantly declaiming his victory.

...Which would promptly earn him Amaya's snowballs down his spine, he had no doubt. Even if she did miss him as much as he did her.

Ah, well. He only hoped she would approve of the general as much as the tea-maker. And as a general, he knew where he needed to be. And it was not sneaking behind enemy lines, like younger and more impetuous souls. It was here; coordinating, listening, and granting the men calming smiles as supplies snaked down into the holds and Captain Donghai's acquaintances joined their plot.

After all, it wouldn't do to have their madness fail due to a lack of attention to detail.

Not quite madness, Iroh reflected. Though I pray Azula will think it is.

Under other circumstances, she'd be right. With the best will in the world, no Fire Nation commander could approach a lord of Earth and expect any fate better than an avalanche loosed upon his head.

But the Earth King knew his nephew, if in other guise. Knew Lee, and trusted him as Bosco's healer. At the very least, Kuei should allow him close enough to listen.

And Kuei should listen, Iroh reassured himself, nodding thanks as a crewman stopped just long enough to update him on the loading. Shirong's report said that the Earth King was informed of our plan. And thought it had merit.

Yet Iroh knew to his sorrow how rulers thought. And what they decided when a would-be ally was out of reach might change terribly when an enemy's blood seemed theirs for the taking.

If so... well. His nephew had faced the Avatar and survived. Zuko would do what he must, to win their people free.

He has the fire to lead, even when all the world seems mad. He has found a purpose worth fighting for. And he is your brother's son. If he has Ursa's kind heart, he has all of Sozin's will.

Which led to a somewhat lighter sigh, as Iroh wished, yet again, he were sneaking along behind Teruko. Kuei's face would be a wonder to behold. And he would miss it.

"Sir?" Seaman Saburo stopped before him; the weathered falconer's face uncertain, for once.

"Only a wish that I could be three places at once," Iroh smiled. "I had forgotten, these past six years, how frustrating a general's task can be. But it goes well enough, for now."

"I'll take your word for that." Saburo hesitated. "Sir. There's a problem."

A problem, Iroh thought wryly a few minutes later, entering a wardroom two levels down. Indeed.

"Master Sergeant Yakume," he said mildly, eying the man and his Earth Kingdom companion as they stood in the midst of a half-dozen unhappy sailors turned guards. "It has been some time." He glanced aside at Captain Jee, who looked as sober and determined as Iroh had ever seen him. "Thank you, Captain. I will deal with this."

"Sir." Worry, concern, the ever-tightening pressure of time; all in a look.

"We have a promise to keep to Sergeant Aoi and his men," Iroh pointed out. "I believe the master sergeant will make that safer for all of us. For that alone, I owe him answers. In private." At Jee's reflexive stiffening, Iroh only smiled. "There is still much that needs to be done."

For a moment, Jee looked mutinous. Then sighed, and nodded the guards out. "Don't make me have to explain this, General." Bowing, he left, shutting and sealing the hatch behind him.

"Is he crazy?" the Guard captain burst out. "We could-"

"Die," Yakume said bluntly. "Two of us, locked in with the Dragon of the West? We're dead whenever he chooses." He straightened anyway. "I gave Captain Lu-shan my word I would protect him here."

"It will be honored," Iroh said graciously. "Though if you knew I was here, why bring Captain Lu-shan into peril?"

"He should know the clan who's stolen one of his own."

"Ah," Iroh said softly. "Huojin." He inclined his head to the captain. "The fault is mine. I was my nephew's teacher. And by my own training, I am... resistant, to another firebender's call. I did not realize how strong my nephew had become. Nor how willing he would be to defend those of Ba Sing Se, when he had known them but a short while."

"You're saying you made a good Guard turn traitor by accident?" Lu-shan's fists clenched, and there was a reckless light in his eyes.

"Huojin is no traitor," Iroh said sternly. "Even now he serves the people of your city, with the Earth King's will." I hope. "Fire Nation, yes; he was born so, even as we. But we are not your enemies." He let his gaze rest on Yakume. "Which is why you are here. Is it not?"

"How?" A choked word, as Yakume shuddered with anger and pain. "How could you betray the Fire Lord? Betray your people? You led us across the Earth Kingdom; you held the siege for six hundred days! And then, when we knew the earthbenders would kill us all, you broke it and led us out-"

"And to break that siege," Iroh cut across his words, "I broke my loyalty to Fire Lord Azulon."

Yakume blanched. Lu-shan looked swiftly between them, anger fading into uncertainty, and a certain wary curiosity.

"It was my father's will that Ba Sing Se be crushed," Iroh stated. "No matter the cost. That was his wish; those were his orders, in private, between us. I did not argue, not then. For I had a vision, granted by the spirits, of throwing down Ba Sing Se's walls and conquering it completely." He weighed Yakume in his gaze. "I knew, when I ordered the retreat, it would cost me my life. And perhaps more, to deny the spirits' vision. But with my son, my Lu Ten gone... I no longer cared. So I acted, as a general should, and chose to save my men." He smiled, sad and wry. "Imagine my surprise, days later, when I woke to find I had survived."

"But..." Yakume almost swayed, white with shock. "If those were the Fire Lord's orders..."

"I should have been executed?" Iroh finished for him. "Yes. Once word reached Azulon of my betrayal... I knew my father, and he was not a forgiving man. But events moved in my favor. While I knew my life was forfeit, I also knew the spirits had given me that vision of Ba Sing Se. So I chose to vanish, as well as I could, and devote what weeks I might escape my father's grasp to a spirit quest. To learn why." He laughed softly, not quite bitter. "And Azulon died, and my brother took the throne. And Ozai was never present when our father gave me personal commands. My brother considered me a failure, but not a traitor. So, when I had found the answers the spirits allowed me... I came home." He sighed. "And it was well I did. For I found my brother's wife, Lady Ursa, vanished. On the very night of Azulon's death. And none would say where, or why. And I found my nephew, terrified and alone. Mother gone; father swept up in the glory of being Fire Lord, favoring his dark dragon of a daughter as heir in all but name." Iroh let his eyes narrow, just a flicker of anger showing clear. "Ozai gave him into my keeping, Yakume. A failed heir, to a failed prince. The words were never spoken, but my brother has never needed words to hurt."

"But... the prince is a fire-healer," Yakume protested.

"A gift he perfected only in exile," Iroh said steadily. "A power that belongs to one no longer loyal to the Fire Lord. He survived, Yakume. As I survived." Iroh drew a breath. "Yet if the Fire Lord's forces capture him now, he will be executed. Because he is a healer."

"That's crazy," Lu-shan said in disbelief. "You're all crazy."

"No." Almost a whisper, but Yakume's voice was steady. "It makes sense. Oh, Agni..."

"To break one's loyalty, is to douse one's inner fire." Iroh watched them both. "A healer can feed that fire. Can nurture embers even against the chill of death, until the spirit rallies... or fails."

"Prince Zuko can save deserters." Yakume's eyes were grim.

Iroh nodded. "And once that becomes known, my brother will try to kill his son. Again."

"Again?" Yakume looked ghastly, as if the steel deck had shattered under him into an arctic sea, and he stood on the last icy ledge before the abyss.

"I am curious," Iroh mused, silk over steel. "Does everyone assume my nephew was in a training accident?"

"Don't answer that."

Iroh didn't move as Lu-shan stepped forward; only raised one gray brow, curious.

"I don't like him," the Guard captain growled, jerking his chin Yakume's way. "He doesn't like me, my men, or my city. But so far, he's kept his word. Which puts him way ahead of an oath-breaker and a traitor." Lu-shan's eyes narrowed. "Why should we believe anything you say?"

Iroh winced, but nodded. "You have lived under the Dai Li; you know how easy it is for leaders to shade the truth. Which is more than some folk in the Fire Nation have learned." He sighed.

"Believe, or not. I ask only that you look at our actions, and judge them for yourself." He turned to Yakume. "You have always been a loyal soldier. I have no doubt, now that you have seen me, you will report my presence to your superiors. So we will have to hold you both here, until we are prepared." He paused. "If you would then see fit to take into your custody Sergeant Aoi and those others of the crew who would not follow Captain Jee, we will have fulfilled our obligation to good and loyal men, not to strand them amongst enemies. And you will have valuable intelligence..."

Forgive me, I will be blunt. You will have information that will distract Princess Azula from inquiring too deeply into the specifics of your visit here. I fear you will need that."

"Distract the princess?" Yakume said carefully.

The hairs on the back of Iroh's neck lifted. "Spirits. What has she done now?"

Lu-shan looked between them, and let out an exasperated breath. "It's not what she's done. It's what your boy's going to do. Challenge her to this - Agni whatsis, to win the city back. Which just means we get passed from one Fire Nation heir to the other, so why do you think any of us should even care..." The Guard trailed off, eyeing Iroh. "Only that's not the plan. Is it?"

"No, it is not," Iroh said simply. "If we are fortunate, none of us will meet Azula. Not myself, nor Prince Zuko, nor any of those refugees we are trying to save."

Yakume took a step back; jerked his gaze away, looking at Suzuran with fresh eyes. "You... you can't possibly mean..."

"Our people are more important than any orders," Iroh stated. "I am very proud of my nephew."

"But she's taken his place as heir!" Yakume protested. "He must challenge her!"

"No," Iroh said sharply. "She stands as the only heir, now. The spirits themselves have made it impossible for Prince Zuko to ever become Fire Lord."

"But-"

"Impossible," Iroh cut him off with a slash of a hand, face grim. "Speak with Sergeant Aoi, and you will understand. Admiral Zhao, in his arrogance and pride, set himself against the Moon. He wounded a great spirit, Yakume! And only through a valiant sacrifice was that damage healed. But it does not matter. One of the Fire Nation struck against the balance of the world. And Prince Zuko was there."

"He was cursed." Yakume shook his head slowly, wishing to deny it.

"The Moon herself has set her hand on my nephew, and she will not be shaken off," Iroh declared. "Princess Azula stands as heir. And as heir, she will execute traitors to the Fire Nation." He paused. "By my brother's decree, those who have fled our borders, who have hidden themselves, who wished nothing more than to live as honest citizens safe from the war... are traitors. All of them."

The wardroom seemed to chill. "Civilians," Lu-shan protested.

"It will not matter," Iroh said heavily.

"Guanyin's merciful veil, man - women and children!"

"It will not matter." Iroh stared him down. "Azula has sought her own brother's death since she was six. Do you think she will hesitate to slay other children? She will not."

Lu-shan recoiled. "And you mean to leave that as heir?"

"I intend," Iroh said with the driest irony, "to see what the Avatar chooses to do with her. It is, after all, the only choice the spirits have left me. Or would you have me slay my own brother and his daughter? If I could. I do not think I have the power." He shook his head. "Avatar Kyoshi inflicted the line of the Fire Lord upon our people. It will be her heir's choice if that will continue, and the world face Fire Lord Azula in her turn." He met Lu-shan's gaze, and let the man see deadly gold. "Or do you follow where the Fire Nation has led, and doubt the Avatar?"

Lu-shan glared at him like a porcupine-boar eyeing a rival, and shook his head. "If you've known she was a monster that long, you should have done something years ago."

"Yes," Iroh acknowledged. "I should have. I was proud, and blind, and believed our nation had the right to conquer the world. But even then, I should have." He gazed back. "What wisdom I have gained, cost me my only son. Pray the Earth King's does not cost Ba Sing Se more than it already has." He gestured toward the hatch. "Gentlemen, allow me to introduce you to Sergeant Aoi."

Time, Iroh thought as they warily moved. We have so little time.

Still. He'd be lying if he said he wasn't enjoying this. Mastery of details, mastery of men; the knife-sharp brightness of the world, as he tested himself against his enemy's cunning.

I wonder if Kuei is enjoying this as well?

Iroh grinned wryly, thinking of a night years ago, when he'd talked a shaking, bloodied teenager down. If his young nephew had nurtured any last illusions of the glory of war and battle, they had died in a port's back alleys. Kuei's first deaths had only been at his orders, not at his own hands, but... Probably not.

"I think I'm going to throw up," Kuei gulped.

Quietly, trying not to draw attention to himself, Shirong rippled the floor to nudge a wastebasket into convenient range near Bosco's paws. He could have done more for the Earth King, but Quan and Bon were already hovering over the young monarch. And...

The Earth King, Shirong thought, soul weary. Not my king.

Oma and Shu - I asked for help, but I didn't ask for this! I wanted to help our city. I wanted to help... Lee.

His would-be recruit. The young man who'd just walked out of this council room a few minutes ago, with a map and a slightly dazed look. Whom Shirong had trusted above all others, to do what was right.

The Fire Lord's son. Shirong winced. What do I do?

"I can only imagine." Quan's eyes were shadowed. "Conquest is one matter. Voluntarily relinquishing part of the kingdom - I can't feel the spirit of the land, and I feel queasy. Fire Nation, lodged on our doorstep. That's going to be a problem one of these days." He shrugged as Kuei frowned at him. "It's probably worth it now to disrupt the occupation here. But planting born killers by a temple of pacifists? I know no one's liked them since Chin's time, but... well. I can understand why you're upset."

Kuei looked at him for a long moment. Turned away enough to scratch behind Bosco's ears, and looked again.

A little less green, Shirong judged, catching a hint of a rueful smile on Kuei's face. Interesting.

"Agent Quan," Kuei said thoughtfully, "were you listening to the prince? Or me?"

Quan was silent. Bon hesitated, then shot Shirong a speaking look.

"He was," Shirong said ruefully, bowing to that silent plea for rescue. "And if he heard what I heard, he heard plenty of reasons why Prince Zuko's people are going to have their hands full now. But in ten years? Twenty? They could be a force to be reckoned with. Unless something else is going to keep them in check. And while the North Pole is close, the Northern Water Tribe tends not to leave it in large numbers." He paused. "Or at least, they don't now. I think."

"You don't know?" Bon asked, surprised.

"I may know a lot about the Fire Nation, but I haven't read much about the North," Shirong answered. Met glass-framed eyes again. "We don't all study history, your majesty. And there's a lot of history in your library." Shirong smiled wryly. "It's not only possible you know something we don't, it's likely."

"...Oh." Kuei looked chastised. Straightened his shoulders, and took a deep breath. "There's a saying I ran across, in a book from Avatar Yangchen's time. If you want to besiege a city, use waterbenders. If you want to hold it, use earthbenders. If you want to take it, use firebenders. If you want to destroy it..."

He didn't have to finish. Quan absorbed that, and frowned. "The stories say the air monks were peaceful people."

"Yes, they do," Kuei said wryly. "But I find it hard to believe the twenty-first Earth King would have agreed to support the Northern and Eastern Temples in perpetuity out of the goodness of his heart. Just because peaceful people asked him to." He scratched behind furry ears again, letting Bosco lean into his hand. "My ancestors may have been good, evil, or indifferent, but they were never charitable. I've read every agreement binding Ba Sing Se. I have to know what my people are bound to do." He ducked his head a little. "I tried to be a good king."

"Just keep trying, sir," Bon said plainly. "It's a tough job."

"It's a big job," Kuei said quietly. "A lot bigger than I thought." He sighed. "So. I've read agreements, and contracts, and pleas for mutual aid, and... Guanyin have mercy, I've read the terms drawn up when Ba Sing Se crushed an enemy." He paused, eyes troubled. "The words aren't all clear, but I'd swear that time, it was the twenty-first Earth King who got crushed."

Quan hesitated, obviously thinking twice before he spoke. "We watched Avatar Aang, your majesty. He's a very... peaceful person. Most of the time."

"You mean, when he's not brushing aside my army like matchsticks, collapsing parts of my palace, and accusing people I trust of treason?" Kuei said wryly. "By those standards, Princess Azula is a peaceful person. Most of the time." He shuddered.

Shirong cleared his throat. "Your majesty, I think you're both missing the point. The people in the temple today are not Air Nomads. They were Earth Kingdom, and they're now threatened by the Fire Nation. I don't think peaceful is going to be high on their list of priorities." He glanced at Quan. "I've seen firebenders heal. How can I not believe some airbenders could kill? No matter how peaceful most of them might be."

"Pushed to their limits," Quan began.

"We're all pushed there, now." Kuei waved at one of the scrolls on the council room table, that had slipped out from under the various maps and documents he'd used to deal with Zuko. "Look at that report, Agent Quan. Look at it. Our people, dead because of - because of my orders." He swallowed dryly. "I knew it was going to happen. I knew it. But to see it-" He cut himself off. "But I haven't really seen it, have I? You have to get me up to the surface."

"Your majesty," Quan shook his head, "it's not safe-"

"I have to know!" Kuei gripped the scroll, knuckles white. "I was safe in the palace, Agent Quan! While my people were hurt, and dying, and - and worse." He gulped. "No one is to learn mindbending. Do you understand me? No Dai Li is to do this ever again!"

Almost, Quan bowed. Clenched his teeth, and stood, wavering. "Your majesty. Someone has to know."

"There's no reason to ever-"

"It's been invented once, it can be invented again," Shirong cut in. "I'd listen."

Quan nodded curtly. "If someone else learns to bend minds, someone has to be able to recognize it. For your safety, sir. For the world's safety. If you want us to hold it secret, we will. If you want us to never use it again - that is your order, and we will obey. But someone has to know."

Kuei took a deep breath. Eyed his head Dai Li. "We're going to talk about this, later."

By which he obviously meant argue. But Quan bowed. "I am at your disposal, your majesty."

"Then you can find a way to let me see what happened to my people," Kuei shot back. "I don't care if it's dangerous. I need to know."

"Prince Zuko's plan-"

"Might create the best time," Shirong said thoughtfully. "The princess should be very distracted."

Kuei blinked. "They're planning to avoid her."

"I know they are," Shirong said sadly. "Spirit-wounds, your majesty. Lee- Prince Zuko is just as deeply marked as I am. General Iroh is of Sozin's line. Min Wen was dragged through solid rock by a palace specter. And his mother, and Lady Mai, and every Fire Nation refugee who's fled the war, is disobeying the Fire Lord, and so disobeying Avatar Kyoshi." He glanced aside, unwilling to let pain show. "It's a good plan. A smart plan. And for anyone else, it would work like a charm. But they'll be leaving Ba Sing Se and the Dai Li's protection. Which means they'll be drawing malice like flies to rotted meat." He winced. "Lee and Amaya are strong. They know spirits. But-" He cut himself off, aware he'd already said too much.

Silence. Bon looked bewildered; Quan, dubious. But Kuei sighed, and nudged his glasses up with a smile, as if finally admitting something he'd seen all along. "Then it's a good thing there's an expert in hostile spirits going with them."

"There is?" Shirong looked up, relieved. And oddly sad. "Who? I looked over the lists of those evacuating, but I was mostly concerned with the scrolls..." And why were they all looking at him?

"I have read about yāorén, Agent Shirong," Kuei said ruefully. "You need to train in fire, or someone's going to get hurt. And the only firebenders who've offered the Earth Kingdom aid, the only ones I'd trust with one of my Dai Li, are leaving." He smiled a little. "I know you all think I need to be protected. And I guess I do. But I also need to keep an eye on a great name. If I order you, will you go?"

He couldn't speak past the sudden lump of hope. Wordless, Shirong dropped to his knees.

"Get up, Agent Shirong," Kuei smiled. "Your family's waiting for you."

Dragon's eyes, Tingzhe thought, watching that uncanny pale gold blink as Amaya took her hand away from the prince's head. Meixiang, beloved, I could have lived forever without knowing that.

Hard enough to know his wife was of another nation. Though he'd grown to accept that, and cherish it, leaning on her strengths to complement his own. But to know part of her heritage, his children's ancestry, simply wasn't human...

Kneeling as she helped the younger children pack up the last of their household supplies, Meixiang smiled at him.

Tingzhe had to smile back, even as the packing reminded him that Luli and her family were doing the same just next door. As were countless other families, raising an odd murmur like waves against stone that made him want to shiver with the knowledge of time slipping away.

But he set that twinge of fear aside, rolling his eyes slightly toward Zuko's side of the room. Where Lieutenant Teruko was watching Mai like a cat at a weevil-rat hole, Mai was not quite glaring right back, and Min was trying not to look too hard at either of them, for fear of starting a second war.

Meixiang hid a giggle behind her hand, cinching down ties on the light wood chest. "So how did he get that water out of his eyes, Amaya?"

"Kind of by accident?" Zuko said awkwardly. "I was... sick."

Loyalty sickness. In a firebender. Tingzhe murmured a silent prayer. Just surviving, the young prince had likely used up every last bit of goodwill any spirit had felt for him, ever. And then some.

"And when I woke up the next morning... it was just gone," Zuko shrugged.

"You don't seem to have done yourself any harm," Amaya judged. "This time." She gave him a look askance. "But I would sleep easier if you never caught another lightning bolt."

"Makes three of us," Zuko muttered. "At least I did it right." He frowned. "So there's nothing wrong in my head?"

"Physically, no," the waterbender said levelly.

Zuko winced. "So there is something."

"I've never touched a spirit the Avatar has touched. I can't swear it was Yangchen." Amaya looked sober. "But something did try to interfere with you. Tried," she emphasized, as Zuko grimaced. "You threw it off."

"Are you sure?" Desperation flickered in pale gold. "If it was just me - Agni, I'm used to spirits going after me. But you're all depending on me. I have to have a clear head." Zuko swallowed dryly. "And I keep remembering things I can't know."

Mai's head snapped up, alarmed. Swung toward Teruko, dark gold narrowing. "What do you know?"

Caught, the marine glanced over suddenly unfriendly faces. She drew a deep breath, and sighed.

"Sir, it's complicated. And you're right; you need to keep your head, and focus on getting us out of here." She chewed her lip. "There's a reason you know what you know. A good one. Maybe Yangchen poked the right place to wake it up. Maybe you just got desperate. But what you remember, sir? It's true. And it's not from Yangchen."

"Then what is it from, Lieutenant?" Amaya's voice was cool, and her hand hovered near her waterskin.

"Complicated, ma'am," Teruko said steadily. "But General Iroh knows." She looked at Zuko. "And Toph knows."

Some of the tension eased out of Zuko's shoulders. "Toph knows?"

"She had that scary little smirk on her face," Teruko confirmed. "She promised she wouldn't mention it, sir."

Amaya glanced at them both, and laughed softly. "You trust her, and Iroh trusts her. I have to talk to this girl."

"Tough as mountains, and sharp as a Piandao sword," Teruko said firmly. "Sokka's not bad, either. If the Avatar's still alive after whatever the Water Tribe fleet's planning, I'd lay odds it's because of them."

"What they're planning?" Tingzhe frowned.

"Katara was carrying plans from the Earth King's generals when I caught her," Zuko told him. "I didn't see them again after I woke up on the beach. Maybe she hung onto them, and gave them to Chief Hakoda. Or..." He shook his head. "Not our problem. Not now. Are you ready? I didn't mean to slow anyone down."

"It's just as well you did." Shirong wove through the standing stone screens, a pack over his shoulder and a tentative smile on his face. "I'd hate to miss the train."

"You're coming?" Min blurted out. "I mean, you should come, you're family - spirits, that's weird - I mean-" Crimson, he searched for words.

"It is going to take some getting used to," Shirong admitted, green eyes alight with humor. "Don't think it will make your lessons any easier. And there will be a lot of them. That specter dragged you half out of the mortal world to pull off that little miracle of hers. Either you train to fight spirits, or you resign yourself to a very short, very unlucky life." He glanced at Tingzhe, just for an instant.

The archaeologist sighed, but nodded. "It's not the life I would have chosen for you," he said plainly, meeting his son's gaze. "But if the two of you can return the Dai Li to what they used to be, and defend our people - I am proud of you."

"Dad." For a moment, Min looked as if he'd step over for a hug. But he rested a hand on Mai's arm instead, careful not to grip anywhere that would impede the flow of knives. "This isn't exactly proper, we don't have a go-between, and we don't really have time- um." He swallowed dryly. "Dad? This is Mai."

"Oh, good luck," Zuko muttered. And clapped a hand to his own face, reddening, as Mai glared at him.

"Really, young man," Meixiang chuckled, standing and dusting her hands off. "What a horrible thing to say about your cousins!"

Tingzhe blinked. Min choked. Jia and Suyin clapped their hands over Jinhai's eyes and ears, staring. And Mai... smirked.

"Cousins?" Zuko yelped.

"Third degree, fraternal," Mai stated, cool as if she were bored. Only the light in her eyes revealed how much she was enjoying watching the prince squirm. "Meixiang quizzed me up and down my family tree until we were both sure."

"Fraternal?" Breath left Zuko's lungs in a rush of relief. "Thank Agni."

"Third degree, I understand," Tingzhe put in, as Jia and Suyin let go of their squirming younger brother. The nobles and merchant clans of Ba Sing Se might marry far closer, after all; and it was rumored some of the desert tribes considered half-siblings a most acceptable match. "But why fraternal?"

"Dragon's blood," Teruko stated. "Sisters' children marrying can be a bad mix. Fraternal works. Third degree is even better." She frowned. "May I ask the ancestry, ma'am? I thought I knew all Byakko's branches."

"We're not of Byakko." Meixiang smiled. "That spirit came to you, Min, because she knew you had the power to help her manifest. That connection to the spirits skipped my generation, but with your father's blood... you have it." She nodded, decided. "My great-grandfather was Fire Sage Gyokuro, brother of Ilah and Momiji. Son of Ta Min, and Avatar Roku."

Zuko turned dead white.

No, no, can't be-

"Breathe, young one." Cool hands against his temples; a familiar, trusted voice murmuring in his ear. "Zuko. Lee. Breathe."

Lee. He clung to that like an anchor in a hurricane. Lee was Water Tribe, was Foggy Swamp; far from noble machinations and the ravages of war. Lee wouldn't care who'd been born of what clan. Not when they were all his people, and in danger.

The evacuation. Azula. Focus!

Breathe. Hold. Out. Repeat.

It felt like an eternity, but eventually he was able to focus on worried blue.

Agni. I hurt.

"You didn't know," Amaya realized, one hand still on his shoulder as she eased back a little to give him air. "Your people are obsessed with family trees. How could you not know?" She rounded on Mai, eyes flashing. "You knew."

"I knew about Momiji," Mai protested. "I knew she was Ta Min's and Avatar Roku's daughter. Adopted out, because she wasn't a firebender. Half the court knew. No one said she had siblings! I didn't know Roku had any other children. Not until Zuko told me General Iroh tracked down Ilah's mother." She glanced at Zuko, and blanched.

Uncle knew. And he didn't tell me. "I have to go burn something down now," Zuko said, very calmly.

At least, he thought it was calm. From the way Teruko and Shirong grabbed his shoulders, and the slash of water whipping about Amaya's hands, they somehow didn't hear it that way.

Could break loose. Don't want to hurt them. Maybe if I just explain? "I really have to," Zuko told them. "Sozin's fault. Probably. But Uncle should have said." Didn't seem to be getting through. "Above Ilah. The tree's blank."

"It's true," Mai said warily, hands full of steel. "Fire Lady Ilah, wife of Fire Lord Azulon. The record ends there." She swallowed. "I always thought it was a boast. Part of the Fire Lords' power. Sozin's line is so powerful, they can choose a wandering firebender for a bride, and never stoop to admit her clan."

"But Uncle knew," Zuko insisted, feeling that fierce clarity seeping away into a gulf of pain. "He found Ta Min. In the records. He knew."

"I suppose he didn't think you'd take it well," Shirong said dryly.

Zuko gave him a look. I have heard some inane things in my life, but that crosses into tarred-and-set-on-fire territory.

"Obviously," Shirong muttered to himself. "Easy. Easy, now. I know you probably blame Roku as much as Sozin for this whole idiotic mess-" He stopped. And winced. "Ah. Yes. I imagine if I had someone whom I considered a congenital idiot in my family tree, I'd want to break a few things myself."

Yes! Zuko thought, thrumming with fury against the hands holding him. Yes, exactly, now if you'd just let go so I can-

Hands holding him. Shirong's, and Lieutenant Teruko's.

Where I lead, she will follow.

I can't dishonor that trust. I can't.

Gritting his teeth, Zuko reached for Lee, pulling water's tribe around him as a shield against the pain of knowing yet another soul he'd trusted had lied.

A boy from the Foggy Swamp wouldn't care about family trees. Wouldn't feel that soul-deep agony of knowing he'd shown disrespect to an ancestor spirit. No matter how much that ancestor deserved it. Lee knew that these people were his tribe; that Uncle, lies of omission or not, was his tribe. And that Roku was not.

He sagged, trying not to just lean against their hands. "You should take over, Lieutenant," he got out. "I'm... not in good shape to command, right now."

"If you were that bad off, you wouldn't be able to talk, sir." Teruko let go. "There's a reason Lady Kotone lets your grandfather handle the idiots she doesn't want alive anymore. He's good at it. But he can keep his temper when he has to. So I know you can, too." She gave him a wicked grin. "I promise, after we get out of here, I'll help Sergeant Kyo's squad pin the general down so you can yell at him."

Oh. Zuko blinked, trying not to giggle hysterically. He didn't think he'd be able to stop. "That's the nicest thing anybody's said to me all day." He blinked again, dragging the pain and all-encompassing white in sight and hearing down enough to think. "Plan. Train. We were going to grab one at night, in the first plan. Now it's day, we figured out a way to still do it but with everything that happened last night there's going to be patrols everywhere..."

Tingzhe frowned. "Should we wait until nightfall?"

"No. Have to move," Zuko said shortly. "Azula's alive, she's smart, and she doesn't just assume things are going fine. She checks. We don't have enough people to fight our way out. If we try, a lot of our people will get killed. We have to move. A good plan violently executed now-"

"-Is better than a perfect plan later," Shirong nodded. "I always did like General Katsu's treatises. Pithy man." He smirked. "As for getting everyone to the train in one piece... I have an idea."

"You're really worried," Ty Lee observed.

Surveying the palace grounds from this bone-breaking height, hands clasped neatly behind her back, Azula tilted her head just enough to watch Ty Lee turn easy cartwheels along the balcony railing. All the fearlessness of air, bouncing back from the morning's terror with a smile as wind ruffled her pink outfit.

Fearless, impulsive, and detached from the world in ways that just weren't healthy, Azula mused. But not stupid. Ty Lee knew what she wanted, from the circus to fighting the cutest guys among their enemies, and arranged her life to get it.

Not stupid, Azula decided. Simply... alien.

"Is it Agent Chan's report?" Ty Lee pushed herself up on her fingertips; grinning, delighted, as a sudden gust of wind made her work to keep her balance.

"Yes, and no," Azula said thoughtfully. Why not bounce her ideas off Ty Lee? The girl had no current reason for treachery, and a sideways viewpoint might be just what she needed. "The Dai Li's reports are part of a puzzle. Or should I say, parts of several, possibly unrelated puzzles."

"Ooo!" Ty Lee twisted, hands now flat on the railing and feet over her head as she looked up. "You mean, like someone dropped three sets of shell-matching games all together?"

Not stupid at all, Azula nodded to herself. "Precisely. In New Ozai, the Earth Kingdom resistance was able to pull off a mass evacuation, and seriously set back our hunt for the Avatar. Yet they had weeks to organize and prepare. Here, we see even more damage, but whoever has Kuei could only have had a few days to plan. No one organizes frightened civilians and stray military forces together that quickly."

"Not even us?" Ty Lee's brows went up in honest curiosity.

Damn. That was a good point. One she must have missed while she'd had a bruised brain. "You're right," Azula admitted. "Just because they're traitors, doesn't mean they're not of our blood. Fire Nation civilians could do it. If they had a lord to rally behind." She paced the balcony slowly, thinking it through. "No great name could have survived fleeing here, but they have had someone to act as a focus. Water can pull almost as well as fire. I doubt she could lead them, but if she had the intelligence to simply say we need sabotage, and stepped out of the way to let them deal with whoever has Kuei... yes. That would work." Another slow circuit. "If she's been hiding them for years, that could also explain her connection to Brush-maker Tu's organization." Who'd left them a deserted shop and bewildered neighbors; she'd had to have men tear the place literally apart before they found the wood-lined escape tunnel. Even then it'd dead-ended in a natural stone grotto under the city, with no trace left to lead them further. "So we know two of our players."

Ty Lee frowned. "Tu's not with Amaya?"

"No." Azula weighed fact and intuition in her mind. "No, whatever Tu's part of, it's organized. And has been for some time. He had code words, hidden compartments, escape routes. Organized espionage. The waterbender's preparations weren't hidden. They simply didn't look like everything they were." What was it Quan had said about Zuko? He'd hidden in plain sight, by looking like just what he was: a desperate refugee. He just hadn't shown everything he was.

Not a plan. A gamble. An improvisation.

No wonder he'd had no trouble passing as Amaya's apprentice. The waterbender must have been improvising for decades.

"Two different operational procedures," Azula concluded. "Two different organizations. One, Water and Fire. The other... probably Earth. There's no love lost in this city for the Dai Li." She looked down at a topiary bear far below, briefly considering what it would look like on fire.

Lovely. But this is no time to indulge myself.

There were still too many unanswered questions. Two loosely allied covert groups could have made last night's mess in Ba Sing Se. And yet...

Three sets, Ty Lee had said. And while the acrobat might have a fluffy grasp on facts, her intuition could shame a general.

Tu's group seemed dug in to watch and vanish; a network of spies, more than anything else. Amaya's traitors had been hiding as ordinary citizens, but they were Fire. Once Mai needed aid to rescue her half-blooded crush, they'd have provided the drive needed to spur stolid Earth into action.

But some of that action didn't make sense. Why steal the royal library? Never mind the reason Agent Chan had given about the Earth King's reading habits; that library was information, pure and simple, and somehow valuable enough for Shirong's rogue band to risk their lives to grab it. For that matter, why steal half a dozen of the other things that had vanished in last night's fires? Weapons, yes, that made sense; but farming tools? Stocks of seasoned hardwood? Ingots of copper and iron? The list went on, and why anyone would risk a good diversion for such plebian supplies-

Suzuran is a supply ship.

Captained by Jee. Who had served Zuko with Iroh.

And if Iroh had already outlived treachery at the North Pole, he would have survived where Zuko perished.

For a moment, she didn't dare breathe. It was like turning a kaleidoscope; suddenly all the stray elements that looked like chaos fit. Beautifully.

"We're caught in one of my uncle's plans," Azula murmured. Slowly, ruthlessly, smiled. "To the train station. We haven't a minute to waste."

"General Iroh's here?" Wide-eyed, Ty Lee flipped off the railing to stand.

"Yes. Yes, I think he is." Azula indulged in a smirk. "We should say hello."

"Captain!" Saburo stopped just inside the bridge hatch, weathered face creased with worry.

"Hawks are moving. Palace toward the Army encampment, and heading for the port. Kei and a few of the men are watching, but..."

"There's a limit to what we can see from here." Jee felt a cold chill down his spine, but nodded.

"Thank you, Seaman." He glanced at the general. "Sir?"

"I suspect Princess Azula has finished breakfast," General Iroh said dryly. "Most likely, we are discovered."

Jee felt for where the sun was, and gave the general a troubled look. "Sir. Even if the prince is on schedule..."

"Azula's forces will reach us before he can." Iroh stared into the distance, quiet and grim. "Pass the order to begin casting off."

Meaning sailed vessels would go first, to clear each other's way. Suzuran could move no matter the wind, and outrace them all, a lion-dog to guard the koala-sheep. So they would wait. Even so...

"Sir. The time."

"My nephew will find a way to reach us," Iroh said soberly. "He must. He cannot go to ground again. Azula has lost a prize she meant to lure in our people to their own destruction. To civilians, and a healer. She will have Ba Sing Se torn up stone by stone to find them. If these ships are taken, we lose our best chance of escape."

"Sir." Jee stood straight. He should carry out the general's order immediately. He should. "If it were only him and Lieutenant Teruko - of course they could make it. But thousands of civilians... and he may not even know anything's wrong."

"Oh, he will," General Iroh said dryly. Gestured toward the harbor. "Our beacon will be unmistakable."

"Don't tug on it," Shirong chuckled, just loud enough to be heard over the clink and clack of yet another train-car of supplies rolling out of their warehouse to link up to the passenger cars. Hopefully, no one would care that far more cars were coming out than could be fit into the building; cars generally had to be lifted by earthbenders up to rail level anyway, so it wasn't unusual for canny Ba Sing Se merchants to move whole shipments of goods underground to get a jump on their competitors. "Leave it alone. You'll ruin all the ladies' hard work."

Zuko scowled, but snatched his hand away from the emerald-tied braid irritating the back of his neck. He wasn't quite sure how Meixiang and her daughters had managed to pin and weave it into his own hair, and he wasn't sure he wanted to know. He definitely could have lived the rest of his life without hearing Min giggle at the results. And as for that wicked gleam in Amaya's eyes as she added her own touch to the indignity...

I'm doomed.

Even if he managed to rip it all out before he got on Suzuran - better yet, burn it all out - he still wouldn't be able to head off Uncle's teasing. Lieutenant Teruko might keep loyally silent, no matter how annoyed she was at temporarily yielding her bodyguard position to Shirong, but Amaya would tell Uncle everything.

The universe hates me.

But Shirong's plan just might work, damn it. So the city was up in arms, with Dai Li and Fire Nation soldiers inspecting every train? Then there would be Dai Li and soldiers inspecting this train. Theirs.

"Everyone knows I won't work with a partner," Shirong had said bluntly, bringing out the uniform with an amused flourish. "So if they see a pair of Dai Li, and they don't see Min, they'll know it's not me."

"I'm not an earthbender," Zuko had protested, as Jia let out an ominous squeal and dove for her beauty supplies.

"No. But you move more like a Dai Li than most earthbenders," Shirong had stated. "If we put someone in uniform who's likely to fall off a roof, who even acts like they're afraid of falling - the game's over right there." He'd grinned. "Given what I've seen you do with ice - what do you think you can do with wet sand?"

Not as much as he'd like. Not without more time to practice, at least. But he just had to look like he was wearing earth gloves. If anyone got suspicious enough to check closer, the game was up anyway.

Not a game.

A game wouldn't terrify him like this. So much could go wrong. So much already had; getting civilians moving wasn't anywhere near as fast as moving troops. And though he'd known that, he'd planned for it-

We're late.

They could push the train faster to make up the time. If they didn't mind attracting every hostile eye in miles. And what earthbenders could do to a train with just a little warning... it wasn't a pleasant thought.

Though that was easier to think about than the memory of screams still ringing in his ears. Children didn't understand risking your life for your people. Children didn't understand war, and choosing lords, and why families who'd always been there were suddenly splitting apart.

Amaya and the herb-healers who were coming had had to dose some of the little ones. Particularly one young girl who'd just turned up in a train car at the last minute, with no parents in sight.

Agni, please let them be on this train. Somewhere.

Much, much easier to go over the obstacles again in his head. Getting out of this train yard; a massive stone edifice where Ba Sing Se's various low-class trains staged, before rumbling onto the sky-high web of stone tracks across the city. Getting across the massive expanse of land between here in the Outer Ring and the harbor itself. Getting past the guards on what was left of the Wall. Unloading at the harbor... spirits, that was going to blow their cover right there. At least all the cars were mostly made of stone, roofed with wood and clay to lighten the weight a bit. If they were quick, their earthbenders could just move whole cars onto various ships-

And the car he was checking suddenly exploded in yells, a spear punching out a window's paper screen in a rush of green flames, blue-green fire impaled on its point.

Hinotama!

Another fiery ball floated out from under the car, followed close by three more.

...So much for being inconspicuous.

After everything else she'd seen these past few days, a pair of Dai Li fighting spirit-flames by a train car warehouse barely made Azula blink.

"Ouch," Ty Lee winced, as one of the agents went down, then slapped a hand on the platform that shot barbed stalagmites up to pierce a glowing fireball.

"I see someone didn't handle a suspicious death or four well." Azula eyed the remaining globes as they seemed to halt and hover a moment, then dove back into the train car. The Dai Li's partner didn't even waste time swearing; just leapt through the burning window after them, murder evident in every line of his uniform.

"Odd place for them," Azula mused, as a horrendous racket broke out inside the car. Usually the creatures lurked by swamps, the better to lure in victims to drown. "How would they lead someone astray here... ah." She looked off the raised stone embarkation platform toward the elevated tracks, and the bone-crushing height between them and the farmlands. Distract the earthbenders guiding the train, and the resulting crash would yield enough dying souls to snack on.

Filthy beasts.

"Maybe we should help," Ty Lee said, troubled.

"We have a general to stop," Azula said levelly, heading to the passengers' platform and the occupation forces charged with inspecting the trains. At the foot of the stairs below, on the north side of the station, a few komodo-rhino cavalry riders were watering bored mounts.

Nothing's happening here. But that's no excuse to get sloppy.

Which was why she was checking every station as she reached it, not simply heading straight for the harbor. Her messages had already gone ahead, after all; and it would be criminally careless to miss some of Iroh's traitors through being impatient.

"Besides," Azula observed, glancing back as the noise started to die and some brave citizen beat out the window-frame, "they don't sound anywhere near dead yet."

Stoic enough to make her wonder if they were dead. Though most likely they were just numb from the invasion. The car quieted, and the younger Dai Li came out - through the sliding doors, this time, brushing himself off with an aggravated bristling that should have filled the air with smoke. The pair of them climbed to the roof, clinging there as the train's earthbenders calmly pushed off...

I know those moves.

"Azula?"

There was a braid, and there was a uniform, and she didn't feel fire, and he was supposed to be dead, frost blacken him, dead, dead, dead!

He's getting away-!

"Get me earthbenders!" Azula snarled, already running for the main stationhouse, Ty Lee racing beside her. "They're on that train!"

"You know," Shirong mused, as a single car bolted from the station and raced toward them, "I was actually starting to feel good about this plan."

"Huh," Zuko muttered, staring at oncoming doom.

"The universe hates us," Shirong sighed.

"Yeah."

"You don't sound surprised," Shirong said wryly.

"No."

"Much as I admire brevity," Shirong glanced at the firebender, "Lieutenant Teruko says it's not a good sign when you can't talk."

She'd said quite a bit more than that, when he'd been patiently explaining to her why she could not cling to her prince's side as a bodyguard while he was impersonating a Dai Li. Much of it in the common speech. Some of it in High Court. A fraction of which was actually repeatable in polite company.

If they lived through this, he had to get her to write those down.

"Can you cut the tracks?"

Shirong almost choked. Cut the rail line? Damage the city, and commerce, and the prestige of the Dai Li-

Stop the very angry firebender coming to kill you? part of him snarked.

Ah. Yes. Good point. "Not from here," Shirong said, already running toward the end of the train, Zuko half a step behind. He could feel the faltering in their speed, as the benders pushing the train saw what was coming-

The train jerked, almost tossing him off before he latched onto the yellow clay tiles of the roof ridge with chi and a twist of his toes, holding him steady.

Lee!

The firebender let himself fall, hitting the roof with an almost casual grab; as if he thought human fingers could somehow bite into green wood shingles-

Crunch.

Imperial firebender, Shirong realized, barely hesitating as he ran for the last, deliberately empty car. His partner could obviously keep himself in one piece, and there was no time. Use your chi to enhance your strength. Damn, that's a nice trick. "Move forward!" he called to the train-pushers, as the cars shuddered again; Tingzhe and his university students in the front of the train, no doubt, trying to find a rhythm most of them had never trained for. "Tell the passengers to get clear! Move at least three cars up, and push from there!"

"But," one of the earthbenders gulped, looking back with eyes so wide he might just jump off the tracks entirely.

Can't blame him, Shirong thought fleetingly, seeing murder in the Fire Princess' tense shoulders.

"Move!" he yelled. "Do you want to be somewhere she can catch you?"

That did it. The pair scrambled along the thin ledge of stone around the cars, disappearing forward.

Wish I could disappear my- Guanyin!

Trained reflexes saved him. Barely. He peeled up a long shield of the ridgeline's tiles, and dove to one side. Felt lightning strike home, as if in his own bones-

Zuko caught him by his robes and yanked, pulling him back onto green shingles before he could tumble off the edge.

Fire roared.

For a moment, Shirong could only stare. The other train was still yards away. But jets of blue flame surged from hands and feet as the princess blasted toward them-

Ceramic shattered, and Zuko tossed shards with deadly aim. Azula had to bring her hands forward to blast them away, dropping out of sight.

I didn't hear a splat...

Then he couldn't worry about what he hadn't heard, because pink bounced through the air almost on top of him. Reflexively, Shirong flung out chains, a net that would snare any mortal or spirit that dared get this near-

She dodged them.

Straight into a blinding face-full of wet sand.

Ty Lee was the enemy. Ty Lee would kill him; or take away his bending, and with Azula on the rampage that would kill him. Shirong knew all of that, and still had to force himself to turn away as she tottered near the edge. She just seemed so innocent.

The fireball that seared his hat off was anything but.

Shards and shale - that's cloth washed in fire! If Azula can char that...

"Stay down, Ty Lee!" Zuko snarled. "I don't want to hurt you!"

Scraping sand out of her eyes, the chi-blocker collapsed to her knees with a bone-jarring thump. "Zuko?" she whispered, barely audible above the wind. "But... you're dead."

"Not quite." Azula smirked, flipping up onto the roof to eye them all. "I should have known you wouldn't have the honor to lie down and die."

Honor. Zuko breathed out, slow and controlled, waiting for the word to tear at him. Three years - three long, horrible years - it had ruled his life. Three years, he'd declared to anyone who would listen that he needed his honor back...

I didn't want my honor. I wanted my family.

And wasn't that pathetic, to want what he should have known he could never have?

My family is on Suzuran, and on this train. It doesn't matter what I want. It doesn't matter if she's my sister. Azula will kill them.

Unless they stopped her. Here. Now.

"Walk away," Zuko growled, trying not to let his voice shake. "Just go, Azula. You're the heir now. These people aren't the enemy. Leave them alone."

"They're traitors to Father." Azula shifted into a ready stance, easily as if the wind pressing on them all was just a spring breeze. "There's only one sentence for treason."

Blood drummed in Zuko's ears, and he felt the world narrowing around him. "Did you watch?" he got out through clenched teeth, holding onto words by pure will. "When Mom was a traitor?"

The roof erupted in fire.

Normally, she'd send guards or Mai or Ty Lee in first to soften up her enemies, then take a calculated second strike. Especially against Zuko, who could slip into a white-hot, mindless berserk in the time it took to call him a fatherless bastard.

Normally. But she'd outstripped her swamped Dai Li, Mai was probably somewhere on this train, and Ty Lee looked like someone had broken her. As for Zuko...

Pale gold blazed at her, but his breathing was calm. Controlled. Even as she shot a sizzling blast at him and he moved a grimy hand as if to catch it, the idiot...

Not dirt, Azula recognized in the instant before screams would come. Why is his hand covered in sand?

Steam boiled into the wind, as flames sank into sand like water.

...What?

A shake of Zuko's hand - Zuko's untouched hand, where there should be blisters and charred flesh and screams, damn him, why were there no screams-

Sand rose into a spiral over his palm, like a miniature dust-devil, heat shimmering off it like the Si Wong dunes.

Hot sand, Azula realized in an instant of shocked comprehension. Agent Quan said he could move hot water, if he's learned to do that trick with something else...

Fire against fire, she could take her brother any day of the week. This ground should favor her. She was lighter. More agile. With far more will, and discipline, meaning far more fire.

But if Zuko could bend more than just fire...

It won't matter. It's a trick. A coward's gamble to hide among the masses here. I have no reason to fear him. Ever.

Zuko spun the sand over his left hand, gaze never leaving hers, even as his right beckoned to the roof's flames like the Avatar's annoying waterbender to a river-

Which was when the chunks of stone Shirong had bent out of the car under them slammed at her like Mai's darts, and she was suddenly too busy to analyze anything.

A waterbender, Yakume thought, running through what he'd learned from Sergeant Aoi and his men yet again as they waited in the cool of the station. It doesn't make sense.

"We should be raising the alarm," Sergeant Aoi grumbled. Eyeing any of the seamen who looked inclined to stumble near the platform guardrail, or head anywhere near the straggly crowd of Earth Kingdom farmers. Some of those in the station were finishing up business with the paper-pushers after getting out of the city proper; others were waiting for the next train in. None looked happy to see men in red and black... but so far, they seemed willing to just keep their distance.

"You saw how quick your general cut us loose," Captain Lu-shan grumbled. "I'd say it's already been raised."

Seaman Koki gave him a narrow look. "You would say-"

"I don't care what you think about me, you salt-warped idiot," Lu-shan cut him off, "but the guy who got you off that ship thinks it's a good idea to lay low for a while. I'd listen. You weren't there when the master sergeant brought your princess information about rebels right under her nose. That... young lady... there's something off about her." He rolled his eyes. "And don't tell me. 'The line of Sozin's supposed to be dangerous.' I've seen dangerous. And I've seen flat-out crazy. You don't speak ill of nobles, but I know which bin I'd drop her in."

Aoi glared at him, and cast a glance Yakume's way. Lu-shan did the same, tapping his foot. Waiting.

They were all waiting, Yakume realized with a start, looking away from the mesmerizing stone-pillared rails, and the green fields so very far below. "Captain?"

"Master Sergeant," Lu-shan said dryly. "So far today I've faced down a pair of your marines, followed you on a hunt better left to Dai Li, been held at fireball-point by the Dragon of the West, and had to stand this bunch of sailors on a train ride to the middle of nowhere while your brain's been spinning its wheels. Talk."

Aoi bristled like a shaggy cliffside. But turned a look of quiet entreaty on him, as well.

Yakume sighed, and shook his head. "I've been trying to piece things together," he admitted. "Some of what I know still doesn't make sense. And I would prefer to make a complete report." One he could, hopefully, write up and arrange to deliver impersonally. Giving him time to get clear.

He was loyal to the Fire Nation. Above all else. He wasn't stupid.

I think she might be on the edge. Lu-shan thinks she might be. Which means... maybe, just possibly, she is.

A dark dragon, General Iroh had called her. When no one spoke of the dragon blood in the Fire Lord's line. Officially.

The general had to be wrong. He had to be. The Fire Lords led their nation with honor. It could not be true that Fire Lord Ozai would want... such a creature to succeed him.

Yet if he believed that... the general was wrong. Or lying.

He never lied. Not to us. Not to any of his men.

Though Yakume had known that the general could be a bit... selective with the truth. Especially when he was setting a trap.

And we're the trap.

And... Lu-shan was eyeing him. Again.

"We're a trap for the princess," Yakume explained. "I don't know how, I don't know what the general expects to gain - but we are. Somehow. He's an honorable man, and he and Prince Zuko gave their word... but I know the general. If he turned us loose, he expects to gain an advantage from it." He swept his gaze over the sailors. "Which is why we are not going back to the palace, or even the city. Not yet. Princess Azula is General Iroh's enemy, and I will not bring danger to her doorstep."

Nervously, Koki and the others started edging away from each other.

"It's not that kind of a trap," Yakume said impatiently. "He's more subtle than that, believe me. It's not a weapon. It's not even a person." He glanced down, trying to recall everything he'd heard of every campaign the general had run. "He let us go to tell the princess what we've seen. Something in that information must be dangerous."

"Try all of it, temper like she's got," Lu-shan said dryly. "Dangerous to any poor bastard in reach, anyway."

Yakume felt as much as saw the others jump at the term, and held up a staying hand. "It doesn't mean the same here," he said stiffly. "And the captain has a point. The Dragon of the West may be known for his application of force and mass, but he also knows the value of a well-timed distraction."

Which might be all General Iroh intended. Possibly. If only I could sort out what I do know. "You say the prince is cursed?" Yakume eyed Sergeant Aoi.

"Like I told you. A waterbender." The burly sergeant shuddered. "Agni, that's just not right."

"Hot water," Lu-shan snorted.

Aoi glared at him. "He froze the damn spirit in ice."

Which seemed irrefutable evidence. And yet... "The general said Prince Zuko was a fire-healer," Yakume began.

"Jee talked about fire-healing, too," Aoi growled. "He must've been talking about the general. It was the traitor who was sick on shore. And we all saw the ice."

"And the general agreed with you that-" Yakume winced, and almost slapped himself in the forehead. "No, he implied the prince was cursed. He never said it." The Moon had set her hand on the prince, indeed. Firebender cursed to waterbender, warping his spirit awry? That would make everything make sense.

Except it didn't. The Dai Li had been sure.

"Waterbending is a curse?" Lu-shan eyed them all.

Yakume shrugged. "How would you feel about a Guard who bent fire?"

"...Point." Lu-shan sighed like a far-off volcano's rumble. Glanced toward yet another sailor straying toward the guardrail, and raised a grizzled brow at Aoi.

"Norimichi!" the sergeant growled. "Agni's flames, man, you can stare like a backwater rube later."

"Um, Sergeant?" Still leaning over the railing, Norimichi rubbed his eyes. "Aren't people supposed to ride inside those things?"

Yakume found himself crushed up against the guardrail with the others, half expecting to just see something odd decorating one of the four or five-car trains he'd almost gotten used to seeing-

It was long. Very long. And moving fast, flames blazing and battering at each other as figures in red and pink and green fought on rooftops for their lives. Orange flames... and fierce, lethal blue.

"Oma and Shu, the earthbenders are crazy!" Lu-shan swore.

The earthbenders? Yakume thought. Tore his gaze away just long enough to give the Guard a disbelieving glance.

"Nobody pushes a train that fast!" Lu-shan snarled, as the train screamed along the rails toward the station, figures growing larger with stunning speed. "Even if they start braking now, they'll overshoot us by a mile!"

Yakume stared at the desperate fight. And the length of the train. And the blurs of green, now resolved into Dai Li uniforms-

Only one of the Dai Li was shorter. Leaner. And parried a blast of fire with a slash of his hand.

Yakume made himself breathe, hearing the crackle of flames in the wind. "They're not going to stop."

"Are you crazy?" Lu-shan was staring wide-eyed at the oncoming juggernaut of wood and stone. "Trains always stop-"

The train howled past, an endless stretch of windows and frightened faces and fire.

Bemused, Yakume waved. Especially at the first car, where a pair of earthbenders who looked like father and son were bending the train faster in a distinctly nonstandard fashion. And where light glinted off knives a gold-eyed girl held ready to throw at any who might block their way.

Endless heartbeats later, they were gone.

Staring down the tracks after them, Yakume shook himself. Glanced at Lu-shan, who stood frozen, mouth gaping. "I take it you saw Guard Huojin?"

Speechless, Lu-shan stared at him.

"That's what I thought," Yakume murmured. And had to shake his head in disbelief, wanting to laugh at the sheer audacity of it... and rage, that such wild brilliance blazed for the other side. "Iroh's heir, in all but birth."

"I- but- he-!" Giving up, Lu-shan flung up his hands.

"He was born of the line of Sozin, and he will die of the line of Sozin," Yakume said, trying to keep his voice steady. "Spirits. They burn so brightly."

"You want to get in the middle of that?" Lu-shan sputtered.

"They are great names." Yakume heard the longing in his own voice, and didn't try to dampen it. "Who would not want to follow?" Sighing, he turned toward a very pale Aoi. "I suppose we can stop waiting here... what is it?"

"They're heading toward the harbor," Aoi said, shaken.

Frowning, Yakume nodded.

Aoi shook his head, speaking as if to a new, slow recruit. "They're heading toward the water."

...Oh.

Too slow, Zuko thought. Has to be a feint.

It wasn't.

No time to block Azula's fire-wheel; he slapped it aside with hot sand, bits of earth guzzling heat like a tavern full of thirsty marines. Molten glass snaked out and slashed at his will; he smelled her hair burning, before wind whipped smoke away.

I don't even have to heat it, Zuko thought wryly, in a brief instant she had to deal with Shirong flinging chains. She's doing that for me.

Which was the only thing that wasn't confusing about this fight. He was fighting Azula. He ought to be either scared stiff or white-blind with rage. And - he wasn't.

Worried, yes. Desperate to keep her pressed as far back on the train as he could, away from innocent civilians. If the train sped up, and Shirong could cut a car she was on loose...

But most of all, he was wrapped in a haze of manic glee. Here was an enemy. Here was someone just as deep in the whole Roku-Ilah-Sozin mess as he was. Who carried as much guilt, in the eyes of the world; whose blood every other nation would say was just as torn between good and evil...

As if Sozin was just evil. And Roku was just good.

Katara would say his sister was evil. Toph probably would. Heck, even Aang would.

And you don't get it, you don't get it at all. She believes in the Fire Lord. Just like you believe in Gyatso, Aang. That's why she killed you. That's why she'll kill you again.

And he could fight Azula and still think. It didn't make sense- wait, what was she-

Training said spinning flame kick. A deeper whisper said yes, covering line-of-sight, look out for the-

The fire-charged punch blasted through his flame wall, and he was flying.

Lee!

Thank Guanyin for training, and practicing until he wanted to just fall over and die. Shirong knew exactly how to fling rock gloves to seize and yank a body back to safe ground. Even if that ground was the top of another train car.

He's down, look out for-

Blue flame seared his shoulder; the world went red and black.

It's just pain, damn it!

Shirong stepped into the blow, seeing her smirk, knowing he was out of rock and placed wrong to fling chains.

Never fought drained of chi, have you?

He drove a punch home like a mine hammer, impacting an area cold experience had taught him would drop a woman fast as a groin-shot in men.

She dodged. Most of it.

Shirong saw her pale with pain as she skidded backward, one arm instinctively raised to shield her breast. Then flush with rage, slashing fire with kicks and sweeps to drive him back and kill him.

In that instant, he could see a lifetime.

Noble. Prodigy. Taught by the best. Trained by the best. Always, always the favored, chosen heir.

No one would have dared fight dirty training you, would they?

You're not like your brother, Azula. You never could be.

Though Zuko wasn't quite fighting like himself either. And it wasn't just bending fire instead of water.

He's got the skill to take her, he just doesn't think he can. Second-guessing himself. Damn it, Lee, she's not better than you-

Blue fire surged at him-

Yanked aside, so close his eyes teared, caught in a globe of orange flame.

Stop thinking. Just fight!

It didn't make sense that he could see Azula's moves coming. It didn't make sense that he knew - knew - what a mountain firebender would expect as a reply, and counter it like waves against cliffs. Just didn't make sense...

But the world had stopped making sense at the South Pole. He was getting used to it.

She's good, something in his mind murmured. Not with the fear he should have felt. Simply... accepting. She's very, very good.

But she's young.

Young enough to get caught in the fury of the quick kill, the utter destruction of her enemies. To believe that if someone didn't kill her, it was because they couldn't.

I could kill her. If I were willing to risk both of us dying.

But there was a better way.

Steel lanced through the charred roof, and he grinned.

I'm going to kill him, Azula thought grimly, dodging spearheads as they punched through. Quickly, and thoroughly. This time, I'm going to be sure.

Zuko was avoiding steel just as easily as she was, damn him. Because he was keeping an eye on his surroundings as well. Instead of just on her.

How dare you!

She was the best. The best. Sparring with her brother was supposed to be a laugh, a lark; a way to spit defiance in Ursa's eye, by showing her ghost how pathetic the child she'd chosen really was.

Only Zuko was holding her at bay. And making it look easy.

If you didn't have that Dai Li covering you...

But he did. And if Shirong didn't seem to be skilled at moving any hunk of stone bigger than his gloves, the agent was more than happy to take apart the whole car under them for ammunition, bit by painful bit.

She could wear them both down. She could hurt them. But she couldn't drive them farther.

And if Shirong could cut away enough bits of stone to shear off a car with her and Ty Lee still on it-

No. He won't.

You didn't bring allies to the field, Zuzu. You brought liabilities.

I know your weakness.

Leap and land and slam fire through the roof-

Oh, what lovely screams.

"Out!" Huojin roared, making himself heard over the panic and roar of flames. The stench of seared flesh and vomit swirled through the air, seized at his stomach; he swallowed hard, and tried not to feel. "Everyone move forward!"

They moved. Except for three unlucky bastards who'd never be moving again.

The kids are all forward, the Guard told himself harshly; hauling out one truly unlucky bastard who was still breathing, and never mind the charred skin tearing off on charcoaled wood seats. Amaya could save him, or she couldn't. My girls are forward, with Teruko...

And he wanted to scream because Teruko wasn't here. Because she was following orders, following the plan, and sticking with the cars of women and children. A living firedamp, ready to keep what had happened here from happening there.

If they lived through this, Huojin was going to take all the nightmares he knew this day would give him. Take them, and be grateful. Because his girls were safe.

Teruko, Huojin thought grimly, letting the sliding door tear in the wind as he dragged his moaning burden through the gale between the cars. Other hands reached out, pulling him up. Jia and the other earthbenders to keep the tracks intact if anyone messes with them. Amaya.

Zuko had arrayed benders like living walls, making the cars full of civilians a moving fortress. Deliberately setting the less crucial supply cars last, so if worst came to worst and he and Shirong were killed, earthbenders could cut the train by a third; a mole-skink shedding its tail to survive.

Overkill, Huojin had thought when they'd set it up. Had to be. He'd heard about Zuko's sister, but he hadn't believed it. Sure, Fire Nation soldiers could be horrid, and evil, and slaughter civilians without blinking an eye... but a fourteen-year-old girl?

But you knew, kid. You knew.

And now instead of laughing at the kid for being paranoid, he was desperately praying Zuko had been paranoid enough.

Don't die out there, do you hear me? Don't die.

Not my people!

Zuko swept a wave of fire at her; punched a flurry of fireballs. Saw Azula smirk, and hated it. And hated himself.

I should have known. I should have known.

Azula always got what she wanted. And what she wanted was his attention.

People dying to get it was just sprinkles on the top.

Charred wood gave way under his feet; he leapt as it collapsed, touching down on the roof of the next car and lashing out with a whip of flame to cover Shirong's jump.

Azula dodged it. Of course. But it kept her busy as she landed, just long enough for Shirong to carve out a bit more ammunition.

It kept them busy too; Ty Lee's somersault between the cars wasn't up to her usual grace, but she landed in one piece, twisting Shirong's last chains loose and sending them spinning away. Gray eyes still wide; hands limp, not forming the deadly fists that would punch a foe into paralysis. But still here, drawn in Azula's wake like a leaf in the current.

Leaves burn, Ty Lee.

It was a fight between us, Azula. I thought you had enough honor to hold to that!

But when had she? When had she ever?

You're my sister...

Shutting his ears to the wail of his spirit, Zuko regarded his enemy.

Steady. Breathe, murmured that deep whisper. The world itself is your weapon.

Everything burns.

Firestorm.

Shirong had heard the word from the firefighters of Ba Sing Se, sooty and mourning their dead with hard liquor and harder grief. The devastation of lives and tenements; the howling monster that devoured flesh and wood and even stone, shattering rock like glass. Sometimes there were evil spirits responsible; those were the nightmares that had cost him two partners in as many years, before he'd finally demanded solo assignments. But most of the time, there was only fire.

There's no such thing, Shirong thought, dazed, as only fire.

He was caught in the heartbeats of raging dragons, savaging roof and wind and anything between. Blue flames that roared of pain and lingering death and failure, you've lost, and you'll burn for it-

Orange fire leapt, curled, twisted; never the same twice. No challenges. No threats. It simply was, as if some angry spirit of iron had hammered lava into mist and moonlight.

Even seared and aching, Shirong could not fear it. It belonged. Just as the breath in his lungs, the stone in his hands-

Smirking, Shirong crushed stone to powdered sand, and hurled it into the fray.

Zuko is alive, Ty Lee thought numbly. Zuko can't be alive.

The two facts chased each other through Ty Lee's brain like angry lemurs as the fight and flames moved over and around her. Azula was stronger than her brother. Ty Lee knew it. Her clan elders knew it. The Fire Lord knew it.

But Zuko was alive. Which meant he'd betrayed the Fire Lord and survived.

Her elders said only two firebenders in this century had ever pulled that off. And if Zuko had the strength of Jeong Jeong the Deserter...

Or the Great Betrayer.

She wouldn't think his name. She wouldn't honor the ghost of that creature that had stolen so many of her own kin, a century ago. Stolen them away like the smoke from a pyre; gone, gone, and he hadn't even offered crumbs of truth to those sent to gently question him...

Only slaughtered them, without mercy.

It wasn't right to wish anyone dead, but when her family had told her the bedside tales, she'd always been glad he was.

So she'd never forgotten whose granddaughter Lady Ursa was. Even if Azula acted like she didn't know.

Azula is born of those who bring death to Tengri's blood. On both sides, the elders said. Serve her, that we all may live.

Of course, Zuko was too. But he'd never acted like it. Clumsy, shy; always ten steps behind his prodigy of a sister.

The firebending slicing around her wasn't clumsy now. Wasn't like anything Ty Lee had ever seen, as Zuko swirled glowing-hot sand between them to absorb yet another blast of blue fire. He wasn't sweating. He wasn't panicked. He wasn't even breathing hard.

Breath is chi, and chi is fire, her frozen mind whispered. How can he make fire without breathing?

A deceptively gentle swirl of his hand snaked flames from burning wood to slash at Azula's shins-

Azula parted it with a stomp that roared a backfire in his face-

Zuko spun and leapt, sand spiraling with him to catch flames and glow, spinning the rest of the blow off and away-

He's not making fire, Ty Lee realized. He's letting her make it!

Like the Betrayer. Like Byakko, who still hunted her clan if they dared to sail an inch across waters that treacherous island claimed as their own. She'd never caught Lady Ursa teaching the prince that perversion of firebending, but somehow Ursa must have...

He wasn't fighting to kill because he didn't have to! If he outlasts her-

He can't!

If Zuko were stronger, he should be the heir. But he wasn't, he couldn't be; he was a traitor to the Fire Lord, and if her people followed him they would die. They would die, and Tengri's ways would be gone. And he was twice a traitor, he wasn't even fighting to be heir, not if he'd tried to sneak in and out of Ba Sing Se without ever facing Azula-

And how could he not want to face Azula? How? How could he betray Ty Lee, betray all her people, by finding his strength now, when it was worse than useless? How could he screw up, the way Zuko always screwed up, and leave her people with no choice but to follow Azula? Because even if Zuko was stronger...

He can't be!

Even if he was, he was alone. Against the Fire Lord's armies. Anyone who stood with him was going to die.

No, no, Zuko wouldn't do that! He can't be doing this! He-

Ty Lee didn't have the breath to shout a warning, as the train shot through a tunnel in the Wall. But then, this was Azula. She didn't need to.

Yet Ty Lee had to duck again as they roared out of the darkness, as boulders flung by soldiers on the Wall crashed down on them all. And even from here, she could see Shirong's face light with fierce glee, as he seized hold of flung stone and punched it at Azula in an explosion of knife-sharp shards.

They'll kill her.

They're standing in the Fire Lord's way.

Everyone on Suzuran, everyone on this train... Zuko's going to kill them all.

I won't let you-!

The train's gale howled about her, and Ty Lee moved.

"There are many reasons Sozin attacked the Air Nomads before the Earth Kingdom," Uncle had said once, on Wani's deck. "If you would capture the Avatar alive, we must take him before he masters earth. The union of opposites can be unstoppable."

There wasn't time to duck. There wasn't time to plan. There was only an instant to move, hope no one was left in the car under them, and pray he could block enough of the shards.

Dragon Chases the Moon.

Fire surged from the burning roof; swirling vortices that didn't so much block the deadly shrapnel as catch and whirl it aside-

Most of it.

Oh fu-

Pain.

When you can smell blood, you're having a bad day.

Flat on his face, one hand gripping the charred wood of the roof, Shirong clamped a rock glove onto the semiconscious firebender's arm. Worked at his fingertips, until rock flowed and locked Zuko to the roof beside him, holding against the train's wind.

Best I can do, right now.

He didn't look at the blackened blades of stone that had stabbed through Zuko's last defense, or the smaller splinters piercing his own flesh. They were hurt. It wasn't good. But if he didn't stop Ty Lee now, they'd both be dead.

Oh, lovely. Stop her, when we're surrounded by wind? How?

But the acrobat - the airbender - didn't finish them. Just stood there, pale as parchment. Shuddered, and turned to help Azula-

Who'd already regained her feet, with a gymnast's twist that made it look easy. And a quizzical, calculating expression. "Why?"

"You're my friend," Ty Lee said simply. "And you're smarter than Fire Lord Sozin and Azulon. They hunted my people. You take care of us."

Soul chilled, Shirong tried to match the innocent smile to the words just spoken. And couldn't.

Our innocent bookworm Kuei gave up Earth Kingdom territory to the Fire Nation. To buffer us from this.

If we live, every Dai Li owes him an apology.

If. Oma and Shu. He was bleeding from a dozen small wounds, Zuko wasn't moving, Ty Lee was an airbender with all the train's gale to grab, and Azula was smiling at him in a way that made his spirit want to crawl right out of his flesh.

If I throw the shards back, it will only blind them for an instant. And she's waiting for that. I can feel it.

No, Shirong realized, as Zuko made a choked noise and Azula's lips turned up in a smirk. She wasn't waiting for the agent to move, any more than a man waited for a mosquito-flea he intended to squash.

She's waiting for him to die.

Spirits. And he didn't have so much as a link of chain left. Though he could see one of his chains, caught around a burning rafter yards away; flames wavering the air above it, clinks mocking him as it swung, so painfully out of reach.

"Mother coddled you, but Father respects me," Azula stated, acid amusement in her voice. "I'm going to enjoy being an only child."

Shirong snarled. I'd like to see you breathe molten glass, you little-

Anger blocked the roaring wind from his ears. All he could hear was Zuko's gasping breath... and a jingle of chain.

Metal is earth. Heat is fire.

He rolled to his knees, and pulled.

Searing chain whipped around legs like strangle-vines, tearing girls from the roof with a scream.

...Ow.

Collapsing on the roof felt like the best idea in the world. If only everything would just go away and let him hurt.

But he'd fought spirits that struck with pain and sleep and pure boredom before. Discipline said you didn't lie down and die until you were sure the enemy was dead.

Gathering himself, he looked over the side of the train.

...Not. Possible.

They weren't on the train, thanks be for small favors. But there was a familiar red-and-pink lump clinging to one of the track's stone support pylons.

Even with the train racing away, Shirong felt that gold-eyed rage like a fireball.

"Guanyin, mother of mercy, forgive me," he whispered. "What does it take to kill that girl?"

"More than anybody's got so far," Zuko rasped, pulling in threads of green flame to staunch the worst bleeding. "Help me up."

"Stay still!" Shirong snapped. Spirits, the speed they were moving - and the harbor was so close... "You get up while the train's stopping, I'll lose you for real this time."

"Look at the docks."

The docks? The whole harbor was on fire, what was he supposed to be-

The docks were on fire. So were the ships. Except for red sails already fleeing into the lake... and Suzuran, holding at trebuchet range from shore, lobbing flaming tar at any group of soldiers that seemed to be getting organized.

"They left us," Shirong realized, too stunned to even be angry as their train screamed down the rails' ramp toward the shore. "Oh, Oma and Shu. They left us."

"Think!" Zuko hissed, working out one of the smaller shards. "Earthbenders! I swear water shuts off your brain. We're not stopping this train!"

"Geh?" Shirong managed. Because that was water, deep and deadly and just waiting to suck down an unwary earthbender and drown him. "Lee. Us. Sink." Oh spirits, here it comes-

"Help me up!"

Command, with nothing of fear in it. Shirong moved, as the train left the rails entirely, crunching over flaming guardrails, wood and stone shrieking into spraying waves.

Standing, Zuko spread his hands, left foot stepping forward and out. Brought his hands together, shifting his weight back and spreading hands out with a tattered breath.

Waves surged forward to seize the train, foaming past windows, rousing screams-

Zuko drew his hands back to center, and pushed.

Waves crackled into ice, a curved arrowhead sheet of it spreading from the train's sides, buoying them into the harbor with all the speed and grace of a terrified flatfish.

"We get out of this," Zuko coughed, slumping against him like a summer-wilted weed, "I'm going to teach you about displacement."

Tucked into a niche Agents Quan and Bon had carved out a remnant of the Outer Wall, heart beating like sparrowkeet wings, Kuei watched the ice-winged train slide into the harbor with a thunderous splash. And tried not to fall off the Wall. That- he-

He'd been guarded inside, so he hadn't seen the Avatar and his friends attack the palace. He wondered if it would have felt like this.

No, Kuei decided, awed and terrified at once. Aang had come like an unstoppable storm, even if he'd meant to be friendly. Twelve-year-old boy or not, he was the Avatar. Who could fight the spirit of the whole world?

This wasn't a spirit's work. This was a desperate, human effort, backed by skill and sheer, bloody-minded audacity.

This is something we could do, Kuei realized. If we dare. Or - well, not this, we don't have any waterbenders right now, but- Oma and Shu. He's right. We can fight for the world. We will.

As Zuko was. And it was working. The train wasn't seaworthy. He could see cars listing, and the fires raging on the docks were pouring out enough heat to melt a dozen icebergs. But it was floating. Suzuran was already throwing lines to the passengers, pulling the train close enough for earthbenders to break off sections of car walls and lift stone, supplies, and refugees to the steel deck.

It wasn't smooth. It wasn't pretty. But it was fast, and determined, and-"I don't believe it," Bon breathed beside him, staring. "They're towing it!"

"They have to," Kuei realized, a dozen bits of books about ships coming together in his head in the face of reality. "Suzuran may look big next to our junks, but she's one of the Fire Navy's smaller supply ships. If they tried to take everyone on board, they'd capsize." He shaded his eyes. "There.

They're catching up to the ferries." He couldn't keep a note of wistfulness out of his voice. Everything was blurred by smoke and distance; if only he could see more.

Something rounded and metal tapped him on the arm. Kuei glanced at the telescope, then at Quan's wry, faint smile. "Oh. Thank you."

"Say what you like about the Fire Nation, they do make good lenses," Quan said dryly. "I suppose firebending can be good for something."

"Yes, it is," Kuei murmured, peering through the spyglass at the dangerous dance of steel and wood and ice. Remembering another impossible, audacious plan, embodied in the drill that had punched through Ba Sing Se's Outer Wall, stopped only by the Avatar.

He watched lives snatched out of the water for a few minutes more; sighed, and handed the telescope to Bon, peering at the flames and ash that had been his city's harbor. "I didn't know destruction could be so beautiful."

"Sir-"

"I know. It's horrible," Kuei said soberly. "I wish it'd never had to happen. But there's a certain... stark simplicity in it. Like fine calligraphy." Where every stroke meant something. And the true artist used just what was needed, and not one drop of ink more. "Look at it, Agent Quan." He gestured toward the smoke-hazed shore, where red-armored soldiers were beginning to get the blazes under control. "Prince Zuko decided to evacuate his people, and he did. Princess Azula decided to break our wall, and she did. General Iroh decided to invade our city years ago, and he did." Kuei shook his head, and looked at his chief Dai Li. "Fire Lord Ozai has decided to take the Earth Kingdom, hasn't he?"

"Yes, sir," Quan said quietly, face sober.

Kuei shivered, but tried to swallow the lump in his throat. "Can we stop him?"

"I don't know, your majesty," Quan said simply. "But for our people, for the world... we have to try." He let out a slow, measured breath. "Though I like our chances a lot better now than I did yesterday." He gestured over the harbor. "I'm not a military man, but even I can see Fire Lord Ozai is going to have some interesting choices to make. Reinforce his army here, and tighten his grip on Ba Sing Se? Send forces after Prince Zuko? Or both?" The agent's smile was thin, a razor of dark glee. "And if he does send forces after the prince, how many of them is he prepared to lose?"

"I hate hoping for death," Kuei said bleakly. "Even those of our enemies."

"I said lose, your majesty. I wasn't thinking of death."

"I don't understand," Kuei admitted.

"An earthbender who breaks his deals can die," Quan said, pointing out the painfully obvious. "So can any of the Fire Nation who break their loyalties; and except for that mad hermit Jeong Jeong, firebenders always die." He paused. "I should have died, your majesty. I didn't. Because you and earth-healers brought me back."

And Lee... Zuko was a healer. A fire-healer.

Still, how did that change anything? Nobles ruled; commoners followed. That was the way of the world. Even the Avatar had allied himself with the nobility of the Southern Water Tribe; young Katara might think Long Feng had kept him in the dark about reality, and when it came to the war, she was right. But the Dai Li's leader certainly hadn't shirked his duties when it came to keeping the Earth Kingdom up to date on details of inheritance and succession!

Granted, Lady Bei Fong might come of a somewhat mercantile background. But her title was proper enough. Even if her behavior was a bit... eccentric.

So the Avatar and his nobles meant to lead the world against the Fire Nation. Of course the commoners of the world would follow.

None of which should have anything to do with Prince Zuko. Certainly, he could try to make a claim on commoners of his own nation, but he was an exile. Those in the Fire Lord's army, by definition, weren't. "I'm still confused, Agent Quan," Kuei admitted. "You seem to be implying that... that Fire Nation forces sent against Prince Zuko could disobey orders."

"Oh, yes," Quan nodded. "Disobey, and desert. Probably not the generals, but the lower officers? Yes. Some might."

"Officers?" Kuei protested, disbelieving. "Those of noble blood are chosen to lead. Those who aren't, must follow. It's tradition!"

"In the Earth Kingdom, sir," Bon spoke up. "From what I've heard Agent Shirong say, the Fire Nation is different. They have," he paused, and pronounced the words carefully, "promotion on merit."

"What in Guanyin's name does that mean?" Kuei murmured.

"It's something like the practice among the Dai Li," Bon said cautiously. "If you do your job well, you get a position with more responsibility." He hesitated. "Unless you're as bad off as Agent Shirong, and just too dangerous to put in charge of a team. Which isn't his fault, sir. Long Feng was brilliant to put him as a recruiter. He got to use his skills, and candidates always got a brush with kamuiy malice to test them. Usually, a survivable one."

"Usually?" Kuei said warily. Eyed Bon, trying to focus on what was important. "Agent, if you follow that logic, a commoner could end up an officer!"

Bon froze.

After a moment, Quan cleared his throat. "Your majesty. Up until he retired a decade or so ago... Colonel Piandao, one of Azulon's most frightening swordsmen? He not only wasn't a noble, he wasn't even a firebender."

Kuei blinked. Polished his glasses on his sleeve, and peered at Quan. "That speech of Zuko's. He implied they could choose to stay-"

"No, sir," Quan said firmly. "He said they could choose to follow you. Honorably. Or follow him."

"You mean... commoners can choose their nobles?" Kuei shook his head, dazed. You mean I'm going to keep them? He'd thought those left behind just didn't want to take the risks of the Fire Prince's plan, never mind Zuko's polite, shocking speech. After all, there were a lot of risks. "That's - that's chaos! People are the land. Land doesn't get up and move to follow one lord. Not when he's not even an earthbender! How could any noble sit still and make arrangements with his fellow lords when part of his own demesne is trying to go somewhere else... oh." Kuei leaned against the inside of the stone hollow, eyes wide, feeling the world tilt askew. "They don't sit still, do they? He said they need to fight. If your commoners can just - just leave... Oma and Shu. How could they ever stop fighting?"

"If Madame Wen's story is true," Bon put in carefully, "Avatar Kyoshi made them stop."

Kuei swallowed. Added that to what Zuko had said, and tried to picture what the Earth Kingdom might be like, had Avatar Roku leveled every fortress city and flatly forbidden them to rise again.

Guanyin have mercy. We'd slaughter each other.

Still. Roku hadn't, and it was the Fire Nation trying to slaughter them instead, and- oh. "He's not just a distraction for Azula, is he?" Kuei said, feeling his way around the edges of a truly shocking idea. "Spirits. He could fracture the Fire Lord's whole invasion!"

"I doubt that, your majesty," Quan said frankly. "Fire Lord Ozai picks his generals. And while Fire Nation troops may not believe in nobles, they are loyal to command. It will be a rare person who risks damaging that loyalty, even if they know the prince is a fire-healer. But for the first time in what the Wens tell us is centuries, they'll know disobeying is possible." Another edged smile touched his face. "The Fire Lord is used to the unbreakable loyalty of his soldiers. It's what makes their conquest so deadly. And now... now that loyalty may not be unbreakable after all." He laughed softly. "Take it from a Dai Li, sir. A threat can be even better than a sword."

"That's why you didn't speak against my arrangement with Prince Zuko," Kuei realized. "You knew, just by being out there, they'd help us." He muttered something very unkingly under his breath. "Quan, you have to tell me these things!"

"There wasn't time-" Quan caught himself, and bowed with a sigh. "Forgive me, your majesty. We'll find a way to make time." He swept a glance across the ground below, looking for patches of familiar Dai Li green. "But could we do that underground, sir?"

With a last look at dying fires, Kuei nodded, blinking at the darkness as Bon sealed their hiding place, and then again at the dim green light as Bon opened a tunnel to the stairs leading down. "So how will Prince Zuko's plan affect the Avatar's invasion?"

"I don't know, sir." Quan frowned. "It would help if I knew the plan's specifics."

Kuei felt a queasy uncertainty as they reached the stairs; Bon leading, Quan taking up the rear guard. "You don't know?"

Quan stopped on the topmost stair. "You don't know."

"Well... no," Kuei admitted. "Sokka came up with the idea, and the Council of Five sent word they were about to finish it, before Princess Azula- oh no." He swallowed dryly. "Oh, I... really feel like an idiot. She knows. About the eclipse," he added at Quan's sharp look. "They hadn't finished the plan when I... told the head of the Kyoshi Warriors."

"Ah," Quan said levelly.

"An eclipse?" Bon looked up at them both, incredulous. "You mean they're real?"

"The sun darkens, and day turns to night," Quan told him. "Only I've heard it's even worse for firebenders. They'll be powerless. Even if the Avatar hasn't mastered all the elements, he should have no problem defeating the Fire Lord."

"Exactly!" Kuei beamed. And frowned, still worried. "Though I don't know how they were going to get to the Fire Lord and still give the Avatar eight minutes to beat him."

"Eight minutes?" Quan repeated carefully.

"The eclipse," Kuei reminded him. Glanced between the agents, as their amazement turned to dread. "I know the sun is partly shadowed for a few hours, but it's only dark for... oh no." He felt faint. "Is this one of those things most people don't know about?"

...Was Bon banging his head against the wall?

"Well," Quan sighed, "if the generals did solve that problem, hopefully the answer was in those plans Katara was going to take to you, your majesty."

"So you don't know?" A chill went down Kuei's spine. "I thought part of our plan last night was to get as much as we could of the army loose."

"And we did, sir." Lifting his head from the dent, Bon grimaced. "Princess Azula beat us to them. The survivors say the Council of Five has either been executed, or deported to Fire Nation territory." He paused. "They're gone, sir."

Kuei winced. He hadn't really liked the generals, the few times he'd met them. They seemed to assume he didn't know anything.

...And yes, that was partly true, but how could he fix that if they wouldn't explain what they were doing? And why?

But he hadn't liked them, and that made him feel even worse. Because he had to put their deaths aside, and focus on what he could do for those still alive. "So we have no idea what the Avatar's plan is."

"No, sir," Quan agreed, obviously unhappy. Clenched his fists at his side, and reluctantly forced the next words out. "But we know when it comes to strategy and treachery, the Fire Princess has them all outmatched."

"Except when she gets hit by a train," Bon said dryly.

Quan snorted. "Right. Like we can... sir?"

Absently tapping the jade beads hidden under his cloak, Kuei thought about that. And, slowly, smiled.

Chapter End Notes

Tai Chi moves for the train escape - Scooping the Sea while Looking at the Sky, and Pushing Wave.

Yes, I enjoyed Speed and Under Siege 2. How'd you guess?

Seriously, ever since I looked at the Avatar world map and saw how fast the Gaang got into the city by train, I've been hoping someone would write a Traintop Battle in Ba Sing Se.

"Cloth washed in fire" - ancient China (and some other areas) made some clothing out of asbestos. Given we see Earth Kingdom soldiers ducking to take flames on that wide hat of theirs, I offer that as a potential explanation for canon.

Chapter 37

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

We need a better plan. Leaning away from the boulder behind him, Sokka looked at the little island-marks he'd scrawled in the dirt, now half-obsured by sunset's shadows. Sighed, and knuckled his eyebrow to rub at a gnawing headache. We need a different plan, anyway. Don't know if we need a better one.

Then again, just about any plan might be better than just charging into the Fire Nation blind. They didn't have the Earth King's troops behind them. What they did have, or could get - it'd have to count.

And it won't, if I don't figure out where to aim it. Darn it, we need information...

Like they had in Ba Sing Se. And they all knew what had happened when they'd relied on other people to tell them about the city.

Aang died. Really died. We all almost died.

We can't do that again. If we're dead, nobody can stop the Fire Lord.

We need to know what we're up against. And... I don't think we can do that from outside the Fire Nation.

Which was the same conclusion he'd circled back to for the past three days, and Sokka muttered words under his breath that would have Gran-Gran washing his mouth out with soap.

We need to get in there. And Zuko gave us a way.

If they could trust the firebender. The exiled, lousy, sister-scaring bastard...

Don't lie, Sokka told himself harshly. It's not Zuko you're worried about.

If they took Zuko up on his offer, Katara would be playing the part of a girl hunting her mother's killer. And... he was really worried... it wouldn't be playing.

Tui and La. He didn't want to think about if they could trust Katara.

Damn it...

"What'cha drawing?"

Sokka didn't look up, even when bare toes stepped into his line of sight, carefully avoiding each scribble. "The Fire Nation. I'm trying to, anyway. The Earth Generals had a big map of it. I think this is what it looked like. Aang's working with Katara again?"

"Trying to figure out how to freeze a wave without freezing somebody's head inside it," Toph confirmed.

"Good luck with that," Sokka grumbled. "Sooner or later, he's got to figure out... well. He'd better figure out something to do with the Fire Lord. I don't think talking him out of conquering the world is going to work."

"Me neither," Toph agreed. "But it's still a good idea. Twinkletoes has big and flashy down pat. Figuring out how to fiddle with the little things in a move - he needs a lot of work on that. If he wants to do it with water instead of earth, 'cause he gets to drool at your sister? Fine. Just as long as he does it."

For once, the Fire Nation took a sharp right out of his mind, only hanging around to giggle maniacally. "He's what?" Sokka yelped.

"Relax," Toph shrugged, waving a hand back and forth. "He's drooling, but she's cooled it down a lot. Xiu must have made her think. Good for her. Aang doesn't have any parents to check on her family. He doesn't have anybody. It's not fair to get him into something that might not be a good idea."

"Hey! How can being my sister's boyfriend not be a good idea!" Sokka protested. Stopped, and buried his head in his hands. "Argh. Brain... broken..."

Snickering, Toph sat down by him. "Sometimes I wish I had a big brother. It'd be neat if he were a lot like you." She punched him in the arm. "Though I can take care of myself."

"What, and you think the master waterbender can't?" Sokka grumbled.

"She's too busy taking care of the rest of us," Toph said seriously. "Katara keeps us together. You keep us focused." She paused. "And Aang takes a lot of focus."

"Tell me about it," Sokka groaned. "I just... I don't get him sometimes. Make that a lot of the time." He bit his lip. "You know what I really hate about that mess at the library now? We spent all our time looking for ways to beat the Fire Nation. I just... I kind of wish we could go back and look up the Air Nomads."

Toph frowned, toes kneading dirt. "I knew it. We left you guys alone, and you got to do all your guy talk with no girls to toss some sense in, and now something's bothering you."

"It's not like- okay. It kind of is like that," Sokka sighed. "Every Air Nomad was a bender. All of them." He waved his hands, unable to describe the odd sinking feeling he'd had when he finally realized that. "I'm not even sure where to start asking Aang about... stuff."

"You want to know if all the Air Nomads thought they were blessed by spirits," Toph said bluntly. "Like Katara does."

Sokka picked up his jaw. "How'd you know?"

"Zuko told me about that." For once, Toph looked a little ashamed. "And after I talked about spirits some with Katara... I'm sorry. I didn't know I was stomping on your toes when I-" She stopped. Shook her head, and started over. "Bending's just me, Sokka. I use it the way you use Boomerang. When I bend to move you, I'm not trying to say I'm better than you. It's just the easiest way to do things when I'm mad."

Sokka started to shoot back a comment about cheap apologies... and stopped, as something a few months back finally clicked in his head. "Bato was with a bunch of nuns when he was hurt. But they weren't earthbenders."

"Yeah?" Toph cocked her head at him. "So why's that strange? My parents didn't say much about nuns. Just that it was a calling. Kind of like Aang getting stuck with the world, only a lot smaller."

"But if they're not benders, how do they talk to the spirits?" Sokka asked, puzzled. "I mean, most of the time. When the spirits aren't mad and trying to kill people."

"I dunno," Toph shrugged. "What's bending got to do with talking to spirits? I've met lots of benders who never even met a spirit. I didn't, 'til I went with you guys."

It was a good thing he was already sitting down, Sokka thought. Because that was just... weird. "Aang talks to spirits," he pointed out.

"Yeah, but that's 'cause-" Toph shot to her feet, and kicked a line of dirt that rumbled under the boulder to roar up in a ring of earth. "Talk!"

Something stomped impatiently, rattling pebbles loose from inside the wall.

"Peace, little one," a hearty, elderly man's voice said gently. "The young lady has every right to be cautious." He cleared his throat. "As I believe she was about to say, young man, that is because Avatar Aang is a spirit. And a human, who embodies the Avatar Spirit, so it might better understand our world. A bridge, after all, must be part of both sides."

Sokka blinked at Toph. Who shrugged, and sank the wall back into the ground.

"Okay," Sokka said, stepping around the boulder to get a close view of the man. Middle-tall, straggly white hair and beard, a hooded cloak mottled in rock-colors over a plain brown robe, and timeworn fingers easily gripping a knobby wooden staff. "So who are you, and why are you looking for Aang?"

"I am Tao," the elderly man inclined his head. "A wanderer of these hills. At times a shaman, when there is need. And I was not looking for Avatar Aang, precisely." He waved a hand at a waft of dust in the setting sun, that swirled with a vigorous stomp. "Does this little one belong with you?"

"So it can be okay to name a spirit?" Aang breathed a sigh of relief as they gathered around the evening fire. Tao had apparently managed to talk to Boots as he traveled, somehow, and he'd brought enough dried noodles to cook for everyone. Best of all, he'd brought tofu.

No meat. Yay!

"Under certain circumstances," Tao agreed. "Which are, unfortunately, rare. It's not simply the act of naming, it is the emotions gifted with the name that a spirit takes to itself. Tui and La, Guanyin, Agni, the Autumn Lord of your own people; they were all great spirits to begin with, so the tales say. Their names were first spoken with reverence and awe, and that clings to them, no matter what has happened after." He shook his head slightly. "The lesser spirits, the kamui, are far more strongly affected. A hide-behind spirit, for example... well, normally those who encounter such creatures do feel fear, no matter how brave they may be. And that fear clings to any name, and leads the spirit to take the fear as part of itself. Which means they seek to inspire fear, over and over, for that is part of their essence." He waved toward the earthbender. "Toph was fortunate. She sensed a creature she did not fear, and named Boots accordingly." He leveled a stern finger across the fire. "You were lucky, young lady. Had this gone awry, you could have unleashed quite the little terror on the countryside. I'm certain the Avatar could have stopped it, but if he has not been trained in the proper handling of spirits... well. It'd be like using a stone mallet to swat a spider-fly. It does the job, but it's rather hard on everything else."

"Oh." For once, Toph looked taken aback. "So Boots went to find you?"

"That is what you asked of him." Tao smiled, a bit sadly. "I would say he was the best messenger you could have sent. There are too few of us who follow the shaman's path, these days."

"Because of the Fire Nation," Katara stated.

"Because of choice," Tao corrected her. "Though yes, the invasion does matter. It is easier to mute the call of the spirits when your village and family need defense in this world."

"How could you do that?" Katara asked, offering Momo a few nuts, before he fluttered back to Aang's shoulder. "It's an honor to be chosen by the spirits!"

"A lethal honor, should you happen to meet a kamui bent on malice whose strength is greater than your own," Tao said dryly. "With the world out of balance, that is happening more and more often. And while thirty years ago, if the need was dire, we could call on Ba Sing Se's Dai Li for aid... those who might still wish to aid us, have been influenced otherwise."

"Whoa, hold it." Sokka held up his hands. "The Dai Li helped you?"

"They are shamans, of a sort," Tao said wryly. "Not always of their own will. But they still battle evil within the city." He sighed. "Though if the tales are true, they have fallen into even greater evil. For one trained in dealing with spirits, human malice is ever an unexpected danger. Long Feng... well, you would know more of him than I."

Aang winced, trying not to think about the Dai Li who'd held Appa captive and worked with Azula. "So it's not just Koh? There are other evil spirits?"

Tao drew back, gauging him with a suddenly wary look. "You've dealt with the Face-Stealer."

"Well, I... kind of had to," Aang admitted, scratching his head. Darn it, maybe getting into the Fire Nation would be easier with hair, but he didn't like it at all. "Zhao was attacking the North Pole, and the Fire Nation was going to win, and - I had to. Avatar Roku said he was the only one who knew where to find the Moon and Ocean spirits..." He trailed off, seeing grim disappointment wash over Tao's face.

"Some rumors begin to be explained," the shaman sighed. "Is that what he said, young man? Is it exactly?"

Aang gulped. "Well... not exactly..."

Tao rubbed his head, the same way Sokka did these days. "Avatar Aang. This is one of the first things you should have been taught of spirits, and it is vital. The dead do not see the same world as the living. Especially those of the dead who remain in the spirit world, and do not visit us as ghosts still tied to mortal kin. And like any creature, the dead act on what they see."

"Roku wouldn't hurt Aang!" Katara protested. "He is Aang!"

"No, young lady," Tao said steadily. "If what I have been taught of the spirits is true, he is not." He regarded Aang, gaze level. "The Avatar Spirit is incarnated, life after life. Separate, human lives, each of whom claim their own spirit. Each of whom will in turn pass away, to join those who advise the next Avatar. You are many things, young man, but you are not Roku."

It hurt. Like diving into cold water without a breath to keep you warm first. "But I've been Roku," Aang objected. "And Kyoshi. And even Yangchen!"

"Any shaman can allow a spirit to possess him, so it may make its wishes more clear to humans," Tao stated. "It is not to be done casually, or without those around you who can bring you back if the spirit chooses not to leave. For while you are possessed, if the spirit is powerful, it can reshape even your mortal body as its own. If the spirit is malicious... shamans have died in monstrous form before."

Wide-eyed, Aang started to back away-

Hit a solid wall of rock, as Toph frowned. "He's telling the truth." She swung a finger Tao's direction. "I don't know about Kyoshi, but Roku and Yangchen helped us."

"And I do not doubt they will do so again," Tao inclined his head. "They are Avatars, and I am sure they mean you no harm. But a man's intention may not be the same as his result. That is as true for the spirits as any of us."

"You think I can't trust Roku?" Aang said, disbelieving. "No way! You heard Toph; he's always helped us out!"

"That's not what he said," Sokka stated. "Remember the solstice? I bet Roku just meant to scare Zhao off, and take the temple down 'cause he was ticked off. Only he kind of forgot we still had to get out of the temple."

"If you believe Zuko," Katara said pointedly.

Sokka lowered his head, lips moving silently for a minute. "Katara. Either Roku brought it down on our heads by accident, or he did it on purpose."

"He wouldn't!"

"Then he did it by accident, and that's the point," Sokka almost snarled. "Us, alive. Able to be crushed by falling rocks. Roku, dead, kind of past worrying about it." He eyed Tao. "That what you're trying to get at?"

"In part," the shaman agreed. "The dead do not see the same dangers as the living. They can mean well, and still do great harm."

"But Roku's really, really wise!" Aang protested. "He wants to stop the war before the comet comes. He wouldn't get us hurt!" He looked toward an uneasy silence. "You know he doesn't want anyone to get hurt."

"Dad doesn't want anybody in the tribe to get hurt fighting the Fire Nation, either," Sokka said soberly. "Sometimes there isn't any choice. If you want to win, you have to send people where you know they're going to get hurt."

Aang swallowed hard. "But Roku's my friend." Like Kuzon was.

"Bato is Dad's friend." Katara's eyes were shadowed, hurting for him. "But the tribe, the world... it's more important than one person. More important than anyone. If Roku's trying to fix the whole world..." Her hands fisted in blue cloth, and she gazed at the fire. "Roku is your friend. And if the dead see things the living don't, I bet he knew we'd get out of there okay. But he's not your tribe. Not your family." She hesitated, picking her words. "He might not be as careful as he would be if you were."

It felt like getting hit in the stomach. "You think he's my friend, but I can't trust him?" Aang shook his head in disbelief. "Katara, that's crazy!"

"Crazy?" Katara sputtered. "Aang, he's not your tribe."

"You're not making any sense!"

"I'm not?" Katara's eye was twitching. "You - you -"

Toph wove her fingers together, cracking her knuckles. "Packed, over the side, gone."

Which made no sense. But Katara took a deep breath anyway, and smiled at Toph. "Thanks."

"Anytime." Toph faced his way. "I think we got another mix-up, Twinkletoes. Roku's like Gyatso, right? Older guy, helps you out, teaches you about what you're gonna be when you grow up?"

"Well, yeah," Aang admitted. Like she had to say that?

"I thought so." She faced toward Katara. "You're trying to tell him not to trust Gran-Gran."

"Oh." Katara looked like she'd swallowed a live catfish-eel.

"Even Gran-Gran can be wrong sometimes," Sokka pointed out. "Aang, if there's one thing I've figured out on this crazy adventure, it's that the world is really broken. I bet Roku sees a lot more than we do, but we can't count on him seeing everything. He told you to master the elements and defeat the Fire Lord. Okay. But he didn't tell you how. Maybe you're supposed to figure it out; part of all that Avatar stuff. Or," Sokka spread his hands, offering a shrug. "Maybe he just didn't know." He paused, deliberately. "If Dad tells me to go hunt zebra-seals down at the cove, and I stop and look over the water for leopard-sharks first, that doesn't mean I don't trust Dad. A good man of the tribe knows things happen. Just because the water was safe an hour ago, doesn't mean it is now."

Roku might be wrong. Aang swallowed, and felt like scrubbing his eyes. Teachers weren't supposed to be wrong!

"So young," Tao sighed. "Too young... Aang. He may have been the Avatar, but Roku is a spirit now. And while spirits of the dead may look in on the living, they often act on what they knew the world to be while they were alive. It's been a hundred and twelve years since Roku perished. The world is very different now."

"Fire Nation armor's changed, and that was just eighty-five years ago," Sokka nodded. "I don't know how far Hahn's guys got on Zhao's ship, but... well, not the point. The thing is, Chief Arnook didn't know it was different, and he's living in this world with the rest of us. Roku could have missed stuff."

"So the Northern Water Tribe did attack the Fire Navy?" Tao's brows climbed. "I had heard rumors, but I didn't know what to believe. Some went so far as to claim the entire Fire Navy was destroyed. I knew that couldn't be true, I've seen Fire Nation ships with my own eyes. Yet some of the invaders I've seen have seemed ill at ease. Which is very, very unusual." He glanced over them all, inviting the truth.

Aang had to look away. I don't want to think about it. I had to, people were going to die - but it was awful.

"Zhao attacked the spirits," Sokka said after a moment. "They helped Aang hit back. Some of the fleet got away; we ran into one of their ships later. But most of it didn't."

"Hah!" Tao pounded a fist on his leg with relish. "I saw the moon; I knew something extraordinary must have happened. Well done, young Avatar!"

Aang cringed. Well done wasn't exactly what he wanted to hear after all that death and terror.

"Very well-" Tao paused, eyes widening. "Oh no. Not good."

"Not good?" Katara gave the shaman a dark look. "How can saving the North Pole not be good?"

"Saving lives is always well done, even if it's hard on your enemies," Tao said firmly. "Not good is... I am a shaman, young waterbender. My concern is the dead as well as the living. Nothing is more dangerous to the living than the restless dead. And nothing is more likely to create malicious ghosts than spirit-dealt death." He paused. "Do those of the Northern Water Tribe know how to lay Fire Nation soldiers to rest?"

"Of course they do!" Katara said fiercely. "They didn't lose their benders to the Fire Nation. They fought!"

"Nor have we lost what we knew of death, and the spirits," Tao said gravely. "But it took time for us to accept that rites which console an Earth Kingdom spirit do not suffice for those of the Fire Nation. Simple, honorable burial does not gentle their ghosts to accept untimely death. They must be burned."

"You bury bodies?" Katara said, stunned. "How can you not give them back to the Ocean? That's wrong!"

"For you, perhaps," Tao said firmly. "For us, it is right and just. As those of the Fire Nation need a pyre, and Air Nomads need their sky burial. We are born of our element, and to it we must return."

"Sky burial?" Sokka turned the weirdest look on Aang. "How does that even work?"

Aang gulped. "It's, um... kind of messy. And we just ate!"

Now everybody looked weirded out. Except Tao. "I have seen it," he said mildly. "Those close to the dead take them high among the mountains, where the vulture-eagles will gather. Then they simply... render it easy for the scavengers to do what is natural."

"Uh," Toph managed. "Wow. That's..."

"Erk?" Sokka suggested.

"...Yeah."

"Told you it was messy," Aang said, cross. Wait a minute. "You've seen a sky burial? How old are you?"

"I believe I've lost count," Tao chuckled. "I was born... well, not long after Sozin invaded the Earth Kingdom the first time, before Avatar Roku drove him off. Which would be... hmm. Well over a hundred and thirty years ago, now."

You could hear the cricket-mice chirping.

"You look surprised," Tao mused. "The war often kills us early, but benders can live a long time. Fire Lord Sozin lasted over a century and a half; I was beginning to think he'd outlive me. Not that Azulon and Ozai have been any more charming." He frowned. "I almost miss Azulon. His forces conquered and killed ruthlessly, but they contented themselves with that. Under Ozai..." Anger flickered in green eyes. "What else can one expect, of a man willing to maim his own son?"

Aang swallowed, as the world seemed to drop out from under him.

"Aang?" Katara leaned toward him, barely held back by the fire.

Determined, Aang stood, glad that Tao and the others rose to match him. He bowed to the shaman. "Thank you for the lesson, Sifu Tao. Will you tell us more about the spirits tomorrow? I think-" He hesitated. "I think I need some time to think."

"Of course," Tao bowed back. "I wish you luck. All of you."

"It's dark," Katara objected. "You don't have to go."

"Night holds no terrors for me," Tao said kindly, his own bare feet stirring a puff of dust. "I may not see as you do, Toph, but I can find my way about. A shaman needs considerable time alone. Sometimes the spirits speak very softly, and if we're always listening to our fellow humans... that can be trouble."

Another nod, and he faded into the night.

Shamans have to be alone? Aang thought, petting Momo for comfort as he sat back down. That sounds awful-

Dust whirled, and he almost ended up flat on his face. "Cut that out!"

Pattering like snickers, Boot scurried away around the fire.

"Great. It's staying." Sokka heaved a sigh, then turned a concerned look on Aang. "You okay?"

"Yeah." If you didn't count wanting to toast a spirit, just a little-

But that filled his mind with flames again, and Aang shivered. "The Fire Lord did that?"

Toph whistled. "Nobody told you what Xiu told us?"

Aang perked up a little. "What'd she say?"

"A lot of things," Katara said firmly. "Why does it matter? We always knew the Fire Lord was a monster."

"Maybe you did." Aang looked down. "I was kind of hoping..." He swallowed. "That's why Zuko doesn't trust us."

Toph leaned back against some raised rock, intrigued. Sokka frowned. And Katara flung up her hands. "Of course he doesn't! We're going to stop the Fire Nation!"

"No," Aang said quietly. "He won't trust us because his father hurt him." He moved a hand, feeling air swirl in it. Seeing Zuko's scar again in his memories; a raw, red mess that looked like - like someone had just cupped a handful of fire against Zuko's face...

Don't look. Just... don't.

"I ran away because I thought - I thought Gyatso was just going to let the elders send me away," Aang explained. "And it hurt. And you say parents are like teachers..." He shook his head. "If Gyatso had really hurt me, I don't think I could trust anybody."

"The Fire Lord's evil," Katara stated. "We know that."

"Evil or not, he's Zuko's Dad," Sokka shrugged. "Just like Azula's his sister. Bleah." He stuck out his tongue. "Glad I'm not in that family." More serious, he eyed Aang. "So this is important?"

"Yeah." Aang leaned his chin on his fist, thinking hard. "Zuko can't trust us because the Fire Lord hurt him. And the Fire Nation can't trust the Avatar because Kyoshi hurt them. I know she didn't mean to, and I bet that Earth King deserves a kick in the butt. But they think she did it on purpose." He poked that cloud of an idea from every angle he could think of. Took a deep breath, and pointed at Toph. "But Zuko trusts you."

Everybody's eyes fixed on the earthbender. Even Appa, lying quietly out of spark range from the fire, let out a questioning snort.

"Huh. Ask the easy ones." Toph frowned. "First off, Twinkletoes, Zuko's not like a lot of the Fire Nation. He's been banished for three years, and he listens to Uncle. What works with him might not work with anybody else."

"I know," Aang admitted. "But right now? It's the best idea I've got."

"You want to get Zuko to trust you?" Katara tried not to bristle.

"We want to get the Fire Nation to trust us," Sokka said firmly. "We're going to have to fight the Fire Lord. And the army. And who knows what else. But remember Gaipan? Some people in the colonies are just people. If we can get them to trust Aang... maybe a lot of people won't have to die."

I don't want anybody to die! Aang tried not to shiver. But -kick the ice and start walking, Sokka had said. Maybe he couldn't see a way to save everybody now. But that didn't mean it wasn't out there. And maybe, just maybe, if he figured out how to save some people, he'd end up in the right spot to save more. "So how'd you do it?" he asked. "How'd you get him to trust you when you found him?"

"First problem, Twinkletoes," Toph said plainly. "He found us."

"Amaya," Katara muttered.

"You think so?" Toph smirked. "I thought you guys put the address on the posters."

Sokka slapped himself in the forehead.

"But he already knew where Appa was," Toph went on. "He found us after." She frowned, obviously remembering. "Boy, was he mad. Not yelling mad. Pretty calm. Mad inside, the kind that makes you shake all over and feel like banging your head off rocks. There we were, there you were, all set to be grabbed like a solstice gift. No Appa to get away on. No help from anybody else, not with Long Feng and the Dai Li in the way. He could have grabbed you. He could have tried, anyway, if the Dai Li kept out of it-

"We would have stopped him," Katara said angrily.

"And that's why he was mad," Toph said impatiently. "He finally figured it out. He couldn't take all of us. He can't take Aang. He knows that." She took a breath. "Trying to do what his Dad wanted, trying to catch Aang, wasn't going to work. So he stopped." She pointed at Aang. "And then he tried to figure out, screw his orders, what was the right thing to do?"

"So he wanted to let Appa go." Aang smiled.

"Not that simple," Toph shot back. "He didn't let Appa go for you. He did it for the Fire Nation. Remember that letter? Generals. Back you into a corner. North Pole all over again. That's what he figured might happen. And that wouldn't help anybody stop the war. Not us, not the Earth Kingdom, not the Fire Nation. So getting Appa out, so you could get out, was what Zuko figured was the best thing he could do. And after he figured that out, that's when he asked Iroh to find me, and ask if I'd hear him out." She shrugged. "He told me everything, and he asked if I'd help. And I did. Because he didn't lie to me, and I could hear how much he was beating himself up over telling me he couldn't grab you. He knew it wasn't gonna work. Worse, it wasn't gonna work and lots of people would get hurt if he tried. He doesn't like hurting people." She was quiet a long moment. "So I don't know if that's gonna help. Zuko took a chance trusting me 'cause he was backed into a corner, and not getting help would have made things worse. But he had to be all the way back against a wall. And he had Uncle. And I think Uncle wants to help you. The Fire Army? Not so much."

Oh. Yeah, that made sense. Darn.

But bad as that was, there might be a way. Maybe. "We're going to stop the Fire Lord," Aang said thoughtfully. "If he's the guy who wants the war the most... then maybe after that, we can make them think stopping the war is the best thing to do."

"They won't," Katara said quietly.

But it was more of a sad quiet than an angry one, so Aang just asked, "Why?"

"They'd have to say they were wrong," Katara answered. "That they've been wrong for a hundred years. Who's going to say that?"

Aang felt his heart sink. This isn't fair. It's impossible, it's too big-!

"Jeong Jeong did," Sokka pointed out. Looked doubtful. "Though he's... kind of nuts."

Which made Aang want to smile all over again, suddenly relieved. "Bumi said we need mad genius." He thought about that some more. "If Zuko said Kyoshi drove the Fire Nation crazy - maybe it's the ones they think are crazy, that really aren't."

Sokka and Katara blinked. Momo scratched his ears. And Toph... smirked. "Uncle."

"Okay, I'll buy that," Sokka muttered. Eyed Toph, who was still smirking. "No."

"Oh, yeah," she grinned.

"Aw, no..."

"No, what?" Katara asked, curious.

Sokka gave Toph a narrow look. "You really think he went back there."

"Yep." Toph's grin was all teeth.

"Azula's going to flatten him!"

"She's gotta catch him first," Toph shrugged. "And he's good at being sneaky."

Katara stared at them. Aang looked between them, wondering why they were suddenly talking about Azula when they'd been talking about- "Zuko went back to Ba Sing Se? Why?" He wasn't going to help Azula after all. Was he?

Sokka let out a slow breath. "Toph? Clear me some dirt. I'm going to draw a map."

It wasn't a really good map. But with a little help from him and Katara, they had everything sketched into place. "Okay," Sokka went on. "Here's Chameleon Bay. Here's where we are. Here's where Suzuran was. Now remember that Zuko's responsible for the whole ship, and Suzuran can't fly." He tapped a stick on the ocean outside Chameleon Bay. "And remember there's a lot of Fire Navy ships that keep coming up this way, no matter how many of them Dad stops."

Right, ships needed water, so... Aang traced a path through lakes and north. "He's got to go past the city."

"But if he goes past, Azula's going to know something's up," Toph stated. "She's the princess in charge. Suzuran's got to stop."

Aang gulped. "But if she finds him-"

"She thinks he's dead. He almost was. And he's sneaky." Toph crossed her arms. "Don't worry about Zuko. He wants to stay way, way away from you."

"Okay, that was just mean," Sokka grumbled.

"Why?" Katara gave her brother a sardonic look. "I think it's a great idea."

It probably was, Aang admitted to himself. Zuko and Katara in the same place were scary.

Besides, Toph was right. Zuko was sneaky. He'd be fine.

...Ow.

Warm feathers were nestled against him, and a beak was nibbling his hair. Which was just about the only part of him that didn't hurt.

"Finally," Amaya sighed in relief. "Gently, Iroh, gently..."

The hug was gentle, except for Asahi's grumble as she was shoved aside. "Uncle," Zuko breathed, tasting tea and smoke and worry. Not opening his eyes. Not yet. "The train?"

"Dispersed through the fleet," Iroh answered. "There were casualties; you and Shirong, frostbite, and some near-drownings. But very few fatalities."

"Azula." Zuko swallowed the guilt. "I tried... tired."

"You should be," Amaya said tartly. "There are limits to how much blood loss waterbending can mend. Get comfortable in that bed. You're staying in it a few days."

Zuko opened his eyes a crack, taking in his quarters on Suzuran, Amaya and Iroh's worried faces, Asahi ruffling her feathers as she peered at him... and a few others jammed in as well. "Captain Jee. I need to-"

"With all due respect, your highness, you need to stay right there," Jee said dryly. "In a few hours we'll hit the spot Earth King Kuei wanted us to bring his resistance troops to, and that should let us ditch the ferries. Without them, we can move faster; which is good, given we're counting on speed and wits to get us past patrolling ships. If we need waterbending on top of that, and I suspect we will, we need you as rested as possible." He smiled wryly. "Though I think earthbending alone may be enough of a surprise to get us clear of most trouble. Agent Shirong and Professor Wen have some interesting ideas."

Zuko glanced at the relieved Dai Li, who'd just nudged Teruko awake where she'd been leaning against the wall. Gingerly swept his gaze across the room to make sure Tingzhe and his family weren't there. And leveled a weak glare at Iroh. "When were you going to tell me Roku was Ilah's father?"

Jee choked.

"Ah," Iroh sighed. "I had hoped, never."

"What?"

"If you chose to help the Avatar, I wished it to be your choice," Iroh stated. "Not an obligation to our ancestors. You have had enough of those in your life. More than enough." The general looked over the room himself, and motioned for Teruko to listen at the door.

"Clear, sir," she reported.

He inclined his head. "There is an organization that wishes to restore balance to the world. You know it in passing, Amaya, for they have brought many of the Fire Nation to your door. Our ability to act is nowhere near as great as our desire to; we have a way of falling in the paths of conquerors. Chin, and Sozin, have only been two of those who have decimated us. But some of us survive. And we hope." His gaze rested on Zuko. "With a century passing, and no sign of the Avatar... our best chance to restore the balance was to work toward a true Fire Lord. One who understood the four elements, and how they need each other. One who would realize the war was wrong." He smiled. "That he would be of Roku's blood as well... we believed it could not hurt."

Zuko swallowed hard, vision graying at the edges. Faintly he could hear shocked gasps, Shirong's hiss of breath. "You set me up."

"Nephew-"

"You crazy, idealistic - you!" Zuko yelled, rising up, hands clawing air in a red-and-gray fury. "That's the same damn mistake all over again! One person to save the world? One Fire Lord to say oh, we're so sorry, we'll stop killing you and everybody will play nice? I'd be assassinated in a month! And if I wasn't, I'd still be under Kyoshi's decree! We'd still be going insane! Agni, what do you think happened to Sozin to make him crazy? He saw what being a loyal lord did to Zouge! Holding every clan together when half of them want to fillet the other half - it killed him! Sozin watched it kill him! And you - you-"

Trying to get up... was a mistake.

As the world blacked out, he felt Shirong catch him, and heard Amaya curse.

"General?" Teruko's voice was fading like everything else. "I know I promised him, but I think you'd better wait to tell him about Kuzon..."

"Is he right?" Amaya glanced back over her shoulder, blue eyes wide in the lamplight of their quarters. "Would someone dare assassinate the Fire Lord? Is that even possible? He holds your people's loyalty."

Iroh paused in brushing her hair. "It is possible," he said, resuming his strokes. "To break one's loyalty does not kill instantly. There is time for desperate acts." He hesitated. No. Give her the truth. "And the bonds of loyalty are not quite as straightforward as the Water Tribe's ties of family, village, and tribe. That is the order in which they hold you, is it not? Pakku has not always been straightforward in his answers."

She started. "You know Master Pakku?"

"I have had the distinction of being frozen by him, yes," Iroh chuckled. "It is one reason I perfected the breath of fire."

"Master Pakku wants to bring balance back to the world?" Amaya's voice dropped. "I've wronged him, all these years."

"Perhaps," Iroh said judiciously. "Then again, he is the one who trained Katara."

"Hmm."

"Loyalty first binds a child to his parents," Iroh went on. "That bond begins to loosen when one is about thirteen, and taking on the responsibilities of an adult. It does not break, if the child chooses to remain loyal. Many do. Zuko is a responsible and honorable young man, so he remained bound; for Ozai was his father, and his clan head, and lord of the capital's domain, and the Fire Lord."

"Clan head?" Amaya shifted so he could pick apart some particularly stubborn strands. "Meixiang says Tingzhe's the head of Wen."

A shock and surprise, indeed. Earth and Fire, bound together? Could it even work? "He is," Iroh agreed. "As clan head, he is owed loyalty from his wife, his children, and his brother, Shirong. Once Shirong's children pass thirteen, they will owe their first loyalty to Tingzhe, for his is the senior branch of the clan. Unless, and only unless, it is evident the main family will perish without heirs. A living branch holds loyalty. A dying line does not."

Amaya stilled under his hands. "So when Lu Ten died..."

"My brother moved too quickly, and angered our father," Iroh acknowledged. "But he was within his rights. If I had no heir, and adopted no heir, then his was the living branch of the clan." He sighed. "But he did anger Fire Lord Azulon, and that snared our family in strangler's coils. For while Ozai should have been loyal to our father, Ursa was not."

Amaya held up a hand to halt his brushing, obviously thinking it through. "She would have been loyal to her children, her husband, and her parents..."

"But while Lady Kotone has made her bow before the Dragon Throne, that loyalty does not, and did not, bind her daughter," Iroh nodded.

Amaya winced. "No wonder he's so angry."

"He is often angry," Iroh sighed. "Though I had hoped he had grown past it-"

"Iroh." The healer gave him a level look. "You were the only one of his clan who hadn't betrayed him. And now he knows you've been lying to him."

True. Unfortunately. "For our people-"

"For the world," Amaya corrected. "If it were for your people, he'd understand."

Iroh's shoulders slumped. "I tried to teach him to care about the world."

"That scar seared more than his flesh," Amaya reminded him. "He fought to care about you, and then us, and then all of our people in Ba Sing Se. He's trying to bring airbending back." She spread her hands. "How much more can you ask?"

Iroh smiled ruefully at his own, unguessed ambitions. "I suppose I wished a son who would follow in all my footsteps. But Zuko has never been drawn to Pai Sho."

"You would have made it work, if the spirits hadn't intervened," Amaya agreed. "I don't think any assassin would get past you." She had to pause, and take a steadying breath. "I know your folk on this ship aren't like that, but that Zuko thought of that so easily..."

"That may not have been simply Zuko," Iroh admitted. "Knowing what I do now, I have suspicions about Kuzon's death." He snorted ruefully. "I should have had them before. In his sleep, indeed."

Brushing stray strands out of her eyes, Amaya gave him a sidelong look. "Even in the Fire Nation, that must happen to someone."

"It often does," Iroh agreed. "And he was ninety-seven, even if he seemed as hale as men half his age. But a lord who is weakening will go home. So that he may tend to his people, and ensure they will be well led after his death. Yet Kuzon died in Shu Jing." He smiled wryly. "It is not quite as far from Byakko as Kyoshi Island is from Ba Sing Se. But it is not much nearer."

"Kuzon." Amaya frowned, and held out her arms for a comforting hug. "Tell me, Iroh. What are we dealing with?"

"Kuzon of Byakko." Swords against swords, Shidan held both Islanders off, eyes narrowed over a thin-lipped smile. "My father-in-law, and my best friend."

Okay, Saoluan thought, trying to catch her breath as steel strained against steel. This guy? Definitely not human.

She didn't worry about the crew working Nami no Kizu around them; they'd been treated like honored if slightly odd guests all the way up the river, even when she and Langxue chased Shidan across the deck with sharp pointy things to work off some steam. She had nothing to complain about. Except for the fact that talking to Shidan was... well, talking to someone that just wasn't quite meshed in with the rest of those who walked on two legs. Asking why are you doing this, and don't tell me it's just spirits, just hadn't cut it.

"Hold," she gritted out, waiting until the pressure against her wrists eased before drawing back her own blade and sheathing it.

"Saoluan?" Langxue frowned at her, but looked a little guiltily glad for the break. He was good, but he was still too young to have built up all the muscles needed to make swordplay look easy.

She beamed at him, then turned a wry glance on Shidan. "Maybe you could be a little more specific, honored dragon? I hate to talk anybody out of helping us, but the Fire Lord's going to smack an army on top of your people as soon as he knows you've switched sides."

Hands empty, Shidan's smile glinted, sharp-edged. "That would be unwise. Mount Shirotona is a water volcano."

"...Huh?" Saoluan blinked.

"There's two different kinds of volcanoes," Langxue said, with that distant frown she'd begun to recognize as hunting down something Hyourin remembered. "Earth and water."

"There are far more, but those two are the most critical to know," Shidan stated. "Earth volcanoes have gentle eruptions. Lava, a bit of ash; certainly dangerous for villages that can't move out of the way, but they give more than enough warning for most people to simply walk away. You have at least two on the Earth Kingdom's west coast. Apart from a few suicidal fools who've no better sense than to slip off the crater rims into lava pools, they haven't killed anyone in centuries." He paused. "Water volcanoes are not so kind."

Her little sword-brother's eyes widened. "Because there's water in the lava."

"Precisely," Shidan nodded, as Saoluan tried to fit together water and molten rock without making her head explode. "And that is what makes them deadly. The water becomes steam, boiling and building under a cap of stone; and what would happen if you sealed a clay pot of water, and placed it in a furnace?"

"Boom." Saoluan's heart sank. Oh great. We're getting helped by a crazy dragon. "And you live on this thing?"

"We do," Shidan stated. "We must. For without someone to speak to the White Tiger, the spirit of the mountain, to calm his rage and persuade him to allow our firebenders to bleed off bits of steam and lava, it would erupt. Not today. Not tomorrow. But when Shirotora roars, all the Fire Nation is in peril."

Not crazy. Not the way I thought, anyway. "You've blackmailed the Fire Lord," Saoluan said in admiration.

"Such an ugly word, Warrior." But the humor in pale gold didn't deny it. "The lords of Byakko have always done their duty to the clans, and to our nation. Mount Shirotora rests willingly under our care, respected and honored. We would not even think of being neglectful. The Fire Lord has nothing to fear from us."

"Yeah," Langxue said wryly. "As long as you're there. Where you can keep the lid on it. But if you're not..."

"That has almost happened, once." Shidan gripped the rail, hard nails tinging against steel, eyes dark with memory. "When Fire Lord Sozin ordered the Air Nomads destroyed. Byakko refused, and paid with their lives." He drew a sharp breath. "I- there was no warning. Makoto was clever, and Sozin even more so. We knew Sozin was rousing hate against the Air Nomads. We knew some of our clan elders - of the dragon clans - had vanished; we were searching for them, when..." He looked into the river, grieving. "I was able to heal Kuzon, and some others. But for weeks Mount Shirotora hung poised on the knife's edge, and Sozin knew it. So even though Lord Kuzon was fifteen, even though he was known to be a friend to airbenders - the Fire Lord dared not touch him."

Langxue raised a skeptical brow.

Shidan matched it with his own. "It would take more than two-score Fire Sages to force the White Tiger to submit. The moment they slipped, Shirotora would rage to cast the heavens down. Whereas even one of Kuzon's blood... the mountain knows us. No; Sozin was not so foolish as to risk weakening his forces. Not when he could have all he wished by simply leaving us alone."

"Now you're not making sense," Langxue complained, rubbing his head. "Sozin wanted to kill airbenders, and he left you alone?"

"A thousand years can make anything a legend," Shidan said dryly. "Airbenders, indeed. Why, any schoolchild can tell you exactly what Air Nomads were like. They were detached from the world, careless and cruel enough to call hurricanes down. They rode sky bison. They had tattoos, and they never ate meat." He gestured at Langxue's katana. "And they certainly never carried swords."

"Detached?" Langxue said in disbelief. "Come on! The temple monks, maybe. But nobody could call the Duo Qang-"

"Xiangchen destroyed that tribe," Shidan said quietly. "Or so my clan said, long ago."

"Who?" Saoluan asked, as Langxue paled.

"There once were several tribes who roamed the winds," Shidan informed her. "Long ago, before the world went wrong. Before Subodei, and Xiangchen, and the Invasion of the North." His laugh had just a trace of bitterness. "I suppose we must call it the first Invasion of the North, now. Avatar Hirata would never have dreamed his death would lead to this..." He sighed. "Unfortunately, some of the Duo Qang's descendants did survive."

Airbenders. There are airbenders, still alive, Saoluan realized. "How can that be a bad thing?"

"Because today they are not called Duo Qang, but onmitsu," Shidan said bluntly. "The Fire Lord's own chi-blockers... and assassins."

Winter rains sheeted down; blinding the moon, rendering merely mortal eyes and ears near useless. Chill rains, soaking through haori and robe and tabi, as he danced with steel across the moss and decorative stones of the inn's contemplative garden. Sweet, fresh rains, that almost washed the taste of blood from his mouth.

Almost let him believe he wasn't dying.

I never would have picked Shu Jing as a place to die.

Well. He was fairly sure Temul hadn't wanted to die here, either. Doubly ironic, that her death would lead to his own. He'd grown used to the acerbic ghost over the years. They'd shared so many secrets; so much pain. Her smoldering hatred of the Fire Lords had not died with Sozin, and she watched Azulon's agents like a raging dragon. Of all the world outside Byakko an old firebender might roam, Shu Jing had always been safe.

Not this night.

Some Fire Sage must have found a way to bind her. Agni, grant her the strength to win free!

Ironic, to be praying for a ghost over his own life. But Temul was iron and flame; so long as she existed, her heart would never be broken.

His - had shattered. Was shattering, with every rain-soaked chi-blocker he cut down.

Heiya. Arisama. Shiri...

He knew them. All of them. Agni, he and Ran had sent welcoming-gifts to half of their births!

Ran...

His beloved lady. The other half of his soul. Dead and lost these two years, swept overboard in a storm while traveling from the capital. An accident.

As this would undoubtedly become, no matter how many dead bodies he scattered about the grounds.

I pray you're not seeing this, Ran.

Duck and slash and twin dao licking out to slice rain and cloth and bone...

That assassin fell without a whimper, darts flying in a storm even as his leg and hand went their separate ways. Rain and a swirl of steel blocked four-

The fifth and sixth sank into his shoulder, biting to the bone. He staggered back, dao dropping from the dead weight of his right hand.

Damn. So close...

Rain faded, one band of clouds passing to leave a few minutes' gap of quiet. The moon couldn't quite break through... but there was enough light to see ranks of dark-garbed assassins, waiting in silent menace on the inn roof.

Not close at all.

He smirked, and knew it was stained with blood. Heiya had managed more than just a poke to block his bending, in those fatal seconds when grief and bewilderment had overridden instinct. Surely, surely one of his own rescued could not intend-

Yet surely she did, and just as surely he'd killed her. Autumn Lord have mercy on her spirit.

But unable to bend, unable to heal... she'd killed him, too.

Just as Azulon intended. Bastard. Coward!

He'd spent his life sowing confusion among his enemies. He wasn't about to break the habit now. "I see Azulon cared enough to send his best," he panted, breathing shallow. "I suppose I should be flattered, Tahou. You so rarely take the field yourself anymore."

Silence. One of the taller masked figures fluttered off the roof, landing... not quite in range for a lunge. Damn it.

Above masking cloth, pale eyes measured his own calculation, and smirked. "And what makes you think we do this for Azulon, Lord of Byakko?"

He chuckled bitterly, no matter how much it hurt. "You're all his lapdogs, Tahou. Telling yourselves you serve to save the many, by killing the few... The Temples were blind, but you? You've corrupted an ignorant way of peace into abomination."

No rumble of hate, not from such as these; but there was a stiffening of darkness in the rain. "Do not dare speak of our ways, thief!"

"Ah," Kuzon breathed. "So this is Ja Aku's will, as well as Azulon's." A laugh; a cough. "I wish I were surprised."

"You destroyed our heritage-"

"I couldn't save the bison, you sanctimonious old fool!" Kuzon snarled. He'd made himself heard across battlefields before; he'd make himself heard now. No matter how little good it would do. "They're large. They're obvious. Half my clan was dead! All I could save were children!"

"You robbed us of our future!"

You robbed yourselves. "And the old hermit picked up the sea cobra, and fed it bits of fish, and warmed it in his bosom through the killing cold of night," Kuzon mused. "And at dawn it struck, and slithered away as he lay dying. For that is the nature of serpents." He tightened his grip on the remaining hilt, ever so slightly. "How fitting that, this night, you give truth to Sozin's lie. The ever-treacherous, murderous Air Nomads."

Some of those shadowy figures above tensed; Tahou raised a gloved fist, halting them. "It's not too late to live. Swear that you will unearth your own treachery, and your chi will be restored."

"No," Kuzon said simply. Watching shadows in the rain.

Somewhat fewer shadows, now.

"You'd condemn your clan to-"

"To what?" Kuzon snarled, tired of pretty half-truths, and sneering lies. "Does your master think Kotone won't know? He has our Ursa; if he wants more, the blood will be on his hands. Our nation's blood! Will he shed that, with a world willing our country's death?" He snorted, the world turning a darker gray with dizziness. "Cross into Byakko if you dare. Shidan will rip you apart."

Old friend. Son I never had. I'm sorry.

And yet another shadow vanished into the night.

They'll notice soon. What can I- ah. He staggered a step sideways, painfully aware it wasn't an act. "Best gloat while you can," he gasped. "You won't have much longer."

Tahou stood still. Almost surged forward-

Yes! Take the bait, you treacherous fool! Because if Tahou was here, there was still one thing more he needed to hear from Kuzon's own lips. If he could just hang on a little longer...

"Where are they?" Tahou ground out.

And now Kuzon could smile, the pain of betrayal easing to something... bearable. It wouldn't be for much longer, after all. "Your brothers and sisters? You'll never know." He'd been fifteen and terrified and grieving - but Shidan had been with him. And no one knew predators like a dragon.

Scatter them, Shidan had advised, in the play of images and feelings that was a dragon's silent song. Friend with friend, and those who act as kin together, yes - but scatter those kin-groups away from each other. Let them know the others live; never let them know where.

The Lord of Byakko holds Mount Shirotona in check, and so is safe from Sozin's wrath. If he seems to know nothing. Be that lord. Hold their existence in your heart.

And carry it to your grave.

"You've already tried to ask Temul," Kuzon breathed now. "She's not here because you bound her to demand her answer. And she doesn't know." He coughed, tasting copper. "And now you've killed the only man who does."

Pale eyes flared wide with rage above the mask. "You will not deny us-!"

Keening to chill the wind, Temul's wraith shimmered from the storm clouds. A blue-glowing jian saluted the sky, and slashed down-

Lightning struck, blasting roof and assassins into a cloud of gore-streaked tiles.

Faint in the crash of thunder, Kuzon thought he heard a young man's, "Whoa! Watch it!"

But that was yards away. Here, now, Tahou had twitched. As who wouldn't twitch, between ghost and lightning and death...

Tahou knew who he faced. Knew better than to let his attention stray. Yet decades of training couldn't kill a man's nature. One foot slipped slightly to the side, abandoning balance to ready himself for flight-

Kuzon lunged.

Everyone remembers a dao's blade. Never the point.

Though Tahou certainly looked as if he'd remember it...

And then the assassin's face went slack, and the body fell, and Kuzon fell with it.

Black and red and... someone lifting his head. Warm hands, and breathing. Not Temul.

"Hang on," said a familiar young voice; one Kuzon had heard only yesterday, giving an informal report on conditions in the Earth Kingdom. "I'll get a healer-"

"Don't be a fool, Major Piandao," Kuzon rasped. "You've been on enough battlefields... to know there's no time." He breathed, looking at the not-quite-solid old woman standing at a young soldier's shoulder. "So you've met. Good. Explain what you can, old friend. After... after you get him out of here."

"Lord Kuzon," Piandao began.

"You can't be here," Kuzon rasped. "By dawn, you'd best be anywhere but here. And you will be visibly surprised, but not upset, to hear the lord of Byakko... died in his sleep."

"But-"

"You're not," Kuzon coughed. "Not stupid, Major. Don't act the fool." Breathe. "I've done... as much damage as I can to Azulon's war. Speak of my death, and he'll suspect you as well."

"And he'd be right," Temul smirked, voice a mutter of rain and wind. "We've killed a good fourth of Azulon's tame nomads. He won't build those forces again in a hurry." At his fading glare, she snorted. "You think I ever liked those scatterbrained, truth-twisting sky-riders? Hah!"

"Nomads?" A ghost might not have rattled the swordsman's nerve, but this did. "They were nomads? But the airbenders are-" He cut himself off, and gripped the hand Kuzon could still feel. "Sir. Your family..."

"Knows what they must," Kuzon got out. "Knows... why." He forced himself to focus on the major's face. "You... serve Azulon. To serve our people." Hang on. Just a little longer. "Azulon... will destroy us all. Choose."

And the rain faded, and hands faded. And, finally, the pain ebbed away.

But not the ache in his heart.

I waited too long. Planned too long. I searched for you, Aang - Agni, I searched!

I should have stopped.

The Avatar is gone. You are gone, Aang; I scoured the world for you, and there was no trace. But the world is still here.

And the Fire Lords will destroy it.

If only I'd known. If only I had some way-

Fire in the darkness. Pain and anger and the razor-edged colors of hope...

"Some way, child of fire?"

My Lord...

Warmth wrapped him; stern as iron, unyielding as the sun. "There is a way," flames crackled, "to keep your promise."

Tell me.

The scent of feathers was all that kept him from blasting something.

It's not raining. I'm not dead.

But I was.

"I am Zuko," he breathed to the darkness, gauging the feel of sun-returning to almost dawn. "Son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai. Prince of the Fire Nation, and once heir to the Dragon Throne!"

But I remember...

Not hard-edged, except for that lingering nightmare that had been reality. More like a well-loved story, read over and over for all its terror and wonder, until he could almost touch what it would have been if it were real.

It was real.

Kuzon of Byakko. Agni, no wonder Teruko hadn't wanted to tell him.

Iroh, though...

"I need air." Working his way out from under the covers, Zuko paused to catch his breath. Patted a clucking Asahi on the neck. "Bet you want some too, huh?"

The black hen huffed, and caught his hair in her beak, just for a moment.

"I know, I know; I promised bad guys," Zuko apologized. "We'll just have to find some the next time we land."

From the snort, Asahi didn't quite take that as an acceptable excuse. But she got up, letting him lean on her when the world spun a little, and headed sedately for the hatch.

...Working the seal on a hatch when the room kept graying out was not fun.

Have to ask Captain Jee if they've given our refugees the safety drill. There's no way Jinhai could manage this.

Eventually, it clanged open. Zuko winced, expecting marines to pounce and drag him back to bed-

Nobody pounced. There were two firebenders in the hall eyeing Asahi, and she snaked her head with malicious glee, but they just stood there. "Morning, sir," the elder said, politely taking off his faceplate to expose a weathered, clean-shaven face. "Healer Amaya said you shouldn't be up."

"I'll take it slow, Sergeant Kyo," Zuko promised, already tired. "But I need..." To get away from dying. "I need some sun."

Asahi had her eye fixed on the other marine, tilting her head as he twitched nervously. Zuko flicked her head near her ear. "No. Leave Private Sukekuni alone."

"Thanks?" Sukekuni squeaked, as Asahi snickered her way past.

Zuko sighed. Eyed them both, and led her on. "There's more to life than just biting people."

"Skrrr..."

"Yes, I know it's probably the best part," Zuko said wryly. Down, and another hatch, and out-Dawn.

He found a quiet spot of guardrail and clung to it, soaking up that reviving strength.

The sun rises. The sun sets. No matter how crazy the rest of the world gets.

Given what he knew, what he remembered... it was pretty crazy.

Zuko's hands tightened on steel. Azulon ordered me... ordered Kuzon murdered.

Probably for more than one reason. If Azulon had discovered that he'd hidden survivors from the South and West temples, then Azulon probably also guessed he was the last human link to them. Meaning either Ja Aku's onmitsu would torture the locations out of him before he died... or they wouldn't.

If they'd gotten the sites, he'd pick them off one by one, so the onmitsu could drag them into harmonious accord and fold them into the families. If I just died - any survivors would stay away from the onmitsu, like everyone steers clear of the Fire Nation. And Azulon would never risk losing his pet assassins to what Air used to be.

Either way, Azulon won what he wanted. And if that cost him a quarter of the onmitsu's forces... well. Azulon had planned to live as long as Sozin. He'd counted on having decades to increase his power.

Except he didn't.

Zuko had no doubts, now, that Ursa had killed Fire Lord Azulon. Byakko had been walking the knife-edge of rebellion so very, very long, to protect their island and their children...

And he was angry and confused and so proud. She hadn't broken. She hadn't wavered. She was Byakko, and dragon-child, and she'd lived honor.

Next to that, his own quest for the Avatar looked pathetic.

Breathe. All we have is here. All we have is now.

And he only had now because he had no luck. He'd given it all up into Agni's hands, so there might be a chance of unsnarling Koh's webs before they strangled the world. So one young prince, not the heir, would have the soul-deep knowledge that something was wrong. That the world shouldn't be this way. That the Fire Nation should be respected for its honor, not feared for its ruthless slaughters.

"That... didn't quite work," Zuko muttered.

Why it hadn't was painfully clear now. Besides Lu Ten dying - and he had all kinds of suspicions about that, given what he knew about his father and Long Feng - Kuzon hadn't been a dragon-child. Kuzon had been a relatively ordinary master firebender, no more stubborn or crazy than... oh, Jee. Kuzon had been sane. Rational. Easy-going enough to take a temple full of airbenders in stride. He'd loved his wife, and daughter, and Shidan - and had still been caught completely off-guard the first time one of his granddaughters had bitten him.

Zuko vaguely remembered biting a few servants himself when he'd been little. Before Ursa had done what Shidan had done with her, decades before: grabbed him by the scruff of the neck, shook him - gently, but with fire in her fingertips - and told him no. Not prey. Bad.

It worked. Eventually.

Sozin was a dragon-child, Zuko thought now, gripping steel. Agni set it up, so the Avatar would know what drives the Fire Nation... spirits, that blew up.

Sozin, and then Azulon was twice over. And Ursa was. He rested his head on the railing, feeling cool steel warm from his temper. I am screwed.

He might have Kuzon's spirit, but he'd been born with enough dragon blood that a hundred years ago, no clan would have dared send him to court. He'd get himself killed.

Well, almost.

And if Kuzon hadn't realized what he was getting into, Agni did know. The spirit of fire knew his children.

But I had Lu Ten. Zuko lifted his head, swallowing the lump in his throat. Things weren't really bad until...

The world is so screwed up.

And Aang had no idea. He'd gone from a world of apparent peace - Gyatso had always chosen their trips very carefully - to one where, if the war hadn't seared its way through a place, people were living on borrowed time. And they knew it.

No wonder he couldn't figure out Ba Sing Se. It's probably the first place that felt normal.

Agni, Aang didn't even know about the yamabushi; much less the onmitsu, or the Touzaikaze of the Si Wong Desert, or... spirits, a half-dozen other small groups that knew enough to just whisper away on the wind when trouble threatened.

And if he doesn't know that, he has no idea why Shidan made sure we met in the first place. Or what Uncle Kuroyama was planning with Gyatso. Or what the elders were really going to do to him if Gyatso couldn't stop them.

Zuko shuddered, guiltily relieved. Aang might have the attention span of a flutter-hornet on a honey high, but that impulsive decision might just have saved the world. An Avatar, twisted the way the temples twisted all the nuns who hesitated to give their children up? The way onmitsu made sure all their active agents were twisted?

Ty Lee. I'm so sorry.

And it hurt, it hurt so much, because he hadn't known. Spies and assassins, yes; but Ty Lee's relatives had families, they looked happy, they'd looked like somewhere safe to put some of the children he and Temul had rescued...

Until he'd sat down one awful night, still trying to get the domain in order, and put together some of the reports Byakko's own agents had sent their young lord. Reports indicating the onmitsu had suddenly gained a swarm of newborns to look after. All with the same slight build, and laughing gray eyes...

Sozin never meant to kill the children. Not all of them.

The Northern Temple had been laid ruin, monks and boys slaughtered to the last. The Eastern... had been harvested.

And if that weren't gut-wrenching enough, that was the night he'd finally pieced together the rest of Kuroyama's plan: to introduce a young monk to his distant kin, to see what the temples had driven out, and how it had maimed their own spirits. A plan that had died in the comet's flames.

I have to do something.

Zuko gripped steel harder, and swore under his breath. I am doing something. I'm getting these people out of the line of fire. I'm going to keep the Fire Army from grabbing the Mechanist back. I'm going to make a place airbenders can live without tearing themselves apart just because they're human. And we're all going to call the drowned home, so things don't get even worse.

Drowned spirits all around the Spirit Oasis, where Koh could cross into the physical world on sheer whim. The Face-Stealer had to be laughing like hell.

"Um." The eyes and queue of the man eyeing him said Earth Kingdom; the ragged bangs and water-worn loose clothing said independent merchant captain, or worse. "You got a grudge against that rail, kid?"

Zuko blinked, realizing Asahi had warily backed off. As who wouldn't, when steel was glowing red-hot. Oops. "And you are?"

"Donghai. Captain," he said, as if it weren't obvious. His expression seemed caught between wary and sour. "Didn't know the Fire Nation recruited kids as firebenders."

Zuko smirked. "I was born into the job."

"Born into the-" Donghai stared at him. Glanced over the rail and back, where a ragged fleet of red-sailed ships was making as much as they could of dawn's light winds. "...No way."

Zuko raised his eyebrow.

"I know Shirong said – and that Sadao guy, but...." Dongahi trailed off, shaking his head. "This is even crazier than I thought."

Zuko let go of steel before it blazed any hotter. Damn it, I know how risky-

Donghai's mouth turned up at one corner. "Just might work after all."

Zuko eyed him, aware that Sergeant Kyo was lingering unobtrusively in the background and Asahi had just ruffled her feathers in a way that promised friendly mayhem.

"Ah, there you are, Captain Donghai." Jee stalked up, glancing at the hot air shimmering around the railing. And gave his young commander a look.

Zuko flushed, and took a step sideways to make sure he could grab Asahi if she got cranky. It was just the railing! I didn't set anything else on fire!

But he didn't say it. Suzuran was Jee's command, and the captain had every right to take anyone who threatened her to task. He might not have always respected that before, but he was going to do better now. No matter how hard he had to bite his own tongue to do it.

"Captain Donghai is here to represent some of our allies in the fleet, as we discuss options," Jee went on. "Will you be joining us for tea?"

Zuko tried not to grimace at the undertone: You and I both know you shouldn't be up. How far are you going to let your pride push you?

As if he didn't know collapsing in front of their allies was a bad idea.

"I believe I'm going to take Healer Amaya's advice, Captain," Zuko said formally. "Please inform General Iroh that I have full confidence in you both." He paused. "And... tell my uncle I understand why he did what we spoke about earlier. I don't agree with it. But I understand." Do I tell him?

...Yes. No more lies. "And tell him, and Agent Shirong, that when it comes to obligation, Roku's going to have to get in line. I remember Kuzon."

"All right." Shirong looked over the small wardroom Iroh had borrowed, trying to gauge exactly why the occupants wouldn't meet his eyes for long. And why Zuko's enigmatic statement had gathered these three to talk to him. Teruko, Amaya, and the general himself, yet not one of the Wens, or Captain Jee? Why? "I can understand that obligations to one great-grandfather might outweigh obligations to another, depending on the circumstances." Fire Lord Sozin, Avatar Roku, and Lord Kuzon of Byakko. Spirits, he had to wonder if there were any other pots of blasting jelly in the branch of Zuko's family tree he didn't yet know about. "But how does the prince remembering Kuzon make a difference? Spirits don't usually make allowances for human frailties like memory. They hold you accountable whether you remember you've promised or not."

Silence. A guilty, prickly silence in which no one met his eyes.

Oh, this is bad. "All right," Shirong said carefully. "What's the obligation Zuko's being held to?" When in doubt, try to find the spirits' deal. And see if you could force a loophole.

Iroh coughed into his hand, looking as if he wished his cup held something stronger than tea. "It would seem Kuzon promised to find Aang, bring him back, and make him apologize for fleeing his destiny."

Oh. Oh my; that explained quite a bit about the mysterious Fire Nation lord and spy. Including the letter Jinhai was holding on to, and why it'd been found where it had. Where better to look for clues about an Air Nomad Avatar, than in lore of the last Air Nomad Avatar? Still, there was a slight problem with Iroh's statement. "Kuzon is dead," Shirong pointed out. "And while the spirits may not hold to, he who dies, pays all debts, any obligation Kuzon incurred should be stuck in the spirit world with him. It shouldn't force Zuko to carry out any part of it, any more than he's forced to uphold the balance for Avatar Roku and Ta Min, or wipe out the Air Nomads for Fire Lord Sozin and Tejjina. Unless his last set of great-grandparents incurred some really nasty spiritual debt...?"

"Dragons pay their own debts," Teruko said firmly. "Shidan's clan didn't bring this on the prince."

Dragons? Shirong thought, stunned. What on earth does she mean by-

If he hadn't been keeping an eye on the most dangerous person in the room out of sheer paranoid habit, he'd have missed it. But he was, and Shirong saw the slight quirk of Iroh's smile.

Okay, don't ignore it, it is important, Shirong told himself firmly. But get it out of them later. He's using it to distract you from whatever this mess with Kuzon is. Which means that's even more important.

On top of that, Teruko still looked incredibly guilty. "I suppose I should just ask him," Shirong mused.

...And didn't that set the cat-owl among the chicken-pigs. Though it was a horrified silence, not squawking oinks, that sank into the corners of the room.

"I will ask him, you know," Shirong said levelly. "He saved my life on that train. Even if he nearly scared me out of it later." Putting them both on a boat, for Guanyin's sake. When he knew earthbenders and water didn't mix!

Though being on Suzuran wasn't nearly as bad as the horror stories he'd heard from Dai Li agents forced to sail over Lake Laogai. The metal was stern, yes, obviously meant for war... but then, so was the Outer Wall. He could stand it here. So far.

That Captain Jee had taken on pieces of the train itself as ballast, specifically for the comfort of earthbenders on board, definitely hadn't hurt.

"It is difficult to speak of," Iroh said heavily.

"He means you'll think we're all mad," Amaya put in, blue eyes dark with worry. "We're not. I have never heard the legend Iroh tells in either of our nations, but from what I sensed in Zuko's spirit..." She let out a slow breath. "It's real. I don't know how it can be, how any spirit could make that choice. But he did."

Shirong felt chill. "Choice?"

Iroh sighed. "Zuko is bound by Kuzon's obligation because, in a sense, Kuzon is no longer dead." The general hesitated. "Though it seems he was sleeping. A mercy from Agni, that should never have been reft away. Yangchen has much to answer for."

Shirong fit facts and implications together, and staggered back against a friendly wall. Guanyin have mercy. "Zuko... has lived before. And knows it."

Iroh inclined his head.

Oh, hell.

Everyone knew reincarnation was the way of the world. This life was but one among many, preached the sages and monks; and a human who was virtuous would be reborn as yet another human life, just as the Avatar was. But that was always years, even centuries later. To return while your kin in the third degree remained alive tangled the whole web of an innocent child's destiny. Obligations of the past, obligations of the present - a soul could go mad, trying to balance them all. And even if he escaped that fate...

He'd have the worst luck in the world.

Numbly, Shirong realized that the wall was all that was holding him up, and Amaya was cradling a ball of water in concerned hands. "I'm all right," he said raggedly. "I will be, at least... Oma and Shu. What did he ever do to deserve that?"

"If the legends are true," Iroh said, very carefully, "he would have offered himself to Agni's task deliberately. To stand as ally to kin or friend who desperately needed it; as he would have stood to the last, had he not died."

"Lady Kotone's letter said he was looking for a friend," Shirong's heart sank. "He was searching for Avatar Aang..."

"They were friends," Iroh nodded. "However Zuko may deny it now."

"It's not denying it when the kid's tried to kill him," Shirong grumbled. "Shale and shards, why?"

"I did not know Lord Kuzon well," Iroh admitted. "He was one of my father's spies, one of the few firebenders left old enough to remember the world before the war, and Azulon did not trust him. But he had unflinching honor. If Agni revealed to him that Aang would return to the world, and this might be the last, best chance to restore balance - I believe he would not hesitate." Iroh looked grave. "I pray I would not, if such a fate were offered me."

"Because if it were you, the fate of the world would come first," Shirong mused. "No matter what it did to everyone around you." It fit. Damn. "No wonder you don't want to face him. Kuzon might have chosen to do that to himself, but you were about to do it to your own nephew."

Iroh winced. Amaya didn't. "What else should he have done?" the healer said reasonably. "The tribe has to come first."

No help there. And the general's feeling guilty, but not enough to change his mind, Shirong thought. Teruko, though... "A few months ago, I would have agreed with you," the agent admitted. "Before I realized my generals were about to use a twelve-year-old child as a weapon." He met Amaya's gaze, unflinching. "I don't know what you're willing to do in the Water Tribes, but if we'd done that to save Ba Sing Se, we would have deserved everything the Fire Nation's done to us."

"The airbender is a child," Iroh stepped in to defend her. "But Zuko is a prince of the Fire Nation. He was raised to accept command, and responsibility."

"And he'll keep being responsible until it kills him," Shirong said bitterly. "Weren't you listening, general? Didn't you hear anything he said? Anything you said? Kuzon didn't come back for the world. He definitely didn't come back for the Fire Lord."

Gold eyes narrowed at him. "Then why?"

"If you can't figure that out," the agent said wryly, "then you'd better ask him."

"Ocean spirits, river spirits, wind spirits, well spirits, mine spirits - mine spirits?" Ticking them off on his fingers as Katara stirred their lunch stew, Aang turned an incredulous look on Tao. "Mines are people digging into the earth. How can they have a spirit?"

"Hey, I dig in the earth all the time," Toph objected.

"Yeah, but that's bending," Aang pointed out. "That's different."

"You think so?" Sokka was giving him another of those weird considering looks. "I thought you were glad Tao's people were up in the air."

"I am," Aang nodded. "But that's different. Maybe they're not bending, but they're not hurting anything, either."

Tao raised a gray brow. "So you think a bender would never harm the earth?"

"You feel your element," Katara stated. "How could you ever hurt it?"

"Most benders will never be so attuned to their element as you are, young lady," Tao stated.

"Among many peoples in the Earth Kingdom, nobles try to avoid ever touching the earth, unless they are obligated to bend it. Ride, certainly, or take coaches, or palanquins - but allow one's own feet to be soiled? That is for farmers. And soldiers. And peasants."

He gave the word the same twist Zuko had, fighting Katara. Aang felt something in his insides curdle.

Tao's tone softened, friendly again. "They forget their debts to the earth that bore them. Just as the Fire Nation wishes to forget that once they were the honor of the world." He looked down. "It's a sad world you've been handed as your charge, young man. We are all so broken. I've searched for ways to heal us for almost a century. And with everything I try, I only uncover deeper wounds."

"Sozin wrecked the whole world," Sokka said soberly. "Man."

Katara stirred the embers. "It didn't start with him."

"Really?" Tao leaned back a bit, as if he were just politely interested.

But he's not, Aang realized. He knows something!

"Xiangchen came for the air-healers, and Chin came for the earth-healers, and Sozin... he came for the fire-healers," Katara said quietly.

She couldn't have said what he thought she'd just said. She couldn't have. "Xiangchen did what?" Aang sputtered.

"Earth-healing," Tao mused, ignoring him. "Now, there's a legend I've not heard spoken in a long time. A long time," he said, half to himself. Letting out a slow breath, he focused on the present once more. "How did you know about Chin?"

"...The Moon spirit gave me a vision."

"Ah." Tao nodded.

Aang blinked at him, distracted even from that impossible thing she'd said about Xiangchen. "Ah? She talked to the Moon!"

"And that is an honor and a blessing." Tao frowned, eyeing him. "Oh dear. Did you think that was something remarkable?"

"But..." Aang swallowed hard. "The Avatar's the bridge between our world and the spirits."

"Of course," Tao nodded. "But at the end of every Avatar's lifetime, that bridge is gone for many years. Those of us without such power, but with need, can find the shallows to cross, if one from the other side is willing to meet us. Even if we are not deserving." His eyes looked haunted. "Even if we could never be deserving."

That didn't sound good. Aang glanced at the others, seeing them tense. Toph looked calm, but he could tell by the careful angle of her feet that anything that twitched wrong was going to get flattened. "What do you mean?" he asked carefully. "You seem like a good guy. Why wouldn't the spirits talk to you, if they wanted to?"

Tao sighed, and bowed his head. "Avatar Aang. Airbender Aang. Much as I am glad to teach you of the spirits, that is not, truly, why I am here." He bowed deeply. "I came to beg your forgiveness."

"Why?" Aang wondered, fear making his throat dry. Were they going to be betrayed to the Fire Nation again? Were they going to have to run again, because he wasn't strong enough to win? "What'd you do?"

"Nothing," the old man said quietly. "A hundred years ago... I did nothing."

"I don't understand," Aang protested. But he did, oh spirits, he did. And it was horrible. "Why... why would you do that? What did we ever do to you?"

"Young man." Tao did look up then, green eyes dark with old pain. "What on earth makes you think it was anything you did?"

He wanted to whimper. He did. Because if that was true - if that was true then the world wasn't fair, and the spirits weren't fair, and that couldn't be right! Because if spirits weren't fair, then-

Aang's mind shied from ice and night and pain. I'm the Avatar. I'm supposed to make things fair.

Katara gripped his shoulder, and squeezed gently. "I think you'd better explain, Master Tao."

The shaman grimaced. "It is not an easy thing to speak of." He sighed. "Nor should it be."

"So you did let the Fire Nation get to the temples," Toph said flatly.

"Yes," Tao admitted. "We did."

Aang swallowed, but couldn't get the words out. Glanced at Sokka, gray eyes imploring.

"I'll bite," Sokka half-sighed. "Why?"

"Because we didn't care."

Aang stared at him, wanting to shake. Wanting to - to hurt someone, and that was just awful. Didn't care? They didn't care?

"We are earth, and we remember." Tao's face was haunted. "It's good to honor the past, so the traditions which bind us as peoples live on. But memory cuts for good and ill, and too often we forget earth's true heart: not tradition, but compassion." He looked down. "We cling to grudges centuries old as a miser does jade coins. And so we remembered what you did not do, when Chin the Conqueror savaged his way across our lands. And as you had stayed your hands, so we stayed ours. We saw the Fire Nation massing. We heard their tales of hate, and we could guess what they meant to do. And we did - nothing."

"How?" Katara's voice shook, and her hand clenched painfully on Aang's shoulder. "How could you? They killed everyone. Every sky bison. Every child!"

"It's easier than you think, when you don't see it happen," Tao said sharply. "You tell yourself they're nomads. Perhaps they've only flown away. You tell yourself the Fire Nation was too strong to fight. That the Avatar should have stopped them, as Roku did Fire Lord Sozin's first invasion. And worst of all," his breath caught, and worn hands gripped his staff like a twig in a flood. "Worst of all, you lie to yourself, and say they deserved it. That they were arrogant. That they were outsiders, who took and gave nothing in return, and no concern of yours. That they should suffer for the sins of their forebears, who flew overhead as your ever-so-great-grandfather's crops were burned, and his brothers slaughtered, and his wives and daughters violated. And did nothing." He stared into awful memory. "You tell yourself all of that. And all of it is true, and still a lie. For there is nothing, nothing, that justifies abandoning Guanyin's mercy. But we did. And so, we allowed a people to die."

"And you want Aang to save you?" Katara snarled.

Aang felt sick. "Katara-"

"No," Tao said firmly. "We who abandoned Guanyin, out of fear or hatred - we do not deserve the Avatar's aid. But our children..." He lifted his gaze, and the pain there was terrible. "I can ask for nothing. But for those born to know only war, who never had the chance to fail your people-"

"Stop," Aang said faintly. "Just - stop."

His friends went quiet. Sokka gave him a serious look. "Aang?"

"Being the Avatar isn't about who deserves help," Aang managed. "It's about making things right. The world needs to be balanced again. That means we have to stop the Fire Nation." He swallowed. "And it means I forgive you."

Tao glanced away. "I don't deserve it."

"Gyatso said once, nobody deserves to be forgiven." Aang remembered that day, trying not to hurt inside. Guru Pathik had said the Air Nomad's love had been reborn as new love... but it was Gyatso. "I told him that sounded awful. There had to be something somebody could do. But he said no. Forgiveness isn't about them. It's about you." He took a deep breath. "What you said - it hurts. A lot. But you've been hurting too, all this time. And when Boots came and found you... you could have left, and we wouldn't know anything. But you didn't. You came to help us. Even... even when you thought I'd hate you." He bit his lip. "And you knew what Roku did when he stopped Sozin the first time. You know what an Avatar can do when... when we get mad." He swallowed dryly. "You're really brave."

Tao raised a brow. "Because I dared to face you?"

"No," Aang said, thinking it over. "Because you didn't stop hoping." He looked at Katara, and her wonder made his heart beat faster. "It takes a lot of courage not to give up."

Toph grinned. Sokka gave him a thumbs-up, and shot Tao a considering look. "So you were around before Aang was born, huh? What was that like?"

Tao looked thoroughly nonplussed. "You need instruction in the ways of the spirits..."

"Yeah, that too," Aang agreed. "But I need to fix the world." He flung his hands wide. "How'm I gonna do that if nobody tells me about how it should be?"

"Hmm." Tao stroked his beard. "Well. My mother was displaced by the invasion, you understand; Fire Lord Sozin might have been forced to withdraw, but she'd already decided the yin and yang of that site were hopelessly unfavorable for her. So I was born at Taku, in the great school of herbalists..."

Leaning back, Aang got ready to do one of the hardest things in his life.

He sat still, and listened.

Chapter End Notes

Duo Qang - sentimental, full of emotion. Found in a book about Tang dynasty poetry.

To answer a few reviewer questions: canon, there are cats in the Avatar 'verse. And displacement is what lets a metal ship float... or a train with curved "wings" of ice sheathing, shaped to displace enough water to equal the mass of the train, so the lake buoys the train up. Zuko's been on a steel ship for three years. He would know how that works.

And yes, I do read reviews. In detail. G I just have a definite plot for the story already. (And I'm up to my eyebrows in classes, so finding time to reply is taking distinct second place to just writing the story. Darn it.)

For whoever put the long entry mentioning WWI on the Just Bugs Me Embers tropes page, about the mess and sticky moral situations of trying to clean up after a war - yay! That was cool! "When people play catch with Idiot Ball", indeed. Exactly. And BTW, a lot of your speculations about the Air Nomads are correct.

Finally, a note on those who've commented on the differences between the concept of "For Want of a Nail" and AU... part of the problem is, when I started writing this story, I didn't intend it to be nearly as AU as it turned out. But then I got into researching exactly what sparks off genocides in RL, and what usually has to happen first. And then wondered about why water was the only healing element, and how that might be balanced if all the elements are supposed to be necessary to the world's balance. And then the bunnies tied together Koh, and Wan Shi Tong, and a few other things...

It, um, kind of snowballed from there. Sorry.

At least now I have a fairly good idea of all the backstory for this AU. And it is drastically AU. No question.

Chapter 38

We have to move. Azula packed with grim efficiency, mind racing down a dozen different paths to rebuild her plans from the impossible wreck Zuko had made of things. We have to move now.

"Azula? What's wrong?" Across their palace room, Ty Lee stopped fussing over a pair of Kyoshi Warrior outfits, finally satisfied with the way she'd laid them on top of each other. Smiling, she rolled them up as neatly as a backflip. "You're okay, and I'm okay, and the city's safe-"

"I don't have a body," Azula cut her off. Eyed the roll of dark and lighter green. "Why are you taking Mai's uniform?"

"Well, she might want it, if we run into her again," Ty Lee said honestly. "There's room in the tank, right?" She frowned a little. "And you can't have a body if Zuko's still alive."

"It's not his body I'm worried about," Azula said grimly. Though yes, that made her angry, so unbelievably angry...

You're supposed to be dead, Zuzu. You're supposed to be dead, I tricked you into killing yourself, I'm not supposed to fail!

And she couldn't fail, she couldn't. Her jaw was clenched and her heart was beating fast and the pit inside her was yawning and dark and full of screams, she had to have the Fire Lord's approval, she had to, she'd claw her way over the bodies of the dead and dying to crawl ahead of that gnawing hole eating her alive...

Quiet. Quiet inside her mind, just outside panic's reach.

I... don't understand.

She'd failed. Failed the Fire Lord. Failed her father. The pit should be coming for her. She should be screaming. Better yet, making someone else scream. It was the only way to stave off the gaping collapse, the pit in her heart where everything froze and shattered.

But it was so quiet inside.

Azula heard a thump, and realized her hand was empty of... whatever she'd just been packing. And Ty Lee was in front of her, gray eyes wide and worried, easing her back to sit on a bed. "What's wrong?"

"What did she do to me?" Azula whispered. "What did that water-witch do?"

Ty Lee gulped. "She said she'd heal you. Because that's what Zuko would have wanted."

Zuko loves you.

A lie. It had to be a lie-

There. There was the pit, aching in her soul, she could feel it...

It didn't hurt.

Ached, yes; like a training sear, not yet tended. But the screams...

The screams were just whispers, tainting a quiet wind. The cold was just - cold.

"I promised I'd protect you."

Her brother's voice, wrapped around Amaya's touch until she couldn't tell them apart. Warming her, like turning the corner in knife-sharp winter peaks to find a fire laid and waiting.

The storm still howled inside her. She could feel it. But Amaya had built a bulwark against the pit. A refuge; firm ground that would not crumble even though she could feel the emptiness trying to devour her still...

Only a fool turned down shelter, even from her enemies. And it was so... quiet.

I failed Father. I failed the Fire Lord. But I'm still here.

Azula breathed, tasting the air as the impossible became real.

I'm still here. And so long as I still breathe, I defend our nation.

And she would. She would. And the first step in that was... "We have to get you out of here," Azula said abruptly. "I doubt anyone was close enough to see much of the fight. Still, if word gets back to my father you're an airbender-"

"...I think he knows." Ty Lee gave her a brave smile. "I remembered a few things. After the train."

"Things?" Azula repeated warily.

"Just some things that might come in handy," Ty Lee shrugged. "Don't worry so much! I won't get executed if I don't do anything obvious. So I won't." A cheeky grin. "And you're always good at explaining things. I'll be fine."

Trust. From an airbender. Somehow, the irony wasn't nearly as funny as it should have been. "So Father knows," Azula murmured. And that called for long and careful thought. "Do you really think Zuko cares what happens to me?"

"Of course he does," the acrobat nodded. "You're the heir! If the Fire Nation lost you - well, it'd be just awful."

The classic answer. The correct one.

Yet when it came to Zuko, the classic answer seemed entirely wrong.

Zuko loves you.

Everyone she knew used love as a tool, a means of manipulation. Even Zuko, mentioning Ursa... but then, she could actually respect him for that. What soldier worth the name didn't try to shake his opponent's nerve?

Though Agent Shirong's tactics - that man needed a lesson.

Never taunt a dragon. You're flammable.

Still. When pushed to the limit Zuko would use even love against her, but he was far more likely to use it as a tool against himself. That fool's quest for Father, and now-

And now, what?

If Zuko wanted her as heir, weakening her hold on Ba Sing Se with that explosive flight was entirely counterproductive. And yes, Zuko was capable of screwing up by the numbers, but if he'd been part of Iroh's plan, the old man should have calculated a way to rein in the worst of it.

Not that Iroh was likely to want her as heir. But idiotic as Zuko was in regard to the rest of their happy little family, he had no trouble seeing Uncle for the man he was: smart, but lazy, and broken by Lu Ten's death from the truth of the Fire Nation's glory. Zuko knew, better than anyone else, Iroh did not want her as crown princess. If he were wrapped up in one of Iroh's plans, and he did mean her well, he'd do his best to wreck anything that meant to harm her.

Which left one of two options. Either that crazy battle had been Zuko's attempt to mangle one of Iroh's plans for just that purpose... or the damage to the Fire Nation's status as irresistible overlords was completely secondary.

"Which would mean he did all that to get refugees and traitors out of Ba Sing Se," Azula said, half to herself. Mentally she went back over the report Master Sergeant Yakume had proffered to her Dai Li, of everything the loyalists had seen and heard before Jee had gleefully dropped them off the ship. She could ignore the bit about ice; there'd been a spirit involved and everyone knew how perverse they were. But there were bits of gold among the dross. "The traitors were all close to the waterbender. Even if Uncle does seem impressed with her - ugh! - it doesn't make..."

Words died in her throat, and Azula suppressed a very ignoble desire to eep.

He wouldn't. He couldn't.

But this was Iroh, who had a very un-Fire Nation interest in the so-called balance of the elements. Who was still younger than Azulon had been when Ozai was born. And all the information she had on Amaya and "Mushi" definitely suggested...

Eww!

Yet it fit, curse the man. He was manipulative. And Zuko wanted to protect her, and the Fire Nation. And both of them thought the fate of her as heir would be one of the most dangerous things that could happen to the empire, short of no heir at all.

But if there were another heir, if Iroh's line was alive again...

"Are you okay?" Ty Lee asked in a small voice. "You don't look so good."

Azula tried to speak. Swallowed, and tried again. "My uncle's sense of humor," she got through gritted teeth, "deserves to be boiled. And shot through the heart. And boiled again. In lava."

"Um. Yikes?" Ty Lee blinked. "What was the joke?"

"It's... complicated." And yet so simple. Right in front of her nose. Transport. People of all walks of life, now personally indebted to Iroh for their safety. Colony supplies. And, it seemed, the Earth King's own agreement behind her Dai Li's loyalty. Meaning he expected to gain something considerable out of the whole mess.

Fracture the Fire Nation in a civil war? Agni, what couldn't the Earth King get out of that?

I have to do something-

Stop, Azula told herself forcefully. Think.

None of her tutors had ever covered the possibility of a civil war. It just wouldn't happen.

But it's going to, Azula realized. It fits. Uncle hates what we are, hates the empire. He'll destroy it. And Zuko, that idiot...

No. Not an idiot. Not if he'd seen this coming first. Though why was he going along with Uncle, Zuko didn't want to see their own people destroyed! Spirits, he'd even gone out of his way to save traitors-

Her hand clenched on the sheets, as Azula fit the pieces together.

Assume the Avatar is alive.

Assume he and his little band are going to follow some form of the Water brats' plan, and attack on the eclipse. With an Avatar's power behind them.

Assume they might - just might - succeed.

Which was not something she wanted to think about. Ever. Leaving aside the indignity of being threatened by barbarians, she knew enough of what the Fire Nation had done to the rest of the world to guess what Earth and Water would do to them. Hunted, hounded, obliterated.

Though... not all. If the government crumbled, the domains would be forced to fall back on their own resources. Most of the nation would be lost, yes - but Byakko would break the teeth of any force that tried to land. And if the Avatar tried to take them...

Azula smiled, recalling what she'd read in crypts under the palace. Avatar Roku had faced a volcano. And that had been a nice, tame one, compared to the White Tiger.

So. The odds were that something of the Fire Nation would endure. At least long enough for whatever plan Iroh had to get off the ground.

A colony. With the Earth King's permission. Azula nodded to herself, recalling history. And no Avatar crosses the Earth King lightly. It could work.

It could also cause a civil war, if Iroh was bent on reestablishing his line. But if the Avatar had gotten that far, a civil war would be the least of their worries.

"It could even be an advantage," Azula murmured, mind racing. "The airbender's such a naive little boy. He wants to believe not everyone's guilty. That someone can be saved."

And the longer Avatar Aang hesitated, the more time they could buy. And with time, and assassins... Azula smirked.

Then all we'd have to do is make sure we have all the Southern waterbenders in our custody. So we can raise their children... and the next Avatar.

Not that she had any intention of letting matters get that far out of hand. She was the Fire Princess.

But leave it to a bender with no luck at all to plan for the worst.

No. That was silly. Zuko couldn't have planned this.

Azula tamped down a flare of contempt with iron control. It doesn't matter whose plan it is. It'll make the Avatar hesitate. And... we might need that.

She knew, as most of the Fire Nation did not, exactly how much damage the Avatar had done at the North Pole. Jee hadn't been promoted to captain, even of a mere supply ship, because he deserved the rank. No; there simply weren't enough experienced naval officers left to beach one for potential rebellious sentiment. Not when Jee had never actually done anything.

Not until now.

Her nation was still a force to be reckoned with. Still the finest navy, army, and soldiers in the world.

But there were far fewer of them, now.

We have to win. We have to. Chase the Avatar, ha - this isn't about honor anymore. This is about survival.

I have to assume those men aren't lying. That the Avatar is alive.

Given that, chasing after Zuko to deal with him, no matter how much he deserved it - was it really the best plan? No matter how much she'd earned it?

No, Azula decided, bitter as gall. No, it isn't.

But leaving was a good plan, if she wanted to be sure Ty Lee was safe. All it would take would be one overzealous spy reporting back to the Fire Lord, and... well. Fire Lord Ozai might know Ty Lee's people were of Air. But knowing and being forced to admit it were two lethally different things.

Ty Lee's too valuable to lose. Our forces are weakened enough already. And I want her family. I am the heir. The onmitsu should answer to me.

So. She was leaving, and leaving fast, though it wouldn't do to look as if she'd been goaded into panicked flight-

Or would it?

Ty Lee's eyes went wide. "Oh, you have an idea!"

Azula chuckled, amused by the sparkle in gray eyes. "Summon Agent Chan, would you?"

One packed chest later, the Dai Li was bowing before her. "Princess. How may we serve?"

"I need you to select an escort for me." Azula let sincerity ring through her voice. "Not so many that it weakens your forces, but if I am to prevent Ba Sing Se's case for a light hand to the Fire Lord - you know how many arrogant generals the Wall has thwarted. I intend to make it very clear to them that you are part of our empire, and will be respected accordingly."

"You mean to leave us?"

Agni, the man actually looked stricken. "Only for a while," Azula said firmly. Really, it wouldn't be efficient to rule the whole world from the capital's caldera. Why not make a second bastion here? The Dai Li were so refreshingly bloodthirsty.

And we'll need trustworthy men for all those new widows back home. Yes; that would work very nicely.

"Honestly, Agent Chan? I find the reports of the incident in the audience chamber disturbing," Azula said smoothly. "If the information is correct, that spirit should not have appeared while the city's true overlord was in residence. And that overlord is me." She bent her head, just the slightest touch of noble humility. "The answer is clear. My brother's treachery must be formally recognized, and I must be confirmed as crown princess by my father's decree, before our ancestors and Agni's eternal flame. Then your spirits will be pacified, and Ba Sing Se will flourish."

Which should give me enough time to drag Fire Sages here to catch that thing and fry it to ashes.

"An escort." Chan inclined his head. "It will be difficult to find enough capable of defeating Agent Shirong-

"Pursuing Agent Shirong, or my brother, brings no advantage to any of us at this time."

Under the shade of the green hat, one brow inched up.

"My brother is many things, but he's never been persuasive," Azula said dryly. "If Agent Shirong is following him, given what I know about the Dai Li, he must genuinely believe that stunt of Zuko's was meant to help your people." She rolled her eyes slightly. "Though if Zuko meant to help, we could have worked out something far more subtle... well. It's done. And honestly, he's made all our lives easier." She waved her hand gracefully, as if offering the city. "Any would-be troublemakers will be easy to spot. They'll be talking about nothing else."

"They already are," the agent murmured, a slight smile shadowing his own face before fading back to sober attention. "I would never mean to offend, Princess, but... you do want him dead."

Unspoken she could hear, aren't you going to try to kill him now, after he's humiliated you?

Azula drew a controlled breath, quelling the urge to fry the agent on the spot. He hadn't actually said it.

Yet.

"That was a matter of succession," Azula said, aware of Ty Lee's hopeful gaze. "Before, he was just a fugitive with a price on his head. Now he is a traitor, by his own words, and I am the rightful heir. Which I believe your spirits will understand, once the Fire Lord formally acknowledges me." She shrugged. "If the world chooses to see mercy as weakness, that's too bad for the world, isn't it?"

All true. She didn't need to kill Zuko. Not yet.

Iroh was another matter. One she didn't intend to bring up now, with Ty Lee all but cartwheeling for joy, barely waiting for Agent Chan to leave before she hugged Azula hard enough to bruise.

"I'm so glad!" Ty Lee pulled back, eyes bright with unshed tears. "Even if you don't want to be like him, family shouldn't destroy each other."

"What is a clan, if its members can't rely on that?" Azula smiled back. "How is your family, by the way? I believe I'd like to send them a letter."

Use the eclipse, will you, Water boy? Use our power and pride against us, in that black horror when we cannot bend? We'll see about that.

And once the Avatar was dealt with...

We won't need to suffer traitors anymore.

Not even the children.

"Cousin Lee!"

You know, Zuko thought, prying Jinhai away from the sorest spots, I'm not really sure I like kids.

Kuzon had loved them. But then, Kuzon hadn't had a younger sister bent on doing him grievous bodily harm with malice aforethought, afterthought, and any other time she had available. Much less every other adult in reach either looking the other way or cheering her on. Tended to sour you on the whole "oh, little kid, cute" deal.

He didn't do it on purpose. I think. "Sore," Zuko gritted out, grateful Meixiang was there to pull her son off. Even more grateful that Lim and Daiyu hadn't jumped in, taking their cue from Huojin's slight frown and Luli's headshake. "Master Amaya says I have to take it easy."

"...Oh." Jinhai frowned, almost as shadowed as this lamp-lit corner of the hold. Sailors and civilians had done their best to partition space up with supplies for families to have a little privacy, but it was far more cramped than the cave had been. Though even crammed together, the Wens and Huojin's family seemed to be making the best of it.

Shadows flickered, deepening Jinhai's young scowl. "When Amaya fixes you, you're supposed to get better!"

"He's trying," Huojin said wryly. "Some things just take longer." His slight smile faded. "You had us worried."

"I had me worried," Zuko muttered. "It worked." He looked over the mingled group. Shirong's not here. I need to talk to him.

Mai wasn't here either, though that was understandable. Apparently Private Fushi, of Lieutenant Teruko's squad, had offered to share her quarters so the Wens wouldn't need to encourage any impropriety until everyone was sure if Min and Mai were to have an understanding. Or not. And one of Fushi's squad-mates was supposed to be very good with knives. Zuko could only imagine the kind of shop-talk going on.

I wonder if Min does?

He hoped so. And that they both took things very slowly. Maybe it was selfish, but... Mai had been a friend, years ago. And he had enough problems thinking about Uncle and Amaya in the same cabin without wishing he could throw his brain in a laundry tub.

First things first. Zuko tried for a smile. "How are you holding up?"

"It's crowded," Jia spoke up. "Everyone's been nice, which is strange - well, I guess it's not strange because they're your firebenders, but..." She shifted her shoulders, obviously unwilling to be too impolite. "You used to live on this ship?"

"Not this one. The Wani. She was smaller. A lot smaller," Zuko answered. "But there were only about thirty of us on board, so..." Oh well. No sugar-coating it. "Ships are always crowded. We're going to make as much speed as we can, and we'll put in to shore sometimes if it's safe, but it's going to be a few weeks before we can stay on solid ground." If we can. Zuko drew a breath, and glanced at Tingzhe. "Professor. Captain Jee says you're helping us keep an eye on all the earthbenders. I don't want anyone... getting hurt." He braced himself, and looked Min in the eye. "Are you okay? Being shut away from your element, it's..."

"A really awful way to die," Min managed, looking right back. "Your sister, she's-" He spread his hands, unable to voice the horror.

"She's a dark dragon," Zuko acknowledged. "They happen, sometimes. People who just aren't..." He winced. "I don't know if this helps. Probably not. But it wasn't anything you did, Min. You were just there. She's like that. With anyone she thinks she can use." Use up, burn up, toss aside like gray ashes...

"And she's our cousin." Min looked ill.

...Of course, that might just be seasickness.

"She is," Zuko nodded. "On Roku's side of the family. The human side." His smile was wry; he didn't try to soften it. "The crazy comes from Makoto. And she's not perched in your family tree."

...And that was a whole new swarm of flutter-hornets loose in his stomach. Oh Agni. What does Shidan think of me? He agreed to let Ursa go, he knew the risks if we didn't...

Shidan's own grandchildren had the blood of the darkest of dragons in their veins. No wonder he'd never tried to see them.

No. No, you know he's not like that!

He'd known Shidan then. It'd been eighteen years. Who knew what had changed?

Huojin gave him a pointed look. "Are you okay?"

"I'm tired," Zuko admitted. My best friend - Kuzon's best friend - might think I'm a monster. And Uncle... who knows what he thinks I am.

I should never have remembered. It's just not right.

He never should have remembered more than hints; shadows of this is familiar. Granted, he didn't know the specifics of Agni's offer; what mortal soul could remember the land of the dead? But he was pretty sure there had been a mention of deadly danger, and a promise of weapons left ready to hand. If, and only if, he had need of them.

I was dead, again. In the spirit world, again. And Yue put her claim on me.

Which had probably been the utter, absolute last straw. Agni might want the Fire Lords' hold broken more than anyone, but leaving Azula as heir?

Zuko hid a wince, picturing a dragon of pure fire, coiled on himself in endless knots, biting his own tail to keep from setting every volcano ablaze with sheer, unholy rage.

Which would be just what Koh wanted.

Tired didn't even begin to cover it. Terrified came closer.

But inflicting his own near-panic on a ship full of terrified civilians would be a bad idea.

You're in command. Act like it.

Meaning deep breath, look them straight in the eye, and keep them focused on what they could do. "Is there anything people really need? I - um - hope the privacy screens are enough, I know ship-scrubs aren't as polite as a bathhouse..."

Suyin gave a kind of strangled laugh. "That's kind of... yeah. You grew up doing this?"

"No," Zuko shrugged. "We don't bring children on warships. Though fishing fleets sometimes have whole families on board." He glanced at the adults. "Is there anything else we can do?"

Which unleashed a slow flood of questions, comments, and startled observations, just as he'd hoped. And at the end of it, he didn't have to pretend to be getting too tired to talk.

Though there was one thing he wasn't about to leave unsaid. "You and your parents should talk to Uncle and Captain Jee about your training, for a while," Zuko told Jinhai seriously. Looked up at Tingzhe. "I know he looks stern, but Captain Jee's a father too. We were sparring partners, until Admiral Zhao commandeered my crew and blew up the Wani."

Silence. Full of staring eyes.

What did I say this time-? Oh. "Captain Jee intends to stay under my authority, and we're going to steer clear of admirals," Zuko shrugged. "We're not going to lose another crew to someone else's ship."

More silence. Broken by Huojin's groan as he buried his head in his hands, and Meixiang's rueful chuckle. "People don't blow up noble residences in the Earth Kingdom, my lord," she informed him. "Attack them, yes; that's why all nobles have guards. But to destroy sheltering walls? It's not done."

"Oh." Not that Zuko had thought of the Wani as sheltering, after three years trapped on board. Still, it had hurt to see her broken.

But a ship is just a ship. Walls are just walls. You use them to protect your people, and if they can't do that, you leave them behind. Let your enemy waste his time and resources taking them. Use that time to find a way to strike his heart...

So many differences. So much that looked like common ground, and wasn't.

Spirits. Can we make this work? Am I crazy for even trying?

Kuzon wouldn't have tried this, he was sure of it. But then... Kuzon had been sane.

Kuzon thought he had more time. I - don't.

There was a subtle exchange of glances between the adults, and suddenly Huojin was cutting through the crowd to escort him out the door. "Let's get you home before the marines come calling."

Up a few ladders and out into open air, and Huojin gave him a sober look. "All right. What don't you want the kids to know?"

"You think I'd leave my own people in the dark?" Zuko tried not to snarl. "You know what we're up against. You know we're all in danger! If you think I'd hide that, that I'd lie-!"

"Calm down." Huojin shook his head. "Zuko. Talk to me."

"Why?" Half-step back, balanced stance, breathe. "We've already covered the risks."

"You think the only thing we're worried about is if we get hurt?" Huojin bit back an obvious curse. "Damn it, what's wrong?"

I disrespected an ancestor spirit. I've got who knows how many other spirits gunning for me, and if Koh figures out we know what he's up to, he'll throw his power into the scales. And he will figure it out. As long as I didn't know who I was, he had no way to know. But now I do. That could doom us all. I shouldn't be here, I'm risking everyone!

But if there was one thing his family had taught him, it was the value of silence.

"You..." Fuming, Huojin gave him a narrow, angry glare-

Bit back whatever he'd meant to say, suddenly sober. "Zuko. Just - stay right there. Okay? I need - damn it, there's never a Dai Li when you need one, where the heck is he?"

Mute, Zuko gestured toward the stern of the ship. Where else would a firebender in training be?

"Remember," Captain Jee instructed the agent, the wind of Suzuran's passage ruffling short gray hair. "Firebending comes from the breath, not the muscle. There's no need to knock a wall down if you can burn through it." He paused. "No offense."

"None taken," Shirong said wryly. "Dai Li knock walls down if we have to; you saw the Wall at Ba Sing Se. But we're not Army benders. We're trained to work on a smaller scale." He breathed out, cupping flame in his palm. And watched the captain's expression, trying to gauge a man who'd known Zuko long before he had. "You're surprised."

"You are an earthbender," Jee pointed out. "You're not?"

"Continually," Shirong admitted. "It shouldn't make this much sense. I've studied your people for years, certainly, but this..." He breathed out gently, snuffing the flame. "Still. You are surprised."

"Who wouldn't be?" Jee studied him right back. "You haven't had much time for instruction. And while General Iroh may be a good teacher, we're both only human."

Mostly, Shirong thought, recalling the details he'd managed to pry out of Teruko the past day. Dragons. You believe every firebender has the blood of dragons.

Which, oddly enough, made him feel a bit better about how utterly bizarre the Fire Nation sometimes seemed. Violent and ruthless and bound by iron codes of honor anyone else would just laugh off... and yet, tight-knit and protective as a pygmy puma with kittens. The good ones, anyway.

They believe they're different from the rest of the world. And they're right.

A belief Sozin must have found all too easy to twist over time, Shirong realized. They weren't better than anyone else. But different? Absolutely.

Of course, it helped that he actually liked pygmy pumas. Vicious habits and all.

But in some things, they weren't as different as they liked to think. "It's not General Iroh's teaching you were worried about, was it?" Shirong asked.

Jee cleared his throat. "Ah... no."

Aha. "He's really that bad?" Shirong raised a curious brow.

Jee gave him a dark frown. Then, reluctantly, sighed. "He could use more tactical training, but Prince Zuko is good enough to be in my marines. And that healing fire is an incredible asset. It's even settled Lieutenant Sadao down, and I was beginning to wonder if anything would... well." He shrugged. "General Iroh's had the prince for three years, and I could still take him in a sparring match. It's - well, it's not what you would expect, from that bloodline."

"I see," Shirong murmured. And was afraid he did. It was never enough to be just good, was it? You had to be phenomenal.

"Though we haven't really had the chance for a bout, since he... managed to free Suzuran." Jee shook himself. "I know the theory behind fighting waterbenders, but I haven't been able to bring myself to apply it. Even if he weren't on the casualty list. He's the Fire Lord's son. Water in his hands is just... wrong."

"Hmm."

Jee regarded him narrowly. "You don't think so."

"I met him as Amaya's apprentice," Shirong stated. "I knew when I saw him he might be a war-child; I didn't realize he was Fire Nation until later. Much less a firebender. As for who he was..." The agent chuckled. "We're lucky we were running for our lives at the time, or I might have done something stupid."

"Amaya's apprentice." Jee frowned. "I had the impression Dai Li weren't easily fooled."

"He worked very hard." Shirong half-closed his eyes a moment, sorting the difference in feel between the heat of metal under earth-clad feet, and the ship's faint, almost unreachable touch of earth. Surrounded by water, and I'm perfectly sane. How very odd. "And he's creative."

"Creative."

One word, that held years of implications. Shirong gave him a sharp look.

Jee covered a cough. "Well, he's always been inventive when it comes to getting past security. Zhao found that out the hard way."

"But Azula's the master, hmm?" Shirong mused. "I've seen them fight. If he could bring himself to kill her, she would be dead. He's good, Captain." He smiled wryly. "He's just not good at this style."

The way Jee's face settled into polite neutrality was painful to watch. You've seen him train, and you don't believe me, Shirong judged. But you're not about to start an argument, because you're certain that as soon as Zuko heals enough to be sparring again, I can judge for myself.

I think you're going to be very surprised.

And there really was no point in arguing. Not until Zuko could surprise him properly. Though if this was the impression the young man had left on his crew, Shirong couldn't grasp quite why Jee had chosen to risk his ship and life following the prince.

Then again, perhaps what he'd followed was Zuko's plan, not his bending. Bending skill and strategic genius didn't always go hand in hand. Just look at Ba Sing Se's generals-

Green wove around knots of red and gray, and Shirong straightened. "Huojin. What's wrong?"

"I asked Zuko to stay put." Huojin gestured forward. "Go talk to him. Fast."

Jee tensed. "Is the ship in danger?"

"The ship, no. Us, no. And the way you even ask that-" Huojin looked skyward, shaking his head. "I know he's a great name. I know you all think thirteen's old enough to walk into an arena and die. But right now he's wound up tighter than he was when I met him on the Ba Sing Se docks, which makes me think that maybe, just maybe, his sister trying to kill him again might have been a bit much."

To his credit, Jee winced. "I'll inform the general-"

"No offense," Huojin growled, "but I thought we might try someone who hasn't got him convinced the important part of getting his ship blown up was Zhao walking off with his crew."

"Ships can be replaced," Jee said sternly. "People can't."

Shirong cleared his throat. "I take it this was the ship that blew up while he was still on it?"

"Yes," Jee nodded. "I thought for months he was dead, General Iroh was very convincing- Where are you going?"

"To tell a young man he's at least as important as his crew," Shirong shot back over his shoulder. "Tell the general whatever you like."

I didn't know. I wish I'd known.

But Zuko had at least as much common sense and will to live as he'd thought, because when Shirong got to the section of rail the young man had claimed, Zuko was still there. Even if the cold expression on his face had every sailor in sight giving him as wide a berth as possible.

Which is a lot less room than I would have imagined, Shirong reflected, watching sailors watch him settle his hands on the rail near the prince. "No wonder you're such private people."

Zuko twitched.

Aha. That got his attention. "We're stacked up on top of each other in Ba Sing Se, but there's always somewhere else to go," Shirong went on, watching out of the corner of his eye as an infinitesimal bit of tension eased out of taut shoulders. "If you have an argument, or fall in love, or your heart is broken - you can always find somewhere else to go. Someone else to talk to. And odds are, you can tell them anything, because you've never seen them before and you'll never see them again. Here," he waved a hand at the water. "Where else is there to go? Your privacy isn't walls and streets. It's silence, and customs, and formality. If you're doing what everyone expects, who knows what you really think?"

"Kuzon would have adopted you," Zuko said, half to himself.

Which was so not what Shirong had expected, he had to blink. "What?" No, that doesn't sound right. "Why?"

"He had a knack for finding people who didn't fit," Zuko shrugged. "Sometimes all they needed was a purpose, and those were the ones he usually left in place. Sometimes they wanted something different, and he'd get them to the colonies, or another part of the Earth Kingdom, or... other places. And sometimes..." He glanced down into white, rushing foam. "Some things, even healing fire can't fix. Ran only ever had one daughter. And she loved children. If he'd found you before the Dai Li did, he'd have brought you home."

"Earthbender," Shirong pointed out, feeling the world decidedly askew. "I doubt I would have gone."

Zuko smiled bitterly. "What makes you think he would have asked?"

Shirong's eyes narrowed. It's worse than Huojin thinks. If not why Huojin thinks. "He would have. You would have."

"Kuzon thought he was right, most of the time," Zuko shot back. "It got him killed."

Something about the way Zuko tensed when he said that... "You remember that?" Shirong asked.

"Every second," Zuko said quietly. "You'd think I could remember the good things. The Southern Air Temple. Learning to bend with Uncle Kuroyama, and Shidan. Raising a daughter. Raising granddaughters." He snorted. "I should know better."

Shirong frowned. "I was told you remembered him."

"Like a washed-out painting," Zuko muttered. "Like reading a court transcript, instead of being there. I know what happened. I know why. I know he loved them all so much..." Hands gripped the rail, white-knuckled. "I know it. But all I can feel is that night. When Azulon finally decided to stop playing games." He swallowed. "Aang thinks Kuzon never killed his people. How can I tell him he's wrong?"

This is very bad. "Tell me," Shirong said gently.

Gold eyes were shadowed. "It was night, and it was raining..."

I was wrong, Shirong reflected. It's worse. And if he ever got his hands on whatever spirit or combination of spirits was responsible... well, someone deserved their heads cracked together. "You haven't spoken to your uncle about this?"

"I can't."

The pain he'd expected, but not the desperation. "Why not?" Shirong asked.

"What do you know about vendetta?"

Enough to know you're all bloody-minded enough to be dragons. "A man does not live under the same sky as his father's..." Shirong's voice trailed off. Oh, damn.

"Azulon had Kuzon assassinated," Zuko said bluntly. "He was the Fire Lord. He had every right to charge a domain's lord with treason and conspiracy and have him executed. But he didn't. He never charged Kuzon with anything. He gave him no chance for an Agni Kai. None."

"Which means... it could be considered murder." Shirong felt ice in his veins.

"I know it. You know it. Uncle knows it," Zuko bit out. "But he doesn't have proof. I do." He took a breath. "Azulon had Kuzon killed. And then, eleven years later, he ordered Ozai to kill me. To atone for insulting Iroh's loss of his own heir."

Shirong felt faint. "Your grandfather-"

"And my mother killed him."

With an effort, Shirong stepped away from his horror, trying to see where the ungodly mess of Fire Nation loyalties led. "Oh... damn."

"Deception is an acceptable part of vendetta," Zuko said, cold as winter. "I'd bet you gold Uncle's wondering right now whether Kuzon saw the assassination coming. And if Byakko accepted the betrothal offer just to get her close to Azulon."

"Did he?" Shirong asked, numbly fascinated.

Zuko gave him a level look. "I'm not going to hand you something Uncle wants to get out of you."

"How kind," Shirong said dryly.

"I can't talk to Uncle about this," Zuko said wearily. "I just... can't. Because if I do - if I do, he'll be sure. And as long as he's not sure..."

"Your mother's safe," Shirong finished. "Where is your mother?" A Fire Lord's killer; spirits, where in the world would be safe for her?

"I don't know."

Shirong winced at that pain. "But you think she is alive."

"I don't know." Zuko shook his head. "She woke me up in the middle of the night, told me she'd done it to protect me... and when I got up the next morning, she was gone. And no one would tell me anything. My father... he just smiled." His voice dropped. "You've seen how Azula smiles."

Arrogant, insane, I'm going to kill you and you're going to scream every minute of it. Oh yes. "Amaya's your teacher-"

"She's sharing quarters with Uncle."

And was evidently not an option, by that flat tone. I can't say I'm surprised, Shirong thought sadly. You have no idea how to deal with people who aren't hurting each other, do you?

"I know... I know I need to sort all this out. Before I - hurt someone," Zuko said faintly. "And you know spirits, and you know how much my family's messed up, and... you were the only one I could think of. Because I'm not Kuzon." He drew a shaky breath. "But... I don't know how to tell Uncle that."

"Because Kuzon was his father's spy, and his father's enemy... and then, his father's victim," Shirong nodded. "And you almost were as well."

"...Yes."

"And it's worse than that, because he's failed you twice," Shirong reflected. "In Kuzon's life, by not throwing his support to someone trying desperately to derail the Fire Nation's conquest. And in this life, by teaching you that you could never be a match for your sister."

"I'm not." Zuko looked away. "She's good, Shirong. She's the best. Kuzon was ninety-seven, he was a master, and he couldn't have taken her-!"

"Are you sure?" Shirong cut across his denial. "She never saw that hot sand coming."

"I..." Zuko shook his head, still unwilling to look his way. "Kuzon... didn't know how to do that."

"He didn't," Shirong murmured, sensing a chance of victory nearing.

"No," Zuko said quietly. "He knew healing fire, and he knew enough airbenders to figure out you could use burning leaves to move a little wind, but... no." A faint shadow of a smile. "I owe Toph. A lot."

Well, there's one earthbender who's left a mark, Shirong thought, amused. And relieved. Good. Toph is here and now. Not the past. If I can just nudge him a bit more that way... "So the Blind Bandit's as good as they say?"

"Better." And that was a smile, wry and tired as it might be. "She's... benders move their element. But Toph - she moves, and the world moves with her." Zuko shook his head. "They say Omashu's king earns his throne because he's the strongest earthbender. If Bumi ever gets around to dying, I know who's going to get the job."

Guanyin have mercy, we actually have a human being here. Shirong stifled a laugh. And I thought Teruko was exaggerating. After all - a firebender, thinking an earthbender was cute?

"What?" Zuko said warily.

Is he-? He is. Shirong bit back a delighted chuckle. It was just a little pink, but the prince was definitely not thinking about death at the moment. "Hmm. I was just wondering how much information we might have on the Bei Fong family. Merchant contacts could be considerably helpful in pulling all of this off. And they might be much more than that for Lady Bei Fong and her allies-"

"We can set up a back door," Zuko said in a rush. Let go of the railing, and paced, thinking hard. "If they use what I gave Katara they can get into the Fire Nation, and if they'd just keep their heads down... But they never do. They're always in trouble. And flying with Appa is just going to bring more of it, they're going to need a way to get out..."

Shirong watched, and listened, and sighed with relief. Good. He's going to be busy... did he just mutter something about genealogies?

Chapter 39

"I'm going to kill him," Langxue gritted out, tucked up against Nami no Kizu's rail in as much shelter as he could find and still be in easy bending range of the river.

"Not if I kill him first," Saoluan muttered, fingering one of the red-fletched arrows still stuck in the railing over his head. Shidan's borrowed troop of Yu Yan hadn't quite gotten around to gathering them all up yet. There'd been so many.

The dragon himself was stalking the deck with a razor-edged smirk, eyeing the water behind them as if daring Pohuai Stronghold's forces to catch up. For all Saoluan knew, he was waiting for just that.

...And from the look on Langxue's face, she'd muttered that bit out loud. "Don't think so," the waterbender told her. "We're making as good time as we can. You know that."

Yeah, she knew; and it was good time. Even so. "Getting shot at isn't what's bothering you," Saoluan said bluntly. "It ought to be, but it isn't." She shot him a piercing look. "So what is?"

"The Yu Yan," Langxue said in a low voice. "They still have Yu Yan."

Hyourin, she thought. "Still? The Fire Nation's always had crazy archers."

"No, they didn't," Langxue said flatly. "Archery... it was an Air Nomad art."

Okay. She was starting to get those odd prickles down her nerves again. "Yeah?"

"Oh, yeah," Langxue said dryly. "You saw Shidan bend that flaming boulder in their faces?"

"Um." Saoluan swallowed, wishing she could forget. She'd seen firebenders make flame do the impossible, sure. Seen earthbenders hollow out a cup of rock to move water, and waterbenders shatter stone with ice. But she'd never, ever seen a firebender move something with fire.

Langxue smirked. "Think what an airbender can do with an arrow-storm."

Blinking, she did.

It was terrifying.

"That's what got Avatar Hirata," Langxue said as she shuddered. "Yangchen... it took her a long time to get the whole story. Subodei and Xiangchen, they knew who she was. So they had her raised... well. The yāorén finally got her loose, so she could find teachers..." He shrugged. "By the time she got to the Fire Nation, they'd been fighting off raids for decades. They figured things out."

"What kind of things?" Saoluan asked warily.

"You don't have to be a bender to move chi," her young friend said, stating the impossible as if it were simple fact. "Sometimes helps if you're not. Benders put chi into their element. Chi-users put it into what they do."

Saoluan put together that, and archers, and winds. "You mean..."

"When a Yu Yan shoots, the arrow keeps going."

Eeep. "But they missed the Avatar," she argued weakly.

"Ah. But not by much." Shidan stalked to a halt by them, still smirking. He looked Langxue over with lazy golden eyes; an otter-croc too full to be interested in stalking prey. For the moment. "So far as the rest of the world knows, the Air Nomads have always been peaceful and harmless. And you wonder that we still have the weapons we paid for in blood?" He snorted. "We are not the rest of the world. Our children are taught in school of the strength of the Air Nomads' army. Of the cruelty of their raiding parties, who pierced the hands of captives in case one might be a hidden bender, and tied them about as living shields against our warriors. Of the sharpness of their katana, which cut the very wind; of the golden armor of their bison, gleaming as they flew at us out of the sun, using Agni's own rays against us."

Saoluan saw red, and almost reached for her sword. "And all of those are lies!"

"But they were not," Shidan bit out, "once."

"He's right." Langxue's voice was small, but it pulled her back from the brink. "I hate it, Saoluan, it's awful... but he's right. Some of them weren't like that. There were all kinds of Air tribes, once, and they didn't all like to fight... but a lot of them did. I- Hyourin saw it." He winced, and looked away. "He saw it all."

"But they weren't like that," Saoluan got out. Feeling... broken inside. "Not when you killed them. When Sozin-" She cut herself off, shaking.

"No. They were not." Shidan let out a gusting sigh, a predator abandoning the chase. "Nothing excuses what my people have done. Both my peoples; for my birth kin could have risked their lives, and died, defending those of Air. But human wars-" He made an impatient gesture, as if clawing away invisible vines. "I cannot explain it. There is no human explanation that would suit you, I think. For one of dragon's blood to not take up weapons, to not prepare night and day to slaughter any enemies that would come against them - it is unthinkable. It is - one who does such a thing, who believes the world will not be dangerous, will not strive to kill him-" He spread empty hands. "That is what we call insane. Do you understand?"

Saoluan breathed, trying to cool herself down enough to think. Oma and Shu, he's really not human. "Dragons think someone who doesn't want to fight is crazy."

"Dangerously so," Shidan said soberly. "For the bonds of clan mean one must assist one's kin. And it is our dangerousness, our peril to each other, that keeps each clan from another's throats. If one member of the clan will not fight, and other clans know that to be true..."

"They stomp on him, everybody else comes roaring in to fight, and the whole countryside goes up in flames," Langxue summed up.

Shidan inclined his head. "I know that many humans are not like that," he said soberly. "I cannot understand why, but I know it is true." He scowled at her, only half playful. "Why must you be so confusing?"

"Why do your people have to be homicidal maniacs?" Saoluan shot back.

He relaxed, and nodded. "You do understand. Good."

"I don't understand anything!"

Shidan flinched. "I had thought... we are fire. What else can we be?" He gestured toward the stern, where keen-eyed archers watched the smoke rising behind them. Closer, now; the stronghold's commander must not have been shy about impressing the need for speed on his commandeered vessel. "What else dare we be, knowing air is air?"

"You have to be ruthless killers because of one little boy who was raised a pacifist," Saoluan said dryly. One Avatar, but why let a little fact like that get in the way of arguing with a dragon?

Shidan eyed her, and sighed. "Fire burns, heals, kills. Air is the zephyr, and the howling tornado. We are what we are. No matter what the monks-"

Langxue jerked his head up, tasting the breeze. "Smoke."

"Kind of a given," Saoluan muttered.

"No. Coal smoke." Langxue wove his fingers in the wind. "Upriver. And... oh spirits, someone's burning houses... Shidan? Why are you grinning?"

Chapter 40

The sun was shining, Gaipan was burning, and it was going to be a wonderful day.

Serves those damn collaborators right, Jet thought smugly, touching the bark of the tree he was crouched in for luck. The flood didn't wash away the trash. We'll just have to burn it out.

Smellerbee and Longshot were scattered in other trees nearby, also waiting for stragglers, and probably not happy about it. Which was just not fair. He hadn't even started this battle.

Aggravated it, sure. Inflamed it, definitely, since a messenger hawk had arrived days ago and the whole mass of Fire bastards had seemed to split right down the middle. Arguing about domains and healing and loyalty, of all things, from what they'd managed to eavesdrop on. Like the Fire Nation would know anything about loyalty.

No. He hadn't had to start this one going. And as far as Smellerbee and Longshot knew, he hadn't.

Nice, that the dagger he'd showed Sokka months back had still been in the treetop wreckage. A real Fire assassin's dagger, no matter what that naive Water Tribe kid had thought. It would have been a shame to let it rust on Earth Kingdom soil.

So if it ended up in a lone soldier's back, just outside a house that belonged to a Fire elder making noise about honor... Well, that was just sending it home, right?

Jet listened to screams from Gaipan, and nodded. So Smellerbee and Longshot didn't want to fight for freedom anymore? Fine. He'd just pointed out that they couldn't let soldiers leave Gaipan to spread this fight elsewhere, now could they?

And if there happened to be a few civilians in with them... the traitors deserved it.

And if it works here, I can do it again down the coast - much better than trying to talk that stupid airbender into-

Green and brown and livid red, heading this way. Looked like the townspeople were ahead of the soldiers, which would make his fighters a little easier to live with...

Him.

He knew that face leading the mob, even from this high up. He knew that scar.

He got past the Fire Nation besieging Ba Sing Se. He's here. And there are Fire Nation cowards in with those people!

Only one thing could explain all of that.

I was right! You are Fire Nation!

And now he knew, you didn't give a bender time to see you coming.

I should have talked to Uncle.

A mistake. A bad one. Granted, Zuko was all too aware of the other boneheaded, foolhardy stunts he'd pulled over the years. But those had just risked his neck. Most of the time.

We should have talked. Before anyone went ashore. Damn it.

But he'd been tired and hurting and utterly out of his depth. What was he supposed to say to Uncle Iroh? Hey, let's just put all the mutual assassination attempts aside and be family?

He hadn't - Kuzon hadn't - set Ursa in place to assassinate Azulon. He was sure of that. Mostly. But that didn't mean Shidan hadn't. The dragon-swordsman knew damn well whose blood ran in Azulon's veins, and he carried a host of grudges of his own. Born in blood, and ashes, and the bones of his winged kin.

And Zuko loved Iroh as his uncle and Shidan as his son and friend and he couldn't choose.

Uncle would want him to choose. His whole family wanted him to choose: save your sister, be a patsy for your sister, chase the Avatar for the Fire Lord's glory so you're anywhere but here. Uncle's choice was relatively benign... at least, from Iroh's point of view. Choose between the clan, and what was right for the whole Fire Nation. Zuko understood that. He even agreed. Partly.

But Uncle wanted him to choose, and he was hurt and tired and angry, Agni, so angry about Roku. And the lies, the misinformation, the evasions...

Lee could stand them. A little better. You lied to people outside the tribe if you had to, and Uncle obviously didn't think of Ozai as his tribe. And if Iroh had had to lie to him to lie to Ozai-

But he couldn't be Lee. Not on Suzuran. Jee's people were under enough strain already. He had to be a commanding officer, not a ragged Earth Kingdom healer.

And if he couldn't be Lee... talking was hard enough when he was sane. Angry and hurt? He didn't want to scream at Uncle.

...Actually, he did. That was the problem.

So he hadn't talked to Uncle. Not really. It hurt too much. He'd just wanted to wait a few days. Just to cool down. To let time wear at the aching rawness of he lied to me.

Mistake. Possibly lethal one. Maybe not for him; Zuko had had more soldiers try to kill him than all of Gaipan's garrison put together, and he kind of doubted anyone here was up to marine standards. But the people with him...

If we live through this, I'm never sailing with civilians again.

Zuko knew logistics. He did. He knew all the fuss and bother and headaches of trying to get a mass of soldiers and sailors from point A to point B without imploding, exploding, or slaughtering each other in the middle of the night. Food, drinking water, little things for morale like - shudder - music night... he knew all that.

And Uncle swore the attempted mutiny last year hadn't been his fault.

But any way you sliced it, civilians weren't soldiers.

Intellectually, Zuko knew that too. He'd been taught about civilians. All his life. Even if he hadn't ever really dealt with them for more than a few hours at a time outside of court, before Ba Sing Se.

Court, he'd painfully discovered, really didn't count. Civilians were nothing like court. Even the noble civilians, what few they had with them, weren't.

Oh, they were a little like court. They knew about armored manners and knife-sharp words; aside glances to hint instead of say, like onmitsu footsteps in the dark. Jia and her poetry classes were proof of that. But real armor, and knives, and onmitsu? No. That was - and here was what really hurt his brain - scary.

How just talking about knives could be scarier than not having a good set tucked away for emergencies, Zuko had no idea. But there it was. Weapons scared them. Firebending scared them. His men - Jee's patient, long-suffering, patched-together crew - actually frightened the people they were all trying to protect.

Then again, Shirong scared them too. Which made no sense at all. Shirong was a Dai Li, and dangerous? Last time Zuko had checked, that was a Dai Li's job.

He'd be tempted to beat his head against a bulkhead, but it wouldn't solve anything. Darn it.

Not that every civilian was a problem. Mai seemed to be making progress charming the more fragile types, especially when she dragged Min along as a proper escort. Tingzhe Wen's family were Agni's own blessing, keeping calm and helping Mai defuse the inevitable clashes between armed Fire, refugee Earth, and Fire that had hidden itself for quiet survival. Luli and Huojin likewise. He wished he had a hundred of them.

But he didn't. And he was responsible for all of these people, and they were scared. They didn't know soldiers, they didn't know ships, and even with rocks on board for the earthbenders, they really wanted to get back on dry land. Even if it was just for a little while.

And Uncle had sworn he had contacts in Gaipan, and sending shore parties off the ships for a day would be just fine.

Every once in a while, Uncle was wrong.

Zuko wasn't sure what his people had walked into. At this point, he didn't care. The town was insane, at least three different factions seemed to be slitting throats at the same time, and the only sane civilians left in the area had either bolted for the woods or locked themselves in to wait out the bloodshed. Which just went to show that Earth's instinct to stand your ground wiped out even common sense, because there were watermarks above some of those rooflines. What kind of insane moron locked himself in on a floodplain?

All of which left everyone who'd come ashore scrambling to get the supplies they'd come for and get back to the ships. If anything was left of their plan, Uncle was with Jee's people, handling that. Which was good, because Zuko wanted to be sure there was plenty of calming tea on board when he set something on fire.

He'd ended up with Shirong, and a bunch of... spirits, he couldn't even be sure he was coming up with the same numbers of people twice, much less nationalities, as the two of them tried to lead some of the less sane civilians in a loop through the edge of the forest that hopefully would take them away from armed troops, back to the river and safety. He hadn't had a chance to ask why these people were following him; he could only guess that some had attached themselves to long-lost relatives they'd never hoped to see again-

Earth Kingdom. Mostly.

Some seemed to have grabbed what they could carry and followed him, right after he'd raised an ice wall to slow down pursuit-

Fire Nation, and the only waterbenders who've been through here are... yeah. Sokka's responsible for this, somehow. And I'm going to get him for it.

And some - well, given the improvised weapons of farming flails and weirder things, they just seemed to be along for the mayhem. And those were a mix of red and green clothes he had no clue how to sort out.

"Sqwark!"

Speaking of mayhem. There was one Fire Nation soldier sincerely regretting rushing ahead of the rest, armor or no armor. "Don't eat him!" Zuko called to Asahi. Grabbed a wrinkled Fire matron who seemed semi-sane, and pointed her toward the river with the formal sweeping gestures of a lord on the battlefield, where yelled orders or temper might steal your voice completely: lead your people, move them, get them out of my line of fire. Now. "You don't know where he's been!"

...Okay, that earned him a dirty look he didn't think he deserved. You'd think a sane soldier would be just a little more concerned about the ostrich-horse trying to take his arm off-

Fire!

Breathe, step, block and shove aside; he spared a quick glance toward Shirong, he hadn't felt earth moving to block that fireblast and the Dai Li didn't have a hat anymore-

Shirong tossed a few stray flames off his hand to sputter out in wet grass, looking as surprised as anyone.

Zuko grinned.

Green eyes caught that, and narrowed. "In case things somehow manage to get worse," the Dai Li declared, as oncoming troops slowed in shock, "I just want you to know one thing." He drew a deep breath. "A train is not a boat!"

Which was almost enough to start Zuko giggling right there, and he was going to have to talk to Shirong later about humor and firefights...

Wind whispered through leaves, and Zuko ducked.

You? Again?

A fire-flash of thought, there and gone, because Jet was good. Not as good as he thought he was, but very, very good with those hook swords. And hadn't been wounded lately, from the way he moved. And from the whites showing all around his eyes, the sheer thoughtless fury the so-called Freedom Fighter slashed out with... he'd utterly, totally lost it.

Spin, parry; he's going low, jump-

No fires to draw off of. This was going to cost him.

Worth it, need to put him down, Shirong can't hold them all off-

Zuko whirled a firestorm around him with steel, blasting Jet back into oncoming spears. Incidentally searing a few arrows out of the wind, and who was shooting at them now-?

Water foamed and struck like an octopus, wrapping arms and weapons in a winter-crackle of ice. "Nobody move!"

A Kyoshi Warrior? Here?

A warrior whose young waterbender ally hadn't fought the Fire Nation, Zuko realized, wriggling himself free with a breath of steam and finger-twitches to shed melting water. That weave of ice wasn't going to hold long.

"Okay, I give up," the waterbender grumbled, sea-green eyes flicking from Zuko's unruly mob, to Jet, to the soldiers currently straining against ice. "Who are the bad guys?"

Wrapped to his neck in ice, Shirong snickered.

Not that Zuko didn't appreciate the irony, but that choked amusement had drawn the warrior's narrowed eyes, and he really didn't want to try and fight his way past a good swordswoman and a trained waterbender-

"Let them go."

Red and gold and - blue?

Midnight blue mountain-stripes on an old-fashioned lord's haori. The lord himself looked almost white-haired enough to have taken his domain when they were still the fashion, centuries ago; though he moved with the grace of a swordsman in his prime, daisho carried proud and ready-

Shidan!

Fear and hope roiled in Zuko's gut like hurricane waves. Not so much fear for himself, though what Shidan might think of Makoto's great-grandson was enough to give him chills. But if Shidan was here, openly, all of Byakko was in danger.

"Let them go, Langxue," Shidan stated, looking the guards' commander in the eye. "I believe the captain will give his parole so we may talk."

Talk. Right, Langxue thought sourly, figuring out a tricky part-push that would let the guard captain loose without releasing the rest of the spear-carriers. And wincing. He wasn't a master. He was good, but he wasn't that good yet... and his chi ached. He wasn't about to let on to Saoluan, there was nothing she could do - but it ached, gnawing at him like a mole-rat, and he was scared.

I'm running out of time.

It would have been easier to just collapse all the water into a tame wave at his feet. A lot easier. But that wasn't what Shidan had asked for. And given the blazing fire of the dragon's presence was keeping the captain from doing something stupid-

Chi plucked at part of his ice, subtly weakening bonds holding that startling green-uniformed firebender frozen.

Another waterbender? Where? There's nobody in blue, or dressed like home... oh.

Earth-green robes, sleeves covered with an odd black tracery that reminded a fisherman's son of waves, and storms, and white fire crawling across the sky. Ragged black hair shaded the teenager's face, but didn't cover the massive scar that almost - almost - didn't let you see anything else. Yet if you could look past it-

He has Shidan's eyes.

Reaching out with chi and heart, Langxue felt an echo of the dragon's inner flame, coiling about frightened people to keep them strong. Not the trained inner fire Hyourin remembered; it was too raw, too much the firestorm instead of a tame, civilized burn. But strong.

And wrapped around that strength, braiding it together when it frayed, was the tide-pull of family.

It's him. Kaze's cousin. A yāorén.

...I'm going to live.

Langxue swallowed a sudden impulse to cry. He didn't know Shidan's grandson. He didn't know anything about the Fire Nation boy, or how he'd gotten an entire navy ship to follow him, much less that ragged fleet they'd seen ranging up the river.

He didn't know... and part of him just didn't care. Fire-born or not, this was another yāorén. Someone who understood. Help.

And those pale gold eyes were fixed on Shidan like the last hold over an abyss.

Beside Langxue, Saoluan choked. "He's your-"

"Indeed." Shidan's smile showed just a hint of teeth.

"But he's-!"

"If you truly wish to fight with him over burning one of your villages down, Warrior..." Shidan chuckled softly. "Later, if you would? Hmm? I'm sure he will oblige you."

Langxue started. The only firebender who'd hit Kyoshi Island in the past century was-

Oh. Whale droppings.

I always knew the Moon had a sick sense of humor.

Almost as bad as, say, a certain dragon. Who deserved to be frozen solid.

"So, Captain," Shidan said easily, as if icy vengeance weren't breathing a few feet away, "shall we talk?"

"Talk?" the guard captain all but spat. "With all due respect, lord, there's nothing to talk about. You're between us and enemies of the Fire Nation." His voice dropped, low and venomous. "Including a known traitor."

The Fire Lord's son tried not to bristle. But pale gold was hard, and ready to fight.

Ready to kill, Langxue corrected himself with a shiver. He'd seen that look on Saoluan, once or twice. It wasn't something you forgot.

And... okay, that was weird. Some of the tension had gone out of Saoluan, even as she stood ready to strike. Why-?

I'm an idiot. He's a traitor? And willing to kill his own soldiers? Then Shidan didn't lie to us. He didn't tell us everything, and I'm going to stick icicles all over him for that... but he didn't lie.

"You are mistaken, Captain." Shidan's gaze was level, and just as deadly. "I stand between you, and my grandson."

The teenager's expression didn't change. It could have been carved from stone.

But through the water, Langxue felt a ripple of hope.

He claimed me. He knows whose blood I carry, he has to know! But he still...

Zuko swallowed. No. No crying. Bad time for it.

Subtly testing ice, Shirong glanced at the dragon, and the captain's suddenly grim face. "I might be wrong," he murmured, "but I have the impression this just got-"

"Serious," Zuko finished for him.

"Ah." Shirong grimaced. "Stay or go?"

"Wait," Zuko advised. "I think-"

"So you lied about your family, too," Jet spat. "Why should I expect anything else from a Fire bastard?"

Shirong winced. Zuko almost cringed; there'd be no way out of this without bloodshed now, he could feel half the people in earshot go from outraged to murderous-

"Your pardon, Captain," Shidan said dryly. "I need a moment."

Turned on his heel, took two long strides, and plucked Jet out of the ice like a messenger hawk stooping on a rabbit-dove. And shook him. Hard.

Given Shidan was maybe an inch taller than he was, Zuko had to stare.

Gripping the nape of Jet's neck, Shidan slammed the teenager to his knees. Waited, one deliberate second, for Jet to try to reach for his swords-

Wrapped his free hand around Jet's throat, clawed nails dimpling skin. And growled. "Do not move."

Showing the most sanity Zuko had ever seen from him, Jet froze.

"My daughter," Shidan said grimly, "is a good, honorable, noble woman. To suggest she would so dishonor her lawfully wedded husband, her clan, and her children - whatever grievance you may think you have against my blood, you will end it. Or I may not choose to be merciful."

"You're the ones who need mercy. But there's not going to be any, when the Earth Kingdom fights back!" Jet shot back.

The dragon snorted, lip curled. "You are a young fool. Playing for time? Don't bother. Your friends in the trees have met... my friends in the trees. There will be no rescue."

His friends in the-? Zuko glanced up, and tried not to stare at painted faces. Yu Yan. Shidan brought Yu Yan!

Meaning another of Byakko's plans, encouraging some of those with a knack for chi-use to take up archery, had paid off. But that Shidan had taken them from their unit as well... oh, this was not good.

Blood trickled from the tips of claws, bright as the sweat on Jet's face. "Just get it over with!"

"Shidan," the swordswoman protested.

"Think it through, Warrior." Shidan's tone was calm, and cold. "To whom has this boy - this murderous, ignorant boy - just given insult?" He glanced at the guard captain. "Death would be mercy, compared to what awaits him."

"So it would." Deliberately ignoring the Yu Yan, the captain eyed Jet, a smirk twitching his mustache.

Zuko recognized that dark satisfaction, and felt chill. The captain might claim he was only following orders; occupied civilians did not insult the Fire Lord. But in this time, in this place, with rebellion and chaos on every hand...

It'll be a public - long - execution.

Another scar on his people's soul.

Enough. "We don't bargain with lives," Zuko said harshly.

"Impudent youngling," Shidan observed, kneading blood-speckled skin. "But correct." He tched. "So what shall we do with you?"

Challenge. Subtle, polite - but Zuko could taste it.

Whose clan are you, young one? Your father's, to turn this fool over to death, as he likely deserves? Or mine - to follow an elder of Byakko?

Zuko took a deep breath, and let his heart break. And made the only choice he could, for his people.

I miss you. Oh Agni, Shidan, I miss you! But this has to be my clan, my domain. Or it's not going to work, and Kyoshi's decree will kill us all.

"Whatever we're going to do, we'll do it on the water."

Chapter 41

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

He is not as Ursa described her child.

Eyes open for other surprises, Shidan stepped onto the deck of his grandson's territory. A glance, a breath; he drank in the controlled chaos of Captain Jee's crew, the whimpers of those injured or frightened by their flight from Gaipan, the thick tang of fresh paint meant to keep saltwater from gnawing steel into rust.

A good sign, that last. Even in the midst of rebellion, the small needs were being seen to.

Speaking of seeing to needs... Shidan stepped out of the crew's way, fire-writing in air where his ship could view the signals they'd previously agreed to. Safe. Traveling with kin for now.

A marine cleared his throat. "And who would you be signaling, sir?"

"My ship," Shidan said plainly, barely glancing at the younger and more nervous firebenders behind his interrogator. That steady man knew quite well who he was signaling to. The real question would be why, and what threat it might pose to Suzuran. "Sergeant...?"

"Kyo, sir." Polite. But not at all impressed by noble gold.

Shidan smiled wryly. Good. The sergeant would need that steadiness, with his grandson on board. "Captain Shinya would worry if I did not contact him, despite the fact that our archers are bringing word back directly. He always worries." The dragon chuckled quietly. "Not without cause, I fear. I am sometimes quite the trial to my own heart's lady." Over half a century walking among humans, and he was still too quick to sharpen claws when it was clever words that were called for. He rarely acted on those impulses, and never without cause, but even the most blind humans might find themselves... unsettled, by his presence. And that brought a host of troubles of its own.

The sergeant inclined his head. "Lieutenant Teruko did mention trouble has a way of finding you, Lord Shidan." He glanced toward the young prince, currently clumped in with earthbenders, soldiers, and his worried uncle; explaining, it would seem by the slash of a hand that trailed a faint shimmer of heated air, exactly what had passed on shore. "Seems to be a family talent."

"Shidan," the dragon said firmly. "I hold no noble rank, outside my lady's husband." No loyalties, outside of Byakko. Very handy for his beloved, when Fire Lord Ozai's will threatened to become inconvenient. "And yes. It most certainly is." He gestured toward the two taking shelter in the fire-shadow of his presence. Not hiding, surely not. "Kyoshi Warrior Saoluan, and her charge Langxue. We have a great need to speak with Prince Zuko and General Iroh-"

"What the hell am I supposed to do with you, Jet?" came a healthy young growl.

"-But I believe it can wait until we are underway," Shidan said dryly. "I do so wish to hear this."

"What are you going to do?" Jet shot back, not at all fazed by the stone cuffing his wrists together; Shirong's work, like the bonds Gaipan's guards would be working their way free of this very moment. "Yeah, right. Who's in charge around here?"

Shidan tried not to snicker in the sudden silence.

Saoluan traded an incredulous glance with her young friend. "You set that up!" she hissed, just above a whisper.

"Such a harsh statement," Shidan murmured back. "I simply took advantage of the situation that presented itself. I'd never met my grandson. I can feel where his loyalties lie, but that does not mean he is aware of them. He is still young. He might not have known himself if he were pulled to Ozai, or wished to seek shelter of his mother's clan from the war. Which would be his right. He has been wounded, in much more than body; deeper, even, than you have suffered, young waterbender. I do say that, knowing you held kinless among your own - for you have one beside you who will not see you come to harm, and all too often my grandson... has not." He sighed. "But I am here now, and I would shelter him, had he been wounded too deeply to continue. Spirits and the world be damned. Yet he is not. He has the strength to fight on. I needed to know."

Agni, but he wanted to snatch the young one up and tear back to Byakko like the mother of all hurricanes was on their heels. This was his Ursa's boy, his kin, wounded and grieving and alone. His clan had suffered enough. More than enough.

But Zuko has the strength to stand as a great name. I will not take that from him.

So. He would behave, and do his lady's nerves good, and sit on a cranky dragon's instincts. And hope, oh so very much, that there was someone in the near future who truly needed his throat torn out. It was so very calming, to be done with an enemy.

Spirits, if only Fang had been able to explain that to Roku!

Curse the spirits and their compromises. No Avatar had ever been dragon enough to feel the needs of those who bore Fire's own blood. And so few, so very few, had ever taken the time to try to understand.

We are the sons and daughter of Fire. We do not defeat our enemies. We kill them.

"And if he was still on Ozai's side?" Langxue said warily.

"There are ways." Shidan gazed blandly back at sea-green. "Not safe ways. But I am his grandfather. Few others have that advantage." Not that even that and fire-healing might have been enough to save one as stubborn as his clan if he did not want to be saved... but a better chance than most, for breaking loyalty. Thank Agni he didn't have to risk it.

"You're kidding," Jet said flatly, brown eyes scanning the officers and sundry others of import around the young prince.

Not entirely stupid after all, Shidan thought, catching sight of young Teruko on the edge of the crowd. Glaring at Shirong. Well, well; and he could certainly understand the impulse, but surely Teruko knew his grandson well enough by now to know nothing short of an armored division could keep one of Sozin's line out of peril? And that was if the spirits were feeling charitable-

"You take orders from a waterbender?"

Shidan sighed, examining the blood still caught under his claws. And him half a world away from Kotone's gentle teeth to preen them clean. Idiot. Entirely.

Zuko gripped the bridge of his nose. Sighed, raised his head, and glared at the young rebel. "Do you ever think of anything beyond killing the Fire Nation, Jet? Ever? Like - I don't know, your friends' lives? Or do you just think it's worth it, shooting through them to get to us?"

The red-painted girl fumed. "Jet would never-"

"He did, Smellerbee," Zuko cut her off. "Because if they didn't know, and they felt dishonored - first they'd kill me, and then they'd kill the witnesses." He eyed Jet. "Don't try to talk your way out of this one. You know us too well not to know we'd do it."

"Foggy Swamp," Jet almost spat, eyes narrowed in contempt. "You people always lie-"

"An evasion, perhaps," Shidan sliced across his words. "Not a lie. We do, indeed, have kin there." More than I can say.

Jet's archer ally raised an eyebrow.

Shidan inclined his head, sensing the wealth of questions in that movement. Interesting, indeed; and did Jet know what faint traces of his chosen enemy walked beside him? Did Longshot even know? Bold, for such a child to take up archery. But not unheard of, if the blood should wake after generations of sleep.

Visibly unnerved, the archer took a step back.

Jet's gaze whipped toward the dragon. "What are you?"

What, indeed. Shidan's lip curled, an amused flash of fang-

"I'd worry less about him, and more about the person who's going to drop you in the river if you don't start thinking," Zuko said coldly. "Think you can swim in stone cuffs? I don't."

"He wouldn't," Langxue breathed.

"It is never wise to push a great name past his patience," Shidan murmured. "I do wonder what ill those two have done to each other." A simple insult - it had been simple, if deadly - would never have made the boy Ursa had shown him so ready to execute an idiot.

He had three years alone with Ozai.

True; though Byakko knew how that had ended. A young man who'd defied custom to protect his country's soldiers was unlikely to have been twisted to cruelty. No matter how badly the spirits tormented him.

So. Take it as faith that the heart-shape Ursa had gifted him of her son, hand to hand and mind to mind, was truth. A young dragon-child, fragile as they always were their first decade, yet still swift to place himself between others and harm. A child now much nearer grown, and far less fragile. Which meant-

Ah. Of course. To someone on this vessel, Jet is a deadly threat. Shidan breathed slow and deep, feeling the fires of loyalty that burned with his grandson's rhythm. No one on this deck or in Jee's crew would be incapable of defending themselves, so... Aha. And interesting.

A young clan. So new he could still taste Agni's fire in its blessing, tempered with the pure rock-salt of nurturing earth.

Earth and fire and kin. How can that be? I know all of Byakko, even those we have hidden...

No. Not Byakko. He sensed a chilling touch of power, of other. Familiar, though he'd only felt it in three bloodlines. Azulon's get, by Ilah. Governor Tsumi's small clan. And Aang.

My grandson has found Roku's third bloodline. And they are here.

Yāorén, and Sozin's blood, and Roku's. Did I fear the hurricane? It is upon us.

"The brig, sir?" Jee gave Jet a jaundiced eye.

"Likely wise," General Iroh said heavily. "I would let the young lady and her companion roam free, but they are Jet's freedom fighters. They might be tempted to act against the ship on his behalf." He gave Jet a sober, disappointed look. "Lady Toph Bei Fong risked her life to set you free of Ba Sing Se, and you still find no better purpose than killing those of the Fire Nation. You asked for a second chance, young man. When will you take it?"

Jet glared at them all. "You think I'd ever give up fighting for the Earth Kingdom?"

Zuko glared back. "We're working with the Earth King."

Langxue stared, and Saoluan stiffened. "He's - how - what?"

At least she'd kept it a whispered sputter. "Interesting," Shidan murmured. Trying not to leap over there, drag his grandson off, and pester the young man into laying out all the fascinating details. The spirits had been meddling, vastly meddling, and they would need all their wits to ride the tsunami's wave.

Manners. Caution. Zuko wanted to trust him, he could feel it. As he could feel the pain that ran deeper than mere scars ever could. If he wished his grandson to be true kin, they had no time to waste hurrying.

"I don't believe you!" Jet snarled. "You're Fire Nation. You're all-"

"Fine," Zuko cut him off. "Enjoy the steel bars. Maybe you'll figure out we're not lying. If you don't - I think we'll find a nice island to drop you on. Or the river. Your choice. Lieutenant?"

Teruko nodded. "Sergeant?"

"Yes, ma'am." Smiling grimly, Kyo and his men moved in, maneuvering prisoners as if stone weighed no more than feathers.

"Odds are he tries to kill us all in our sleep," Zuko grumbled.

"Nephew," Iroh sighed. "A man can change his mind."

"Uncle. We were under Lake Laogai, I was with Toph breaking him out of prison, we were surrounded by Dai Li trying to kill us or drag us off to bend our minds, and he sees I'm a firebender and tries to kill me. I am not going to risk anyone on this ship hoping he gets an attack of sanity." Zuko growled under his breath. "We need to get these people settled-"

"We'll handle it, sir." Teruko glanced Shidan's way. Pointedly.

Zuko sighed. "I know."

"Sir!" Teruko's glance whipped between them, a woman on shore watching kin swept toward a waterfall.

"I know. He's my grandfather," Zuko said soberly. "Who I've never met, because he's a great name of Byakko, and that clan's kept their mouths shut and their eyes open ever since Kyoshi dropped in to visit. And now he's here. On a ship the Fire Lord would sink without blinking twice." He winned. "This is not going to be good."

Pessimistic young fledgling. But accurate. "That will depend," Shidan said graciously. "How skilled have you become at spirit-healing?"

I know there's never much room on a ship, Langxue thought, tucked up against Saoluan as the safest spot in the cabin, but this is ridiculous.

Normally, he'd guess, this was General Iroh's quarters; warm, and more than roomy for a single sailor, steel bulkheads barely softened by tapestries, a hint of jasmine tea in the air. But from the amount of water and bits of blue showing from a stuffed clothing chest, he and Amaya were sharing. And a cabin meant for one, shared by two, was absolutely not meant to hold six. Especially when one of those six was a dragon, who seemed to occupy more space than humanly possible just by breathing.

So the good news was, besides the two royal firebenders themselves, none of Prince Zuko's people were in the cabin with them. The bad news was... none of them were in the cabin with them. Langxue had a bad feeling he really could have used that wry earthbender Shirong as backup.

"Let me get this straight." Pale gold burned into him. "Kyoshi Island's been attacked by spirit-monsters because the Ocean Spirit's upset. And the Ocean's upset because there are thousands of restless Fire Nation ghosts." Zuko's eyes narrowed. "I wonder why that might be?"

"Bunch of bad funerals?" Saoluan said brightly.

Langxue felt the silent snarl, vibrating through the deck. Tried not to shiver. Shidan was a dragon, but so far he'd been a friendly dragon. His grandson...

The Fire Lord's son.

Trust, seeped into him from Shidan's subtle fingers against his back. Testing of strangers. Angry. Not at you.

...Dragons had no right to be so spooky.

"So you realize you're in trouble on Kyoshi Island, and you came looking for help," Zuko went on. "And you walk into Fire Nation hands to get it. I know you're desperate, but are you crazy? Who gave you the information to find us? They're probably massing troops-"

"Zuko." Iroh rested his hand on a stiff young forearm. "Forgive him. My nephew is not accustomed to friendly interference from the spirits."

Was that-? Oh yeah. Definitely a groan.

Langxue had to smile wryly, suddenly feeling a lot better about this whole mess. Monks and nuns could hold the spirits in worshipful reverence. Yāorén had to deal with spirits run amuck, or humans who'd provoked them, or both. Which meant a lot less reverence and a lot more desperate improvisation. Fire Lord's son or not, Zuko already had the attitude.

I'm not alone.

Saoluan blinked at Iroh. "You believe the spirits told us?"

"As surely as I believe your young friend was injured, and needs our help," Iroh said graciously.

And smiled at the woman beside him.

Yeah. He really could have used Shirong, Langxue realized. Or at least, someone else to put between him and a helpful Northern waterbender.

That's what she says she is, anyway.

Blue eyes, check. Dark hair, with just a bit of gray, and no engagement necklace; back home, she'd be married with some kids still half-grown. Dark skin; not as dark as some of the Southern Tribe he'd seen, but definitely darker than anyone at home. Blue dress, but that was a city style, formal and proper, and it wasn't anything like home. Put it all together, and- "No."

Water cupped in a globe in her hands, Amaya edged no closer. "You need help."

"I know. I just - can't." Langxue shivered. I wish I didn't remember. "I know... too much about what can go wrong. Spirit-healing takes trust."

Something most yāorén got through that first, life-saving time by sheer guts and not knowing any better. Hyourin had been hurt, bleeding, burning inside from the fire laced through his spirit. When Kaze had found him, and said let me help-

Kaze. Langxue swallowed, and met eyes pale and fierce as those of the dragon behind him. "Can you do it?"

"Me?" Zuko said in disbelief.

Which wasn't nearly as disconcerting as Iroh's raised eyebrow. The old general was considering him, in a way that reminded Langxue all too much of Kaze and Shidan at once. Eep.

"Him?" Saoluan's hand crept toward her hilt, outraged. "Little brother, he burned down Kyoshi Village."

"I'm sure he's sorry," Langxue managed. He didn't want anyone poking around in his spirit. Anyone. But if someone had to - he trusted Kaze. And this was Kaze's cousin. There couldn't be anyone safer in the world.

"Oh, I just bet he's sorry," Saoluan grumbled. "Comes in, starts a fight on a neutral island-"

"An island harboring a declared enemy of the Fire Lord," Zuko said stiffly. "So no. I'm not sorry."

Langxue tried not to groan. Oh, he is so dead.

"He was my father's enemy. My only way home." Zuko looked Saoluan straight in the eye. "I was following orders, I almost had him, and an airbender with your fans is a menace. Did they tell you why those fires spread so fast?"

"You're not the one that put out the flames," Saoluan declared.

"No. The Avatar did. Riding the Unagi. Idiot." Zuko took a deep breath, let a little steam blow out. "He was a threat to my people. He is a threat to my people. If you think I'd let a neutral village stop me..." He sighed. "But I am sorry, Warrior Saoluan. I'm sorry I was loyal to someone who didn't deserve it. I'm sorry I didn't figure that out years ago. If I'd known, if I'd been smart enough to talk to Aang at the South Pole instead of..." He winced. "Like my grandfather said. You want to have it out later on the deck? I'll meet you with steel. That's fair." Pale gold narrowed. "Just tell me one thing. You know who I am. If my father were in an innocent Earth Kingdom village, one that didn't want a fight - would you ask before you went to kill him?"

Langxue swallowed dryly.

"The Avatar," Saoluan bit out, "is nothing like your father."

"No. He's not." Zuko's gaze never wavered. "But that's not an answer."

"You know what the Fire Lord has done to the world!"

Zuko smirked, wry and bitter. "Yes. I know." He shrugged. "I don't really have to ask, do I? You'd be one of the first ones in."

"You..." Saoluan seemed to slump a little. "Damn you. You're a firebender. You're not supposed to use logic."

"A bad habit I have passed on to my nephew," Iroh chuckled, walking a lotus tile across his fingers.

Oh man, Langxue wanted to groan. Not another Pai Sho nut- wait. Wait.

...He couldn't believe he hadn't made the connection before.

White Lotus. General Iroh? The Dragon of the West?

Careful. Careful. You knew the White Lotus a thousand years ago. Even if they are still looking for yāorén... who knows what they're doing for the Avatar now?

"So you do know about the North Pole," Saoluan said quietly.

Zuko snorted. "We were there."

"...Oh."

"If it should help," Iroh added, "I am sorry we attacked your island. It had remained a place of peace, untouched by the war. Such refuges are few in this world. I wish we had arrived a day later."

Zuko's face was still. A little too still. Langxue eyed him. "You don't think that would have worked," he challenged.

"He's a twelve-year-old airbender who found an island where people liked him," Zuko grumbled.

"He sticks around places like that until he gets bored. Or the spirits send somebody like me to shove him back into being the Avatar again."

Saoluan gave him a skeptical look. "You think the spirits send you after the Avatar?" She crossed her arms. "And I suppose that makes it all okay."

"No. That definitely does not make it okay," Zuko snarled. "He's twelve, and naive, and an idiot. And the Avatar. Which makes him a threat to the whole Fire Nation. Not because of what he'll do to us - and he will, you know that - but when he blasts our army to shreds, who do you think is going to be tearing through the rest of us behind him?"

Saoluan bit her lip, but didn't back down. "You deserve it."

"A lot of us deserve it," Zuko said tightly. "Some of us don't." He shook his head. "You think whoever comes in to mop us up is going to stop with just the army? When they saw what the Avatar did at the North Pole? He's the spirit of the world, and he obliterated us. You think people aren't going to think that's the right thing to do to rest of the Fire Nation?"

"But you're a yāorén," Langxue blurted out. "You have to-"

Zuko's glare killed the words in his throat. "Help the Avatar," the prince finished icily. "So I'm told. I didn't ask for this. I didn't want it. La took me, and wrecked the entire line of succession, and that means if Uncle and I don't pull off something crazy, a lot of our people are going to be dead. The spirits want my help? They'll get it my way. And my way means, I am not going to let Aang kill us all off. Not on purpose, and not by being a naive, gullible, everybody can just get along airbender who'll ask so nicely for his allies to stop killing us." Steam wisped from his sigh. "So if you want me to do this, instead of Amaya - I am not going to be a yāorén like you think they ought to be. I am not going anywhere near the Avatar. He wants to go after the Fire Lord? I'm not going to stop him. He's the Avatar. The Fire Lord's a firebending master. I've seen them both fight." He snorted. "When dragons duel, a smart cricket-mouse finds a crack to hide in. I've found a hole in the world, and I'm going to try to patch it. That's it."

You're a yāorén, Langxue thought, stunned. A warrior yāorén. You couldn't be a cricket-mouse if you tried.

And Shidan was so still behind him.

Shidan said he was hurt. And - if La didn't ask...

Oh, man. He's Fire and Water. And he really thinks the Avatar would kill his people. Or let people kill them.

Tell a great name he was supposed to help the boy who'd do that? You might as well try to put out a forest fire with a ladle. Zuko was angry, to the core angry; Langxue could feel it, rippling faintly through all the water in the cabin.

He let out a breath of his own, convinced. "Yeah," Langxue nodded. "I want you to do it." He looked at Amaya, a little embarrassed. "I'm sorry. But I don't know you. And we're both waterbenders, and... I don't know what your tribe wants. What they're going to do in this war."

Amaya studied him, and inclined her head. "And you have brought your own tribe with you."

One big sister. Pretty small tribe. "Yeah," Langxue admitted, lump in his throat. "Saoluan's here because of me, she's not going to leave me if I do something stupid. Like get caught up by someone else's family. So I can't be stupid." He nodded at Zuko. "He's a firebender. If he uses fire, he's not going to catch me. Not by accident."

Zuko flinched back a little, then set his jaw. "I'm not going to do it on purpose, either. You need help. I'll help. You decide after that you want to hear how crazy we are, that's up to you."

Looking at his sister, Langxue raised an eyebrow.

She frowned at him, then eyed the firebenders. "You found a hole in the world the Avatar can't fix," Saoluan said skeptically.

"Indeed we have," Iroh said plainly. "The Avatar has power beyond any bender. But there are skills he lacks. What we have... well, it will not be perfect. But it may be enough."

Langxue wasn't going to ask. He was not going to ask, no matter how much his curiosity itched at him. And Iroh knew it was tempting; he could see it, in that amused gleam of gold eyes.

No wonder La grabbed his nephew. That guy is pure yāorén-bait.

Well. One way to get his answers for sure. "Let's do this."

Saoluan frowned at him, a silent are you sure? Really sure?

Sighed, and shook it off. "Right behind you."

No. You can't be. Not in this. But it helped. This was his best chance, and he trusted Kaze, but he could still feel his heart jumping as Zuko pinched a candle alight and-

Spirits. I haven't seen that in... heh, a thousand years...

Green and gold flickering around his hands, Zuko reached for head and heart.

Don't fight. Don't fight, stay calm, stay still, he promised he would help-

I won't hurt you.

The whisper of another spirit, as slow but sure fire melded the pieces of his spirit back together. But there was an echo to it, a familiar echo...

Drawing on fragments of the past, Langxue sank inside.

Stars, and waves, and moonlight.

Not surprising. Zuko was using fire, but they were both claimed by water - oh.

In the foreground, flames just flickering away from his healed wounds, the scarred prince he'd seen in life. Behind him, ghostly-

He looks like Shidan.

Not the face; though the ghost was just as white-haired and wryly smiling. It was the stance, the paired blades - dao, not daisho - the mountain-striped robes...

Looking at that double image, that double life, Langxue had to laugh.

"Where are we?" Zuko demanded.

"It's okay-"

"Am I dead again? Once was enough, damn it!"

"It's okay," Langxue insisted, trying to pull his face straight again. "This is just something we can do." Something we have to do. Because sometimes we're teaching a yāorén right in the middle of a spirit-uproar, and there's no time.

But no one had been around to teach Zuko. Ouch.

"We?" Zuko eyed him warily. And blinked. "You're... a lot of people."

Oh good, at least he's seeing clearly. "I've come back a lot of times," Langxue admitted. Looked around the night-dark shore they'd crafted where their spirits touched. "This isn't the spirit world. Exactly. Though we can get there from here, if we have to. It's got to be bad before we risk that. We're not the Avatar. We're just human." He grinned wryly. "Well... mostly."

"Mostly." Zuko's face was still, but the waves surged.

"That's what we pay for who we are," Langxue said honestly. "The way we always cross the spirits the first time? Ordinary people would die. They'd just die. We don't. We won't. Because something's more important than dying human."

"You mean we're all crazy," Zuko said sourly.

"Well..." Langxue hesitated. "Yeah."

That won a quiet snicker. "So how do we get out of here?" Zuko asked.

At least that's quick to teach. "Just find your center, and pull back..."

A breath, and Langxue blinked. The cabin again. Good.

I've got a yāorén who already hates spirits and the Avatar. If I'm going to turn him around, I better look like I know what I'm doing.

It wasn't going to be easy. If Zuko had actually seen what Saoluan had said happened to the Fire Nation fleet... well. That was bad.

The Avatar hasn't had yāorén to help for centuries. I know what Aang did was awful - but who was going to teach him any better? We can fix this. We have to.

For more reasons than one. Saoluan said Avatar Aang trusted that Southern waterbender, Katara. And if a firebender had been given water...

Aang's firebending teacher. He's got to be.

Now all I've got to do is talk him into it.

Chapter End Notes

Yes, you can all feel sorry for Langxue now. He doesn't know Zuko or Aang. Yet.

I've been checking out the WMG page on Embers. Evil Grin. At least some of the guesses are accurate; I don't plan to spoil anyone's fun by saying which ones unless someone's really dying to know. I do find the bits about Kuei interesting.

I will, however, say straight out that Jinhai's not going to end up a Fire Lord. Zuko wouldn't do that to the poor kid.

I've also finally seen the Last Airbender.

...

...

For the love of mercy, someone, tell me they'll steal a few thousand from the SFX budgets for scriptwriters for the next 2. Rufftoon (on DeviantArt) skewered it so well...

That said, it had its moments. The fight between Zuko and Aang at the North Pole was as down-to-earth of a mix of martial arts and bending (and breaking things) as I could have hoped for. Iroh is awesome. (Plus, I looked up dreadlocks in the cultures the film is supposed to pull from. If Wiki's right, they mean - among other things - a spiritual master with power over fire. Nice.) And if you're looking for the subtleties, it was very interesting to see visible differences in skill level between occupation soldier firebenders (need a lot of moves to charge up), invasion troops in the Siege of the North (a move or two), and Zuko. And then Iroh tops everybody. Oh yeah.

Chapter 42

Chapter Notes

Azula warning.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Wow," Ty Lee breathed, shifting her balance just a little to counter the tank's vibration as she looked at the explosion of papers all over Azula's room. "Did we hit a really bad bump? Because I thought I would have felt it, but maybe I was doing a finger-stand-"

"No," Azula said shortly, as the acrobat closed the door behind her. "I did this intentionally."

"...Okay?"

"And no, I haven't hit my head again," the princess said wryly. "This is a strategy." Even if it seemed utterly silly to describe. "It occurred to me that the Fire Nation's strategic environment has become suddenly complicated."

Wide gray eyes blinked. Looked over scattered papers. Shrugged.

"Shell-matching," Azula filled in.

"Oh!" Ty Lee brightened. Frowned a little. "Um...?"

"For the past century, our enemies have been clearly defined," Azula broke it down further. "We eliminated the Air Temples, set to work on the Earth Kingdom, and harassed the Water Tribes." She paused, giving the airbender a measuring look. "You've never seemed concerned about the temples." But that was before you remembered you were a bender.

And did her father know the onmitsu could do that? Did Fire Lord Ozai have any idea?

No. He trusts me. Not with all of our strategy, of course. But if he'd known anyone could tamper with your mind to the point you forgot your own spirit - he would have told me.

Which made it all the more critical to avoid pursuing Zuko. Perhaps she would have trusted the news of the Avatar's planned invasion on the eclipse to a messenger hawk. But as things stood - some intelligence was too deadly to bring any way but in person.

We need to know how their methods work, and how to counter them. No firebender should ever be robbed of their flame!

As for what they'd done to Ty Lee... Agni, how much of the acrobat's disconnect from the world was Ty Lee, and how much from being cut off from her own spirit?

You hurt her, Azula thought toward those as-yet unnamed elders. She'd learn their names, one way or another. You hurt one of my people. And I will make sure it never happens again. No matter how useful you are.

And... Ty Lee seemed to actually be thinking about what she'd said. Interesting.

"What happened to the temples was sad," Ty Lee said at last. "But I don't think they would have let Aang be another Yangchen."

Azula arched a brow. "Yangchen?"

"The last Air Nomad Avatar. Only she got away."

"Got away?" Azula asked carefully. Avatars were honored by their nations. Or so the histories read.

Of course, she had reason to know histories could lie.

Ty Lee nodded vigorously, wafting papers aside to bounce onto Azula's bed. Absently, Azula noted how the airbending briefly muted the rumble of the tank's engines. A cue like that might be vital to get the drop on the Avatar before he could get it on her.

Folded on herself to her liking, Ty Lee squinted into memory. "You know the stories about training the Yu Yan because of the raids that killed Avatar Hirata?"

"Thoroughly," Azula said dryly. Some of those had been quite heady adventures for a young lady. If she hadn't been graced with firebending, she'd have fought to be first among them.

Only Father never would allow her a bow. It wasn't fair.

Father isn't here.

Hmm. Risky thought. But they'd need the archers for the eclipse. And she could always present the case that she'd wished to make certain no officious fool who couldn't read a calendar had ordered them elsewhere.

"That was Skylord Subodei," Ty Lee went on. "He had a vision. The White Wind would own the skies. The rest of us..." She glanced at her hands, obviously picturing them pierced through with bloody ropes.

"My uncle had a vision of Ba Sing Se," Azula noted. "That didn't turn out so well."

"Yeah," Ty Lee said softly. "I wonder who the Fire Sage who helped him with it was. I bet he was a lot like Monk Xiangchen."

Court-trained instinct pricked up its ears: This is important. "Who?"

"Monk Xiangchen. Subodei's favorite shaman," Ty Lee obliged. "He had a vision, too. And it meant using the Skylord's." She shifted the feet dangling over her head like other girls might shrug. "He wanted the whole world to be at peace."

Azula let silence stretch between them, making absolutely certain Ty Lee had no intention of rephrasing that impossible statement. "So he helped a man out to rape, pillage, and conquer?"

"Think about it," Ty Lee said; for once, serious. "Once Subodei conquered the world, Xiangchen and his followers could make people peaceful."

Azula shook her head. "That's impossible. You can't make-"

"People can't fight if they don't remember how. Or why."

Stepping blindly back through scattered papers, Azula sat down. Trained control or not, she wanted to shiver. Forget to fight? Forget what kept you alive? Agni. Oh, father of fire, preserve us.

"So he helped Subodei until Avatar Hirata was killed, so the Skylord would give him the next Avatar," Ty Lee went on. "And he did. So Xiangchen got to keep her as a nun, away from the world, while Subodei and his son Yisugei and his son Subodei - boy, that was always hard to keep straight - kept conquering all over the place. And... well, it's a lot of long stories. But she got away, and something happened near the North Pole, and ashes were falling out of the sky everywhere, and she got Subodei and his warriors and Xiangchen - but she didn't get the ones who believed in Xiangchen. Not all of them." Ty Lee took a deep breath, gray eyes bright with tears. "And all the healers were treating lung-sickness from the ashes, so Xiangchen's followers could just go places and find them. And they took them away. To the temples. And no one ever, ever came back."

Fools, if they didn't hide, Azula almost said. Regarded those threatening tears, and softened her tone. "So you lost clan to the Air Temples."

"I don't... well... it wasn't just the healers," Ty Lee gulped. "If they found you, if they knew what you were, if you couldn't get away - airbenders were supposed to be spiritual. That's what they said. And Xiangchen said spiritual people didn't have attachments. Ever. So if they found you..." She shivered.

Cold rage burned in Azula's heart. You're supposed to be sunshine. The wild wind, blowing where it will. You're not ever supposed to be afraid. Not of someone who isn't me. "He won't do that to you, Ty Lee. Do you hear me? The Avatar will never do that to you. I'll burn him alive first."

The acrobat sniffled. Scrubbed at her eyes, and gave Azula a watery smile. "You can be really scary. In a good way." She unfolded herself, serious. "That's why I couldn't let Zuko win. He's too nice. You say you'll stop Aang if he tries that, and you mean it. Zuko... he doesn't want to hurt people. Not really." She glanced down, sad. "I kind of hope Aang doesn't know anything about... what the temples did. The elders think the monks didn't catch anybody after Chin the Conqueror, but who knows?" She rustled a few papers. "So... messing up a bunch of histories and reports is new tactics?"

Conversational whiplash. Occupational hazard, talking with Ty Lee. "As I was saying, it's been the Fire Nation against the world," Azula obliged. "Now we have the Fire Nation. The Earth Kingdom. The Avatar's rag-tag band, wherever they are. Whoever Brushmaker Tu was working for. And my brother's apparent alliance with the Earth King. Multiple factions; multiple goals." She waved a hand at scattered pages. "Given our intelligence analyses somehow missed half of those, I intend to do a new one."

"By mixing everything up? So... you can see if things really match, instead of just being together because that's where everyone always puts them." Ty Lee brightened. "Did you find anything? Can I help?"

"Yes," Azula said bluntly. "And I believe my brother is better at intuiting danger than most of our generals." She tapped a sharp nail on her own list of notes. "I've identified at least three key conspirators who must have been assisting Uncle. All of whom had relatives among the raw recruits in the Forty-First."

"Oh," Ty Lee said in a small voice.

Stupid, Zuko, Azula thought. You should have whispered to Uncle. You should have let him stop it.

Stupid, possibly. Naive, she was beginning to believe instead. How had Zuko reached thirteen so innocent?

She shook it off, and gave Ty Lee a look askance. "You're not thinking far enough. If Zuko was able to grasp that would be a fracture point to lead men into treachery three years ago, what has he seen about the Avatar now?" She waved a hand toward the tank wall, vaguely toward Ba Sing Se, now days behind them. "He left with the Avatar. We saw it. But my rock-headed, treacherous brother, who doesn't want to kill, didn't stay with the Avatar. Think, Ty Lee! What does that mean?"

"Ooough." Ty Lee turned faintly green. "That sounds... really bad."

"Yes," Azula said grimly. "That's why we need to talk to him."

"...Huh?"

"It will be difficult," Azula mused, tapping the list thoughtfully. "He's not stupid enough to let me close enough to kill him again. It'll have to be messages. And we can't risk those falling into the wrong hands..."

The vibration of the tank shifted. She crossed the room to fling the door open. "Why are we slowing down?"

The Dai Li who'd just raised a hand to knock looked slightly nonplussed. "Lady Li - or Lo - spotted a messenger hawk. They say it's come for us."

Brow raised, Azula headed for one of the top hatches.

Fifteen minutes later, having absorbed the details someone had officially admitted to about the Yu Yan, her surviving grandfather, and the completely unexpected news of a cousin now heir to Byakko, Azula called a halt for an hour. For target practice.

We really need to talk, Zuzu.

Because if Zuko had somehow made off with part of the Yu Yan needed to defend the capital on the day of the eclipse, he'd better have a damn good reason.

He's up to something, Saoluan thought, suspicious. I just know it.

Oh, not the Fire Navy lieutenant currently leading them down passageways and companionways, even if he was casting a few shifty glances her way. She'd seen enough sailors trading with the island to recognize a young man sneaking peeks, even if he was in red armor. Not even the pair of princes and the dragon they'd left behind - though she was sure they were up to something. Probably lots of somethings.

No. The only one she was worried about was the way too thoughtful little brother walking with her, that touch of white locks ruffling in a breeze, eyes creased and thinking.

He's planning something. Can I hide now?

Worse, she was pretty sure he was planning something that had to do with Prince Zuko. And when two nefarious plots butted heads, someone was going to get hurt.

...Not that she thought Langxue would plot something nefarious. Well, besides getting them onto a rebel Fire Nation ship in the first place. But there was one thing about her little sword-brother she just knew was going to rub their reluctant host raw as leopard-sharkskin, and she couldn't for the life of her see a way around it. Yet.

Langxue respects the spirits. And the Avatar.

He didn't revere them, not like some villagers she knew. But he and his family had always honored them, always leaving offerings on the new moons and the season-turns. And they'd always believed the spirit of the world could not be destroyed, and someday there would be an Avatar again. Langxue might not respect what the current Avatar had done - screw-up of epic proportions was the most polite thing he'd said about the North Pole - but he was absolutely confident that what Aang needed was just some helpful advice so it wouldn't happen again. And from what she'd heard a few minutes ago, he knew just who he wanted to have give it.

Prince Zuko. Give Avatar Aang advice. Nope, not seeing it.

Now, throwing the airbender overboard - that, Saoluan could see. Or throwing himself overboard. After all, Zuko could swim.

He was there at the North Pole.

Bad enough to think about when she'd just heard the glee from the elders at the Fire Nation's defeat. Sure, they were the enemy. Sure, they deserved it. But she'd dealt with enough of Langxue's nightmares to have a gut-clenching understanding of just what the invasion fleet had faced. No one fought the Ocean and won. No one.

Once Langxue had told her what would happen to the Fire Nation drowned, and any spirit that came in contact with enough of them... well. She'd had her own nightmares to fight.

And Prince Zuko was there. You want to talk him into helping his nightmare, little brother?

Put that together with the firebender's crazy conviction that an airbender would be willing to lead a massacre of his people...

Only it's not so crazy, is it? Saoluan admitted to herself. She'd pestered Shidan for every scrap of information on the onmitsu he'd been willing to scrape together. And if that was how you thought of airbenders growing up, and not the nice-guy monks at the temple-

Sweet and charming and oh so sorry if they have to hurt anyone. But they can paralyze you, they can take away your bending, and if you're lucky, they kill you in the middle of the night.

If you're not - they give you to the Fire Lord.

She still thought the Fire Nation was a bunch of paranoid, murdering bastards. But the ones on this ship didn't seem to be murderous. Just paranoid.

Guess I should find out how paranoid. "I get the feeling his highness is a little haunted by the North Pole."

...Which probably wasn't her most diplomatic moment ever. But Langxue was already going to be rubbing Zuko the wrong way. Better to get any hurt feelings aimed at her, first.

"Haunted." Odd; Lieutenant Sadao didn't sound upset. "Yes, ma'am. That's a good way to put it. We've kept a memorial flame burning on Suzuran, and it helps, but... you don't get over seeing something like that."

Something about the way he'd said you... Saoluan grinned wryly. "You sound like you were there."

Sadao shot her a wary glance. Sighed, and shrugged. "We were."

...Oh, damn.

Langxue gave the firebender a measuring look. "How are you still alive?"

"Captain Jee," Sadao said frankly. "He'd seen the Avatar cut loose before. The moment we saw the glow, he had us reverse engines. And pray."

Saoluan almost laughed. The Fire Nation, praying?

Took another look at Sadao's face. "You're serious."

"The captain sailed with General Iroh for months," Sadao stated. "Admiral Zhao said the general feared the spirits, but... well, we know what happened to him." He paused. Looked abashed. "Um. You probably don't know what happened to him."

"I'm afraid to ask," Saoluan muttered, morbidly fascinated.

"The Ocean took him." Sadao's gaze was level. "Prince Zuko saw that, too."

Took him. Saoluan tried not to shiver. Not, wrecked his ship. Not, drowned him in a tidal wave. Took him.

Meaning their reluctant host had seen a great spirit mete out personal vengeance on the Fire Nation's fleet commander.

Great. Kid's not just paranoid. He's right to be paranoid.

"I'm just glad he knows how to duck," Sadao muttered.

"Duck?" Langxue said uneasily, beating her to it.

"He'd just blasted the admiral down," the firebender said wryly. "A little disagreement over blowing up the Wani. While the prince was still on it." He nodded toward the next stairwell. "Let's try down here. We're all kind of jammed in various places, so... just tell me if you think this will work, or if you want to transfer to another ship."

Stunned, Saoluan followed.

Silence. Warm, tea-scented, claws ticking almost soundlessly on the table. Silence.

Zuko watched Uncle Iroh glance at the hands resting on polished wood, and felt a tickle of dark humor. Yes, he's a dragon. Yes, you never looked. Yes, there's a reason Kotone never let him near court.

Shidan in the midst of the sneering crowd Fire Lord Ozai encouraged. That would be painfully short. Ending in a pile of dead nobles - and yet another dead dragon, at Ozai's hands.

We can't lose him. We can't lose any more dragons. They're few enough as it is.

Few, and very hard to hide, except in human form. Which was never, ever a permanent solution. Just a way to buy time as Byakko tried to stop the madness.

And how have they tried, that I don't know about?

He was afraid to ask. But someone had to. He was just glad Amaya had left for the infirmary, murmuring something tart to Uncle about freezing any member of the family who got out of hand. It was going to be hard enough translating dragon to Fire Nation without adding Water Tribe to the mess. "Is there vendetta between us?"

"Zuko." Uncle shot him a disapproving look. "He is your grandfather."

Zuko refused to flinch. "So was Azulon."

Shidan snorted; a stifled, dark laugh. "You have his gift for uncomfortable truths. Good. It would be a pity to lose that part of the bloodline."

Zuko stared, totally confused. He'd been compared to a lot of people in his life, but... Azulon?

This can't be good.

"As for vendetta..." Shidan let out a quiet breath, and looked Iroh in the eye. "I fear you are the only one who can answer that. I can only tell you what I know, from one I believe without doubt." He turned a hand palm-up, sunlight catching on sharp nails. "Will you hear me?"

"One you believe," Iroh echoed. "Ursa?"

Shidan inclined his head.

Don't jump over the table, don't jump-

Zuko focused on his grip, nails biting, wood heating under his fingers. He had to know!

"She is alive."

...And the world was too close and far away at once. Zuko held onto the table, and gulped for air.

"Alive, but wounded," Shidan went on, watching him with knowing eyes, "What Ozai did... well. Ozai." He shook his head. "General Iroh. I do not know what your father said, or intended. Nor did Ursa. She only knew what Azula had threatened Zuko with. A threat Ozai confirmed, when she went to him." Another slow breath. "Your brother meant to sacrifice his son, so he and his chosen heir would succeed Azulon. If that was truly what the Fire Lord ordered - I do not know. And Ursa had no time to learn. To save her children... she struck a very dark bargain."

"All medicines are poisons," Zuko whispered.

"So they are." Shidan regarded Iroh. "Vendetta is yours to decide, Prince Iroh. In Byakko, as among dragons, vendetta is for the living. To mend broken souls, and remove enemies to the clan. But what you will use it for... is your choice."

Uncle was silent, steam drifting from his tea. "To save her children."

"She does love Azula, even now." Shidan didn't look away. "Does any mother wish to see one of her children glory in the death of the other?"

Zuko swallowed, heart hurting.

Iroh sighed. "For the living, you say." He gave Shidan a measuring look. "Lord Kuzon did not die in bed."

"We knew Azulon would strike eventually." There was grief in Shidan's voice, and an old, old anger. "Ran was his love and his light. Together they could weather any storm. Without her..."

Shidan glanced aside, saddened. "We loved him. We wished him to stay. But he was so very tired." Clawed fingers curled. "There are worse ways to die than fighting."

Iroh's eyes narrowed. "And you seek no vengeance for his death?"

Shidan smiled, slow and fey. "Did I not say we saw death coming, Prince Iroh? Our vengeance sits beside you. Azulon's blood, who will never follow Azulon's will. Azulon's grandchild, Makoto's blood, who wants nothing of the war they have made. We are avenged." His smile softened. "And we are blessed, and grateful. We thought we knew the risks of joining our blood to the Fire Lord's line. We were wrong. Terribly wrong. For years, despite all our healing, despite Shirotona's protection... it is so easy for spirits to still a life before it is truly begun."

"Chihisen couldn't bear," Zuko whispered.

"Ursa was next eldest of our children," Shidan nodded. "One child as a prince's heir. One for Byakko. Just as Azulon had planned, to bring us to heel at last." He smirked. "A pity for Ozai he never grasped the true importance of that plan."

Iroh straightened. "Zuko was exiled..."

"And we were, finally, able to set enough defenses," Shidan finished. "Even so, we knew we were at great risk, and then-" He looked at Zuko, deep and warm. "And then Ozai had but one living heir, with none left for Byakko. The spirits were distracted. Early; too early, had we a breath less skill at healing. But we knew we would have no better chance."

"I was dead," Zuko managed. "I was - really gone..."

"Just long enough." Joy radiated from Shidan like flame. "Your aunt, Chihisen, is safe delivered of a daughter by her husband, Tsubasa. Haruko has met the dawn for over a full round of the moon, and is accepted of Shirotona." The dragon chuckled. "She has very strong lungs."

Byakko is safe.

Well, not safe; nothing was ever safe. But Lady Kotone had two heirs in the direct line now, daughter and granddaughter. Any move the Fire Lord might make would be glaringly obvious.

And right now, my father's got bigger problems.

From Uncle's nod, he'd considered that as well. "My brother may know that his forces are better spent resisting the Avatar, but he will hear of your presence among us. You have put Byakko at great risk."

"We have taken precautions," Shidan shrugged. "I am here. Kotone is not. And like Kuzon before me, I am often seen in unsavory company." He sobered. "There is no more time, General. All the signs are of danger, and death. To do nothing would only mean we perished later. If Byakko is to live, if our people are to survive, we must act."

Iroh frowned. "Agni has spoken?"

"Agni does not speak near as often as the Fire Sages imply," Shidan said dryly. "Even to those of dragon's blood. As you should well know, General."

Silence. Zuko snuck a glance at his uncle, taking in the rare sight of surprise on Iroh's face. "I don't think he does. Azulon didn't talk about family much."

...And it was wrong to gloat. Very wrong. But he couldn't help wondering how Uncle liked having his world yanked out from under him.

Bad nephew. Behave. "So what should we do if Great-Grandmother shows up? Besides run."

"Running would be wise," Shidan agreed. "Beyond that, use water and earth. Makoto is of fire, only; the dark fire, but fire all the same."

"Sozin's companion is dead and gone," Iroh said sharply. "He died - was killed - before Azulon was born. It is what began the tradition of dragonslaying."

"Ah? And did Fire Lady Tejjina tell you that?" Shidan's whiskers twitched. "I am curious. Does Azula truly resemble her mother so much, you could not see your grandmother in her?"

"Her body was in her chambers!"

"A body, I am sure," Shidan said dryly. "Hers? I imagine the charring was too horrid to tell. Was it not?"

"Stop it," Zuko hissed.

Startled, the two older firebenders broke off their glaring and glanced at him.

"Just stop," Zuko said raggedly. "Grandfather. I know you hate Makoto. I know. And you made sure Mom married my father anyway, even though you knew - you knew! - we'd all be crazy. I don't understand people. I try and I try and I don't. And that's your fault." He focused on the other half of the problem. "Uncle. You know the records. You should know better than anyone what they mean. Fire Lady Atsuko vanished when Zouge died."

"But that cannot-"

"It is," Zuko insisted. "Sozin was a dragon-child. Azulon was a dragon-child twice. And if you didn't have all the luck in the world, to take after Grandmother Ilah-" He winced. "We're not right, Uncle. Azula. Father. Me. And you've got to stop thinking it's your fault. You didn't know. I remember Lu Ten. He would have made a great Fire Lord. You taught him that. And you couldn't teach me, and... it just is, Uncle." He swallowed. "Great-Grandfather lied. I'm sorry."

"Nephew," Iroh began, stricken.

Zuko held up a hand; stop. "Grandfather. No evasions. No omissions. Why are you here? Why come to find us now, when we're running from the whole Fire Nation to jam the Avatar Spirit between a rock and a hard place?"

"Is that what you are doing?" For a creature supposedly more in touch with the spirits than any human could be, Shidan looked downright intrigued.

"No, it is not," Iroh said firmly. "We defy Kyoshi's decree, indeed. And we will build a place of safety for our people, where airbending can rise again. But to think one could ever dictate terms to the spirit of the world..." Iroh shook his head. "Zuko. He is young. He will listen to reason."

Zuko gave him a look.

"In a few years," Iroh amended. "But he will understand what we are doing, and he is kind. He will have no reason to act against us. And whatever blame you believe he bears for the North Pole, you have no reason to threaten him."

...I am not going to set this table on fire.

Shidan cleared his throat. "We are speaking of Aang? Gyatso's student?" At Iroh's nod, he sighed. "I am only a dragon, and my lady's beloved, and ever bewildered by humans. But I think you give the boy too much credit."

"Do I?" Iroh looked unconvinced.

"General. I knew Aang."

Whatever Iroh had been about to say, he apparently thought better of it. "I have rarely seen the boy when he was not pursued by enemies. My nephew, or others. But he has seemed quite brave. He has rescued Zuko. Twice."

Zuko reddened. "Pohuai Stronghold doesn't count. I went in to rescue him."

"And the polar ice?" Iroh raised a gray brow.

"...All right, that counts." Which still stung, damn it.

"I have never doubted Aang's bravery," Shidan said gravely. "A cowardly child would flee. He would never still seek to face the Fire Nation, after all he has seen. No. It is his kindness, his tolerance, that I doubt. How are the sons and daughters of fire to win honor and respect from one who sees dragons as no more than sky bison?"

Silence, as sunlight caught glittering motes of dust. Iroh scattered them with a heavy breath. "You are certain?"

"Time after time I would show him images, and never did he shift in his images of me," Shidan nodded. "Kuzon's animal companion, he believed. No more."

"It is not a heritage we speak of with outsiders," Iroh pointed out.

"Heritage or not, a boy who cannot recognize the fact that Kuzon would spread scrolls for both of us to read is missing the obvious," Shidan said dryly. "Leave aside that willful ignorance. If Sozin had not seized his chance with Joetsu and the comet, I well believe Aang would have started the war."

"Not on purpose," Zuko protested. Yes, Aang could be an idiot, but - oh. Right.

"No. Not on purpose," Shidan agreed, whiskers bent in wry, bleak humor. "He simply assumes those who speak a truth speak the truth, and all of it. And that those he favors are wholly in the right."

"A flaw of the young," Iroh observed. "Hardly enough to start a war."

"More than enough," Shidan countered, "with the Face-Stealer setting snares at every turn."

Zuko shivered.

Iroh caught that, and frowned. Looked Shidan in the eye. "We will speak more of this."

Great. Talk about the spirit that wants us all to die horribly-

"Alone."

What? Uncle, you wouldn't-!

On the other side of a firmly shut hatch, Zuko took in the fact that Uncle most certainly would.

You can't do this to me! I am-

Sixteen. Not lord of Byakko. Certainly not a crown prince.

He threw me out on my ship!

Jee's ship, to be specific. For what Uncle thought was a good reason.

I need to think about this.

He couldn't think angry. He knew that.

And there might be something Shidan didn't want him to know, without prepared, friendly arms ready to catch him.

He said Mom was wounded. That Ozai hurt her...

One grandfather had ordered his death, twice. The other wanted his father dead.

It's official. Today sucks.

Deep, slow breath. In and out. Use the training.

And in the absence of orders to the contrary - go find something and kill it.

Chapter End Notes

Yes, Zuko quoted Rommel. Heh. The Desert Fox and the Fire Nation army? Talk about fitting like a glove... which also includes some of Rommel's very bad habits, like being so eager to attack he kept outrunning his supply lines.

Another Rommel quote fits the whole mess Sozin started, and illuminates part of why he started it: "Anyone who has to fight, even with the most modern weapons, against an enemy in complete command of the air, fights like a savage against modern European troops, under the same handicaps and with the same chances of success."

Before anyone invokes Godwin's Law, please Wiki Erwin Rommel. He was on the wrong side, but even his enemies agreed he was a decent man. I can see the younger Dragon of the West, before the siege of Ba Sing Se, being a lot like him. Or like General George S. Patton. "Fixed fortifications are a monument to the stupidity of man," indeed. And though he was on the right side, never forget the man also said this: "May God have mercy upon my enemies, because I won't."

("Have taken Trier with two divisions. What do you want me to do? Give it back?" Oh man, I could so see a young Iroh sending that back to Azulon when the Fire Lord said taking a town was impossible...)

About Embers TVTropes page - Troperiffic. (Insert writer giggling here.) Well, yes.

Intentionally. ATLA hit so many itself, you can't swing a fanfic without KO'ing a swath of them. And they're fun.

Finally, this may qualify as a minor rant, but what the heck... One theme in some reviews goes along the general lines of, "if Zuko really thinks he's a good guy, why doesn't he help Aang - who is, after all, the Spirit of the World and will do what's best?"

There's a trope to describe someone who turns their back on their own society and government, actively works to destroy it, and leaves it at the mercy of non-related outsiders. Especially in community-based, clan-based, and tribal cultures. That trope is Too Dumb To Live.

If Zuko didn't believe in his own people, didn't believe, heart and soul, that their ways really matter, he'd never have hunted for Aang for three years. He did. He does. A Knight in Sour Armor believes in the rules and breaks them only when necessary.

Setting up an outside domain is not destroying the Fire Nation. It's recreating what used to be a working system in the first place. On top of that, it's setting up a domain with Earth King Kuei's permission to be there - meaning part of the Fire Nation is, currently, out of the war. Which does help Aang.

Granted, it's a very small part of the Fire Nation. After all, one teenager with a vision and a few people to help? Starting small is pretty much a given... oh, wait. (Insert Aside Glance at the Avatar... AKA in tropes terms, The Messiah.)

And while I'm throwing in tropes, here's a few that Zuko has reason to think describe Aang: Black and White Morality, The Pollyanna, Well Intentioned Extremist, Good is Dumb, Hero Ball, Idiot Hero, Stupid Good. And, of course, Too Dumb To Live.

Aang is triumphantly hailed as the returning Avatar. That Spirit who - people believe - really knows best for the world. And then proceeded to wipe out a large chunk of Zuko's people.

And given he has every intention of overthrowing Ozai, he doesn't plan to be slowing down any time soon.

Zuko is not, and never will be, a saint. The war has to be stopped? Good idea. Fire Nation people are going to have to die to stop it? Awful idea. It may well be necessary, but that doesn't make it any less awful to the young man who was raised to lead and protect them.

The only way Zuko would ever accept joining Aang - not be happy about it, but accept it - is if he really believed joining Aang would cut down the body count. So far, he has no proof of that.

Is that fair to Aang? Possibly not. But Aang - from Zuko's point of view - has no one depending on him. He has no relatives, no clan, no binding oaths. He has no forces to lead. No one who relies on him to make the best decisions, the ones that keep them alive. Note in the Gaang, Sokka is the Idea Guy. And on top of all that, Aang doesn't feel compelled to tell the truth.

Which means Zuko would be looking at any potential alliance as just another chance for Aang to say, "Whoops, that's not what I really meant."

Meaning Aang risks nothing by just using him, and Zuko risks everything.

Paranoid? Sure. If you'd had half your face burned off by your father, and large sections of the world trying to kill you ever since, wouldn't you be?

What worries Zuko is, is he paranoid enough?

Chapter 43

Chapter Notes

Xiāo yāo jīng: xiāo - long-legged spider, yāo jīng - evil spirit; alluring woman. This is, of course, an expy of the Japanese youkai, the jorōgumo. According to Wikipedia, that's written as "絡新婦" ("binding lady") or "女郎蜘蛛" ("whore spider"). One of the forms it takes is a young woman carrying a "baby"; the spider's eggsack.

Fēnglàngshāo: (風浪 风浪 fēng làng (n) wind and waves; storm tossed sea. 蛸 shāo long-legged spider; one of the original Japanese terms for octopus I ran across was "sea spider".) Expy of the Akkorokamui, (アツコロカムイ) a gigantic octopus-like monster from Ainu folklore.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Walking meditation." Surrounded by firebenders on Suzuran's stern, Jinhai clinging to him, Tingzhe regarded the lit candle in his grasp with some bemusement. He and Shirong already had to shield theirs from the wind of the ship's passage north; that Lieutenant Teruko's burned slow and steady spoke volumes. "We have it in earthbending as well, though I doubt it's for the same purposes."

"It's about the union of opposites, right? Um. Professor," Private Sukekuni added, at just the slightest glance from Sergeant Kyo.

"Correct," Tingzhe nodded, intrigued. "Where did you learn that? I had been under the impression that most of the Fire Nation considered other forms of bending... uncivilized."

"Well, ah..."

"As Colonel Piandao once said," Corporal Shoni stated, studying one of his knives' edges, "you are just as dead if they kill you with a pointy stick."

"Ah," Tingzhe said dryly. Well, and what did you expect? he told himself wryly. Yijiao was little different when he was on the Wall. The enemy is the enemy, even if you may respect them.

"Well, that and I used to listen in while General Iroh - um - showed people how to play Pai Sho," Sukekuni said in a rush. "He'd talk about other bending styles, and how they were tied in with strategies. It kind of stuck."

"Losing a week's pay tends to do that," Private Rikiya smirked.

"I did not!"

"Really." Rikiya drew it out, with a grin too broad to be anything but trouble.

"Okay, once! You would've lost a lot more."

"Oh, no." Rikiya's eyes were bright with mischief. "Because I, unlike some I may know, listen to the whispers in the wind. And those whispers say... the general has a rep." He cut a glance across at Tingzhe. "Total tile-shark. Dangerous man."

"Ooo." Private Fushi grinned, bouncing. "So you would have lost a whole month."

Rikiya didn't - quite - lose that edge of mischief. "I would not."

Kyo cleared his throat.

"...Which has totally no bearing on the lesson at hand," Rikiya said without missing a beat. "So how does that work with rocks, Professor? I mean, people move. Fire moves. Rock? Kind of doesn't."

"Which is a key point of the meditation," Tingzhe stated. "To bend earth, you must match your will against its tendency to remain in place. Rather like water, from what I have learned from Amaya; though water must be persuaded, not commanded... well, I'm certain we can discuss that at some later date." He frowned, thoughtful. "The walking meditation I know serves two main purposes. Philosophically, to consider the paradox of motion in motionlessness. More practically, to accustom a student to simply moving stone. Never mind that it is muscle and bone which do the work. What mind and body work together to accomplish, bending will do."

Jinhai was watching him, fingers slowly easing their death-grip on his robes. Risked looking straight at Kyo. "Cousin Lee never did that."

"Tight quarters on the Wani," the sergeant said, unfazed. "He probably got out of the habit." Kyo raised a gray brow. "But next time, ask your teacher, little guy."

"Huh?" Startled, Jinhai looked at Teruko. "But..."

She's a girl! was written all over his son's face, Tingzhe thought ruefully. Though at least he hadn't said it.

"So the rumors are true?" Shirong's face was calm, but already Tingzhe had begun to be familiar with that attentive twitch that was the Dai Li's Aha! I knew it! "The Fire Army has some female instructors?"

For a moment, Tingzhe imagined, you could have heard a pin drop.

Rikiya twitched first. "Some." Half a cough; half a laugh. "Yeah, I'd say - what is it, four out of five, Boss? Yeah, that's... pretty much some."

Tingzhe tried not to stare.

"Combat bending instruction's done by the Home Guard," Teruko informed Shirong. "Most of them are women or retired veterans. Sometimes both. Though not many women go for the Marines or the Navy. Private Fushi and I are kind of odd turtle-ducks." She eyed Jinhai. "Your cousin's first firebending teacher was his mother. Trust me, you would not want to cross Lady Ursa. She could singe a fly off a moon-peach at a hundred paces. I grant you she's not as scary as the general, but there's only a handful of firebenders in the world as scary as General Iroh."

"One of those being the Fire Lord," Shirong said soberly.

That brought quiet, and a handful of uneasy looks. But Teruko squared her shoulders, and nodded. "Let's put it this way, Agent Shirong. Stories say the tunnels under the capital are full of lava. They also say the Fire Lord can walk through them, any damn where he wants."

"Lieutenant," Tingzhe said mildly, hand on his son's shoulder.

"Sorry, Professor." She gestured for Jinhai to take his candle. "This isn't too far off how your father's meditation works. The point is to get used to moving fire while you're moving. Part of the trick is learning how to make the flame feed itself. So you take advantage of the breeze, and it doesn't get snuffed out."

Jinhai nodded, evidently determined to take this seriously even if Teruko was a girl. "So if it goes out, I lose?"

"This isn't a contest," Teruko said firmly. "No matter what you see Rikiya and Sukekuni doing."

Behind her, both firebenders suddenly tried to look innocent.

"Just keep it lit, and walk," she went on. "If it goes out, light it again. And keep walking." She smiled, gold eyes warm. "Trust me, it only looks boring. When you start figuring out how the wind plays into it? It gets interesting."

Candle in hand, she started walking.

Sitting on the deck by a bit of rock he'd brought up from below, Tingzhe watched.

Hmm. She has done this before.

He could see it in the way she kept an eye on Shirong and Jinhai without seeming to, only stepping in with a quiet turn more this way, or work with the wind. And, every once in a while, good.

Jinhai, Tingzhe was sure, was convinced she had eyes in the back of her head.

Nothing so mystical, the professor smirked, eyeing the one firebender sharpening blades with Shoni instead of practicing with the rest. "So you're the spotter?"

"Don't train a firebender without one," Sergeant Kyo nodded.

"Lee did," Tingzhe observed.

Kyo gave him a serious look. "He have a choice in the matter?"

"No," Tingzhe admitted, absently carving off a slice of stone to crush into sand. "And he always made certain there was someone else with him. And a sand-bucket."

"Lousy setup if you've got other options. Otherwise - not bad." Kyo gave him a considering look. "You have something against that rock, Professor?"

How best to put it? Was there any good way to put it? Likely not. "You all seem... very sane."

"For bad guys?" Kyo's smile was dry. "Blame the captain. He spent months with the general. It rubs off." An armored shrug. "Last winter this was a pretty sorry bunch. Morale was shot. We weren't even a crew. Just a bunch of sailors nobody wanted, jammed onto one ship. So if somebody screwed up, we'd be the only ones who went to the bottom."

"Ah." Ruthlessly pragmatic, Tingzhe thought. Which far better fit the skull-faced armor of his nightmares. "But Captain Jee changed that?"

"Captain's stepped into a few messes himself," Kyo observed. "Got stuck with the exiled prince. Which was about one step up from getting tossed out of the Navy the hard way."

Tingzhe frowned. "The hard way?"

"You don't want to know."

Unsettling. Which, ironically, calmed him; the Fire Nation's military was supposed to be unnerving. Not friendly.

"Captain doesn't talk about it much, but the prince made him think twice," Kyo went on. "Screw-up, maybe. But the prince worked. And if he couldn't carry out his orders the way he was supposed to... well, sometimes the prince found another way."

"Training a firebender with hot water," Tingzhe murmured.

Studying his men's form, Kyo gave him a swift glance. Raised a brow.

Amused, Tingzhe nodded.

"...We have to pick that kid's brains." Kyo chuckled wryly. "Like that, Professor. The captain wants good order and discipline, and the ship running at the end of the day. Outside of that? How we get the job done is up to us."

Tingzhe's brows went up. "So you do have reason to protect the prince."

Kyo gave him a thoughtful glance. "You teach the advanced classes, Professor?"

"Yes, actually," Tingzhe admitted. "Are there facts I lack, that would make my conclusion incorrect?"

"Nope." Kyo looked a little smug. "Though Corporal Shoni's had to pound the reasons into a few heads."

"We take oaths to protect the Fire Nation." Shoni carefully buffed one of his smaller blades. "One of our greatest tacticians, who was correct when he warned of the dangers of spirits in the North, says spirits intend to destroy our nation." Shoni looked up. "The Fire Nation is not walls, or ships, or even islands. It is our people. It is fire, and the blood of dragons. So we will follow our oaths to the Fire Lord, and defend our people." Steel slipped out of sight. "If exile is the price of that oath? We will pay it."

Stubborn as the walls of Ba Sing Se, Tingzhe thought. And clenched sand into stone, to fight that wave of longing for home.

Home is not a place. It is my family. My wife. My children. My brother. The people who made us welcome.

The Fire Nation's definition of home. Oma and Shu, what had he done?

What I had to. What I chose, for my clan. Spirits, why am I even considering this? It's far too late to back out now.

He knew why. Unfortunately.

"Something bothering you, Professor?" Kyo's polite sidelong glance was clear statement he knew something was - but he'd take none of your business for an answer.

And I know that, because I know Meixiang's silences, Tingzhe realized. I know the woman I love.

"How do you deal with it, Sergeant? With... the dragon?"

"Huh." Kyo mulled that. "Most of us don't have it as bad as the lieutenant. Definitely not as bad as the prince. Dragon-child," he elaborated at Tingzhe's raised brow. "Bad temper, hates to be backed into a corner, hates it more if they can't see the sky. Remember that, and that they're the last people you pick as a diplomat, and you're okay." A faint smile. "Best people in a fight. And they're really sweet kids. Like little kitten-owlets. Mess with their kids, though - better have your will written. If Lady Ursa'd been in the Fire Nation three years ago, we might be short one son of Azulon."

Tingzhe glanced at Shoni.

"Captain Jee has made known the circumstances of the prince's injuries," the corporal said precisely. "Of course, one cannot criticize the Fire Lord. He is the leader of the Fire Sages, who interpret Agni's will on earth."

An interesting and deliberate pause, there. "Of course," Tingzhe murmured.

"But under most circumstances, it would not be unreasonable to accept a surrender at the beginning of a duel," Shoni observed.

"Ah." Tingzhe thought furiously. "Bear in mind that I am from Ba Sing Se, and so far from certain what I do not know about the Fire Nation. A thirteen-year-old is old enough to fight, and suffer the consequences?"

"For honor," Kyo nodded. "You don't ship them out to the Earth Kingdom until they've got more training. And a bit more brains."

"I have also been told that it is a parent's duty to haul a child away from a fire too hot to handle," Tingzhe said cautiously.

"So it is," Shoni agreed. "Particularly among the great names. Of course, they cannot tolerate fools among their children. And only a fool would deliberately show disrespect to the Fire Lord."

Enough evasions. "You know he did not," Tingzhe challenged.

"We're here," Kyo said levelly.

Not good enough. "It's inhuman," Tingzhe said bitterly.

Kyo's eyes narrowed. "That what you really think, professor?"

My family. My son. Jinhai's candle had just blown out yet again; the boy looked ready to throw beeswax to the deck and stomp on it-

Then Jinhai looked at him. And heaved a dramatic sigh, and pinched the wick, determined, until it lit again.

Tingzhe smiled. Held it, until Jinhai turned away, before surrendering to that awful, bone-weary worry. "I... don't know."

"Looks like a good kid," Kyo said softly.

"He was a surprise," Tingzhe admitted. "Even before the firebending." Belatedly, a thought struck him. "Do you have children?"

"Had." Old grief, worn as wind-smoothed stone. "Bandits."

"I'm sorry." He was, Tingzhe admitted to himself with some surprise. Enemy soldier the sergeant might have been, but loss... that, they had in common.

Even if he's not human. Do dragons go to war? Betray one another? Grieve their children?

He didn't know. He desperately wanted to know.

Shoni snorted. "What the sergeant is not saying, is that you have said nothing that would require such a long face, Professor. That was not a request for aid. His vendetta has been carried out, and is over." Shoni rolled his eyes. "Despite possible orders that the situation might be considered too delicate to pursue, as the bandits had retreated deep into the Earth Kingdom, almost to Omashu." A sharp-edged smile. "Almost. But not quite."

Tingzhe eyed them both.

Kyo gave him a wry grin. "And now you know why my squad's on this ship."

"Years ago," Shoni sniffed, waving it off.

"Command doesn't forget a whole team going AWOL," Kyo said dryly. "No matter how well Fushi and Rikiya cooked the books." He scowled.

"They would do it again, and you know it, sir," Shoni replied. "There is law, and there are orders. And there is what is right."

As there had been in Ba Sing Se, Tingzhe reflected. With the Dai Li.

Kyo shook off memories, and straightened. "Ought to stop second-guessing yourself, Professor. Especially when you're right. We're not all human."

Tingzhe tensed.

"We are hunters, like our kin," Shoni nodded. "You who bend earth, or air, or water - what you seek exists, of itself, and is sufficient. But fire must burn."

"I've seen you create-" Tingzhe cut himself off, recalling Lee's lessons. "Of course. If there is nothing to burn, then you fuel it with your own chi." And the reserves that must take, the sheer amount of energy drawn from a living body; spirits, it wasn't-

It isn't human.

"How do you reconcile that in yourselves?" Tingzhe wondered. "How... what must that first firebender have been thinking, to join with something - not of our world?"

Shoni and Kyo traded a look. "If the tales are true," Shoni offered, "it is humans who are not of this world."

"We... what?"

"That's the old stories," Kyo nodded. "This is the spirits' playground. The dragons' world. Sky bison, badger-moles, canyon crawlers - they live here, and the spirits look after them. Then one day, humans showed up. And not all the spirits were happy about it."

"Showed up," Tingzhe echoed thoughtfully.

"It is a story," Shoni shrugged. "Perhaps the ancients only meant that humans were created later than other creatures. The old stories do not always make sense..." He trailed off, at the slight shushing motion of Tingzhe's hand.

"Professor?" Kyo ventured, after a few minutes' silence.

"I am an archaeologist, by training," Tingzhe began. "I do much of my work in archives, true, but I also do a fair amount of digging in the dirt. When I was a young man, before the war had surrounded us, I made several long trips outside Ba Sing Se." He paused, gathering his thoughts. "You can trace a town's growth in the earth. Below streets are centuries of trails, and below houses old farms, and below even that traces of fish-drying posts, or nut storage pits, or... spirits, any number of things. But Ba Sing Se... the city is old. Very, very old. The most ancient parts of the city are caverns deep within the earth itself, and in those caves-" He had to hesitate. "Understand, we are earthbenders, and much may have been reshaped over the millennia. But I believe I know the signs of such work. And if what I saw in those caverns was accurate - Ba Sing Se did not begin as a settlement. It began as a city, a tremendous city, all at once."

Silence. Shoni rubbed at the back of his neck, as if the hairs there were standing straight up.

"I could be wrong," Tingzhe observed. "I would dearly love to spend time in one of your archives."

"Ask the prince," Kyo advised, after mulling that over a moment. "We've got what the Earth King handed over. I'd bet he'd love to add to the hoard... here he comes." He waved a hand toward Lieutenant Teruko, that even Tingzhe could see meant look out.

"Sir." Teruko brought the walk to a halt as Zuko approached, inclining her head.

"Carry on," Zuko said raggedly.

Spirits. He looks awful, Tingzhe thought. Not quite as bad as that frightening day the young man had laughed about his own maiming. But bad enough.

"Jinhai needs a break." Teruko shooed the boy Tingzhe's way. "Rest with your father. Get warmed up. Meditation's a lot harder than it looks."

Privately amused, Tingzhe wrapped robed arms around his youngest. Who was a bit chilled, by his shivers. Neatly done.

"What happened," Shirong asked bluntly, "and how lethal is it likely to be?"

Zuko blinked, as if the question had come from far away. Shook himself, like shedding water. "I think if my grandfather and my uncle decide to maim each other, I'm going to let them. And pick up the pieces afterward."

The marines stiffened. "They're fighting, sir?" Teruko asked swiftly.

"Arguing, I would guess," Shirong stated. "What happened?"

Zuko opened his mouth. closed it. Clenched fists, with just a spark of flame, and took a deep breath. "My mother's alive."

"Um... yes, sir," Teruko said cautiously. "We knew that."

...Oh dear, Tingzhe winced.

"You knew that," Zuko echoed, edged and chill. "Well. It's nice to know all of Byakko knew something no one told me for six years."

"Daddy?" Jinhai whispered against his chest.

"Shh," Tingzhe murmured. "He's not angry at you."

"You didn't...?" Teruko paled. "Sir. She's Shidan's daughter. Your mother. You'll know if she dies."

That made the scholar in Tingzhe prick up his ears. They know? How? Certainly, nobles and powerful earthbenders felt when another name had to be carved in the family tablets. But how on earth could that work with fire?

"No one told me that."

Simple words. Controlled words. But the rage and grief beat against him like waves, and Tingzhe had to catch his breath.

"Sir. You'll know." Teruko held out a hand, palm up and empty. "A lot of us aren't that lucky. But strong firebenders? When one of our clan's fires die, when their spirit leaves us... we know." She lowered her voice. "No one ever told you, sir?"

For a moment, a bitter smile shadowed Zuko's face; then calm settled like snow. "Thank you, Lieutenant. It's good to understand what my uncle went through six years ago."

"Sir?" Teruko had the wary air of someone sure she'd missed something.

A few feet away, Tingzhe caught Shirong's wince. What? Why?

In the Fire Nation, Shirong and Meixiang had both told him, so much hinges on what you don't say.

If he says General Iroh suffered six years ago, he implies he did not, Tingzhe realized. From all I can tell he adored his cousin, so they would have been clan- oh.

Oh, indeed. And damn. Shirong had told their family of that battle atop the train, in terse but vivid detail. How could anyone who'd lived through that believe-?

Zuko stepped back from that hand, and nodded. "As you were."

Shirong's eyes narrowed. "I believe the lieutenant was about to start sparring practice."

Stalking away, Zuko didn't slow down. "That would be why I'm clearing the deck. Enjoy."

"I see there are distinct disadvantages to a chain of command," Shirong mused. "If you don't come back here, I'm going to start pegging rocks at you."

Marines tensed. Didn't move, as Teruko raised an eyebrow.

Zuko stopped. Took a deliberate breath. "I've read Captain Jee's file on the lieutenant, Agent Shirong. You should take advantage of skilled instruction when it's available." Jaw set, he kept walking.

"I can't believe I'm going to have to do this," Shirong grumbled, heading for Tingzhe's rock. "Professor? I suggest you take cover."

"Sukekuni," Kyo stated. "Rikiya."

"Blast shields-"

"-Extra ammo, on it!"

Before he could blink, Tingzhe found himself and Jinhai yanked behind an iron plate Sukekuni had pulled up and locked into place. With a rattle that sounded like - why was Rikiya dumping coal on the deck?

Oh. My.

"Professor," Sukekuni panted, the panel was not light, "are Dai Li all crazy?"

Stone gloves whistled through air; there was a sudden, snarling yell-

Tingzhe watched flashes of fire over iron, and smiled, even as his heart raced. "I wouldn't be at all surprised."

It's quiet, Jee thought darkly, blowing warm air on ink to dry it before tucking the ship's log back into its niche on the bridge. Tobito had the helm, Lieutenant Sadao was making sure everyone aboard had at least a corner to call their own, Captain Donghai had just returned one of their hawks to affirm the fleet didn't have any problems a few drunken nights in port couldn't solve, and Prince Zuko was handling the dragon.

...Which made him shake his head. Again. A dragon. On his ship.

It's quiet. Too quiet. I wonder what Lieutenant Teruko-

Fire boomed.

Ah, yes. There.

On the one hand, if he didn't see it, he didn't know about it. Officially. On the other, Sergeant Kyo's crew had been quietly effective in persuading some of his more stubborn sailors to actually consider the realities of the prince's situation. If they'd suddenly come up against something that required a less subtle approach, they might need a hand.

Or, they could be just practicing.

Curiosity fought common sense, and won with the third fireball.

Retreating to the rear of the command tower, Jee peered past smokestacks to the stern. Coal. On my decks? I don't care what Rikiya says he needed it for, this time the squad is scrubbing the plates down with used ink-brushes- oh.

A sweep of green-clad arms, and a coal wave intercepted a fireball. Crushed together in a ball to snuff out sparks, then surged like a scorpion-viper after the firebender who'd challenged it.

The motion was blurred by green robes instead of red armor, but in that leap and twist away, Jee recognized the form he'd seen the prince drill a hundred times.

Always the same problem. He'll break his root in a heartbeat to get into the air.

Yet against an earthbender, the air was where Zuko apparently wanted to be. Which didn't quite make sense-

Watching Shirong fight, Jee let out a hiss of breath. I'm a fool.

What had Teruko and General Iroh told him about Lady Bei Fong? She read the ground.

Barefoot soldiers, Jee thought grimly. I fight from the sea; I've always stayed as far off Earth Kingdom soil as I can. But the prince fights on land.

Earthbenders draw their strength from the ground. Their chi is the heart of the earth, and they move that energy up. From their roots.

The farther you were from your enemy's source of chi, the more of his own strength he had to spend to strike. That was how earthbender prisons worked at all; keep them away from earth. Keep them weak.

Feet on the ground can be trapped, Jee realized, watching Zuko execute a heel-spin to sweep away bonds of coal like paper. A stance that touches earth - or metal - can be felt.

Three years exiled from the Fire Nation. Crossing the world on a quest everyone knew was hopeless. Crossing the Earth Kingdom, which meant fighting earthbenders.

Intrigued, Jee settled in to watch.

When this is over, Shirong thought, skidding aside from yet another slicing blast of fire, I owe Rikiya a drink.

He'd proposed this little experiment to Lieutenant Teruko with the idea that he'd just be using the rocks scattered on the deck. After which she'd given him a look generally reserved for drunks and small children with hammers, and proceeded to outline exactly what level of lethal skill one could expect from an imperial firebender.

...Eep.

Hence the coal. And stern advice to keep Zuko at a distance. Coupled with strict instructions to yield if the fight turned ugly. Jee would never let either of them live it down if he were sloppy enough to-

Ack!

One moment the young firebender had been poised, ready to jump away from fists of stone yet again. The next, Zuko's sliding skid took Shirong's feet out from under him in a wave of flame.

Get his ankles, immobilize - uh-oh.

Lethal feet whipped out of reach, as bare hands slapped the deck and torqued his opponent away in a spin that looked oddly familiar-

Splash.

Should have expected that, Shirong reflected, gripped in ice. Why am I still surprised?

Rolling to his feet, Zuko deliberately slowed his breathing. Lifted a hand, and let it sink gracefully down, melting ice away. Waited for the agent to stand, and bowed.

Shaking off a few stray drops, Shirong grinned wryly. And prepared to do something even more lethal than sparring with an angry firebender. "As I've been trying to tell the lieutenant, when it comes to bending, you're fearless. If it's anything but fire."

Zuko stiffened.

"Lieutenant Teruko's trying to help," Shirong said quickly. "So sit on that temper. I know it takes a lot of sitting on, but listen."

Please listen. I know I'm right. But we can't help if you won't believe.

A slow jerk of a nod. "Lieutenant," Zuko said stiffly. "Explain."

Teruko stood straight and correct. "Sir. I think you should hear Agent Shirong out."

...Oh, thanks.

At least he had Zuko's attention. "I was sixteen when the last Earth King was assassinated," Shirong stated, painfully aware of listening ears. This wasn't going to be easy. "Just a trainee, called out when the city went dark and everything went insane." Screams, running in the streets, fires that burned green without ever casting light...

Breathe. It's over.

"I ended up separated from my mentor, which was bad. But I kept trying to do my job. Which turned out to be worse."

Pale hands, a sweep of hair like black silk, and elegant weeping...

"It was a fountain square. Everyone else was running from... well, all kinds of things. But I stopped. I saw a woman sitting on the bench, rocking her baby, numb to the world. Or so it seemed." Breathe. Go on. "She saw me. Just- came into focus, eyes waking up. I was sure she'd snap out of it and start moving with the rest of the civilians. Instead, she put her... bundle down on the bench, took a biwa off her shoulder, and started playing. So I went over to talk to her." Shirong paused, looking back on that long-ago stupidity. How could he have missed her hair, her too-fine, too-revealing clothing? The way the bundle squirmed, like no human form could move?

Young and stupid. It happens.

Gold eyes were focused on him. Listening.

"In fact, she was playing for her children," Shirong said dryly. Remembering shadows of a sharp-edged smile, coils of trapping silk, and pain. "Lots and lots of little, eight-legged... offspring."

"Oh, boy," Fushi whispered, eyes wide. "Jorōgumo!"

"We call them xiāo yāo jīng," Shirong said, trying not to shake at the memory. "The spider-woman. She wrapped me up in silk over water before I could blink, and then - you know what spiderlings do with prey."

It's over. Put it away. Do not think about it.

"I got lucky, for the last time in my life." Shirong tried to stuff the nightmares back into their cage, remembering after. "Long Feng had secured a guard around Earth King Kuei, and was leading teams out to smash some of the worst intruding spirits. He found me before I'd been quite drained dry." Keep going. It's daylight. Nothing can touch you here. "I don't know how he handled the xiāo yāo jīng, but I know it was lethal. I felt her fangs pull out of my spirit. That's the last thing I remember of that night." Just a little more. You can do this. "The next I knew, I was waking up in Amaya's garden at sunrise. There were too many injured, you see; she had to stuff us in everywhere..." He swallowed. "I've never seen anything as beautiful as that dawn."

Iroh thinks La's been watching Zuko since he was born. How long have you been watching me, Agni?

"Amaya's good, but there are limits," Shirong went on, voice level. "I carry those scars, and the death that almost had me. And I would have done anything for Long Feng. Not just because he saved my life. Because I know what's out there, I've fought it - and he saved our city from those nightmares." The agent's hands were trembling. He forced them still. "For Long Feng, I would have faced any foe. Even Azula. But to this day, I can't hear a biwa without breaking into a cold sweat."

There. My nightmare, spread before you like silk for painting.

What will you do, young friend?

"I'm sorry," Zuko whispered.

"Don't be sorry," Shirong said firmly. "I refuse to let the fear rule me. Ever. But it's a scar on my soul. It's a weakness in my defenses, and I have to plan for it. I flinch. And that has nothing to do with courage. It's pain, and the memory of pain. Instinct remembers the threat of death, and tells us to run before our minds can catch up. Before we can think, and realize that running is the last thing we should do." His eyes narrowed. "And it's worse when our minds and feelings are already at war. I was trained to help and protect civilians. So I did. And it nearly killed me. And you..." Shirong eyed the young firebender. Dragon-child. "You say you're predators. Guanyin as my witness, you've reminded me of pygmy pumas since we've met. And when a cub makes a parent angry? They go limp. They don't fight."

Zuko was pale. Trembling.

"Everyone I've spoken to, everyone, says surrender was a viable option," Shirong said quietly. Easy. Easy. "It should have worked. But it didn't." Please listen. Just a little longer. "And because it didn't, because the best decision you could make failed - you don't trust your judgment. Not in firebending." He took a deep breath. "I imagine your great-grandfather never encountered anything so crushing to the spirit. Even when he was dying, he knew there was something he could do."

Zuko flinched. But held his ground, pale gold wide and wild.

"You're stronger than Kuzon," Shirong went on. Agni, if you care, let him hear me. "He burned to the last, until he burned out. You were crushed into ashes. But you still fight. You still face firebenders. Spirits, you still faced your sister."

"There isn't any choice," Zuko ground out.

"There's always a choice," Shirong disagreed. "You're just stubborn enough to convince everyone else you don't even think about other options." He paused. "Even your uncle."

"Uncle's not responsible for my failures!"

Oh good, Shirong reflected, deliberately ignoring the flames sprouting from clenched fists. I finally got him mad enough to fight.

...Terrific.

But a threat wasn't an attack. Not yet. "It's not a failure to be afraid of what almost killed you!" Shirong snarled back. "It's instinct!" He let out a huff of breath, and shook off the fury. "It's human."

A flat, deadly golden look.

Ah, yes. Human is a bit tricky here, isn't it?

"I don't know if this will help," Shirong admitted, avoiding the problem. "But if we're up against everything Kyoshi and Sozin set in motion, and who knows what else... you say Lieutenant Teruko's a good instructor. Well, show me."

Now it was Teruko's look that promised murder. Shirong smothered a chuckle.

"He's got a point, sir," Teruko said steadily. "General Iroh's one of the best, when it comes to mountain style. Wave style, though... I haven't practiced it much for a few years, but I can help you double-check your stances." Her lips twitched into a wry smile. "Don't take this the wrong way, but Lord Kuzon was a bit taller."

Don't laugh, Shirong told himself firmly. Eyeing the rest of the marines, to find Kyo had beaten him to it; every firebender looked as if butter wouldn't melt in their mouths.

"I'm just sorry you never got a chance to meet him," Teruko went on. "Even if he steered clear of Fire Lord Azulon, he would have sent a bloodknot for the welcoming."

Zuko blinked. And seemed to deflate, as if all the anger had drained away. "Oh."

"Bloodknot?" Shirong asked. Noting he wasn't the only one who looked confused; Rikiya had a carefully bland look, while Sukekuni was openly bewildered.

Fushi, on the other hand, was bouncing on her toes, grin wide and eager. "Old family tradition. You don't hear much about it, but everybody does it--"

"Not anymore," Kyo said flatly. "The history books call it one of those outdated superstitions. Which is probably why you two never heard of it." His gaze lingered just a little longer than it had to on Rikiya.

There's a story there, Shirong thought, as Rikiya looked guiltily away. The way he acts, just a little too casual around power... ambitious relatives?

"That's just wrong," Fushi insisted. "Family's important." She turned a hopeful look on Shirong. "You got welcomed into your clan, right?"

"Yes," Shirong acknowledged. "It was... very odd." Blood and wine and a snap of something locking into his own spirit, a certainty he'd never be lost again...

Oh.

That's what comes from being a lone agent so long. You forget about family. Shirong smirked at himself at the irony. We spend so much of ourselves doing our duty to protect the city from spirits, we forget others' duties to the spirits. Especially our ancestors.

So the Fire Nation tied together clan spirits with blood instead of ancestral tablets. Why was he not surprised?

I wonder. The elders named me dead when they knew how unlucky I was. When I joined Wen... did I die twice?

"You send a bloodknot if you can't make it to the party," Fushi shrugged. "Blood and hair, and they can just burn it and add the ashes. And everything's set."

"Dragons do it with scales," Teruko stated. "Or so I've heard." She gave Zuko a sympathetic look. "Sorry, sir. I keep forgetting your mother had to be careful about what she said. Or did. Parents' fires - you're born with that link. The rest of the clan takes some work."

"Which is Guanyin's mercy," Shirong said bluntly. "We lost a lot of people on that night. Plenty of them nobles. If Kuei had been made known to all his kin's ancestral tablets before then... there are good reasons to keep children from the spirits until they're old enough to handle it. Even family spirits."

Zuko frowned.

Shirong raised an eyebrow. And the other, all but feeling the wince as the marines went silent. "Was it something I said?"

"Um." Sukekuni cleared his throat. "How old did you say the Avatar was?"

Shirong blinked. And swallowed hard, as a sudden warm breeze of summer river-mud curdled his stomach. Oh, damn.

"Spirits." Plop went a pebble into the numb stillness of the bay. "Sheesh." Another plop, as Toph scuffed the fuzziness of sand. "The Avatar must concentrate to properly sense creatures of the world beyond!" Done echoing Tao's grim tones, Toph rolled her eyes. "Duh. So maybe this is new. So maybe he needs some quiet to get started. But he's a bender. He can't concentrate when people are flinging rocks at him, he's gonna be toast. Graaah!"

Splash!

Okay, that lump of rock she could still feel in the water. Though it was muted. Like having someone step between her and a fire. You knew it had to still be there, but it didn't feel warm.

Didn't matter. She was plenty hot enough for everyone.

"So we were distracting Aang," Toph grumbled to herself. "Well, duh! We're his friends. We're kind of supposed to. How's Twinkletoes gonna save the world if he's all serious all the time?"

She'd seen Aang serious in the desert. And up against the lake serpent. It wasn't good.

"Sokka," Toph declared to the splash of waves. "Tao ought to be teaching Snoozles about the spirits."

Only Tao didn't think Sokka ought to have anything to do with spirits. After all, he wasn't a bender.

Which had ticked Katara off enough to make her join Sokka on his latest hunting trip. Summer meant snow-berries at the South Pole, and Katara swore she'd smelled something like that on the forest wind.

So Tao had what he wanted. Aang, with no distractions, while the Water Tribe was off being responsible their way.

Which had left Toph to loudly declare sitting around while Aang trained was not her idea of fun, and she'd head out to train herself.

And she was. Already, she had just a little better idea of where rocks ended up in water. She might have an even better one, if she'd just been focusing on the water.

Toes stretched into the sand, Toph felt back towards camp, where Aang and Tao were still sitting while Momo probably flitted through the air. Appa was a solid, breathing weight behind them, heart slow and steady. Looks okay.

Not like she didn't trust Tao. She did. Mostly. But Tao was an old guy, he was a teacher, and Aang stuck to teachers like iron on loadstone. It was kind of scary.

And she was being snippy about Tao, and she knew she was being snippy, because she couldn't come out and ask what she really wanted to know.

Is Sparky okay? Is Uncle?

She'd talked Sokka into asking his dad to spread the word around the Earth Kingdom people helping them that they wanted news from back in the city. Wasn't hard. If Sparky had pulled off something crazy, Sokka wanted to know just as much as she did. So far, the word coming back from Ba Sing Se was stunned with a side of what-were-they-drinking?

Depending on who you asked, the Fire Nation had gone crazier and incinerated the whole trading fleet, families included. Or a swarm of ghosts had destroyed the Earth King's palace. Or a flock of Air Nomad survivors had unleashed a wind storm to punish the Earth Kingdom and the Fire Princess alike. Or the Earth King had forced allegiance from Wan Shi Tong to spirit half the city's army mysteriously away.

Having dealt with the stupid owl-spirit's sinking library, Toph kind of doubted that last one.

But the one that confuzzled Chief Hakoda the most - and still made Toph want to bust out laughing - was the story that, drawn by the Avatar's command, a rampaging northern water spirit had fallen hopelessly in love with the palace specter, and vowed to do battle with her enemies until Ba Sing Se was once more a free city. Complete with flashing dao, spirit-masks, ghost fires, haunted ice-sheathed trains, and all kinds of sneaky derring-do that included spiriting the Earth King right out of Azula's claws.

Oh, she'd laughed herself sick on that one.

Though feeling Aang's shocked recoil at dao, masks, and sneaky? Not so funny.

Whichever of the stories were or weren't true, none of them even whispered that Zuko or Uncle had turned up dead. Toph was counting on that being good news.

You hear me, Sparky? That better be good news. Stay in one piece. And give 'em all hell.

So. If Zuko had figured out all new ways to give the spirits a headache, she'd better figure out her own.

Keeps Aang on his toes. And it's fun.

"Salt in water," Toph muttered, dipping her own toes into that endless, fish and seaweed-smelly emptiness. "Must be really tiny salt."

There were really tiny earth-bits in metal, too. And she'd made that work.

Yeah, well, I could see those.

She'd bent side by side with Katara on that sludge from the drill. But same deal. Lots of water, but plenty of earth to see. This? Was like standing on the edge of a cliff, with no way to know what she might hit on the way down.

Sparky can wrestle hot glass. There's gotta be a way to do this.

She knew how to do earth. You out-stubborned it until both of you moved. So she'd been trying to out-stubborn the whole bay.

It wasn't working.

Which was ticking her off. She could taste the salt kicked up in the air every time wind dashed the waves up on shore-

Licking her lips, Toph frowned. Salt.

She bent what she "saw". Whether that was rocks in the air or sludge on the ground. But she couldn't see this.

Zuko couldn't see fire in hot water, either. So how'd he do it?

Maybe if she just got a little closer to the water...

Footsteps without feet frantically tangled with hers, pushing her back and away.

Boots? What the-

A slight tremor in the slope of the beach into black. Barely a whisper through her toes.

Toph slammed sand into a solid dome over them, gritting her teeth as something pounded on the sandstone shell. Not fast, but hard; like standing in the raging torrent when the skies tore open that others called a killing storm.

The world went gray.

Boots was shivering against her, a quiet rattle like feathers snapping over each other. Toph felt those shivers tremble the sand under them; a faint shimmer, against the pounding gray of water fuzzing every vibration of the earth. Like the desert, but worse. This wasn't just the way sand shifted instead of carrying a steady feel. Something was making the world blind, water pounding in a headache like iron spikes, seeping up through her toes in chilling static that made Boots squeak like leather rubbed wrong-

Oh no you don't!

Toph reached for earth, and scooped their whole shell inland. Stomping sludgy sand, driving that icy water down and away-

It surged back, a wave of freezing empty that sucked down her toes. Sucked down the world.

Can't see can't - focus, Toph!

Reach, and yank, and reach-

Air slashed through gray and sandstone; in the dust on her hands, she felt Sokka scrabble through the hole. "Toph, come on!"

Strong hands wrapped to catch a razor-sharp boomerang yanked her out, slinging her over his shoulder with Water Tribe swears. She shivered in the black, biting her lip not to yell that she needed earth, she needed to see, where were her toes-

There was yelling. A lot of yelling. Aang from one way behind them. Katara and Tao from another. And a roaring, like waves and storm and something even bigger than a badger-mole.

"Put me down." Toph tried to yell; winced when it came out more of a whimper. She was the greatest earthbender in the world; she was not a whiny girl, ever! "Put me down! We gotta help them-"

"Tao told me to get you up here," Sokka said, just as rock-stubborn. "I'm getting you up here- ow!"

Sissy. She hadn't bit him that hard.

The rocks up here were hard and dry. At least that was what her hands said as she landed. Her feet gave her just thumps of gray. "I can't see!"

"Yeah, I bet." Sokka didn't sound mad at all. Just worried.

Which made her gut try to tie itself into knots. Toph knew just how mad she'd be if Sokka bit her. This was bad.

"We need to - darn it, you don't have time for that." Dropping to the rocks by her, Sokka picked up the lumps on the end of her legs and tucked them under his tunic. "Brrr!"

It burned. Like walking out in winter snow. Toph swallowed the pain and listed to the rumble and roar of water, earth, and air. "What are they fighting?"

"...You don't want to know."

"Sokka!"

"Toph? Right now, I wish I was blind."

Familiar trilling as Momo landed nearby. Which meant he thought it was too scary to go up in the air. "What's out there?"

"It's big," Sokka said at last, as thundering splashes went on. "Big as a Fire Navy ship. This huge mass of red arms in the water, with suckers and teeth..." He shuddered. "Don't think I'll ever look at pentapuses the same again."

Toph swallowed. "That big."

"Way big. And way sneaky," Sokka said grimly. "If Katara hadn't seen it wave an arm out of the water..." He bent, and blew on her toes. "You feel that?"

"Yeah," Toph gritted out. Ow.

"Good." Cloth rustled, as Sokka wrapped his tunic around her feet. "Stay put, okay? I'm going to get a fire going."

Toph bit her lip. "I miss Uncle," she whispered.

Maybe not quiet enough; she felt Sokka's pause in the earth under her hand. "Right now?" Sokka admitted. "I miss him too."

Toph tracked the fight as well as she could, from hisses and sliding splashes and the trembling of the shore as waves smashed it. Which wasn't good at all - but she thought she'd feel something coming fast enough to shield Sokka. Maybe.

Boots was a mist-touch of leather and feathers against her arm, pressing close whenever one of the massive waves struck. "Thanks, little guy," she murmured.

Slipper-soft stomp. Nudging, like wisps of koala-wool over her arm.

"Yeah." Toph swallowed bitterness. "I guess that was stupid."

"Kind of, yeah," Sokka said impatiently, striking spark rocks. "What were you thinking? Nobody goes near shore alone. What, you want a tiger-seal to eat you... Toph?"

Toph scrunched her fingers in sand. She was not going to cry. No matter how much her feet hurt. "What's a tiger-seal?"

Flames crackled as tinder caught; she felt wisps of warmth as Sokka stacked the fire with fuel. "Right. You lived in the hills." He helped her shift closed to the fire, partly unwrapping cloth so his tunic funneled warm air over her feet. "They swim, they eat fish, they only come out of the water when they want to warm up or show off to their girls, and they're about as big as an ostrich-horse. Most of the time, they leave people alone."

Toph felt queasy. "And when they don't?"

"They've got teeth like a leopard-shark, and a temper like Zuko's," Sokka said bluntly. "Get between them and the ocean? About all that's left of you is a bloody mess in the snow."

"Oh." The noise had died down, though she still heard Aang yelling at something. "Okay. Scared of water now."

"That's not what I - argh." Sokka grumbled something rude under his breath. "Toph. You're blind. Most of the time, that works out okay. Sometimes? Not that great." He sighed. "Just let us help, okay? We're Water Tribe. We kind of know things about water."

Splash. And spreading silence.

Footsteps, getting more solid as her feet warmed. And then Katara was there in a sliding skid, moving cool water over heels and toes in a swoosh that eased away the pain. "Thanks," Toph sighed.

"What did it do?" Katara pounced. "It almost feels like frostbite, but - not exactly. And it's kind of... mucky."

"Chi drain." Tao's staff tapped the ground. "Kamuiy know human weapons can't harm them. They move quickly to thwart that which can." He sighed; tired, but still gentle. "Now do you see why you must learn to sense the spirits, Avatar Aang? Those spirits and spirit-creatures who wish your aid will try to attract your attention, if they can. Those that seek to do harm will conceal themselves. I knew the fēnglàngshāo haunted this bay, and still I could not sense it until it was nearly too late."

"I understand," Aang said, resigned. Jittered on his toes. "But Toph didn't do anything!"

"Hey!" Toph stomped a still-chilly heel, almost knocking Twinkletoes off his feet before he jumped. "I was getting myself out of there, if you didn't see it."

"No! That's not what I mean!" Aang protested. "I mean, you didn't do anything to that spirit!" He hesitated. "Did you?"

"Hello?" Toph sputtered. "I was just there!" Playing with the water, yeah - but she hadn't done anything.

"Have more faith in your friends," Tao advised. "It is not unusual for a human to offend the spirits without ever intending harm. Unfortunately." Curiosity crept into his voice. "You said you meant to train. Why train there?"

Toph sucked in a breath to explain - or complain, it wouldn't have mattered where she trained if he'd just said there was a nasty tentacle-thing lurking in the water - and got a mouthful of smoke instead. She wrinkled her nose, trying not to sneeze. Gah. Tastes like ashes.

"Sand makes her feet see fuzzy," Katara stepped in. "She's been trying to fix that... Toph?"

Ashes. Toph licked her lips, and sniffed the air. Dirt's kind of like ashes, sometimes. And she knew where the smoke was, she could feel it warm against her skin as she reached over the fire.

Air is delicate.

Hand in the smoke, she slowly curled her fingers. Like a wasp-snail, gingerly unfurling its wings from their shell.

Barely breathing, she pulled the eddy of smoke to her.

"Whoa." Sokka's voice was all grinning teeth.

"Guanyin's mercy, no!"

Toph's reflexes had been honed in dozens of Rumbles. She countered the sudden stony trap rumbling around her with slaps that crumbled spikes into dust. "Hey! What gives?"

"And you call yourself the Avatar's teacher?" Tao said sternly. "How dare you- young lady!"

That, to an all too familiar crackle of ice now trapping him in place. Toph grinned at Katara.

"Don't you young lady me," Katara said angrily. "What'd you do that for? She's still hurt!"

"She bent smoke," Aang said, stunned. "Toph, you... how... why?"

"Ignorance, I do hope," Tao said grimly. "Or else she does not care that her teachers told her it is forbidden."

"Forbidden?" The swing of Sokka's shoulders spoke of a skeptical guy reassuring himself just where Boomerang was. "That was totally cool!"

"It is totally lethal," Tao said sternly. "To Toph." He twisted against ice. "If you would be so kind?"

Reluctantly, Katara beckoned her ice into water and away. "What do you mean, it could hurt Toph? It was just smoke."

"It was trespassing," Aang said solemnly. "He's right, Toph. You can't do that again."

Make me, Twinkletoes. "Why not?" Toph shot back. "I'm a bender. I bend."

"But you were born an earthbender, and it is earth which claims your power," Taos stated. "To attempt to vest it elsewhere is arrogant, and an insult. Both to the spirit whose element grants your power, and the one in whose realm you have trespassed. The spirits take revenge for such insults. Usually, that is fatal." He shook his head. "Warrior Sui, one of Avatar Kyoshi's closest friends in her training, was a renowned earthbender. But he tampered with water to save her life, when she had not yet completed her training to face Chin the Conqueror. And no healer could save him. He simply wasted away." Tao sighed. "Some disliked how Avatar Kyoshi enforced the separation of our nations, but she did it out of mercy. So no bender should ever be tempted to violate the spirits' wishes." Staff leaning against his shoulder, he spread an empty hand. "The Avatar, and only the Avatar, is granted the right to call on all the spirits' elements. The rest of us... we are only human, Toph."

"But Aang and I worked together to bend clouds," Katara protested. "And Toph and I bent the drill-sludge. Nothing happened to us."

"Then you've been fortunate beyond belief," Tao stated. "Toph, please, think of your friends. Bending water, you may have escaped harm; it's near kin to earth, as fire is. But to bend your opposite--"

"I wasn't bending air!" Toph burst out. "I was bending the smoke! The ashes, you dummy!"

Tao drew in a sharp breath. "The... ashes."

"Really really tiny ashes!" Toph shot back at him. "Like really really tiny bits of earth in metal. And I can bend it, because I am the greatest earthbender in the world!"

In the quiet after the echoes, she could feel Appa's heartbeat.

"She really is," Katara said; with a shift of her weight that spoke of her gaze not quite challenging Tao. "She took on most of the Earth King's guards when we raided his palace."

"Shook the whole place out of whack," Sokka added. "You should have seen the looks on those guys' faces. One minute they're all ranked on the steps; the next, they're headed downhill to the moat. The hard way."

"Bending earth in smoke," Tao mused. Sighed, and rubbed tired eyes. "Be careful, Toph. If you're right, Oma and Shu will watch over you, and all will be well. If not..."

"She'll be fine," Katara insisted. "Right, Aang?" She paused. "Aang?"

"...I don't know."

"But you're--" Katara tensed, swallowing words. "Right. You said at the North Pole, no one taught you about being the Avatar. But Tao's a shaman." She shifted her head that way. "Don't you know?"

"Even if I knew how the Avatar was to be properly trained, which I do not, such training might be less than accurate now," Tao stated. "The world is out of balance. The spirits are angry. Old agreements may not hold, and old alliances may be broken. All I can do is teach the Avatar what I know of the spirits, and pray."

"No," Sokka said bluntly. "That's not all you can do. You can teach the rest of us, too."

Tao's feet had the gripping toes of a frown. "Sokka, you are a gifted fighter, but you are not--"

"Where we came from, the whole village held ceremonies for the spirits," Sokka interrupted. "And Katara was the only bender left. Why can't you teach us?"

"It's not tradition."

Sokka flung up his arms. "What's tradition got to do with saving the world?"

Ooo, not good. Toph winced, feeling Tao's heart rate pick up in stirrings of anger. "Uh, Sokka? Tradition's kind of... well, everything. Almost."

Katara growled under her breath. "The Fire Nation doesn't care about people's traditions-"

Appa sniffed the air, and surged to his feet with a rumble.

Aang was at his head in a bound. "What's wrong, buddy?"

"I guess he knows coal smoke when he smells it." Sokka's hand was raised to shade his eyes, as he peered out over the emptiness of water. "Fire Nation, heading this way!"

Oh boy, Toph thought. Time to make a hole and pull it in after them.

"What? No!" Katara's hand fell to her waterskin. "They couldn't have gotten past Dad-" Her voice cut off, anger fading into a laugh. "I don't believe it!"

"Um, guys, hiding?" Toph pointed out.

"No, it's okay!" Sokka was doing a mad little dance. "It's Dad!"

"Chief Hakoda seized a Fire Nation ship," Tao murmured, also making no move to hide. "Amazing man."

Yeah, he is, Toph thought soberly. But not as amazing as the airbender bouncing happily around her.

She was glad Chief Hakoda was back. He was a great guy. In a Fire Nation ship.

Clue, Aang. How do you think he got it?

Chapter End Notes

If anyone's interested in poking into history in general, particularly with an archaeological viewpoint added, I recommend any book by Brian Fagan. Fish on Friday is of particular interest to those curious about the effects of holidays on culture and history.

The history with Sui came from a reviewer suggestion on just what would have happened if Kyoshi met someone who became a yāorén, and died of it. Thanks! Yes, Tao is wrong about what happens when you bend a foreign element, and why. The knowledge of the yāorén has been lost a long time.

On Blue and Orange Morality in reference to dragons: Very cool entry, people. Very cool. I liked this a lot more than I anticipated from the first version that went up. Yes, exactly; Zuko's instincts are a mess, and the poor guy knows it.

In Shidan's case, there are two main reasons he didn't help, despite actually liking some Air Nomads. First, because he and Kuzon were Up To Something that kept them very busy. Remember that in canon Sozin's actions caught almost the whole world off guard, and the bulk of the massacre was carried out in one day, much of it thousands of miles from dragon territory. The vast majority of dragons couldn't have helped whether or not they'd wanted to. Second - Kuzon, Ran, and a host of other people were dying. Byakko goes, Shiroto goes up. Shidan had priorities.

Also, do more research on Kent State than Wikipedia has up. And on the Sixties in general, and the so-called anti-war movement in particular. A lot of those people were not pacifists. You're not a pacifist if you throw rocks at firemen and police; you're an idiot, depending on someone else to act in a much more civilized manner than you are. Also note that groups like the Weather Underground and others claiming to be part of the anti-war movement were busily wreaking havoc, inflicting property damage, and murdering people across the country. And there were all kinds of rumors and noises about people like that being in the crowd. Potentially with bombs.

But let's go back to dragon behavior, and why Blood Knights and Proud Warrior Race are, indeed, a fair description of what's going on.

Read up on the behavior of any intelligent, social predator. Look up wolves and chimpanzees. Not the Disney version; the real stuff, particularly later works by Jane Goodall and anything on the Druid Wolf Pack in Yellowstone. Social predators may not be interested in slaughtering random bystanders, but they are inherently violent. If one aggressive group meets another and senses weakness, blood will out. Warning, what Goodall found out about cannibalism in chimpanzees is not for the faint of heart.

(If you really want Nightmare Fuel, look up what groups of dolphins have been found doing to smaller porpoises. Anyone familiar with Zoe's quote about the Reavers in Firefly? Dolphins don't make clothes. Outside of that...)

Shidan said that among dragons, pacifistic behavior is insane. And he knows humans don't think so. Air Nomads were not dragons. They were not in dragon territory. Hence, they didn't "need" killing. Dragons tried to judge them by human standards. As far as they understood them, at least.

Dragons and firebenders know they run a fine enough line in sanity that they've formalized the Agni Kai. They know they're aggressive and they have to set limits on it. What do you think all that excessive formality of customs in the Fire Nation is for? Formal customs, as opposed to the improvisational types of social interaction we tend to have in the West, can let you slow down and think. They give you time to cool down.

That said - have I ever said Azula and Ozai are not sociopaths?

We have wolves, Canis lupus, and dogs, Canis lupus familiaris. Still closely related, after several thousand years of natural and human selection. Still with similar instinctive behaviors - but a dog has key differences from a wolf that allow them to negotiate living with us on a usually safe basis, despite the fact that dogs are descended from apex predators. Short definition: apex predators (like wolves, killer whales, and humans) hunt - and almost nothing hunts them.

Crossing wolves and dogs is a bad idea.

With a hybrid, you can't predict what it will look like - more importantly, you can't predict what it will behave like. They may be tamable. They may be wild. They may be totally fearless and aggressive toward humans, far beyond normal wolves; wolf-dogs may be behind some werewolf legends of people getting gruesomely eaten.

Now consider that with dragons (who are, hands down, apex predators), firebenders, and anyone not in the Fire Nation.

Dragons aren't good neighbors for humans? Oh, so true. I may think the Fire Nation got a bum rap in the show and Iroh is one of the best uncles in fiction, flat out. But I would never, ever claim they're safe. They're not tame.

Chapter 44

Chapter Notes

For anyone who doesn't have the Avatar world map handy... The Suzuran is currently north of Gaipan (remember, where Jet hangs out), heading up the river toward the coast. Aang and co. still aren't very far from Chameleon Bay. Azula and Ty Lee are heading west from Ba Sing Se, overland. None of these groups is currently near each other. Fortunately. Remember, a major part of Zuko's strategy is getting the heck away from Aang and Azula.

Of course, no plan survives contact with the enemy. Zuko doesn't have to taunt Murphy. Murphy comes looking, expecting a party...

See the end of the chapter for more notes

After years as a leader of firebenders, Iroh had made a habit of not leaving flammable objects in plain view in his quarters. It served him well when dealing with a hot-blooded nephew. And also, it seemed, with dragons.

Smoke still rising from his robes, Shidan gave him a wintry smile. "Feeling better?"

Snuffing out one more spark caught in his sleeves, and waving a hand to shoo some of the smoke from their discussion out the window, Iroh gave him a look of devilish innocence.

"You are his uncle. I suspect he'll forgive you usurping his territory," Shidan mused. "But I also suspect he has no true grasp on why he is so angry. Ursa..." The dragon grimaced, and shook his head. "Your brother has much to answer for. And in my arrogance, so do I."

Arrogance, Iroh thought. Well, that was part of fire; entwined within the drive to live, to burn, to make the world bend to one's wishes. Should he be surprised dragons fell prey to it as well? "What has happened to Ursa?"

Shidan let out a rumbling sigh. "She is wounded."

"So you have said," Iroh observed dryly. "I must wonder, what wound can linger so long, and defeat even a fire-healer?"

"Not one of the flesh." Shidan looked into memory. "Prince Iroh. General Iroh. Dragon of the West, and heir to the throne. You were trained to conquer the world." Pale gold stabbed at him. "Did you know what Azulon trained your brother for? We thought we did. And found, too late, that we were wrong."

Iroh frowned. "Ozai was taught to take up my duties if I should fall. And to deal with factions of the court."

"Deal with, indeed," Shidan said grimly. "You were trained in the inner fire to lead, and to rule. Ozai was meant to be your right hand. Your shadow. Your master of onmitsu. And to that purpose, Azulon trained him to manipulate."

The snarl in that word knotted Iroh's gut. "My nephew is right. Enough evasions."

Shidan's shoulders slumped. "Zuko wishes to see his mother. I know it. I can feel it. But I cannot let that happen. It would crush him." Pale gold dimmed. "I will not see him broken by what she would do."

Chill sluiced down Iroh's spine. "Speak plainly!"

Shidan's fists clenched. "My daughter... believes her children are very much alike."

Iroh leaned a hand on the table to steady himself, feeling the roughness where Zuko's wild emotions had almost scorched wood. "How?" he managed.

"She loved her children. And she feared them," Shidan said starkly. "She knew, as Zuko knows, what risk she ran. Two dragon-children, bearing children, with no human blood to bank the fire? The risk of a dark dragon is small, but it is there. And that was before we realized what your brother was."

If he closed his eyes, Iroh could almost believe himself in quicksand. The same sense of struggle, of numbing panic. And there was not even an earthbender to blame it on. "Surely, she could not believe her own son-"

Shidan eyed him. "I dared not near the royal palace, or recruit watchers too close. Yet even I have heard rumors of Princess Azula."

"They are nothing alike," Iroh said firmly.

"They are brother and sister," Shidan observed. "Would you claim to be nothing like Ozai? I thought not." He regarded Iroh. "You are kin of the Fire Lord's line. It stamps you, blood and bone. Your niece and nephew, my Ursa's children, are born of that same deadly blood. Power. Cunning. Ruthlessness. Do you think Makoto would deign to mate with any creature not her full match in them all? Byakko's clans hold Shirotora in their keeping, and the White Tiger has long been a friend to man. Makoto is of lost Asagitatsu, and the Blue Dragon ever hungers for the lives of fools."

He wanted to deny it. Zuko and Azula were night and day, fire and water; his nephew had nothing in common with the will to murder Sozin had unleashed on the world. And yet... Tutors challenged. Rules defied. And that one instant in the war council when all had been lost.

Even as a small child, Zuko had hated idiots.

Still. "Surely, she knew her own son," Iroh objected.

"Not with Ozai's interference." Shidan looked grim. "She is my daughter, Iroh. She is - we are - ill equipped to deal with lies. And she did love her husband. Part of her still does." Wood made a rasping sound under clawed nails. "And when one you care for and bear loyalty to tells you your daughter is wonderful and honorable and a prodigy, while the best that can be said of your son is that he lacks ambition and is, perhaps, not quite bright..."

Iroh's heart sank. "It is not true."

"No. But it was true enough, with all about her willing to follow Ozai's lead," Shidan replied. "Even you."

That hurt. But Iroh's eyes narrowed. "There is more."

"So there is," Shidan admitted. "Imagine her flight, General. Imagine you have just killed the Fire Lord - the Fire Lord! - and must leave your young in Ozai's hands. Would you wish to believe you had left a child? Or merely another monster?"

It chilled, like an icicle to the heart. "Surely you have told her this is not so!"

"What could I tell her?" Anger; but from that anguished crunch as claws bit through wood, it was aimed at himself. "All the reports I had of Zuko were her letters and what Kotone's spies could gather. Before his exile, there was little they could tell me, save that he had not yet earned Ozai's displeasure. Damning enough, in her eyes. And after..."

Ah, yes. Iroh sighed. There had been some very public losses of temper on Zuko's part. More than enough for rumor to spread that the exiled prince was a spoiled, self-serving fool.

"That he even accepted the quest, she has taken as proof of his father's blood," Shidan said quietly. "I have tried to remind her it is no more than we of Byakko have sought to do. If far less subtle. I have not succeeded."

"Ursa was always kind. Forgiving," Iroh said heavily. "This will break his heart."

"And so my silence." Steam wafted from Shidan's sigh. "I do not think it is wholly her decision, this fear. She struck against the Fire Lord. That shattered the protections the Fire Sages gifted her as the wife of Azulon's son. When I did finally find her, after her escape, the spirits' torment had driven her to... injury."

Hairs rose on the back of Iroh's neck. "Legends of dragon-children claim they are immune to lesser spirits."

"Resistant," Shidan stated. "Not immune. Even lesser kamui, backed by the Face-Stealer's will, are not brushed lightly aside." He frowned. "Most of those who seek to harm her are spirits who draw strength from the Fire Lord's war. Kotone and I have taken steps to protect against them, so much as we can. Ursa herself acts in her own defense; any tie to the line of Sozin is a link her hunters can use against her. To cut herself off from her cubs, to refuse to believe they are anything but Ozai's - it does protect her."

Iroh raked him with a look, and raised an irritated brow. "You speak so calmly of your daughter abandoning her son?"

Pale gold slashed at him, bright with rage. Iroh felt the very air grow thick, wavering with heat.

...Then it died, and Shidan drew in a steadying breath. "I am not human, General. Do us both the courtesy of recalling that. If a hatchling is lost, it is lost. You do not allow dark dragons to live. Not even your own cubs. Their mother knows them better than anyone!" His breath caught. "Or she should."

Iroh leaned back from singed wood. "You never believed Zuko was lost."

"I had Ursa's letters," Shidan nodded slowly. "Ozai may have warped what she thought of which child was the liar, yet there was one fact she wrote, time and again. Azula thought her uncle and cousin both weak-willed fools. While Zuko loved you." He smiled. "Over the decades, on my travels for Kotone, I watched you on campaign. I saw a good man. A hard man, to be sure, and one who often did not question his father's will. But a good man. One who might have considered the Fire Nation's conquests enough, and ended the war."

"It would have been possible, then," Iroh allowed. Considering what he had deliberately shut away these six years; if he had taken the Dragon Throne... "With our losses in the Siege of the North -

no."

"Precisely."

Iroh straightened. Recalling the Oasis, and the Moon, and legends of Koh. "I believe you should explain."

"Among you, in this form, I look old," Shidan obliged. "Among dragons... suffice it to say that like my grandson, I too lost much of my clan when I was young, to Makoto and those she considered allies. Dragons were dying before Sozin ever began his hunt. And with those deaths, we lost much. But my clan gifted me with these shards of truth: the Face-Stealer was wronged in the past. And in the face of that wrong, he wishes to destroy all those he holds accountable."

"The Fire Nation," Iroh nodded, grim.

"Humans," Shidan corrected. "Every nation is human, General. And so we must all suffer." He chuckled bitterly. "Even dragons are human to him, for we share your blood, and call you kin. To the Face-Stealer, we are no better. Worse; for we were born of Agni's fire, and yet we step into your world of our own will. We are his prey, set to destroy one another, to ease that inhuman hate."

A sobering thought. "If you knew this, why not tell the Avatar?" Iroh challenged. "It is his duty to soothe the great spirits."

"According to my clan, the last Avatar told was Kuruk." Shidan shook his head. "That did not end well." He shrugged. "By the time I was gifted with that history, Roku was already refusing to speak to Sozin. We tried to bring him the news through Fang, but he wished nothing to do with a grief not of his making. Those responsible were dead and dust, he claimed, and if the Face-Stealer wished recompense, he had only to ask." Shidan snorted. "I do wonder why the Fire Sages never admitted it was odd that a Fire Nation Avatar could be surprised by a volcano."

"They suffer, serving the Fire Lord instead of Agni," Iroh stated. "Zuko tells me Sage Shiyu acted on Aang's behalf. We should-"

"If you mean to tell Avatar Aang our world is tearing itself apart because of one great spirit," Shidan cut across his words, "remember whom you are dealing with. And think. He is a twelve-year-old boy."

Who is the Avatar, and duty-bound to be responsible for the world, Iroh almost said. But paused, at the grim look on Shidan's face. That was the look of one who had seen a scorpion-viper twitch, and was wondering if it would pass safely by... or if he must act.

Which was uncalled for. The White Lotus was prepared to handle Avatars lost to evil, yes - but Aang was far from evil. He was only-

Young.

It was hard to think of the boy, and not the inhuman power within him. Yet Iroh had seen himself that when the Avatar Spirit was not striking out, Aang was well-meaning, if impulsive, and prone to sudden kindness...

And he pictured that kind, young boy, facing the Face-Stealer with the best of intentions, to set right that ancient spirit's wrong.

...I do not think I will be sleeping well tonight.

"Perhaps he should not be told, yet," Iroh allowed. "But we might write down what you know, and send it to Sokka of the Southern Water Tribe-"

"Chief Hakoda's son? Interesting choice," Shidan mused. And caught Iroh's look. "Kotone's devoted spy, General. Little use would I be did I not know who commanded the Water Tribe fleet."

Ah. And Iroh might never admit it to the dragon, but that was slightly daunting. The White Lotus was accustomed to holding the edge when it came to information, or none of them would have survived in occupied territory. How much those of Byakko knew - that, he suspected he had underestimated. Badly. "Sokka is a warrior, by his tribe's ways; inventive enough to have kept Aang alive through his journey, and sensible enough to accept even Fire Nation aid when it is needed." He chuckled wryly. "Zuko trusts him as well. To a point."

"To a point?" Shidan frowned. "The boy has conflicting loyalties, then. Is the rift within his tribe, or his family?"

Iroh blinked, for once caught off guard. "In his family, possibly. Sokka and Chief Hakoda were willing to hold truce with us, but Katara... how did you know?"

"Trust is more precious than the finest sword, and cuts more deeply," Shidan said gravely. "Dragon-children hoard it, until they know what binds a man. To a point..." The dragon shook himself, disturbed. "You will see that there is someone to stand between them, should Zuko encounter her again?"

Unsettling, and suspicious. "Why?" Iroh demanded.

Shidan paused. Frowned, obviously trying to frame something felt in human words. "It is far more comfortable to have an honest enemy, than one who might be an untrustworthy ally."

Iroh straightened, the implication striking home. "He would not kill her!"

"You know him better than I," Shidan acknowledged. "But if I were young, and frustrated, and convinced she stood between me and one who might be an ally or honorable enemy - I would be tempted. Very tempted."

Iroh eyed him. "Perhaps it is not Ursa who believes her children are too alike."

Shidan met him gaze for gaze. Sighed, and gripped the bridge of his nose in a familiar gesture of everyone around me is insane.

Which, Iroh admitted to himself, he'd often enjoyed provoking out of his nephew. The young man was far too focused, at times. If a man did not take the time to laugh at himself, how would he ever realize when old goals were no longer practical, or even possible?

"I did not say he would harm her," Shidan said precisely, letting go. "I said he would want to. If I loosed my blade against all who made me want to paint the walls with their blood, Kotone would have what was left of several noble clans trying to besiege her. Which would be inconvenient." A puff of steam. "So I restrain myself. As I am sure Zuko does. As I know, Azula does not." He cocked his head, whiskers twitching. "Have you truly never wished to char an annoyance into ashes?"

Agni help them, the dragon actually sounded curious. Iroh had to shake his head. "Not a child. Certainly not a young girl who is a friend to one Zuko does trust. Toph would be quite upset, should Katara be harmed."

"Toph?" Shidan looked intrigued.

"Lady Toph Bei Fong," Iroh obliged. "A young earthbender, better known to some as the Blind Bandit..."

That grin, Iroh reflected, was far too sharp to be human.

"The Rumble champion," Shidan mused. "The Avatar's earthbending teacher, I take it? Young; how very odd. Roku, Kyoshi, Kuruk from what I was told of him - they all took older teachers. Established benders."

"Perhaps not so odd," Iroh stated, on firmer ground. "Monk Gyatso, from what I have read of him, was very young at heart."

"Hmm." Shidan rested his chin on a clawed fist, thoughtful.

"And perhaps Gyatso, and Aang, have deeper wisdom than you or my nephew believe," Iroh said. "Toph has made alliances with those of the Fire Nation who wish to aid her. Katara is willing to listen to her brother, and Sokka would have no quarrel with us if the war was stopped. And Gyatso - you would know more than I, how he taught Aang to shun bloodshed." He spread empty hands. "The Fire Nation may not trust the Avatar. But this one, truly, means no harm. So long as the balance is restored."

Shidan regarded him for a long moment. Sighed. "It must be comforting to have such faith in the spirits."

Iroh started, caught flat-footed. "You are a child of Agni!"

"Of mortal flesh and bone, just as you," Shidan said tartly. "Byakko follows Agni's will, yes. But to do what is right, is only to do what is right. It does not guarantee success, or even survival. I hope that you are right. I pray that you are right. But I will act to defend my clan and kin. I have seen half of Byakko perish once before. Do not ask me to place my clan's lives in the hands of the one who killed them!"

Iroh's eyes narrowed.

Pale gold glared back, then reluctantly looked away. "I know. It was Sozin's orders that killed them. But if Aang had stayed instead of fleeing! If he had trusted his friends, and fled to them, instead of the South Pole where he knew no one-!"

"Then Sozin might have succeeded," Iroh said levelly. "The past is gone, Shidan of Byakko. Let it die."

"Look my grandson in the eye," Shidan said, not quite steady, "and tell me you believe the past is dead."

Iroh drew in a hiss of breath. Revenge for Kuzon, Shidan had named Zuko. But for the harm done Ursa, and Zuko himself... "What do you intend toward my brother?"

"Defiance," Shidan said grimly. "To our last breaths, if we must." A snort. "Oh, do not mistake me. I want him broken and bleeding at my feet. I want him dead, and the ashes scattered." A low, snarling sigh. "But what I want, will not save my children. I know his skill as well as you. If my death would assure his, I would raid the capital myself. But I do not have the power." A bleak chuckle. "He is Fire Lord, by the Avatar's decree, with all the will of the world behind him. I... am only a dragon."

Iroh kept his expression politely neutral. Accepting. Not even a hint of a smirk of disbelief. If there was one thing decades at war had taught him, it was that if one's opponent wished to be underestimated, sometimes it was best to play along.

And if Shidan believed blood told in Ozai's children, then Iroh could look to dragon-children to judge the dragons. Three years on a small ship with his nephew had taught him much. Among other things, that a quiet, calm, desperate Zuko was one a breath away from carrying out the impossible. Such as... oh, breaking into Lake Laogai.

I must warn Captain Jee. Such adventures can be hazardous. To everyone.

"A very curious dragon, I will admit," Shidan went on, humor glinting in pale gold. "I had no idea I would find other kin aboard. Who is the little firebender? And who is Jet, to threaten him?"

He sensed Jinhai. So a dragon was not quite as meek a power as Shidan wished to imply. This should be interesting. "Jet, and those like him, are part of why Zuko seeks to build a sanctuary," Iroh began. "We met the young Freedom Fighter on the ferry to Ba Sing Se..."

Min touched her arm as they headed down the foreboding steel passageway toward Amaya and an older marine, giving her his best Big Brother look. "You don't have to do this."

"Yes I do," Suyin said stubbornly, getting the words out before her shaky knees could betray her. It wasn't cold down here in Suzuran's brig. But it felt - scary.

He can't hurt us. He can't hurt Jinhai. He's on the other side of steel bars. Thick ones.

All true. And none of it made her feel any better.

She risked a glance at Mai's impassive face, as the noblewoman walked behind them both, ready to nod at any guards who might question them. "I have to see him," Suyin insisted. "I have to know why anybody would do... what Jet tried to do." Turn Lee - Zuko and Uncle Iroh - in to the Dai Li as firebenders? That was horrible.

...So they really were firebenders. It was still awful. Jet had lived in Ba Sing Se, just like everyone. Didn't he see what the Dai Li did to people?

Well, most of them. Amaya said they'd gotten a good, hard shake when the Earth King had to hide, and they'd be thinking a lot more about what they really wanted to do for the city. Like Uncle Shirong had. And he'd done some horrible things, he said so himself, but Mom and Dad said he wasn't going to do them anymore.

Not that she thought it could have been as bad as he thought it was. Uncle Shirong was Dai Li, but he'd helped the city. He'd just been stuck, like Dad had been. He knew what the Dai Li were doing wasn't right, he just... couldn't fix it. And when he could fix some of it, when Zuko and her family needed help - he'd been there. That mattered.

And now Uncle Shirong was family, and he was going to stay one of the good guys. If she and Jia and Mom had to sit on him to keep him that way.

"He hates the Fire Nation, and he wants us dead," Mai said calmly. As if it didn't shake her to the soul. "It's pretty common." A jet-black brow lifted. "This one seems a little more fanatical than most." She nodded slightly. "Healer Amaya. Corporal Moriaki."

We're here. Suyin gulped, looking at the steel-barred doors of the brig cells. Oh boy.

"Loyal to the Earth Kingdom," Mai went on, "or just crazy?"

"I can hear you!"

"Yes, we're all quite aware of that by now, young man," Moriaki said dryly. Like Captain Jee, his hair had gone all gray, kept short except for one small topknot.

The armor's still scary, Suyin thought. But his wrinkles... they were like her father's. A face that worried, not one that hurt people. And he carried a bag that looked... well, a lot like Amaya's looked, when she thought she might have to handle something that didn't really need bending to fix. Or needed more than bending. A lot more.

"Would you care to answer Lady Mai's question?" Moriaki went on. "Or should we ask your companions?"

Messy brown hair lunged at the bars. "Don't you dare come near them, you-!"

Amaya's upraised hand halted the spit in midair. Suyin stared, wide-eyed, as the waterbender considered it, and Jet, and a pale-faced Smellerbee and Longshot-

A knife-sharp motion, and saliva cracked against the rear of the cell, hard enough to slash paint off steel.

"Normally I prefer patience, and reason," Amaya said, with a sadness that shivered to Suyin's toes. "But Lee has tried them both. He risked his own life to be certain you escaped Ba Sing Se. And here you are, again, attacking one of my tribe. The next one - and there will be only one next one - will draw blood. After that..."

Longshot gripped Jet's shoulder. Brown eyes seemed to clear a little. "Just stay away from us," Jet growled. "You work with the Dai Li, now you work with Fire Nation - what kind of waterbender are you?"

"You worked with the Dai Li?" Suyin blurted out. And wanted to clap her hand over her mouth. Amaya had worked with Uncle Shirong, she knew that. But - the way Jet said it, it sounded...

"Oh yeah," Jet breathed, looking her way with a smile that was just wrong. "She's a happy old torturer. You didn't know?"

"Big words, from the moron who got himself caught," Min snarled right back. "Amaya says you're messed up about your family. Well, tough! You know what you almost did to my family? You almost got us all killed! I don't care if she cut your fingers off and made you eat them! Lee kept chasing you off, and I couldn't, and you just wouldn't leave it alone-!"

"Stop it!" Suyin burst out, grabbing his arm. "You're not like this!" She glared at Jet, and the boy and girl with him who weren't doing anything. "It's true. We were so scared. I don't know what Amaya did, and I don't know what you did. But I know what you wanted to do! You hate firebenders who didn't do anything to you!" She dragged in breath, trying not to cry. "Just tell me why."

"You're a firebender?" Jet backed off from the bars. "You're a firebender."

"She's not," Min started.

Suyin gripped her brother's arm again. "So what do you care? I was born in Ba Sing Se! Dad's a teacher! We would have followed the Earth King all our lives!"

Jet's lip curled. "No, you wouldn't." He shrugged at the steel around them. "You're here. With the Fire Nation. So you can save your worthless firebending neck." He came one step closer, eyes narrowed and smug. "A true patriot would have died."

Suyin froze.

"You don't believe that!" Smellerbee burst out, crowding next to Jet so he had to look at her. "You can't!"

"I'm afraid he can, young lady," Moriaki said gravely. "I've seen this before. On our own side, unfortunately." The marine sighed softly. "I imagine you had reason for your hate, young man. It's a powerful force, and not always an evil one. When hope dies, when all else seems to fail - hate can keep you alive."

"Don't act like you get me, firebender!"

Moriaki smiled. "Ah. Now there you are mistaken. I am not a firebender, though many of my squad are. I'm only a medic. A combat healer, in your terms. And no, I most certainly do not get you. But I have seen those afflicted often enough to understand the forces at work." An armored shrug. "You are comfortable in the embrace of your hate. It warms you, when all the world seems frozen and fragile as new ice. It gives you purpose. And it walls you away from your grief."

"You've got no right to talk about being sorry, you monster!" Jet flung a rude gesture at Suyin. "None of you do!"

Steel gleamed between Mai's fingers. "You're not just boring. You're rude."

Suyin swallowed, heart beating fast. Oh spirits, there was going to be blood, and screaming...

"We do not throw weapons into the brig, Lady Mai," Moriaki said dryly. "It annoys the captain."

"Too bad." Steel vanished again. "Did you two get what you came for?"

"I guess," Min said, a little shaken. "I don't get it, but... I don't think I want to." He looked at Suyin. "Can we go now?"

Shivering, Suyin nodded.

Jet smirked. "That's right, run away-"

Smellerbee jabbed him in the ribs, one quick punch. "Quit it, Jet! It isn't right!" She flung a glare at all of them. "And it's not right for you to keep us here, either! Just let us go!"

"My dear young lady, I assure you the captain will be quite happy to, as soon as we're somewhere the prince is certain your fanatical friend will do no more harm," Moriaki stated. "I believe someone mentioned a nunnery."

Dead silence. Longshot raised an eyebrow. Amaya shot Moriaki a dark look.

"If the boy will throw the word bastard about, he should know precisely whom he is insulting," Moriaki said dryly, pulling a scroll from his bag in a hiss of paper. "And why it is likely to get both himself and his companions executed." He smiled wryly. "It might amuse you to know this turned up in the archives we brought aboard. The Dai Li simply never had time to realize it applied."

Smellerbee gingerly took the scroll through the bars, and started to unroll it. Almost dropped it, eyes wide, mouth gaping. "This - these are-"

Against his will, Jet looked. Snapped his gaze back up. "It's a lie!"

Moriaki raised his own brow, affronted. "I assure you, it's quite genuine."

"It's insane!" Jet snapped. "The Fire Lord would never-"

"Is that not your quarrel with us?" Moriaki's tone could have shaved steel. "That we of the Fire Nation are all insane monsters?"

"You." Jet jabbed an accusing finger toward the marine. "You're trying to play with our heads. It won't work."

"Both traitors violated imperial orders to ex-" Smellerbee stumbled on the calligraphy.

Longshot gripped the scroll above her hands, steadying it. "To exterminate the Water Tribe barbarians as well as capture the Avatar." The archer looked up. "Permission is granted to kill them on sight."

Out of the corner of her eye, Suyin saw Min gulp. "Have I mentioned lately how glad I am Dad's not crazy?"

"You should meet mine," Mai said levelly. "He was pleased with me. As long as I didn't move. Or breathe. Or do anything a proper young lady shouldn't." She shrugged. "Azula just wanted to make her father happy. It's sad. As long as you're not in lightning range."

"What's really scary?" Min muttered. "I think I get that."

Me too, Suyin thought, chilled. Your dad was your dad. You wanted him to be proud of you. And Zuko had to walk away from that. Even though Fire Lord Ozai was evil - it had to hurt.

"It's a lie," Jet repeated flatly, not looking at the scroll. "Kill on sight? And we're supposed to believe a whole Fire Navy ship turned traitor?"

"I won't bore you with the details. You wouldn't believe them anyway," Moriaki observed. "Suffice it to say that this is... a ship of orphans, in a sense. No other commander would lead us, or let us fight for our people the best way we can." He eyed Jet. "But of course, we wouldn't understand you at all." He straightened. "Have you seen what you needed, Healer Amaya?"

"To a point," the waterbender acknowledged. "It's still possible this could be physical, not... obsession. I need a closer examination." She eyed the youngsters in red and green. "You, out."

Suyin had never been so glad to follow a healer's advice.

Min kept his mouth shut until they were safely headed down to the hold. "You let him think you're the firebender? That's-"

"An old ploy, but still a good one," Mai said thoughtfully. "Every clan should have a kagemusha. People going after benders never expect a knife."

Suyin gulped. She didn't want to-

But I would. If Jet was coming for Jinhai, for family - I would.

"He'll try to hurt her," Min protested.

"If he gets loose near us? Probably," Mai agreed. "You want him to target Jinhai instead? Suyin stands a fighting chance."

"But Jinhai's just a kid!"

Suyin stepped onto the next deck, and scooted out of the way of a passing sailor carrying a steel plate, a toolkit, and a preoccupied look. Mai and Min caught sight of him just after; Mai pressed them both against the wall as the man grumbled his way past.

Joining Suyin on the deck, Mai gave Min a sober look. "You think it would matter?"

"No," Min sighed, following them through the maze walled with stowed supplies. "Lousy thing to think about people." He glanced at Suyin. "But he'll know she's not a bender."

"There are ways to fake it, if you're bluffing someone who doesn't know fire," Mai informed them. "Flash paper. Flint and oil. There's a paste you can use that keeps you from burning for a few minutes. Ty Lee showed me that one. We'll need Corporal Moriaki's help to make it; it's tricky, and using it too much can make you sick. And you need time to put it on, so it's not useful if you're surprised."

"People pretend to be benders?" As had become a habit, Suyin kept her hand on the wall of cargo netting as they headed for home. It was just so different from the city; tough, hempen strands around a woven-steel core, black as nut-husk dye, carrying scents of salt, fish, and tar. "Doesn't that... offend somebody?"

"Not Agni." Mai smiled slightly. "They say he loves a good trick."

Okay. That was good. If kind of creepy. "Do you..." Suyin waited for a few neighbors to pass, not wanting to say anything around those who weren't family. "Do you think we ran away?"

Mai was quiet. So was Min, surprising Suyin. I guess he really wants to know, too.

"What Jet calls running, we would call a rout," Mai said at last. "That's not what we did. We made a tactical withdrawal from terrain the enemy holds to their advantage, so we can open a new flank and lead the Fire Lord to divide his forces."

"So we ran, but with a good reason," Min said wryly.

"You'd rather have stayed? Dead people don't serve their lord." Mai frowned at herself. "Ghosts can, but that's rare. Better to be a live problem." She looked Min in the eye. "You're a better citizen of the Earth King than Jet will ever be."

...Oh great. Mushy stuff. "I'll go see if Mom needs help with dinner," Suyin said in a hurry, and forged ahead.

It was even true. Cooking on the ship wasn't like back home, where everyone had a stove. Here, there was a galley with stoves and ovens and really weird things, and the trick was preparing everything to get it set to cook, then nabbing your spot in Cook Luchan's schedule. And making sure you separated all the parings and peelings and stuff the way he wanted, so it could go into the Deadly Soup of the Day, or the worm bins.

Which were both creepy and utterly cool. Making your own dirt to grow tiny trees in, so there were flowers on board? And fish-bait?

Not that she liked putting worms on a hook. But fishing was something you could do, out in the air, and not be in anybody's way.

Pressed against the netting yet again as some poor lady tried to herd her kids past, Suyin really wanted to be fishing.

Another few turns, and she was back in their own nook, grinning at Lim and Daiyu as they gnawed some of the purple carrots Luli and Meixiang were slicing-

Her brain stuttered to a halt, as she tripped over a sitting kid her own age, with a sword and a wolf-like scowl and one stark lock of white in black hair. "Augh-!"

Strong hands grabbed her, gripping with the kind of calluses she'd first felt on Lee. "Easy. You're okay."

Brown hair, gray-blue eyes, and an odd green armor and uniform that twiggled at her memory. One of Dad's scrolls?

"Sorry," the swordswoman went on, steadying her. "Guess we should get a little farther back from the doorway-"

"You're a Kyoshi Warrior!" Suyin blurted out, finally placing the sword and fan. "How - who - what?"

"Saoluan," the warrior introduced herself. "The scowly silent type is my little sword-brother, Langxue."

Flat on the deck, Langxue scowled. "Hmph."

"He's had a rough day," Saoluan advised, helping Suyin step out of the tangle. "Lieutenant Sadao said we'd be better off with your families than anyone else. You already know about yāorén-"

Picking himself up, Langxue almost growled. "Are you going to go through this every time someone else shows up?"

"You better believe it," Saoluan said cheerfully. "Ba Sing Se people are weird. Imagine, living in the middle of a pile of rocks, instead of having a good ocean between you and the bad guys. Only fair to warn them we're going to be weird right back." She winked at Suyin. "Hey, you're going to be heading up to the galley, right? Can you find out if Lord Shidan sent over any river shrimp?"

"Any... what?" Suyin wondered. There was a really suspicious grin on her mother's face.

"I promise I'll tell you what's in it," Meixiang said virtuously. "After you try it."

Oh boy.

But she set to work on the carrots anyway, sure of one thing.

We're Earth Kingdom and Fire, on a Fire Nation ship, with a dragon and people from Kyoshi Island on board.

Nobody out there is having a weirder day than I am.

Weirdest. Day. Ever.

He'd been on a Fire Navy ship before, once. Briefly. But he'd never gotten below the deck Katara had frozen him to, which meant his little taboo-breaking sister had probably seen more of the inside of a Fire Nation ship with Aang than he had. Not that he was planning to admit it. Not now, down here with Dad deep in steel, away from the wind. Maybe not ever.

All the smells are wrong. All the sounds are wrong.

Sokka knew Water Tribe ships, wood and canvas and sticky smells of seaweed-pitch to caulk the seams. And fish. Sometimes a copper-rich scent of blood and seal fat, but always a smell of fish.

This hold smelled like rust and oil and coal smoke, with a hint of bilge tang from Bato still figuring out the pumps. It creaked, but not like wood; metal on metal, like the drill, almost too low to hear. It set his teeth on edge.

Doesn't seem to bother Dad.

But then, looks could be deceiving. Out of the corner of his eye Sokka saw his father surreptitiously tug at the gray collar of his captured uniform. And felt a little better.

Good thing the captain was about Dad's size-

And he didn't want to even think that too loud, not even with Aang tucked into a cabin where he and Tao could talk spirits and Katara could try and work on his scars. Aang had a way of not being where you expected him.

We've got a problem. A big one. And I don't know what to do.

"You're quiet," Hakoda observed, searching this section of the hold for anything useful the warriors might have missed in their early hurry to get the mess cleared away before they'd reached the Avatar.

"It's... big," Sokka said, tilting his head back to stare at riveted steel. So much steel. You could fit all the knives in the village into one girder, and still have room to stuff a canoe in. They've got all this and they want more? Why?

Duh. The Fire Nation was greedy and evil, that was why.

...Only that was the easy answer. Zuko, General Iroh, Captain Jee, even that crazy woman Teruko - they weren't evil. Scary as hell, dangerous, and nobody he'd ever let date his sister. But not evil.

They're not like the Fire Army thugs we met at Haru's village, or working for Zhao. They don't want anything.

...Not stuff, anyway.

Reminded him of the guards he'd met at Gaipan, when he tried to warn the village before Jet's flood could crash down on everybody. He was Water Tribe. The enemy. They could see that, of course they didn't trust him-

But when the old traveler had vouched for him, the guy in charge had let him go. Just like that.

Get out of here. We'll evacuate the village. Go.

And they had, that was still the crazy part. They'd pulled everybody out of the flood's path. Not just Fire Nation. Everyone.

Like anyone would have done it. Like it didn't occur to them not to do it.

Like Zuko had let Aang go in the middle of a storm, instead of get in the middle of them rescuing an old fisherman...

"Sokka?" Hakoda frowned, concerned.

Sokka held up a hand; wait a second. Walked to the bulkhead, and splayed his fingers against steel. Stronger than wood. Stronger than almost anything. Except one horrible night at the North Pole. "I think... maybe... I figured out why Aang ticks the Fire Nation off."

His father chuckled. "You mean, besides the whole Avatar thing."

"Actually, yeah," Sokka admitted. "I told you about when Zuko raided our village?"

"Katara told me a bit more."

Sokka reddened. "Well, anyway... The jerkbender waited for me to charge him. Twice. The guards didn't stop me. He did." He chewed that thought a little more, no matter how sore it'd left him.

"They let it be a fair fight. Kind of."

"Fair?" Hakoda gave him a skeptical glance.

"Point is, I had a chance," Sokka shrugged. "Not a good chance. Kind of like a tiger-seal up against a polar bear."

Which wasn't a one-sided fight. Tiger-seals had teeth, too. If the polar bear missed that first lunge, and the tiger-seal could scoot into the water, under ice? Bye-bye dinner.

Hakoda nodded, obviously thinking of that himself. "Go on."

"So... fighting the Avatar's like fighting the whole ocean," Sokka stated. "Or a volcano - did I tell you about the volcano? That was scary... Yeah. So when the world tries to kill Fire Nation guys? The decent ones, like Iroh - they stop fighting. They save people."

Hakoda raised skeptical brows.

"Some of them do," Sokka insisted. "When Zuko took Aang at the North Pole? I would have left him on the ice. I don't think he would have left me. Killed me, maybe. But not left me."

"Firebenders are crazy," Hakoda observed. "We knew that."

"Right. They're crazy, and they don't know when to give up," Sokka agreed. "But they believe in a fair fight. At least a one-on-one fight," he amended, at his father's skeptical glance. "If we can pull this invasion off, if Aang can beat the Fire Lord - we might really win it. Aang takes down Ozai, everybody else is loyal to the Fire Lord; he tells them to stop, then they'll stop."

Well, except for Zuko. Sokka was really hoping Zuko wasn't going to be a problem after the Fire Lord went down, because seriously? Sure, Aang was the Avatar. But Zuko was ticked off.

Katara was alive because Wan Shi Tong had ignored one puny, ticked-off human. He hoped the owl still had a headache.

Heh. What are big brothers for?

"I hear a but," Hakoda said thoughtfully.

"Umm..."

"The plan seems simple, if a little shaky on details," Hakoda observed. "We fight our way in as a distraction. Aang faces and defeats the Fire Lord during the eclipse, when no firebender can... oh."

"Yeah," Sokka said grimly. "Oh."

"One boy bending earth, air, and water, against a man without his fire." Hakoda mulled it over. "You have a point. But this is still our best chance. We need to beat them, first. The Avatar can pound it into their heads that they are beaten later."

"I'm not arguing with that." Sokka held up his hands. "But if we do this, we can't let Aang go after Ozai alone. He'll get killed."

His father studied him for a long, sober moment. "Run that by me again?"

"Zuko doesn't need firebending to kick somebody's butt," Sokka laid it out. "He throws fire at Aang, sure - Aang's always bending back at him as hard as he can. But I know up close and personal that Zuko does not need to bend to hurt somebody." He paused. "Zuko can take me down, barehanded. I don't like saying that, but he can. What do you think his dad can do?"

Hakoda straightened his shoulders, concerned. "You don't think Aang would let him get that close."

"Yeah, I do," Sokka sighed. "If Ozai tried talking to him? He would. He sat down and waited for Azula when she was chasing us. To try and talk her out of it."

That gave Hakoda pause. "He does like to talk."

"He has to," Sokka said. "He can't kill."

Hakoda covered a cough. "I think the Fire Navy would disagree."

"I know. The Avatar kills," Sokka shrugged. "Aang? He can't. He won't. I'm not saying he hasn't, he's knocked a dozen tanks off mountains - but face to face? Looking Ozai in the eye?" Sokka shook his head.

"Sokka's right."

...And his heart could get right back out of his throat now, thank you. "Toph!" Sokka sputtered. "How did you sneak down here?"

Smirking out of the shadows, Toph pointed back toward the ladder. "Duh. Metalbender? I ask it not to make a noise, it doesn't."

"Hmm. That could be handy." Hakoda rubbed his chin, blue beads glinting as he bent his head toward her blind gaze. "So you're worried about Aang as well."

"Oh yeah." She didn't sound happy about it, bare feet stepping precisely across the deck toward-

Sokka gulped. "Toph, stop!"

She did. Inches away. Thank the spirits. "What's on the floor, Sokka?"

"Ah... umm..."

"It feels kind of like rust. Only not. And it's all over the ship. Though you guys tried to clean up a lot of it." She faced his way. "Is it what I think it is?"

Oh hell. This is Toph. "If you think it's blood? Yeah."

The little earthbender nodded, shoulders slumped a little. "I figured." She brushed dark bangs off her face, and listened Hakoda's way. "Aang ask anybody how you got this ship?"

"I don't think he has," Hakoda answered, surprised. "Why would he?"

"And nobody's told him."

Both Water Tribesmen eyed her; Sokka rolling his eyes as he realized, once again, it was just going to bounce off. "It's kind of obvious?"

"Uh-huh," Toph said skeptically. "Aang gets grumpy if you bring back meat, Sokka. What do you think he'd say if this-" her toe stabbed down, almost on the bloodstain, "-was obvious?"

"Oough." Sokka bent a little, trying to be manly; gave up, and flopped down on the deck. Or tried to. The uniform didn't exactly let you flop. "Oh, I don't feel so good."

Toph crouched down to pat his shoulder. "Yeah. Me too." She blew out a breath. "And the really bad part? I don't think we can tell him."

"We've got to," Sokka insisted. Or tried to. Somehow, he couldn't put much oomph into it.

"Yeah? Tell him, the ship you're on, the bed you're sleeping in? The food you're eating? Everybody who had that is dead now. So you can save the world." She winced. "Do me a favor. Put me on land first. So I can hide."

"He wouldn't hurt friends..." Hakoda trailed off, looking between them.

"Aang wouldn't," Sokka said heavily. "The Avatar? Yeah. Oh yeah. You heard about Roku's temple. Remind me to tell you what happened to one Earth General's fort, after he ticked Aang off."

Strong arms wrapped around both of them, as Hakoda pulled them together in a hug. "We'll work something out. One step at a time." He grinned wryly at them. "After all, we're going to be a little busy for anyone to be worrying about little details of how we got this ship. There's this little problem we have to get past, called the Fire Navy..."

Chapter End Notes

Kagemusha - "shadow warrior". Impersonator or decoy.

About Space Whale Aesops... try Japanese Tales by Royall Tyler, Beowulf, or really any work of folktales out there. And look at the behavior of Hei Bai, Wan Shi Tong, Koh, and Koizilla in canon. Spirits and fantastical creatures do not act to teach people lessons. They act because they can. Sometimes they strike out because they've been offended - whether or not said offende is still anywhere in the area. (Hei Bai, I'm looking at you.) Sometimes they're subject to flattery and clever approaches. (Wan Shi Tong.) But most of the time they're just there, and a human who happens to stumble into crossing them is in for a very bad time, indeed.

And sometimes the obvious answer is the best one. Toph wasn't so much a target for breaking rules as for being 1) a strong bender, 2) who's fought spirits before, and thus is "visible" as a legitimate target (no, Wan Shi Tong has not forgotten who held up his library!), and 3) out of immediate sight of the Avatar when said spirit-kraken got the munchies.

BTW, in Japanese folklore - giant centipedes are the mortal enemies of dragons.

Chapter 45

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Familiar clawed hands settled near his on the rail. Zuko managed not to flinch. Flinching might draw Shirong's attention; and he wanted the agent's mind on Lieutenant Teruko, critiquing his bending. Not on one tired, rage-burned-out firebender.

Worse, if he flinched, Shidan would wonder why. And he couldn't explain, he couldn't-

"Your uncle," Shidan chuckled quietly, "is currently warning Captain Jee that I am about to do something spectacularly drastic."

Zuko eyed him. "Are you?"

"Not that I know of." Shidan gripped steel with no little satisfaction. "Though I find it interesting that one so oddly untutored in dragons can recognize the signs." Pale gold eyes slid toward him.

I am not going to blush.

"You have carried a heavy burden many years, and I wish we had been able to lighten it," Shidan said gravely. "I can tell you that I was acting for Byakko. That I was carrying out your great-grandfather's wishes, to protect that which we of Byakko have long kept safe. That you are not the first of our clan to be sacrificed to Byakko's need, and certainly not the last. But my daughter chose her fate. You did not."

Zuko's jaw tightened.

"You should know," Shidan said deliberately, "you are far more than any revenge."

"Makoto was a liar and a murderess," Zuko gritted out. "Sozin killed a whole people, who'd never done anything to him! How could you ever let my mother marry that for anything but revenge?"

"Because we are the blood of dragons," Shidan said levelly. "And if your mother failed to tell you why she did love your father, then it falls to me."

My mother? He didn't know what to feel. Confused, definitely. Angry; after everything his father had done, his mother still-

I have to know.

Rigid, Zuko nodded.

"Sozin and Makoto were ruthless, surely," Shidan stated. "Swift to strike at those they named foes. Clever and cunning, to snare those foes so they could not escape; to turn their own blood against them, suborning the onmitsu themselves to Sozin's will. Masters of fire; Sozin could tame even volcanoes, given time to beguile their flame with his own. Determined. Indomitable. Unkillable. Save by grief, as Sozin's slew him at last. For once he did call Roku friend." Shidan paused, three deliberate heartbeats. "What, of that, should any clan not wish to claim as its own blood?"

Zuko swallowed dryly. "But I-"

"There is also," Shidan said wryly, "the fact that your father is not unhandsome."

Zuko's fingers clenched on steel. Not reaching for the scar.

"Shh... shh, cub, none of that." Regret laced Shidan's voice, but pale gold held nothing of pity.

"You were brave. Remember that, and that you did what was right. Scars? Hah! I should show you my own. Wandering for Byakko is often interesting, but never safe. You survived, grandson. You live, and are not broken. That is the strength of your line! The strength we wished to steal for our own, through Ursa's children." He paused. "I would wish my grandson well, if he would accept my blessing."

They wanted me. Not... not just another plan. "She loved him?" Zuko whispered. "What he's done... what I know he's going to keep doing..."

"What he has done, yes," Shidan said firmly. "He is a dark dragon, and it is likely his death would be the saving of our people. But Ozai's evil is his choice. As it was Azulon's, and Sozin's, and Makoto's. Iroh and Lu Ten chose otherwise." He waved a hand to encompass the ship, the river, the green forest crowding almost down to the shore. "Let the world say Sozin's blood is evil. They know nothing. Your blood is Sozin's, and Makoto's, and mine. And none of us - none! - can choose for you."

"Not even Roku?" Zuko said sourly.

Heat shimmered over Shidan's shoulders. "Hmph. I admit, that man's heritage would give any sane parent pause. But your uncle survived it. Even if he does have the family obsession with tea."

Zuko blinked. Cast a look askance at the dragon. "Oh, he didn't."

"Calming tea," Shidan said dryly.

Zuko tried not to snicker.

"Did I want to be calmed, I would meditate," the dragon went on huffily. "I do not wish to be calm. I have risked Byakko. I have set a plan in motion that may - may - disguise why I have taken some Yu Yan in a fashion that will aid us all. I have found a yāorén, unlooked-for, and kept him alive and in fair health until we could find help. I have found my grandson, and learned he knows less of his heritage than his mother knew when she was a toddling cub at my knee. The spirits are stirring, the world is in chaos, and all I love is at risk. I am irritated. I have earned the right to be irritated. Were this Byakko, I would have climbed the mountain by now, to play with the lava Shirotora grants us. And hopefully fry whatever foe might be so foolish as to follow me. But it is not, and I have not such luxury. Pity. Tea!"

Almost, Zuko choked back a laugh. But one word had caught his ears. "Lava?" he breathed. "I thought - the scrolls said only the Avatar, and the Fire Lord..."

"And where did they learn it?" Shidan arched a brow. And studied him. "Most cannot master it, no. Even many dragons can only do as Kuzon was able to; guide it roughly, to save their own lives. But it flows, like water. I wonder..." He reached out.

Zuko flinched. If he touches me, he'll know. He'll know. I should leave, I should-

But this was Shidan. And he was so tired of running.

Fingers halted, not touching. "You know I mean you no harm."

"I know," Zuko whispered. "I don't want to hurt you."

Shidan tilted his head, curious and wary. A wariness that seemed to shift, suddenly, with the slightest widening of pale gold.

He knows. He can't know - but he knows.

Trying not to think, Zuko took Shidan's hand. Warm fingers, a fiery prickle of connection-

Don't be afraid, young one. We are kin, and I would never- Shock. Amazement. A kitten-prickle of amusement, braided with sudden worry. ...Oh.

An echo between them, as the spirit-in-flesh that was a dragon felt his own spirit. And knew it, in a rush of worry and love and laughter, sparkling like a brook in the sun-

Of course, Shidan chuckled in his mind. Who else could have made such a glorious mess?

Zuko winced. Mess was the word for it, all right-

Stop. Grandson, my own heart's brother - stop. Shidan drew him closer, a delicate hug. The Face-Stealer's plan snares all in his web. What could the world need more, than someone to break the strands?

Zuko started, almost pulling loose. He knew what web Shidan referred to, that Koh's was only a lesser part of. And for the dragon to favor breaking that-!

Shidan smiled a little. "Yes, I know. I am a creature of spirit as well as flesh; how can I call for tearing the web the Great Spirits weave for us? But you forget; I know you have forgotten, the path you took strips memory to its bones... We are Agni's creatures. Earth, air, water; they weave the very stuff of creation, and draw strength from its pattern. They follow the pulse of the world, and bend to its spirit, the Avatar. But fire's task is otherwise. Fire burns."

"Agni the Trickster," Zuko whispered.

"Agni who watches over the world, to see where the weave tangles, threatening to halt the loom forever," Shidan nodded. "Who burns away the old, when he must, so that which survives can weave onward. You are not the first to walk this path."

Zuko swallowed dryly. "I'm not?"

"No, cub," Shidan said gently. "It is a rare gift; even Agni does not lightly burn what the world has woven. But this is his gift to give. The blessing - of no blessing at all."

Zuko blinked, thinking that through. And made sure he had one hand on the rail. His knees felt a little shaky. "I have no luck."

"No sign of the spirits' favor, save bending," Shidan agreed. "No light burning about you for spirits to see; as I have, or Iroh, or your sister. You are a ghost. A mist. Fire burning through pine roots, unseen to those who walk the earth." A callused hand rested on his. "You are Agni's knife in the dark. Strike truly."

"I don't know what I'm doing," Zuko admitted in a rush. "It's all messed up. Aang doesn't even try to understand us, I don't know what to say to Uncle, I don't know what to do next, we got this far and- I came up with a plan, when I thought all the airbenders were dead. Establish a domain. Our domain. Let people be what they want to be, and protect the Northern Air Temple. They're already living in the air. I thought, if airbending was ever born back into the world, it'd be there. But if there are airbenders, that's not why the world is out of balance..." And if it's not, I don't - I don't know how to fix it. Fix anything.

"It is, and it is not," Shidan said thoughtfully, nails scraping a shivery thin sound on steel. "The onmitsu, the yamabushi, the Touzaikaze... they all live, yes. But they are not a nation. They live by the grace of other powers, of fire and earth, warding them from harm. They are not a force in their own right, feared and honored by all the world." He paused. "And the Autumn Lord has always had an attitude problem."

Zuko shot him a look.

Shidan blinked, lazily amused. "I am a dragon. We are hatched with attitude problems."

"Uncle always told me I got it from my father," Zuko grumbled.

Shidan laughed, a warm ripple of kin and safe. "I fear not. You come by it honestly. On all sides."

"...Oh." It was a pure, guilty relief. Just wanting to lose his temper and fry something didn't make him like his father. That was - good. Kind of.

"Actions, not wishes," Shidan said firmly, the grave look in his eyes and warm whisper of shh, silly cub making it clear he'd felt that guilt. "We are born to prey on the weak and the fearful. It is our nature, to stalk and ambush and kill." A quiet breath. "But we are more than nature. Agni gifted us with thought, and choice. We may choose to be monsters. Or we may choose to think. To give our violence to the service of our clans, and strike only when it is right."

"Dark dragons?" Zuko said quietly. My sister...

"They, too, have a choice." Shidan sighed. "A starker choice than ours, for something within them is missing. But it is a choice." He frowned. "Iroh said Healer Amaya tried to help your sister. I am - uncertain. A fire-healer could not help her, that I do know. But water is family, and it is that, above all, dark dragons lack. I wonder."

"She did try to kill me later," Zuko pointed out. "Again."

"Damn." Shidan looked into the distance, letting go of regret and frail hope in one determined breath. "Well. Airbenders." He frowned. "Your plan may be best after all. If the Air Temple stands as its own nation; if you protect it as an ally, a neighboring clan, and not within your own domain... it might be enough to soothe Air's injured pride."

"Pride," Zuko snorted.

"Not something one associates with monks?" Shidan said wryly. "Hah! What is it, to think you can wander the world without ever lifting a hand in anger, and believe your shining example will inspire all to never raise weapons against you? Arrogance, yes, that is the weakness of fire. But air? Pride."

Zuko almost said something... then closed his mouth, thinking it over.

"The yamabushi and onmitsu shelter under Fire's wings," Shidan went on. "The Touzaikaze... the Earth King may not have seen them for centuries, but the desert they roam is within his kingdom. And as for their lost oases - Zuko?"

For a moment, he could see it. The river hidden beneath windswept desert spires, where none would ever look. The silver-and-peacock carp-minnows, and lotuses, and bison grazing on river cane. The high rippled-stone curtains of the caves, marked only by climbing vines and airbenders' bare feet, before the foxes had come...

That's why Misty Palms Oasis dried up. Wan Shi Tong blocked the waters.

Then. Now? "Wan Shi Tong's been banished from the Earth Kingdom."

For once, he got to see Shidan stunned. "How?"

"Kuei's tougher than he looks," Zuko smirked. "One of the foxes got greedy, and the Earth King threw them all out. And the owl." He waved a hand at Suzuran. "Not long before we got there, but-

"

"Long enough, with the leste shamans ever hunting for a way home." Shidan snarled in anticipation. "Good. Good! Already, a knot is cut!" The dragon drew a breath. "You should draw your clan together this eve; I will tell you what I can of the knots that remain." Then he smirked.

"An Earth King with spirit. That, the world has not seen in some time."

"Spirit-bending. Amaya says he's going to be one of the best." Zuko grimaced. "He's going to need it, after giving us part of the Earth Kingdom."

"Giving you-?" Shidan shook his head, incredulous. "Grandson. Just what happened in Ba Sing Se?"

This isn't how I thought I'd go out.

With practiced calm, Yakume kept his breathing slow and even, tallying up his situation. Nausea and splitting headache; too dark to check for doubled vision, but he'd bet on a concussion. Fingers and toes wriggled, though, so it didn't seem to be worse than that. Yet. Only fingers and toes wriggled; the weight of stones and street rubble on his armor, bruising enough to leave him wincing, had him pinned unless he could shift enough small bits to get better leverage. Even if he did, the blinding pain in his right knee was a clear sign he wasn't going to be walking out of here.

Hah. Not damn likely. They set the trap too well for that.

He refused to get angry. Fury enough to lift boulders did no good if he couldn't get leverage. So, calm. Admire, in a detached and calculated way, the ingenuity of the saboteur; ingenuity you almost never saw in the Earth Kingdom. The calmer he stayed, the longer the small pocket of air trapped with him would last.

The calmer he stayed, the less he breathed. The less he'd smell the results of what else had been buried with him.

The komodo-rhinos might have had the easiest deaths. Drop the earth out from under a half-ton beast and bury it in enough rocks for a small mountain? If their necks hadn't snapped in the fall, the shattered ribs would have finished them. As for their riders...

"Kaasan," whispered out of the dark.

"Steady, Private Tennen," Yakume said levelly. Wiggled his toes, grateful habit had kept his helmet on, even in the heat of early summer. Calvary armor wasn't too much lighter, but from the glimpse he'd had while they were all falling, he had a nasty feeling Tennen had gone down sideways.

Agni, please. He's only a child.

Well. Nineteen, if Tennen was a day. Still too young for an old soldier to want to listen to him die.

"J-Juzou and Ginji aren't..."

"They were closer to the center, son," Yakume said quietly. "I'm sorry." He forced a bit of amused snarl into his voice. "When I catch the mind behind these traps, I'm going to make sure they stay alive. Long enough to tell us everything."

If, the bitterly practical part of him pointed out. Whoever's clever enough to sabotage us like this won't be easily caught.

And whoever does the catching... it's not going to be you.

No, likely not. There would have to be someone looking for them to find them, and given the street pit trap had been cleverly set up to hold the weight of people, yet collapse under the rhinos, and the rumbles that had made it clear there were more than just the pit which had taken them...

The odds were high there were more traps, waiting under stone for the rescuers. Possibly even earthbenders - and this terrain would be perfect for earthbenders.

General Iroh would have seen them rescued. No matter what it took. The forces Princess Azula had left in command?

I doubt it.

Miya and their boys would survive. Say what you liked about some of the noble idiots in Onsenzakura, the resort town was far enough north to have been out of the war for decades. Even if their clans hadn't been there, veteran's wives looked after each other. His family would be all right.

Enough fretting. Is there anything else you can do?

Hmm. The rubble had settled somewhat. Carefully, Yakume tried to twist.

Pain is only a warning. Do what you must.

Stone crackled and muttered, pieces rattling as the master sergeant tried to squirm from flat on his back to leaning more on his right. His knee was going to hate him, but the rubble seemed a little thinner on that side. By feel, at least. He couldn't see anything.

He hoped that was because of the dark.

Stay calm. Panic uses air faster. Be calm.

"Master Sergeant?" More clattering rocks.

"Stay still, Private!" Yakume barked. Damn. Not his imagination. He could hear the pain-wracked gasp, the hint of liquid in the breath that spoke of organs injured, lungs punctured-

Agni, don't let him die here. Not in the dark.

"Stay still." Yakume forced his voice level. "I'm going to come to you." If I have to tear down a mountain to do it.

Hands in shattered stone, he hesitated. He couldn't see what he was doing. One wrong move could bring the whole pile crashing down.

Better a quick death than lingering in the dark. Put away fear. Act.

He wasn't facing toward Tennen... but he wasn't more than a compass-quarter away, either. Which might be to their advantage. Digging a curving tunnel would create less of a long void in the pile, making it less likely to shift suddenly and catastrophically. He hoped.

Never would have thought I'd be glad this isn't my first cave-in.

He'd told Lu-shan the truth, after all. He didn't like the Earth Kingdom. He knew them too well.

The pit traps are new.

Which was more than a little worrisome. One of the reasons their army had carved off as much of the Earth Kingdom as they had over the past century was Earth's military doctrine. Unfailing, unflinching, all but unassailable in their fortresses so long as their nerves and supplies held out... yet also unchanging. Walls were sacred. Walls were defended. Walls marked yours and other.

Scar the earth with pits to trap your enemy before he could reach your walls? Those of earth wouldn't like it, but they'd do it. Destroy your own walls and streets to kill an enemy? Unthinkable.

Only someone thought of it.

Had thought it out partway, at least, Yakume decided. The trap was only a pit, a sinkhole cracking open once enough weight marched on top. No sand to smother and suffocate. No spikes at the bottom to pierce through armor like seaweed gel.

Like the ruin and fire he'd dealt with at Lu-shan's side that horrible night. Like dozens of other petty and violent disruptions of life in the rings of Ba Sing Se. Dangerous. Distracting. Lethal. Yet not as lethal as they could have been.

Someone's fighting us. Fighting hard. But they're not a soldier. They'll kill us if they have to. But slaughter? No.

...And he was going to think about that, as he pried at the rubble between himself and Private Tennen. He was going to think of their opponent, who they were, why they might think they were doing this, and not the dead around him. He would honor his fellow soldiers' deaths, and find the mind responsible for this ambush.

And while he was at it, he'd spare a few curses for High Command. Take the generals out of the city. Deprive the earthbenders and their army of leadership. Wonderful idea.

Only someone was leading the rebel earthbenders. Someone who definitely wasn't a general. Agni, it was as if they didn't even know Earth Army doctrine-

Wrestling with a boulder the size of a rice sack, Yalume froze. Listened to creaks, and held still as loose bits pattered off his helmet.

An amateur. We're fighting a civilian.

A very determined civilian, who apparently had the authority to order earthbenders to carry out the unthinkable. Given how the Earth Kingdoms worked, that had to be a noble.

Which, again, made no sense. He'd heard more than enough about all the nobles in this city...

All the nobles, Yakume realized, except one.

A chill danced down his spine-

Yakume opened his mouth, drawing in a breath that tasted of earth and death... and of a cool dryness like cold northern winds. Air. That's air!

And where there was a breeze, there was a route to the surface. "Here!" He tried not to cough, dust coating his tongue. "We're down here!"

Silence. One pebble clicked, distant in the darkness.

The earth roared.

Coughing, Yakume blinked at the long shadows of sunset. Against his will, he leaned into the familiar hands dragging him out of the wreckage. "Captain Lu-shan-"

"Formal even if it kills you," the Guard captain complained, half-carrying him clear. "Why am I not surprised?"

Yakume spat out black dust, coughed again. Ow. "Put me down. I'll live. Private Tennen-"

"They're getting him, you overgrown fire-striker. Relax."

Yakume blinked, vision blurred; dust or concussion, he wasn't sure. "They?"

Sandy wraps swarmed them.

Sandbenders. Yakume's pulse jumped as the nomads moved like a walking dune, screening himself and Lu-shan from the troops he heard marching toward the disaster. Not good.

Sane people didn't tackle the desert, firebenders or not. The sun was their ally, yes - but desert nights were cold. And sandbenders didn't go to war. They raided, and faded away, never the same place twice. Only a fool made war on shifting sands.

"Stay down," Lu-shan said, gruffly gentle. "I know this tribe. Their word's good, once you get it. If any of your men are left down there, they'll find them." He tapped a dent in Yakume's armor. "Damn, that one was close."

Ow. The bruises were going to be torture, he could tell already. "I'm sure they'll get luckier one of these days." Yakume said dryly.

"I hope not."

Startled, Yakume eyed the man.

"You're a damn Fire Nation killer, and I want you the hell out of my city," Lu-shan said sharply. "But you're our damn Fire soldier, and you've kept your end of the bargain. Puts you mountains above the rest of them. I want you all gone. But if you're not gone? I'll take the man who's put his neck on the line for my streets."

Touching, Yakume thought. Unless you were the one who gave the rebels the information to ambush us.

No. No, he didn't think so. Lu-shan, too, had kept his end of the bargain. If he'd meant to break their fragile arrangement, the captain would have warned him first.

...Which meant it was probably someone else in the station. Damn it.

Treachery later. Casualties now. "Have they found any-"

"Stay still." One of the nomads; tall, face unwrapped in the dampness of the city, with that polished-bone look of the water-starved. His voice grated, like sand on stone. "You will frighten Amisi."

Yakume squinted through the screen of bodies, where a young woman in loose, hooded robes was turning rubble into sand to shift it away. Her moves were more fluid than most earthbenders, with an arching sway that reminded him of tall stones and moaning wind. "I see. Thank you."

One of the man's brows went up.

"You're searching for my people," Yakume said tautly. "General Iroh himself would be polite."

The glance was swift and subtle. Yakume almost missed it.

Why would a desert nomad be interested in an outlaw general?

One way to find out. "Master Sergeant Yakume." He inclined his head; as well as he could, seated on the street with battered armor and a worse knee. "Whom do I owe for this help?"

"Runihura," the nomad answered, after a long moment. "And you owe us nothing, Yakume of Onsenzakura. The Earth King has already paid your debt."

What?

"Earth King Kuei... what?" Lu-shan said in disbelief.

"The winds have changed, and the world is shifting." Runihura looked into the distance. "You are a man who seeks truth, and so I will give it to you."

Why does that sound like a threat?

"Our shamans listen to the desert. They feel the heat of the sun, lingering in the sands. They hear the wailing wind. Earth King Kuei has made alliance with the sun's blood. Those who follow it... have a choice." A last, hard look, and he vanished into the sand-hued throng.

Yakume traded a glance with Lu-shan, wondering if he looked half as rattled as the captain.

"Always knew they were weird," Lu-shan grumbled. "But - Oma and Shu, they found somebody!"

Yakume gripped his arm, and let the captain drag him along.

Tennen.

Amisi was still sifting sand, other men obviously guarding her, gripping her shoulders as she slumped and shook her head. Another young woman was bent over the private, ghosting gentle fingers along the pulse of his throat as she listened to his breath.

Heart in his throat, Yakume listened with her.

Head pillowed on dusty scraps, Tennen snored.

Yakume let out a relieved breath, pain gnawing at him again. No one with bruised lungs could snore like that.

But I was so sure...

"Let him sleep," the healer said, voice quiet as the hush before dawn. She moved her hands across Tennen's forehead, a faint scent of water-lilies wafting in her wake. "It will help."

Yakume bit back a snarl that would have sounded something like barbarians, lack of combat medical training, and concussion. Glanced at Lu-shan. The captain had apparently worked for years with a very good healer. If anyone should know one when he saw them work-

Lu-shan looked - startled. "Ma'am." He hesitated, then forged onward. "Are you... blind?"

Yakume blinked, and took a second look as she grew very still. And had to keep himself from a sardonic laugh. Granted, that was a clever bit of malachite about her eyes to give that greenish hue, but... "Haven't you ever seen gray eyes before, Captain?"

Silence. And the sudden, sinking feeling that he was surrounded.

Keep calm. The troops are coming. Keep them distracted, what did I say- oh. "You haven't, have you?" Yakume smiled bitterly. "You people are such hypocrites. Strong villages for a strong kingdom, you say. But your villages don't exist without people. Stiff-necked, hidebound, complacent peasants, who want every day to be just like the last. And when someone's born who doesn't fit, who reminds you there once was a time the whole Earth Kingdom feared the skies..." He snorted. "Gray eyes happen, Lu-shan. Even in the Water Tribes. I hear they don't like to talk about it either."

And here's where they kill me. If they dare. He kept his gaze on the healer. Those fluttering scraps she'd draped over it might disguise the blade from casual glances, but no one wore a sword at their shoulder like that unless they knew what they were doing.

"Sometimes, I don't know what the hell goes through your head," Lu-shan muttered. Cleared his throat. "I know he's insulting, but we have an arrangement-"

And... yes. Red and black in view, and closing. Yakume carefully didn't smile.

"The truth is no insult." The healer rose. "We, too, remember the raids of the White Wind."

"The... what?" Lu-shan asked, confused.

"You called them Air Nomads." She inclined her head, tucking dark strands back under her hood. "I am Eshe. And the Touzai will remember you."

They faded away from the troops, leaving Lu-shan looking at Yakume very, very oddly.

The master sergeant raised an eyebrow.

"Never would have thought the Touzai would go for... Fire Nation propaganda," the captain said dryly.

"The best lies are woven with truth." Yakume bared his teeth. "Just ask the Dai Li."

Almost automatically, both looked up at the skyline.

Nothing.

"You know," Lu-shan said, voice low, "I never thought I'd see anything spookier than Dai Li."

"Not seeing Dai Li," Yakume finished, equally quiet. He felt Tennen's pulse again. Still resting. Still steady. "What in Agni's name are they up to?"

"The mission went well?" Bon asked, keeping his voice low. He couldn't feel footsteps on the floor of the improvised library behind him; not much more than a hastily raised rock enclosure, with niches hollowed for books. Either Kuei was tearing through yet another stack of scrolls, or sleep had finally ambushed the young king and he was out cold curled up in a chair. Bon was hoping for sleep. Bosco was asleep, away in his den near the Earth King's chambers; the bear showing more common sense than half the people here, in Bon's opinion.

"I'm still compiling the report." Agent Quan looked tired, and just a little dusty. But there was a grim satisfaction glinting in his eyes.

"He won't appreciate being kept in the dark," Bon said firmly. "Again."

"I know. And I won't. I just..." Quan sighed. "He's still not sleeping, is he?"

"Not well, no, sir," Bon admitted. "He's a kind young man. This is hard for him." He shook his head. "I've gone over some of those scrolls Professor Wen and Healer Amaya identified for us. I can help him get some rest. But it's not as good as natural sleep."

"Then my report can wait until I have more details." With an effort, Quan shrugged it off, and smirked. "How's Operation Fainting Maid going?"

"...I hate you, sir," Bon grumbled under his breath.

"If it were easy, Long Feng would have had him married with a handful of heirs by now." Quan glanced aside, a flinch of remembered pain. "He thought that until we could find at least a few good candidates, it was better not to get the Earth King's hopes up. A pity Lady Bei Fong is so young."

"All of Ba Sing Se and we can't find one young lady with enough spiritual strength to marry the king?" Bon said skeptically.

"Earth King Luo Hua thought he had," Quan sighed. "Of all the current crop of nobles who've ever had a report of spirit contact, there's no one - no one - any stronger than Queen Ye Zao was. And when the Earth King was assassinated..."

Reports said the queen hadn't survived him by more than a few minutes, once the spirits were loose. A sobering bit of history Ba Sing Se tried to forget... and the Dai Li never could.

Bon shivered, and spared a glance upward, toward the far-off shafts ventilating the cavern. A necessary risk, they had to have fresh air... yet sometimes he couldn't sleep, imagining some sharp-nosed Fire soldier tracking down an odd breeze.

"I've had some of our university students working on the problem," Quan went on. "It's been a century or two, but this isn't the first time the city's nobles haven't thrown a young lady unlucky enough to draw spirits. Apparently there are tests for those with the strength of spirit we need." He shook his head. "Looking at them, I feel like an idiot. So many of them are Dai Li tests."

Bon raised his eyebrows. "The beaded robe?"

"Partner tests, blindfolding, kamui exposure - you'd recognize at least half of them." Quan grimaced. "You'll like this even better. If our archivists have uncovered the truth? When Kyoshi set us up, there were women in the Dai Li."

Bon stood very still, fighting a rush of pure loneliness. He'd realized, over the past few years, that his odds of having anything like a normal family were vanishingly small. In a way, they were too good at their jobs. The fewer citizens who were exposed to kamuiry wrath, the fewer women who were forced to face spirits and survive. Or not.

It was the or not part that made sane Dai Li hesitate. Even so, once in a while, Bon had to wonder if any other Dai Li had the same dark impulse he'd fought off, one lonely night; slam up walls, let something loose - and bring home the survivors in the morning.

He'd never do it. But sometimes...

We give up everything for our city. Can't it give us something back?

Some agents might have relationships with a Joo Dee. But that'd always struck Bon as - well, ew.

And that, Bon my friend, is why you're still single, the agent told himself. Felt a slight breeze tug at his robes, and glanced about to be sure it was only a physical wind. There were agents keeping watch for malice, but you could never be too sure. "So if the nobles are out, and I'm guessing you've been testing our people here..."

"Earth and Fire," Quan nodded. "Smith Pei's a remarkable man, even if he is blunt as an iron ingot. He's been a great deal of help, and many of their ladies are strong. Just... not quite enough." He smiled a little, wry. "He also had the same suggestion as our priests, and a few of the students. I took them up on it."

"Which is, sir?" Bon asked warily. Why do I have a bad feeling about this?

"Pray."

"Pray," Bon echoed. "Right. Because it'd take a miracle to find spiritually strong women in the middle of a Fire Nation invasion-

Footsteps trembled through his shoes. Too light to be Kuei's. In the library, and not alone-

They were in, gloves ready to fire, before the sand-cloaked individuals could blink. "Don't move," Quan growled.

"Don't wake him," the one looking at Kuei whispered, as the pair of them held very still. "He looks so tired."

"Step back," Quan said coldly. Not at all softened by that gentle, female voice. "Slowly."

Bon slipped between the retreating nomads and the Earth King, doing a quick visual, scent, and touch check of his drowsy charge. No blood, no poisoned needles, nothing more subtle that he could detect. So far, lucky. "Sir? I'm sorry, your majesty, but I think you should wake up now."

"No, Bosco, don't eat the rock candy while it's growing..." Kuei blinked fuzzily at him, feeling around for his glasses. "Agent Bon?"

"Here, sir."

Lenses in place, Kuei blinked again, taking in the room with a dutiful - if unpracticed - attention to possible threats. "Who in the world are you?"

"What I was about to ask, your majesty," Quan said dryly.

"Don't blame Amisi for this," the nomad girl said softly.

"Eshe," her companion warned.

"I... I just wanted to see you," Eshe forged on. "I thought... when the shamans said what you did, I thought you'd be... scary."

Kuei blinked more sleep out of his eyes, and glanced at Bon. Who had to shrug subtly. I have no idea what she's talking about-

One graceful flow of color, the two young women swirled off their hooded cloaks.

...Oh. My.

Lazuli blue robes, so pure it was like looking into endless sky. Gold glimmering from jet-black hair, a brilliantly delicate headdress of hawk wings. Gray eyes, like storms, looking up from where Eshe knelt in the bow Bon knew the Earth King had never seen in his life: lesser foreign power to greater ally.

Gray eyes.

Amisi's were green, alive as the lotus patterns decorating her blue robes. But if they weren't at least cousins, Bon would eat his hat.

They're afraid. Why?

And why did he feel he ought to know those headdresses from somewhere... and spirits, how had he missed Eshe's sword-

Sorceresses! Guanyin save us, those are desert-witch wings!

"Touzaikaze," Kuei said, stunned. "You're... I thought your people were dead."

"Hidden," Amisi said, voice barely shaking. "For a long time. Before Wan Shi Tong drove us from our safe places. After that, things were... hard. For a long time."

"But the Owl has been driven out," Eshe stated. "We could go home."

She hid it well. But her voice wanted to break, Bon could hear it.

"Our shamans..." Eshe swallowed. "The Touzaikaze owe the Earth King a great debt. We have asked how to repay, and learned that..." Her voice dried up. She braced herself, and forged on.

"The Touzaikaze offer alliance. If you find one... acceptable."

...Oh, Bon thought, heart sinking. Oh, you poor girls.

Kuei looked as though someone had hit him with a board. Bon didn't feel much better. No wonder they were trembling.

No wonder they snuck in, either. It hadn't done his nerves any good at all, no - but offered up for a marriage alliance, just because your tribe's shamans said it was the thing to do? Arranged marriages weren't rare, but ouch.

Yeah. I'd do something stupid, too.

Kuei deliberately closed his jaw, and shook himself. "Where are - I mean, your family didn't make - let you come alone..."

"Uncle Runihura and Cousin Haqikah are probably meeting your guards right now," Amisi dared. "The Fire Nation can't find you the way we did, but I don't think that will make them feel better."

"Don't be so sure they can't find us, Lady Amisi," Kuei said sharply. "Princess Azula has left the city with her airbender, but there may be more."

Gray and green eyes went wide. "The Fire Princess has an airbender?" Eshe whispered.

"Sir?" Quan's voice was dry. "Before we listen to any more spirit-tales, I want to know how they got in here."

Bon added up desert legends, and what his king had said, and that out of place breeze... "Through the air shafts." He swallowed, stunned. "You're airbenders."

Eshe inclined her head. "No one is surprised, when wind sculpts the dunes."

"Or when dunes shape the wind," Amisi finished. "Many of us are sandbenders, your majesty. Some... are not."

Kuei took a deep breath. "Rise. Please. Your shamans... they've made a mistake."

Uneasy, the young ladies glanced at each other.

"The Earth King's line cares for the spirits of Ba Sing Se," Kuei said firmly. "We must be strong. We have to have the power to deal with spirits. But after all that, we have to care."

Eshe bit her lip, and looked aside in demure disagreement. "We do care. We are - we have a duty to our people, to the desert's spirits, as you do to the city's. We are here of our own will, freely."

Right, Bon thought, not believing a word of it. When going against the tribe's will gets you abandoned in the deep desert with no waterskin. He'd heard about the desert nomads. Who hadn't?

Still. Airbenders?

"You're here, but you're scared." Kuei winced, obviously trying to find a better way to say it, then giving up. "It won't work."

They flinched.

Damn. If the shaman's told them to come, they probably can't go back... "What his majesty's trying to say," Bon put in, thinking fast, "is that the royal family's bonds of compassion are as essential as power to deal with the city's spirits. Discord in the king's bloodline leads to chaos in the city. It leads to death. Horrible, widespread, and spirit-cursed... and we do not have enough Dai Li to save the city from another night as we suffered twenty years ago." He cast a glance at Kuei. "The Earth King's marriages have often been arranged. But that was usually when they were princes, and parents could allow young men and ladies to meet, and see if they might at least like each other..." Come on, pick up, I know you have no experience at all, but - oh, who am I kidding? You're clueless-

"Does that sword still mean you're a healer?" Kuei blurted out. "Some of the scrolls I have - here, let me show you..."

...Back to the books. Bon sighed, as Kuei almost tripped over his robes in his haste to show their two attractive intruders a scroll. Well, it could have been worse.

Eshe touched the spread paper respectfully, some of the tremors easing out of her hands. "A work of Na-Au the Lame... have you read this?"

"A long time ago," Kuei admitted. "And then, after we found the earth-healing scrolls - we need all the healers we can get, I thought it might help-" He looked down at her. And hastily up a little. Looking at gray eyes. Firmly.

I'm not going to laugh.

"If your tribe wants an alliance - we can use your help. We can use anybody's help. But if you want... more than that..." Kuei swallowed. "Would you like to meet my people?"

Chapter End Notes

Leste - a hot, intensely dry easterly wind that blows autumn through spring, accompanied by clouds of fine red sand.

Why yes, I do love Bridge of Birds. One of the best fantasies ever.

Chapter 46

Chapter Notes

Is it just me, or is Azula scarier when she's sane?

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Studying her maps as the tank approached the harbor, Azula considered a triangle of betrayal.

Byakko. Pohuai Stronghold. The Northern Air Temple.

The last seemed foolish on the face of things. But Uncle Iroh believed in spirits, in tradition, and in honor to the restless dead. Sane commanders would only see a crushing defeat in the North. Uncle... would see something far more dire.

Dire enough to drive him into blatant treachery? And take my brother with him?

She still didn't have as many details about her brother's escape from the North as she wanted. She had more, now, certainly; hawks to Onsenzakura and other places her brother had been sighted had made sure of that. But how, exactly, her brother and uncle had managed to last three weeks on a makeshift raft in the middle of the Northern seas with only scavenged supplies...

Zuzu always was hard to kill.

Azula wouldn't have liked to try it herself. She could admit that. With no one else in the room. It would have been... stressful.

Hmm. And most people are too weak to deal with stress properly.

Given her brother had never quite gotten a grip on the restful habit of working out frustrations by finding someone to barbecue, a few days with Uncle at a spa wouldn't have been nearly enough to calm down.

...Then again, given the choice between a few days at a spa with Uncle, and a few weeks fighting off sea vultures, the spa might have been worse.

Trapped with tea, Uncle flirting with any pretty girl in sight, and laziness. Zuko must have been climbing the walls. Azula grimaced. I miscalculated. Badly.

Either she should have grabbed them as soon as they'd hit shore - impossible, unfortunately - or waited a few days for Zuko to pry himself loose from Iroh and start hunting the area for Avatar-sign again. She should have found an excuse to linger in the harbor, simply there, rather than approach directly. There had to have been a bit of bribery and smuggling at the docks she could deal with for the throne. There was always smuggling on docks.

And interrogations were so amusing.

Well. She hadn't, her brother had still been jumpy enough to react like a soldier under boulder fire, and that idiot captain had opened his mouth. Ah well.

So now her brother and uncle were loose - she'd never assumed Ty Lee had killed him, she hadn't managed it yet, and Gaipan's reports confirmed she still hadn't - and they'd caught up with one of the few people in the Fire Nation she never would have expected to openly defy the Fire Lord.

Though Shidan of Byakko hadn't. Quite. Supposedly.

Either my spy of a grandfather is utterly sincere, or he's playing our enemies against the Fire Lord.

Dangerous, treacherous - and all too likely. Byakko had never really believed in a unified Fire Nation, no matter what Avatar Kyoshi might have decreed. Byakko believed in Byakko. Anyone outside was a potential threat.

Which wasn't entirely unreasonable, Azula had to admit. Shirotora wasn't a tame caldera like the capital. Byakko's mountain was a monster on a leash of lives, only willing to lie down because it chose to. How could anyone focus on conquering the world when they had a permanent test of wills in their own backyard?

From such a self-absorbed, selfish domain, what could anyone expect but betrayal?

They were at war. They were bare months away from needing the Yu Yan in the capital for the eclipse. Stealing some of them right out from under their commander's nose, making it blatantly obvious that was exactly what Shidan was doing? Lady Kotone's explanation to the Fire Lord had to be a lie...

Yet Byakko was known for not lying.

They were careful with the truth. And sometimes suspiciously silent. Reliable sources of Azula's own among the Fire Nation's spies said Shidan was under orders from Kotone never to enter the palace. Or approach the Fire Lord. Ever.

Given Azula's own suspicions about her mother's fate, the order made perfect sense. Not that she doubted her father could handle the matter. But it would be so messy.

Mother never lied, either.

She'd known that, as long as she could remember. Which was why Ursa's words hurt. She was a monster. And if Ty Lee was her friend, it was because the acrobat wasn't much different. Air didn't love. Didn't feel the way normal people did. No one could love a monster-

Zuko loves you.

Damn that Water Tribe woman.

Though it might even be true. No one had ever accused her brother of sense.

Which meant that insane as it seemed, Azula had to consider the other option. What if Lady Kotone's private message to the Fire Lord was true?

Azula traced the river up from Gaipan, along the coast, across northern seas. And around, to where a hidden band of Earth Kingdom refugees had built war machines atop a mountain dedicated to peace. And then revolted, with the Avatar's willing help.

They control the air.

Which was exactly what the Yu Yan were meant to fight. If fighting was what Shidan had in mind;

Kotone's message had mentioned using rumors of traitors to the Fire Nation, like Jeong Jeong, to convince the poor fools to let them in.

And now, with my brother and uncle, the rumor is truth. Azula tapped a nail against the map, a raindrop-pattering of thought.

If Zuko really is like Mother... perhaps he's telling the truth, too.

The Northern Air Temple and its Mechanist were valuable war resources. Leaving them free to fight for the Avatar was unacceptable. Letting them fall into a traitor's grasp-

Azula raised an eyebrow. Considering treachery, and her brother, and the report from Sergeant Aoi and his men.

Zuko helped the Avatar. But he is not with the Avatar.

The airbender, in point of fact, had allowed Earth General Gang to assault and trap the Suzuran. Bad luck for the general. And far, far worse for the Avatar.

A pity Great-grandfather Sozin hadn't lived to see it. How he'd have laughed.

Healing fire could fracture our nation. But we can deal with a civil war. First, we have to survive.

And in that one failure to act, Avatar Aang had ensured they would. How deliciously ironic.

You think my brother is a fool, Avatar. He is. You think he is harmless, helpless to stop you. You think he is alone.

And there, you fail.

He is not alone. He is not an idiot. If you drove him off, if you made him abandon someone he tried to help, when even exile did not break him of clinging to his duty...

Azula considered that, and her brother's simmering rage. And smiled.

Zuko and Uncle will take the Temple. They will deny it to you.

And you have only yourself to blame.

She'd have to make sure word reached the Avatar when Zuko succeeded. Rumors, to start; casual, outlandish things the airbender would try to laugh off... and shiver at, in the depths of the night. Then a scattering of firmer facts. And then... oh, and then...

Chuckling, Azula scratched nails lightly along steel. Kill the Avatar, and another would be born. Crush his spirit, crush his hope, and they would win without fighting.

She frowned then, and traced the map again. The problem was the skies. Or rather, one particular sky bison. So long as the Avatar could travel freely by air, he could return to the Temple and win its foolish inhabitants over again. The Yu Yan would oppose him, but even they couldn't fight an Avatar and hostile civilians on the ground at the same time-

Her eye fell on an Earth Kingdom fortress in the north, where the Avatar had been reported at winter's end. A fortress whose general had tried to leash the Avatar's power to destroy the Fire Nation - and didn't care how many died in the process.

"Now what would General Fong do," Azula mused, "if he learned Ji the Mechanist worked for the Fire Nation?"

Timing would be critical. She'd have to calculate Suzuran's speed, how fast Fong would come to a decision, how swiftly he could move his troops for the assault. And coordinate it all by hawks, as she made her way across the ocean as a dutiful daughter. But with a little work...

If Fong killed Zuko - not likely - Iroh would kill him. Which would rid the Fire Nation of two thorns in one blow. If Fong didn't kill her brother...

General Fong was a known vicious, arrogant noble hothead of an earthbender. The methods he would use on civilians who'd fled to the highest mountains in hopes of being left alone... would be extreme.

Enjoy your present, Zuzu.

Jammed into Iroh's cabin with most of his family, Tingzhe polished his reading glasses and gave Shidan a look of frank annoyance. "What sort of gift of a tale do you have, that a child can't hear it?" And what sort of family gathering is this, that leaves out my son, yet includes...

Well. If Amaya were here with Iroh and Zuko, it made sense to bring Mai and Lieutenant Teruko in as well. Both Fire Nation ladies had made their interests quite clear. Even if Meixiang had had to explain certain... implications to knife-sharpening. On both sides.

He still wasn't sure whether to be amused or aghast at his wife trading comments with the marine about choosing your level of grit. He wasn't quite sure he wanted to know.

And possibly it made sense for Langxue and Saoluan to be here. Teacher and student could be as tight a bond as family, and the youngest yāorén would need Zuko's training as much as Jinhai did. Certainly he was no airbender - but the prince was the only living person on the ship who'd ever fought one.

Still. Why?

"You may tell Jinhai of it later, if you wish," the elderly firebender said gravely. "But it is our custom that such tales are not to be gifted to those too young to-" He paused. Cleared his throat. Eyed Jia and Suyin - and, surprising Tingzhe, Langxue and Zuko. "One needs to be of a certain... age."

"Ooo." Saoluan smirked. "There's sex in this."

Langxue reddened. Min blinked. And Zuko looked as if he wanted to sink through the floor.

Tingzhe eyed a beaming Iroh, and felt very sorry for the boys.

"Yes," Shidan admitted warily. "There is also death. And betrayal. And a great many complicated things. It is not knowledge that should be within children. It is dangerous." He smiled gently. "But it is also a beautiful tale, and one that has come too close to being lost. My daughters all know it, but Ursa left while Zuko was too young for its gift. I would remedy that."

"So we have to listen jammed in like sardine-herrings?" Jia muttered under her breath.

"We need to be close enough to join hands, young lady," Shidan answered, unperturbed. "It is the only proper way to live the tale."

Live the tale? Tingzhe wondered, clasping Meixiang's right hand as his own gripped Shirong's, and the Dai Li in turn gripped Zuko's. Doesn't he mean hear-

Shidan's eyes closed, and the world shifted.

So loud-flocking-weaponsdown is a human-gathering, Ryuuko-hime thought, crouched next to a few tumbled boulders as the two-legged group arranged wood, rocks, and various odd containers. When oddhumans not trying to kill each other.

Not that they ever seemed to really kill each other. They'd gather in separate groupings, posture and yell, and charge each other with the long metal claws they called swords. Yet no matter how much damage they did to each other, they always seemed to stop short of killing blows. Even the most seriously injured human was always up and around in a few days. She'd hidden near one of the display-fights just to watch their healers work. It was magical.

Healing notfire notwater notair notearth. Not of here. No wonder Father-of-Fire worries.

And when elders claimed Father-of-Fire was worried, a wise young dragon investigated.

Besides. Humans were turning out to be fun to watch.

Like now. Some of the humans had already pegged into the ground the colored web-like shelters their mouth-noises named tents. Others were setting up folding tables and chairs, or building fires in circles of rock to burn wood for no obvious reason. They didn't heal with fire, so why-?

Lookthere! Kingami!

Ryuuko-hime held still, not even letting her tail twitch in interest. Yes, they were supposed to use numbers to refer to the humans. There were so many of them. And no one knew which spirits were supposed to look after these strange creatures. Naming them could be dangerous.

But the gold-maned one was kind. He always killed his food cleanly. He walked carefully along cliffs, never stirring stones to strike the unwary below. And often, like now, he had the human-young gathered around him, chattering away like sparrowkeets as he arranged rocks in two linked circles, lighting a fire in one and-

Oh, interesting.

In the larger circle Kingami had a fire burning steady and even. As it burned, he used a steel paw, a shovel, to scoop embers from the large to the small, until he had a ready bed of coals. Neatly done, for one who could not bend fire. So what was he doing now?

Wind brought the rich scent as Kingami lifted dripping meat from a container. Ryuuko-hime licked her fangs. Mmm... an odd spice-scent from the sauces slathered over it. But it was meat, being propped on a net of steel to properly cook, and maybe humans weren't as strange as they looked after all. Even if they used throat-rumbles of words and ears, instead of touch and heart.

Mmm. A juicy scent. And it'd been some time since breakfast.

Got close get closer maybe?

Heh. They didn't call her Asagitatsu's Thief for nothing.

Step. Pause. Wriggle. Play big, blue, scaly rock. Step. And remember not to drool, no matter how good it smelled.

...And maybe prissy elders might have called the heat-shimmers she'd bent around herself, to look more like rock and less like dragon, cheating. But this was sneaking. Not fighting. Anything was fair in sneaking.

Little farther, little more... looking this way? See only rock - oof!

The human-cub slid its hand along her side, looking puzzled. Screwed up its face to wail-

Eeep! Shh shh sleepycub shh warmsleep safe find Kingami cuddlewarm!

Odd blue eyes blinked. Small fingers poked azure scales. An image of Kingami fluttered back along that touch, with warm and almost-uncle.

Yes! Cuddlewarm Kingami go... ooo, smells good!

The human-cub thought so too, tugging her mane as it scampered over to where Kingami was lifting skewers of meat off the embers. Which gave Ryuuko-hime an even bolder idea.

Going to get yelled at.

But even the crankiest, most winter-achy dragon elder would admit it was worth it. Just to see how much like dragons humans really were.

...And to see the look on their faces.

A very large, warm, friendly rock, she nudged herself in at the end of the human-cub line weaving toward the meat. Kingami was taking it off the embers a skewer at a time, pushing bits off onto the cubs' flat rocklike plates with the small metal claw of a fork.

The last cub in front of her took its meat and headed for some of the other savories on a table that smelled of greens and fruits and tubers fried and salted. One hand still wrapped in cloth, Kingami was absently taking yet another skewer off the coals. Probably for the adult humans.

Delicately, she reached out with a whisker to touch his shoulder. Kingami? One more hungrycub hmm?

Sighing, he turned-

The look on his face was priceless.

Gently, very gently, she plucked the meat and steel from his grip. A swift move of her tongue bent heat away from her teeth; she walked on lava when she had to, this was nothing.

He still wasn't moving.

She smirked. And winked at him. Mine!

"Urk?" He gulped.

Ryuuko-hime Asagitatsu's Thief ha gotcha!

"Hey!"

Proper introductions made, Ryuuko-hime scampered off with her prize. Bounding and leaping, not flying; humans couldn't bend fire, and you did not spill embers around hatchlings. It just wasn't right.

There was a lot of angry mouth-noise rising behind her.

Hee hee hee...

Up and fly. Circle, and... yes. There was a perch, in plain view, so she could taunt at will.

Landing, she took the metal bit in one claw, and slurped the meat off with teeth and tongue. Mmm, chomp, mmm...

Whooooaaah hoooooot!

Water. Water water water...

What felt like half a stream later, Ryuuko-hime sat back on her haunches, panting. And - reluctantly - smirked.

Heh. Heh heh heh. She tongued a scrap of spiced meat out from between her teeth. Clever Kingami! Got me!

Well. No proper thief would let that pass unchallenged.

She'd start by returning the skewer...

Ow. Tingzhe took the cup of tea without a murmur of protest. It wouldn't cure the headache, but it'd at least dull the stabbing knife in his head.

The short mind-tales don't hurt.

And how he knew that, the scholar in him shied away from thinking about. Shidan hadn't had time to give them short tales. He'd buried them under Ryuuko-hime and her brave human Kingami, under all the tangle of love and peril and spirits that had come with two lives striving to find common ground. Under the vast, heartbreaking mess that had been a people struck down by a plague they could not fight, and the desperate bargain with the spirits that had shattered them apart...

We were one people, once. Not kingdoms and tribes and conquerors. One people. Kin.

But dragons and bison were not kin, and sides had been taken. And while cooler heads might have prevailed against that feud, or against the sickness scything lives down... together, the strain had been too much to bear. One people had splintered into four, and not even a dragon-princess and her beloved could heal the hate. They could only build, and love, and remember.

Memory. Passed down from dragon to dragon, dragon-child, and kin. For... spirits, I can't even count the generations.

But he could feel them. Ghosts of countless lives of talon and wing and fire. Of learning human thoughts, human words, yet never quite being of the two-legs...

It was... a bit odd... being only human again.

More than odd, the professor thought, feeling the warmth of Meixiang's hand on his own. Knowing that warmth, now, for more than mere touch. It was a fire of the mind; constantly seeking, constantly testing.

Are you prey? Enemy? Kin?

He could feel Meixiang reaching. But he couldn't answer. Not the way that long-lost firebender had been able to. Kingami could bend the energy within himself. All Tingzhe had was earth.

"I love you," Meixiang murmured.

Tingzhe smiled, comforted. And made certain Jia got her tea, even if she wanted to fuss and claim she didn't need it. There was so much to think about...

"Asagitatsu doesn't look like that anymore," Langxue said over the clinking cups.

And perhaps it was his imagination, but Tingzhe swore he felt the shock radiating from a handful of firebenders. "You know where Asagitatsu is?" Shidan said tautly.

"You just showed it to us," Langxue protested.

"I showed you the volcano as it was," Shidan said bluntly. "Hundreds of Avatars have lived and died. The mountains themselves have been scoured by wind and rain, or lifted by the fire within their hearts. The clans of Shirotona and Asagitatsu have not been allies for a long, long time. I know it is north. I know it is danger. I know it killed Yangchen, it will erupt again, and we dared not seek for it with the Fire Lords hunting dragons. I do not know where it lies."

"Typical," Langxue muttered. "Kills dozens of us, and the only one people talk about is the Avatar. Yangchen would bust heads about that, trust me. She knew the Avatar couldn't be everywhere-hey!"

Saoluan poked his shoulder again. "Big, blowing up fire-mountain," the warrior said frankly. "Where?"

"Why's it matter? We're not..." Langxue stared at Zuko, eyes narrowed in suspicion. "North. And maybe-airbenders. No. You wouldn't."

Zuko raised his brow. Unfolded a map of the northern continent, to lay it in front of all those seated. And pointed.

Ah, Tingzhe thought. Indeed.

"Are you insane?" Langxue yelped. "You were planning to put us on a volcano? That's-"

Iroh coughed into his fist. "Entirely common, in the Fire Nation." He paused. "Though I had thought the mount by the Northern Air Temple was unnamed. I pray it still is."

"I don't," Meixiang said gravely. "Remember the old rhyme, General."

"I know many," he stated. "Which one?"

Teruko cleared her throat. "With all due respect, General, you don't know this one. Or you wouldn't have to ask." She inclined her head at Meixiang; go on.

"Listen, and remember," Meixiang stated, gathering her kin with her eyes. "Volcanoes of earth kill. Those of water destroy. Listen, and learn the names of death. Kurokame. Akitori. Shirotona. Asagitatsu."

"Lake boil, burn stone
"Shirotora stands alone
"Five hundred years from rage to rage
"Tiger rattles at his cage.

"Lake boil, burn stone
"Asagitatsu stands alone
"A thousand years from rage to rage
"Dragon rattles at her cage."

Silence. Tingzhe gripped her fingers tightly.

"Every five centuries, more or less, Shirotora wishes very much to explode," Shidan said into the stunned hush. "It is what saved Byakko in Sozin's time, and saves us to this day. If we keep to ourselves some children who may be firebenders, if we train them in our ways and not the Fire Lord's schools - Shirotora is deadly, and he will kill, unless coaxed otherwise." He paused. "Kurokame waits six thousand years; Akitori, half that long. Both are beyond the lands of men, safe-kept by dragons who wish nothing to do with humankind. Only Asagitatsu remains, once held by Makoto's blood." Clawed fingers clenched. "If Asagitatsu slew Avatar Yangchen, and has since kept silent... she is a hundred years overdue."

"If," Iroh said firmly. "We cannot be sure."

"Yes," Tingzhe said, startling himself. "I believe we can."

Well. He was used to eyes on him in the lecture hall. This was different.

Tingzhe straightened his shoulders, and nodded, just as if he were about to instruct a class. "Shidan's... tale, tells us of both kinds of volcanoes. Those of earth have limited effects. The ash..." Unconsciously he rubbed his fingers together, remembering the feel of unseen bits of glass in soot. "The ash can travel miles, yes. A few days' ride, likely." He paused. "There is no volcano a few days from Ba Sing Se."

Ah. Undivided attention. If only his pupils had been as rapt.

"There are two layers I can be sure of," Tingzhe went on. "Very old, very deep, and in every land I have ever dug in. The elder marks about two thousand years ago. The younger... was eleven hundred years ago. Almost exactly." He swallowed dryly. "Ba Sing Se has records of the blackened sky, the fall of ash; the walking dead from the north, who had breathed ash and drowned on dry land. Avatar Yangchen's death brought horror, and fear. No nation dared attack another. There was nothing to spare to attack with. The spirits' only blessing was that it was winter. Had that ash fallen a few months earlier or later, on the crops..." He shook his head.

"We can't do this," Min said, stunned.

Tingzhe fought not to raise an eyebrow, and eyed his daughters when they might have leapt to protest. Min had a point.

"He's right," Langxue said shakily. "Yangchen couldn't get Asagitatsu to back down. All of us together couldn't! Sure, we were holding off Subodei - but there were dozens of us, and you've only got two yāorén here-

"Three," Shirong put in.

"Because one more makes so much of a difference," Langxue said sarcastically. He stood. "Make another plan. Turn this ship around. We can't win this!"

"We have to." Still seated, Zuko tapped the map once, stark and deadly. "Look."

"There's nothing on that map that makes suicide-"

"Look."

Langxue looked; at the cove, at the marked volcano, at the symbol of the ancient temple. And rubbed what had to be a worse headache than Tingzhe's. "They'll die if they stay. We'll have to get them out, too."

Zuko glanced at him. Moved his finger west-northwest, to what had to be a very chill harbor indeed. "That's where the fleet went down."

An awful victory, yes, Tingzhe thought. But I don't see-

And then he did, horribly, Shidan's gifted memories of Koh and dragons and the Face-Stealer's victims reeling through his head like a nightmare.

"The Face-Stealer holds the drowned dead," Langxue got out, pale. "Tui and La, protect us."

"They're already busy protecting their own," Amaya told him. "If the Avatar noticed nothing amiss after the Ocean walked - they are protecting the Northern Water Tribe." She traced her own finger over the map. "Tug the currents here, strongly, and no wind from Asagitatsu would reach them. That is where they will spend their power." Blue eyes swept over them all. "We have our own histories, chanted and written. The year Avatar Kuruk was born, the southern sky grew black. You could hear a roaring, as of a wounded snow-beast, that went on and on for days. But it did not touch us."

"They're not going to be that lucky this time," Zuko muttered. Raised his gaze, and his voice, as all eyes went to him. "Not with all that death in the water. Right there, where the Face-Stealer can use it! And he will. People are going to die. Half the world is going to die! We have to go. We have to stop it!"

"The Avatar," Iroh began.

Zuko shot to his feet. "Asagitatsu eats Avatars, Uncle! Aang's young, he doesn't know fire, and she will kill him. That's Koh's plan! It's been his plan all along!"

Iroh rose, matching the angry gaze with his steadiness. "Explain, nephew."

"You can't see it?" Zuko waved at the map. "How can you not see it? Plot, lethal, twisted, walk right into it if you're lucky - it's right there!"

"We have not all had the benefit of your sister's devoted attentions," Iroh said dryly. "What do you see?"

"A hundred years," Zuko bit out. "Where would the Elders have sent Aang to learn water? Where did he go?" He pointed toward the northern ice. "Aang's got the curiosity of a cat-owl and the survival sense of a gnat. If he saw a mountain smoking, what do you think he'd do? What did he do, at the Wu Shan volcano? Run like a sane person? No! He tried to stop it! And walls and trenches and blowing air around might stop lava, but what Asagitatsu's going to throw at him?" Zuko's hands clenched, fire blazing for a heartbeat.

"You mean, what she's going to throw at us," Shirong managed.

"Not without warning," Shidan said thoughtfully. "It takes months for a water volcano to ready itself to erupt." He nodded toward the mark of the Northern Air Temple. "Which is likely why we are all still breathing now. Aang was not in the north long enough. Not nearly as long as he should have been, to truly learn water."

"Because he ran off," Zuko said, half to himself. "He went south and got himself frozen. And Katara learned water up there instead. Blind, dumb luck." He let out a breath. "Shidan's right. Asagitatsu's not going to blow yet. Not until late summer. Harvest." He smirked, cold and angry. "This time, Koh wants to be sure."

Tingzhe held his family tightly, horrors out of history sending ice down his spine. Ash across the fields, destroying the crops. Ash in the lakes, choking the fish. Ash filling lungs, with no bending healers to save those choking on their own blood.

Guanyin. Agni. Help us all.

"And you think we can stop him." Shirong sounded too stunned to disbelieve.

"Yes."

Fear and strength and pure will, beating back the dark. Tingzhe remembered to breathe.

Shirong nodded, and spread empty hands. "How?"

How indeed, Tingzhe wondered, caught between terror and amazement. If Asagitatsu could kill Avatars-!

"Asagitatsu is bound to Makoto's blood," Zuko said firmly. And swallowed. "Makoto was Fire Lady Tejina. Sozin's wife."

Mother of Azulon, the mind of a scholar filled in, as Tingzhe tried not to sputter. Grandmother of Iroh, and Fire Lord Ozai...

Spirits and little fishes. They had Makoto's children.

"It should let us get close enough to talk," Zuko went on. "If she's willing to hear us out, if she'll let us soothe the magma down... We don't have enough firebenders, I know that. We don't have enough training in volcanoes, even if we did. But we have earthbenders. We have waterbenders! It's the water in the magma that kills people! If we can open vents, bend it out, take the pressure off-!"

Iroh regarded his nephew thoughtfully. Turned his glance on Shidan.

"It is possible," the dragon said, reluctantly. "If Asagitatsu is willing to be persuaded. It might work. But the risk-"

"Is worth it." Zuko's eyes seemed to devour the map, before he gave them a glance that should have seared the very air with its fierceness. "If we win this, we win it all."

Shirong eyed the map. And Zuko. And the map again. "No," he said in disbelief.

"Yes!" Teruko was grinning ear to ear, pounding a fist on her thigh. "Oh, yes, sir! I knew you had a plan!"

Shidan looked amused, Tingzhe judged, and almost as grimly delighted. And Iroh...

The general, Tingzhe reflected, looked as if he'd been asked to swallow a bowl full of molly-guppies. Alive.

Why?

"Prince Zuko." Iroh's voice was full of foreboding. "You will not try to blackmail the Avatar."

"Yes," Zuko said with that same fierce smile. "I will."

Tingzhe's jaw dropped. Oma and Shu. Is he mad?

Iroh was shaking his head, as if he couldn't believe his own ears. "Of all the foolish things you have done in your sixteen years-

"The Avatar believes in four nations. Four separate peoples." Zuko looked at his uncle. "These are my people, Uncle. I will protect them."

Iroh gave him a disbelieving glance. "Surely, Aang would never be so unkind-"

"He is not kind, Uncle! I know him!" Zuko held out empty hands, pleading. "Yes, it's crazy. Yes, I could get killed. Worse than killed. Yes, I'm not taking anyone to Asagitatsu who doesn't volunteer. Byakko will help hide people if we have to. Please, just listen."

Iroh regarded him for a long moment. Sighed, and inclined his head. "Tell me, then. Tell me why you, who have healed this boy, cannot trust he will respect that obligation to those under your care."

"Because he's not just a boy, Uncle," Zuko said soberly. "He's the Avatar. He doesn't have obligations. Not to anyone human."

Iroh frowned.

"Kuzon knew him," Zuko insisted. "Grandfather and I - discussed it. Aang is a lot of things, Uncle. He's brave. He's smart, when he takes the time to think instead of chasing butterflies. He wants to do the right thing, whenever he thinks he knows what the right thing is. And the right thing isn't kind. The right thing, what he's been taught is right, is that the four nations have to be separate. Always. Air Nomad, Uncle. No family. No land. No clan. They give up their own children because it's the right thing to do." Zuko swallowed. "He won't even be angry about it. He'll just be upset. Confused. Because we're doing something so horribly wrong. And good people don't do bad things. That's not the way his world works. So we're not good people. We can't be. And if we're not..." He waved toward the map, and the arctic harbor that had swallowed a fleet.

"If you are wrong," Iroh began.

"If I'm wrong, he never has to know!" Zuko waved his hands. "We're just a bunch of people living on a volcano. Like Byakko. Like Wu Shan. He'll just think we're crazy. He already thinks I'm crazy. He probably won't even notice." He met Iroh's gaze. "Not one path to victory, Uncle. All paths. You taught me that."

"Three years chasing the Avatar, and now he listens," Iroh said dryly. Stroked his beard. "Strategically, there is merit to your plan. But what does your heart say, nephew?"

Zuko's shoulders slumped. Straightened, as the young man faced the general, unflinching. "My heart says my people are going to die, Uncle."

Iroh stiffened.

"My heart says I know Aang. That he's nice, but not kind. That he's so nice, so brave, so sure he has to do what's right, he'll lead the good guys against the bad guys. Or everybody else, against the Fire Nation. And because he's so nice, he'll believe they are the good guys, as long as they're beating the bad guys. No matter what they do to beat the bad guys." Zuko swallowed dryly. "My heart says, there are widows and orphans - thousands of widows and orphans - who are screaming in their sleep, torn by nightmares of the Siege of the North. Of their mothers and fathers who aren't ever coming home. And if - when - the Avatar comes to the Fire Nation..."

"They'll kill themselves trying to get to him," Teruko said soberly. "You know they will, sir. I would."

"More to the point, they'll kill anyone between them and the Avatar. And they'll be creative." Shirong winced. "Given the Earth Army's standing orders on firebenders who invent new techniques..." He had to pause. "From personal experience... once you start doing things as black as attacking children... it's very hard to stop."

I don't want to hear this, Tingzhe thought, aching inside. I don't want to imagine it.

But he could, Oma and Shu help him. He could.

"Yet if there is a place for those bereft to vent their rage in action," Shidan said thoughtfully, "where they can mourn their dead, and feed the flames to beckon lost ghosts home - we will at one stroke drain away that tainted power the Face-Stealer seeks, and save our people's lives." At startled looks, he smiled. "We have practice in extracting people from the Fire Nation. A very great deal of practice."

"Now that," Mai mused, "sounds interesting."

Shidan's brows climbed; he chuckled. "I would be most grateful for the assistance, Lady Mai. You may have observed that certain gifts run in my family." A hint of gleaming teeth. "Diplomacy is not one of them."

Mai's answering smirk was thin, but there. "I noticed."

"You want to go back there?" Min blurted out. "Why?"

Tingzhe kept manfully silent, even when he wanted to roll his eyes. Ah, to be a young man, blithely confident that girls wanted what you wanted. And never, ever had their own agenda.

"I left a friend with Azula," Mai said simply. "I didn't have a choice then. Now, I do."

"But who's going to teach us?" Suyin asked, stricken.

"Your mother knows knives. So do the marines. And your cousin." Mai nodded toward Zuko. "He doesn't show off, but he's not bad." Her gold eyes were set, unflinching. "But they can't step back on shore in the Fire Nation without risking a death sentence. I can."

"Death?" Min gulped.

"That's what exile means." Zuko's voice wasn't quite calm. "Cross into Fire Nation waters, anyone can kill you." He smirked a little. "Though Zhao just tried to catch me. Until the Avatar pulled a temple down on his head."

"Avatar Roku," Iroh reminded him. "Not Avatar Aang."

Zuko took a breath, let it steam out. "I'm not going to argue about this again," he said quietly. "You think it's not his fault. I think it is. Fine. That doesn't change the result." He pointed to the map. "And neither will taking Asagitsatsu. We can win this, Uncle. We can give our people a home. We can give Earth King Kuei, our ally, the buffer he wants between Earth and Air. We can make sure Ji the Mechanist never builds another weapon for the Fire Lord. And even if we can't do any of that," one hand closed in a fist, "we'll know when the mountain's going to blow. We can send out warnings. If there's early crops, if the earthbenders can get them underground before the ash falls..."

"There are many defenses against ashfall, and the glass knives of tainted air," Shidan said soberly. "None are perfect. But we will see that knowledge spread as far as we can." He grinned dryly. "After all, if the Earth King gives an order, his people might obey."

Shirong was studying the map, face still pale. "You realize, if this thing goes off, the Fire Lord's not going to need an army to take the Earth Kingdom. All he has to do... is wait."

"If he were willing to wait, Fire Lord Azulon would still be alive." Zuko shook his head. "One problem at a time. Volcano first. Get our people sheltered. Get those ghosts called home. Then we worry about my father."

Chapter End Notes

I have a confession to make. I grew up on, among other books, Heinlein SF. One of his themes? "Ignorance is its own death penalty." Put together that, with what we see of Sozin, Roku, and Aang. Oh boy.

Comets have often been blamed for causing eruptions.

Also, I've run across stuff on Koh that ties him to the World-Serpent of Norse myth, Jormungandr, and to Nidhoggr, who eats the roots of the World Tree Yggdrasil and corpses, and controlled said bodies at the end of the world. Gnawing the roots of the tree holding up the world sounds bad... but according to the myths, without his gnawing, the roots would outgrow the world's boundaries. Which would be Very Bad.

Embers Wild Mass Guessing page entry, "Vathara is reading this page right now laughing evilly": Confirmed. And yes, I do read it to double-check my plot!

Chapter 47

Chapter Notes

A disturbing subject will be mentioned later in this chapter. It will not be described in detail, but one of the realities of war will come up. Nightwish's "I Wish I Had An Angel" would not be inappropriate background music.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I miss my hat, Shirong thought, standing with Saoluan as close to one of the trebuchets as they could manage without sinking into the steel. There seemed to be a lot of open space on the rear decks of Suzuran. And there was. For firebending. Or even earthbending.

Whoosh! Thunk.

"Ow..."

Airbending, not so much, Shirong thought ruefully, watching Zuko pick himself up off the deck yet again, as Langxue winced.

"I guess I missed one of the twists?" the Kyoshi yāorén admitted.

"Not sure." Zuko got his breath back, and stalked over to where iron bars were holding down a scroll against the ship's wind... and any other breezes. "Let's take another look."

"You're not sure?"

"Stand there and dodge a few fireblasts," Zuko said dryly. "Then I can bring you a firebending scroll, and you can tell me how the form works."

"All right, I get the point..."

"Do you still think he's crazy?" Shidan said, almost in Shirong's ear.

"Gah," Shirong managed, earth-gloves ready to fire even as Saoluan's blade snicked loose in its sheath. "Do you have to do that?"

Pale gold blinked lazily at them both. "Do you wish an honest answer, Agent Shirong?"

"It's a dragon thing," Saoluan confided, securing her sword once more. "I think he can't sleep nights until he's startled something out of its skin."

"You are very close to right," the dragon smiled. "We are hunters. We test that which may be prey. We find it... amusing." He shrugged. "Walking among inattentive humans... it is much like holding a long feather, and coming across a sleeping cat. Irresistible."

"Resist," Shirong suggested dryly.

"When I've so short a time left to walk among you before we reach the harbor?" The dragon's smile sobered. "Zuko and Iroh know this, but I will tell you directly. Byakko will be sending aid. Yes, it will draw attention to us. But if my lady reports we have plausible word of a restless volcano, our firebenders will not be detained. The Fire Lord is arrogant and cruel. He is not foolish. No one can reign over ashes."

"I wasn't really thinking about that," Shirong confessed. He'd been trying not to think of it, more accurately. "I was listening to some of the farmers talk, while people were deciding who'd go with the prince. And who'd split off with your ship and Captain Donghai's associates." That had gone a lot more quickly and calmly than he ever would have dreamed. We're going to live on a volcano really did seem to be no cause for concern. It's cranky and potentially about to blow had given some pause, but no more than one in four had found Asagitatsu too much to face.

The Fire Nation is crazy. Shirong smiled ruefully. And here I am, following. "It just struck me that, well, I've never heard of some of the crops they were discussing. Oca? Mashua? Achira? Oogami nuts?" He gave Shidan an arch look. "Facing off with the Fire Army is one thing. Threatening a man's dinner menu? There could be consequences."

"If you've had glass noodles, you've had achira," the dragon stated. "I imagine our refugees smuggled them in as flower seeds, when your officials asked. Just as they would have with the others. Particularly oogami nuts; you've likely seen tall sprays of sky-blue flowers scattered all over the fields to strengthen them. They aren't nuts, any more than peanuts are. You probably won't notice the difference in a sauce unless you see them grinding the seeds ahead of time." He paused. "Though they can be a bit poisonous, if you get an inexperienced cook..."

Shirong stifled a groan. "Can't you people live without something trying to kill you?"

"Not easily." Shidan half-closed his eyes, thinking. "I imagine there will be difficulties. The grains we grow aren't truly grains, not as you know them. Teosinte-buckwheat, oca, the others... Much of what we tend either stores itself underground, or has seeds that can survive and sprout after being buried in ash. Wheat is a thing for sweet tarts, and other treats. It's not fond of high mountains or the seashore. And there's little of Byakko that is not one or the other."

"That's going to make things tricky," Shirong muttered.

"Food?" Saoluan glanced at them as if they were both nuts, even as she kept most of her attention on the pair arguing over airbending forms. "As long as we have enough to eat, who cares?"

"This from the young lady who tried to clean my galley out of river shrimp?" Shidan hmphed.

"Food is morale, Warrior Saoluan. Our friend is right to be concerned."

"That wasn't exactly what I was thinking," Shirong said thoughtfully. "Farmers and fishers, they're the backbone of Ba Sing Se. How your treat the land affects the people, and the spirits. Who affect the land themselves. Earth farmers are about stability. Building the soil deeper and richer. While you burn what's left in the fields." He spread an empty hand. "We're going to have to figure something out. Spirits don't like being confused."

"We're heading north," Saoluan pointed out. "It's going to be hard to pick out spirits being upset when the whole ocean wants humans to keel over and die."

"Point." Shirong rubbed at a ghost of threatening headache. "This is insane."

"Oh, you haven't heard insane yet." Saoluan was watching the dragon, poised and ready. "Think about it. Makoto's still out there. She's been out there a thousand years. And no one's acting like she'll save us a headache by keeling over and dying. Meaning dragons live longer."

Shirong looked between Shidan's stillness, and the swordswoman's tense stance. "And?"

"So somebody knew where Asagitatsu was a thousand years ago," Saoluan said tautly. "How do you lose a whole mountain?"

...Oh.

Shidan inclined his head. "It is not an easy thing to speak of. Zuko knows, though I will remind him of the details... In short, one loses it by interference. From Makoto, and Wan Shi Tong."

Shirong traded a look with the Warrior. "Explain."

"Words limit one so," the dragon sighed. "And yet, they give your people a safety mine have never had. Save with Kingami, at the beginning; tales say he did find a way to record mind-tales, long ago... words, Agent Shirong. Brush and ink. Frail conduits, to carry truth and memory into the future. Yet chance and hope may spare them, to be found again even when all of the clan who wrote them are dead and ash."

That doesn't make sense-

Suddenly, horribly, it did. "Mind-tales... need a mind to carry them," Shirong realized. "Oma and Shu. She didn't."

"She did." Shidan did not flinch. "For Wan Shi Tong, she was the heir to Asagitatsu, with claim to all knowledge of it; she granted it freely to him, if only he would steal it from all others. That, for human knowledge. For that of dragons... with the Face-Stealer's help, she had the strength to bind water spirits like the haima-jiao. They are weaker than a dragon armed, less than we - but a swarm of them against one? Water against fire? One by one, she lured us away to death. Even Agni's children cannot return from drowning to warn of danger. Not if another power binds their souls... and none of their clan survives to light a beckoning pyre." Pale gold looked away. "Her clan did not survive Yangchen's death. So there was no one to warn us what she might be. None to warn that she was not the anguished last survivor, alive only because of a freak windstorm to ground her far from home. It took us centuries to suspect..."

The Dai Li drew a deep breath, reflexively hardening his will against that cold, aching despair. A dragon might be flesh and blood, but that power felt like a spirit.

"You," Saoluan blurted out. "It was you, wasn't it? You figured it out. This is personal."

"You have no idea," Shidan breathed. "Father of Fire... I was only a cub. Barely a few decades past a tumbling hatchling. And our clan had so very many hatchlings." He looked away, into nightmare. "She forgot to count us all."

Shirong felt his heart beating hard, and remembered to breathe. "You went after her."

"I was a child. And a dragon. We can be very, very stupid," Shidan said dryly.

The agent thought of that, and Zuko, and night on the shores of Lake Laogai. And shrugged. No comment.

"But I was also lucky," the dragon went on. "Though I did not think so, not then. The yamabushi found me."

"Who?" Shirong asked, puzzled. But Saoluan's not? he wondered, seeing her frown. Huh.

"The mountain sages," the dragon elaborated. "Wind brought them whispers, that great evil walked our slopes. That Shirotora and every creature Byakko sheltered was in danger. They listened." He smiled, bittersweet. "Master Ikkyuu had come for the ritual threatening a few days early; he liked to be unpredictable. His sages and students were meant to be a show of force to an entire clan. They were more than enough to capture me, and rescue what few hatchlings and eggs survived. And sit on me, until Byakko's lord could calm me enough to learn the tale."

Shirong could almost see the dripping slaughter. Shivered, thrusting his own memories of deadly water away.

"Ritual threatening?" Saoluan asked, dazed.

"To establish the boundaries." The dragon shook himself, obviously trying to push the past back into dark memory. "You go to the border, as your neighbor does, and there is much stalking and hissing and baring of teeth." He rubbed his head. "And someone generally miscalculates a hair, and gets their skull bruised. But everyone is armed - the yamabushi never insult us by coming unarmed - so no one gets hurt."

"Unarmed is an insult?" Shirong said warily. It felt true, no matter how crazy it sounded.

"You are so pitiful an enemy, I don't even need claws to deal with you," Shidan *hmp*ed.

"Ah."

"The yamabushi saved what was left of my clan," Shidan said quietly. "Kuzon and I tried to save their kin from Sozin-" He stopped, and shook his head. "Shirotora would have saved us from Makoto, had we but known. The White Tiger may be no match for the Face-Stealer's power, but Byakko is his. Yet we saw a fair face, and felt fair thoughts... and invited her in."

"And once she had permission to enter your home, she could call in anything." The Dai Li looked the dragon in the eye, knowing that pain. "It's not your fault."

"I know that!" Smoke curled from the dragon's breath.

Stand your ground, Shirong told his shaking knees. Don't run!

"I know that," Shidan repeated, white-knuckled and pale. "And I know we were fortunate. She did not know how many of us walked among humans. We did not lose every adult. Only... most." A bitter laugh. "And that was not the worst."

Oh. Wonderful.

"We were so wounded," Shidan said simply. "So desperate to wall out the world and say, leave us to our grief." He looked down. "We knew of the pirates. But they knew better than to lurk near Byakko. So we thought them... not our concern."

"The pirates?" Shirong repeated, confused. He was getting in some practice with Tingzhe, yes - but trying to talk to someone who casually mentioned a thousand years of history still left him a bit dizzy. No. He can't mean- "Kyoshi's pirates?" Which was the wrong way around, entirely, but-

White hair dipped. "The same." A bitter smile. "So you see, you are wrong. It is our fault. Byakko has ever warded the Fire Nation from harm. That time, we failed. We could not look beyond our own pain... and so Avatar Kyoshi had no answer for hers." A gusting sigh. "And so. An Avatar's rage. A Fire Lord. And, eventually, war."

For a moment, Shirong had to bury his head in his hands. One thing to hear Zuko outline bits of the Face-Stealer's millennia-old plan to destroy humanity. Quite another, to hear it from someone who had been there.

"Makoto's fault," Saoluan said bluntly.

"Asagitatsu and Byakko were allies, once. And kin." Shidan's eyes were still distant. "So. For over three centuries, Byakko has been the raven-wolf to her sea serpent. Any one of us she catches, she will kill. But we could warn, and hunt her, and drive her off in numbers... and so she persuaded Sozin to slay us all."

"You hold Byakko," Saoluan snorted. "He'd have cut his own throat."

"Never underestimate what love will drive a man to do." A bitter smile. "He almost did."

"But why?" the swordswoman asked. "Why is she doing this?"

"If you encounter her, you may ask," Shidan said, coldly precise. "I do not care."

Something in the way he'd said that... "You'd be too busy staying alive," Shirong stated. "If she was a Fire Lady, that means... oh, bury me somewhere cold. She's that strong?"

"The match of a Fire Lord in strength," Shidan nodded. "Or more. Do not fight her, Agent Shirong. Kill her. Or flee." His whiskers twitched. "And be warned. Sozin is long dead, and Fire Lady Tejjina with him. But by night, with the moon full or dark... she may walk in other forms."

Oh. Lovely. "We're all insane," Shirong muttered.

"Do you think so?" Shidan looked honestly interested. As if the answer weren't a potential insult to all his clan.

Dragons want the truth, the agent reminded himself. "Yes. And no."

"Well, that clears everything up," Saoluan muttered.

"Forget Makoto." Oh, I wish I could. "She'll go after us, or she won't. If she does, we'll... have to deal with it. She wants us dead? A lot of people do. At least that's simple."

Shidan raised a brow, listening.

"What's complicated is the human mess," the agent went on. "The prince of the Fire Nation is trusting the Earth King not to betray him, and the Earth King is trusting Prince Zuko to delay and divide the Fire Lord's forces. It should be crazy. Any of the Council of Five would call it crazy. But it isn't." He stared toward the west, where tree-shrouded banks still hid the river mouth of the harbor. "A year ago, a year to come - who knows what will happen. Here and now? I know Kuei. And Zuko. This might work." He glanced at the dragon. "You think of earth as stable, unyielding. Bound in tradition. And we are. But we're also the slope of the mountain, waiting for that one stray pebble to start the avalanche. That one moment when everything changes. Forever."

Shidan inclined his head, a gracious acceptance of offered truth. "And is this such a moment?"

"You've been throwing pebbles as hard as you can," Shirong said dryly. "Just what did you slip into our heads, under the cover of a story?"

The dragon smirked. "Very good."

"Good?" Saoluan echoed in disbelief. "You - you - what did you do?"

"I gave you tools," Shidan stated. "Tools, and templates. Those created by Ryuuko-hime, in ages past, so her bond with Kingami might be fruitful, and bring the joy of children to the clan. The same shapings used by her children, and her children's children, and all of dragon-kind who walk among humans. It is not easy for us to bear young, even with those touched by fire. That the Wen clan has four, when Tingzhe is Earth alone... you have no idea how rare a blessing that is." A shrug, red and dark blue silk shimmering in the afternoon sun. "Most of you will never have the power or the need to shape a mate. But the knowledge is part of the story. And yāorén do have that power." He cast a glance at Saoluan. "And in the past, centuries ago... yāorén sometimes used that knowledge for other purposes."

The warrior's eyes narrowed, suspicious.

"It is nothing that would harm you," Shidan said gravely. "But those who keep company with yāorén often find themselves beset by unfriendly spirits. And those with a touch of dragon's blood, born or gifted, tend to be more able to hold their own. And strike back." He smiled at Shirong, eyes terribly gentle. "After all, young man... how did you think you survived a spider's embrace?"

No.

He didn't want to move. He didn't want to think.

"I know one of our kin when I touch them," the dragon said softly. "I do not know how, or where, or how long ago. But if you have need of a home, if all else is lost... Byakko would shelter you." He let out a sigh. "Yet you were born to Earth. And my grandson needs that heritage of you, as well. His hopes rest on nurturing three elements among you all, so Air itself is challenged, and rises to defend its mountains once more." He shook his head. "Dragons are thieves, Agent Shirong. Of lives. Of gold. Of hearts. My own heart cries out to steal you all away. To forge you into Fire, that your hope and determination might heal my poor, ravaged nation." A bittersweet half-smile. "But I am one of Agni's children, and I know my duty. Be Earth. Be Dai Li. Remember all you love of Ba Sing Se, and make it anew."

Shirong raised an eyebrow, trying not to let lingering shock show on his face. "You want me to keep Zuko... grounded."

"Yes." Shidan turned to Saoluan. "And he will need your help, as well as Amaya's. She knows Water living among Earth. You know it living with Earth. He will need them both."

Saoluan gave him a measuring look. "You scare me," she said at last.

Teeth glinted. "I frighten many folk, Warrior."

"Oh, it's not the teeth," the swordswoman said dryly. "Or the sword. Or the fire. Or even the dragon." She let out a low whistle. "You. And the prince. You just - you don't stop. You pick what you think is right, you plan it - and then you go." Her voice dropped. "It's going to kill your people. You know that, right? You don't stop. And the Avatar has to stop you."

"I know." Shidan was just as quiet. "But to be otherwise, would not be Fire."

"And if you lose yourself, you lose everything," Shirong agreed bleakly. "Some things are worth dying for."

Saoluan eyed them both. Then, reluctantly, looked at her little brother, and the sudden snowfall around him as wind and water-shaping went awry. "Yeah."

"Snow." Stepping carefully across white-dusted metal, Zuko glared at the world. "Well, that's just-"

Passing by, Lieutenant Sadao's red and black uniform suddenly blurred. "Eyagh!"

Thud.

"Um." Shirong eyed the fallen lieutenant, and the sudden waft of smoke from the bridge. "You think-?"

"Strategic retreat," Shidan advised.

Jee's snarl could have been heard all the way to the shore. "Why is there snow on my ship?"

"We're what?" Aang blurted out. The sun was shining, Appa was grumbling under his covering sheet that the wind off the harbor was just asking to be flown on, and Sokka - even wearing a Fire Navy uniform - was grinning. He couldn't have said what Aang thought he'd just said.

"We're chasing Zuko," Sokka repeated. "Gotta say, I kind of like the irony."

"But - but -"

"Aang." Helmet concealing his blue-beaded braid, Hakoda looked down on him, serious. "We've only gotten this far because no one's looked too hard at where this ship is or what orders it's following. So far, 'in pursuit of Suzuran' covers a lot of 'not following proper procedure'. If we're lucky, it'll get us through this port. From here - well. We'll have to see which way he went."

"What makes it even better? Zuko knows all about hawks." Sokka rubbed his hands together, savoring it. "So nobody thinks twice about why we ask people where he's going, instead of taking reports."

"You think this is funny," Aang said, incredulous.

"You don't?"

"People are going to think we're trying to catch him!" Aang protested.

"Right. That's kind of the idea," Sokka agreed.

Aang rubbed at his eyes, willing the world to make sense. Maybe he was having a bad dream? "What if we do catch him?"

Sokka blinked. "Um..."

"Better think about it, Sokka." Metal shivered as Toph worked her toes against it, wrapped in a red cloak as she climbed out of the hold. "Aang doesn't think it's funny? I bet Zuko wouldn't think it's funny either. I know Katara doesn't."

"But she knows the whole plan!" Sokka protested. "She was laughing about it!"

"Less laughing. More, mwah-ha-hah, I get to drown them all if they look at us funny." Toph shook her head. "I've kind of got her distracted down by the waterline, seeing if she can feel the harbor like I do dirt. So could you think about this?"

"Come on, it's not like we're really going to catch... Dad?" Sokka suddenly looked worried.

"If we were only following Suzuran, I doubt we would," Hakoda said gravely. "She may be a freighter, but Captain Jee knows how to handle her. Which is more than we can say for this ship." He frowned. "But the Ba Sing Se ships are slowing them down. They need the wind."

And no one else could bend it. "So what's the plan?" Aang asked.

"Ah. Plan." Sokka grinned, just a little nervous, and scrambled for some paper and ink. "Let me get back to you."

"You do that. I'll go head off watery death." Stepping back onto the ladder as if it were dry land, Toph zipped down out of sight.

Aang rolled his eyes, and reluctantly walked away. Watery death? Sheesh. Toph acted like Katara could be scary.

...And, well, she could - but just in an "uh-oh, supper's going to taste awful tonight" kind of way. She wasn't scary scary. Not like the spirits were. Not like the Avatar Spirit was.

"You don't like Shaman Tao's lessons."

Ack. He'd forgotten Hakoda was still there. Following him. Toward his lesson with Tao, which he really, really didn't want to go to. "He's a good teacher," Aang stalled. "I need to know this stuff." I guess.

"That's not what I said." Hakoda gave him a concerned look. "Aang. There are many things a young man has to learn that aren't easy to bear. Which is why he should always have a father or a grandfather to go to. Or an elder monk, for a nomad." He smiled, rough and kind. "I'm no monk. But if something is upsetting you, I'm here."

Aang swallowed. "It just - it doesn't seem right," he said in a rush. "The spirits are supposed to be the good guys. The Moon and Ocean are! And Hei Bai was just upset. But Boots is a pest, and that sea-spider tried to eat Toph, and Amaya said there was an evil spirit in Ba Sing Se I didn't know about, and - it's just wrong! Spirits aren't evil!"

There. He'd said it. And now Chief Hakoda was going to laugh at him. Or worse, frown and tell him how wrong he was.

"Hmm. I haven't had this talk in a while," Hakoda mused. "Usually, children ask this the first time they're old enough to understand a bad birth..." He stopped, and looked at Aang. "But you didn't grow up with mothers-to-be in your temple, did you?"

"That was a nun thing," Aang said, for what had to be the thousandth time. "How can a birth be bad? Bringing life into the world is a good thing."

Hakoda looked startled. "Katara told me you dealt with a birth outside Ba Sing Se."

"Well, yeah," Aang said, wondering what he was getting at. "She seemed really worried. So did Sokka, before Hope was born. But they didn't say why."

"Of course not!" Hakoda looked shocked. "You don't mention the blood-drinkers and breath-stealers when a woman might be about to become a mother... you have no idea what I'm talking about, do you?"

"No!" Aang tried not to glare. "And I wish somebody would just tell me!"

The Water Tribe chief looked as though he'd rather be handling live scorpion-vipers. "Let's find a quiet corner. I think Tao can wait."

An hour later in Hakoda's cabin, Aang was clutching his staff like a lifeline. "Spirits can... spirits will... babies?"

"Koala-otters eat kelp. Leopard-sharks eat penguins. And some spirits prey on us, if we don't make them offerings," Hakoda said plainly. "Sometimes even when we do. That's not evil, Aang. It's just what they are."

"But it's wrong!"

"Aang..." Helmet off, Hakoda spread open hands. "That's life."

"But..." Aang swallowed, and screwed up his courage. "But if it is... then why didn't Gyatso tell me?"

Hakoda was quiet, glancing down; so much like Sokka in one of his thinking moods, it hurt. "Aang," he said, very carefully, "if you hadn't been the Avatar, what would your life have been like? How would you have lived, growing up?" He smiled a little. "We have a lot of stories about what the Air Nomads were like. But you're the only one who can really tell us."

Because the others are gone. It hurt, like it always hurt, unless he was doing things to forget. But Aang bit his lip and thought about it, because at least Chief Hakoda was trying to help. Even if the things he talked about were scary. "I guess... I'd be like the other monks," Aang said at last.

"Maybe I'd work in the orchards. Or making gliders. Or cooking; Gyatso taught me how to make these great cakes..." He swallowed. "And when I was eighteen, we'd go see the nuns at the Spring Festival. And maybe when I was forty or so, the elders would say if I could train a student. And we'd travel, and maybe paint the temples if somebody dedicated a new room, and we'd always be trying to see if there was something neat new we could do with airbending..."

Huh. That was weird. There weren't any more words.

Hakoda shook his head, and held out his arms. "Come here."

"I miss them," Aang managed.

"I know," Hakoda said quietly, holding him close. "I miss Kya, too."

"I know I'm not supposed to - we're supposed to be detached, that's what Air is..."

"Maybe. But you're the Avatar, not just Air." Hakoda gave him a wry look. "I don't think it's wrong for you to miss them."

"But it h-hurts..."

"That's life, too," Hakoda said softly. "I'm sorry."

Hiding his face in cloth and armor, Aang sniffled. Great. Now I look stupid.

"All I can think," Hakoda went on, "is that Gyatso taught you what any young monk should know. And if that's how he grew up - I don't think it's his fault he didn't know how to teach you how the rest of the world lives." He tilted his head, inviting Aang to share the joke. "No teacher knows everything. Just ask my mother. 'Don't ask me about tracking tiger-seals. That's for hot-blooded young idiots out to lose a finger!'"

He sounded just like Gran-Gran. Aang couldn't help but giggle.

"It sounds to me," Hakoda said more soberly, "that you lived very safe lives in your temples. Very peaceful."

"Well, yeah," Aang said, pulling back a little. "We were monks. Peace was kind of what we were all about."

"The problem is," Hakoda said thoughtfully, "most of the world has never lived that way. Even before the war. I'm trying to imagine the life you lived myself. And I can't. Even though I'm one of the most peaceful chiefs we've ever had."

"Peaceful?" Aang tried to back up, without making it look like he was backing up. "You led all the tribesmen off to fight!"

"With the Fire Nation. Not with other Water villages," Hakoda said practically. "Sokka and Katara are far too young to remember, but before the Fire Nation began their raids, we had little ambushes every summer."

Aang recoiled. "But - why? You were all Water Tribe!"

"And we're all human," Hakoda answered. "We get angry at each other. We get jealous. Some people just want to fight. Or to show off for a pretty girl. Or - Tui and La, Aang, there's as many reasons as there are people. We're not monks. We fight. Hopefully for good reasons. Or what seem like good reasons; I'm sure even some of the men on this ship-" He cut himself off, and sighed. "Never mind. Tao's probably looking for you."

Deposited gently but firmly outside Hakoda's door, Aang blinked, startled.

What isn't he telling me?

Something's wrong, Dad had said. Find out what Tao's teaching him that we don't know about.

Easy for him to say, Katara thought, stepping carefully down the metal corridor. Sneaking around igloos for Gran-Gran to get an idea if people were feeling a little winter-crazy was one thing. Sneaking outside the door to Tao's cabin, where there'd be exactly no explanation they could give if Aang heard a noise and looked?

Good thing Toph had been willing to hear her out when she asked for help. Snow, Katara could sneak over without a sound. Steel? That took the earthbender's firm touch.

I just hope Sokka can keep Boots busy. Tao seems to know where spirits are.

Laying one hand against dark metal, Toph pulled with the other, like stretching a piece of seaweed gel. Slowly, carefully, until she had a taut, thinner layer, the better to poke holes in with a finger for both of them.

Putting her ear to the opening, Katara listened.

"So I believe part of your difficulty is in not recognizing there are different levels of spirits," Tao's voice came through. "You should learn of them all, but most are not powerful enough to merit the Avatar taking a direct hand."

Is he kidding? Katara thought, incredulous. The Avatar-

"But I'm supposed to be the bridge between humans and the spirits!" Aang protested. "That's what they told me in Senlin Village."

"The Hei Bai forest spirit is powerful, but a competent shaman should have been able to deal with it," Tao said firmly. "It's far beyond a kamuiy like Boots, even into the realm of a kami. But it is not a great spirit, that can think and reason much as humans can. Though never in the same way as humans do. Those few, those powers, are what we truly need the Avatar for."

"Great spirit?" Aang said doubtfully. "You mean, like Wan Shi Tong?"

"Did the owl tell you he was one?" Tao hmphed. "If he did, he lied. He is a very powerful kami, to be sure. But he is not one such as the Moon, or Ocean." A pause. "Or the Face-Stealer."

Katara shivered, and felt Toph touch her hand. They'd both heard Aang's story of the dreadful spirit he'd found going through the oasis. And Koh was supposed to be as powerful as the Moon? No way.

"I don't get it." She could hear the frown in Aang's voice. "If Koh's that powerful, why isn't he helping? I mean, I know he doesn't like the Avatar..."

"He doesn't like anyone human," Tao said, voice dry. "And I'll thank you not to use his true name so freely if you are not trying to get his attention."

"...Sorry." Aang sighed. "So why doesn't he like people?"

"Anyone who might have found the answer to that, didn't live to tell the tale."

"Well, that's no help," Aang exclaimed. "If we don't know what's wrong, how can we fix it?"

"You're assuming it's something humans can fix," Tao said pragmatically. "It may not be."

"It's got to be!"

"Does it? What if he doesn't like the sound of babies crying?" Tao countered. "There are lesser spirits who do not. And they will take drastic measures to restore what they think of as peace."

"...Yeah," Aang said quietly. "Chief Hakoda told me."

"Good. Though why didn't your mother-? Ah. Yes. Forgive me." Tao cleared his throat. "Sometimes the best way humans can be good neighbors to the spirits is to simply not draw their attention. Though as the Avatar, you always have the great spirits' attention. Whether they make it obvious or not."

"Okay," Aang said doubtfully. "So who are the great spirits?"

"You know of the Face-Stealer," Tao stated. "There are the Ocean and Moon, your people's Storm Lord, and Guanyin of the merciful earth with her deputies Oma and Shu."

"But they were humans," Aang objected.

"Were, yes. A very long time ago. They certainly aren't human spirits now."

Silence stretched out.

Predictably, Aang broke first. "Um. Aren't you missing one?"

"No."

Toph raised her eyebrows. Katara bit back a snicker.

"What about Agni?" Aang persisted.

"What about that creature?" Tao's voice was cold. "A true great spirit would never have let its people cross the boundaries set by the spirits at the beginning of time. Much less inflicted this war on us. Most of the Fire Nation doesn't even believe in spirits anymore. You saw that at the North Pole."

"Iroh does," Aang said firmly. "So does Zuko."

"Believing spirits exist is not the same as having faith in them," Tao stated. "For as long as the legends remember, the Fire Nation has had no faith in spirits. They build machines. They conquer the sea with ships of steel, rather than bow to the Ocean's tribute of storm-lost ships." He *hmp*hed. "They don't even write their prayers such that the spirits can understand them."

"...You don't like the Fire Nation, do you?" Aang said warily.

Katara rolled her eyes. Toph frowned, pressing her hand against metal to pick up vibrations.

"I have over a century of reasons, young man," Tao said tartly. "I would not wish to see them utterly destroyed. That would unbalance the world even more. But there isn't a Fire Nation soldier alive who has not committed acts of pure evil."

"...Iroh was a soldier," Aang managed.

"Indeed he was," Tao said dryly. "How much do you know of General Iroh, and the Siege of Ba Sing Se?"

"Um..."

"I thought as much." Tao sighed. "If you're not convinced, call one of the spirits haunting this vessel. You can compel the truth from them."

"...Why would there be spirits haunting our ship?"

Uh-oh. Katara shot to her feet, heading for Tao's door to pound on it before things got any worse.

"You can't be that numb to the aura of lingering death," Tao said starkly. "Chief Hakoda took this ship, Avatar Aang."

Knuckles, metal, start pounding-

"Where did you think the blood came from?"

Wind blasted steel into her, and the world grayed out.

"-Wake up. Wake up, Katara, don't do this, I'm scared-"

Gritty hands against her head. And Toph was never scared. "I'm awake," Katara said through the pounding headache. "I'm - oh, no."

Tao's cabin was shredded. The shaman himself was barricaded in a corner behind a low wall of the stone Toph had brought on board, looking as dazed as anyone who'd been at ground zero of one of Aang's rare losses of temper. And the window-

The window's gone. "Where's Aang?"

"Not far enough away, when I get through with him." Toph's words were angry, but she brushed something away from one milky eye. "Darn dust... You were down, Katara. You weren't talking, you didn't hear me-"

"He didn't know we were here!" Katara defended her friend. What Aang heard, how he must have felt - it was awful.

"He didn't know there wasn't anyone here, Sugar Queen!" Metal creaked under Toph's toes, quivering. "I tell him to sense the earth. I tell him to listen. And what's he do when he loses it? This is it. We catch him, I am going to sit on him until he tells you he's sorry and he knows he hurt you."

Catch him? "He's not on the ship."

"Sokka and the guys are looking, but I don't feel him anywhere," Toph said flatly. "He's gone. His glider's gone. Appa and Momo are still here."

Gritting her teeth, Katara levered herself upright. "We've got to find him."

"Duh. Where? I can track dirt, not water. And for sure not air!"

Katara shook her head, and winced. "We don't have to track him. We know where he's going."

"The one spot no sane guy would be?" Toph grumbled.

I do not need to hear Zuko from you, Katara started to say.

And stopped, and thought better of it. "Ah... well, kind of."

Toph's shoulders slumped, and she groaned. "The Fire Nation."

"I think so," Katara admitted.

"Without us? Why?"

"Because we betrayed him."

"We betrayed him?" Toph sputtered. "How hard did he hit you with that door?"

"We should have told him!" Katara argued. "He wouldn't have been so scared if we'd told him about the raid in the first place."

"Told him?" Tao said, incredulous. A wave of his hand parted rock enough to stand up. "Young lady, are you seriously suggesting he had to be told? This is a Fire Nation warship! How could he have thought your chief gained it, save by deadly force?"

Toph blew out a breath. "Twinkletoes can be really slow about some stuff." She crossed her arms. "That's why we wanted in on your lessons, you old stick! You keep acting like Aang's from now! Well, he's not! He's from back when people didn't kill each other. Not around him. He didn't even see Sozin's Comet the first time it came, and you act like he ought to be just as mad at the Fire Nation as you are-"

"Toph!" Katara cut her off. "Tell Dad what happened. I'm going to get Sokka and some supplies."

She set her jaw. "We're going after him."

Docked at the seediest merchant's pier he'd ever seen in his life, Hakoda stepped away from the Kichigai's rail, back toward their currently unwelcome ally. A few of his warriors were in town, playing the part of Fire Navy sailors to gain information from the locals. The rest were enjoying a well-deserved break before they flung themselves into the next stage of Sokka's plan. But Bato was here, a quiet guard against whatever powers a shaman might call... and a bit further off, Asiavik picked through his healing kit. To pick up the pieces, after all was said and done.

And quite a bit needs to be said, Hakoda thought, far beyond annoyed. Be smart, Sokka. Keep them safe. "I suppose I should be glad we're not having this conversation in front of the children."

Tao stood straight, dignified and unrepentant. "I know you consider the boy family. And any man would be upset to see a child race headlong into danger. But I had no idea he would react so strongly. It's impossible that anyone could be that naive about war. Even an airbender from a century ago. They watched Sozin invade the first time!"

The father in him wanted to strangle the man. The chief in him sat up and took note. Sozin's first invasion. Why is that important? "That was years before Aang was born," Hakoda pointed out. "You know what children are like. Anything before their time isn't quite real, until they grow up enough to take their tribe's stories to heart." He glanced aside, as if considering the matter; watching from the corner of his eye. "Aang has told me about his life with Gyatso. It doesn't sound as though stories about Sozin were part of the Temple's lore."

There. A flare of nostrils. White-pinked lips. Old, bitter anger.

"I know you of Earth like your grudges, but this is going too far," Hakoda said pointedly. "What could Sozin have done to you? You weren't even born then. And don't tell me it was what he did to your people. You know Aang better than that. He doesn't understand revenge. Hurting someone if you have to, so they won't kill you - that he understands. But last I heard, Sozin died decades ago."

"I bared my shame to the Avatar, he was polite enough to let it rest, and you dare tell me he doesn't understand?" Tao said darkly.

"Aang?" Bato muttered, just loud enough to hear. "Polite?"

Painfully true. If not quite accurate; Aang was polite. For an airbender. For any other tribe - well, he'd seen Sokka trying not to tear his hair out. "What shame?"

Tao's eyes narrowed. "That is none of your-"

He didn't like using his size to intimidate people. But sometimes nothing else would do. "My son and daughter are flying into the Fire Nation to find him," Hakoda said grimly. "That little earthbender, their friend, who has always been a reliable ally - unlike your army - is going with them. They may not come back. Tell me why."

The look Tao gave him was pure poison. "As I told the Avatar," he gritted out, "after the invasion, my mother decided Taku was far too unlucky to give birth there."

That? That was it? "My mother would have decided the same," Hakoda stated, trying to make sense of it. "Why camp where the enemy can find you?"

"Your mother," Tao snorted. "Doesn't your father have any pride?"

"They'd argue things out until they agreed on something," Hakoda answered. "I don't understand-"

Bato coughed. "Earth Kingdom. Fathers lead the family."

Ah. Right. And hadn't that gotten him in trouble sometimes, trying to negotiate for the tribe. He could forget it around Toph; the blind girl was so relentlessly self-sufficient he almost wondered if Kanna had forgotten a cousin somewhere on the Eastern continent as she'd made her way south. How had Toph handled her own father? "So they killed your father. Why not say so?"

He'd never seen someone so pale with rage and shame. "No. I suspect they would have congratulated him," Tao hissed. "If they thought of it at all."

...Oh.

Hakoda held his ground, unflinching. And he'd thought his daughter hated the Fire Nation. The pallor of the skin inside Tao's wrists, where sleeves usually blocked the weathering sun; the hint of other to the eyes, beyond the overall otherness of not Water Tribe. Little details he'd missed, covered by time and a manner wholly, deliberately Earth. "Aang didn't know."

"That's preposterous-"

"Stop." Hakoda stared him down. "Let me tell you about one of the most frightening things my daughter has ever done in her life. Frightening to me, at least; she didn't think anything of it. Did you know Katara inspired an entire prison barge of earthbenders to revolt?"

"A noble deed, but-"

"She did it," Hakoda cut across his words, "by pretending to be an earthbender, and allowing herself to be captured."

Tao started, shaken loose from his anger. "That young girl? How - but - where was her brother? Where was the Avatar?"

"They were helping," Hakoda said, not at all kindly. "You see, they were going to break her right back out that evening. She wasn't in any. Danger. At all."

Bato winced.

"The Fire Nation doesn't like to fight on ice," Hakoda went on. "They'd stay long enough to raid, kill or capture waterbenders, and melt parts of a settlement. That's it. That's all. They haven't raped a Water Tribe woman in my lifetime." He shook his head. "Sokka and Katara didn't think there was a danger. Why should they? They were chased by Prince Zuko. Apparently the worst he's ever done to Katara was tie her to a tree for Avatar-bait. He was the enemy. But he was never a monster."

Tao was silent, even as he was shaking his head.

"They didn't think of it," Hakoda said deliberately. "And I'm not sure Aang even knows rape exists." He sighed. "Apparently, young monks don't get to visit the nuns for spring festivals until they're eighteen."

"Until they're..." Tao buried his head in his hands. "Guanyin, have mercy. What have I done?"

"I wish she'd have mercy on the rest of us," Hakoda said practically. "He's not of our tribe, he's not of our time - I almost think I'd have better luck trying to understand a star dropped out of the sky."

He sighed again. "If anyone can reach him, those three will. I just hope you've taught him enough to handle any nasty surprises we hit when we invade the Fire capital."

Raising his head, Tao blinked. "When we what?"

Hakoda grinned.

Draw. Aim. Loose.

Steel thudded into the target, even farther off center than she'd anticipated. The last rays of twilight were fading past the sandstone walls her Dai Li had raised around this patch of shore, and Azula could feel her fire dimming with them.

At least there will be moonlight to fuel us tonight. Azula lowered her bow, studying the target without a glance at the sky. The Earth Kingdom knew firebenders were weaker at night. If they hadn't realized firebending was even weaker on specific nights, she wasn't about to clue them in.

Not perfect. Not anywhere near perfect. Which was annoying. Far, far more than annoying; Fire Lord Ozai's daughter was supposed to be perfect, and if the court saw this-

But incinerating the targets would be wasteful. And...

How very odd. She didn't feel like burning the targets to ashes.

That water-witch's fault.

Whatever that water-working had been, it stood like a railing between her and the ever-hungry pit in her soul. She felt the despair. She tasted the bitter ash of failure if she disappointed her father...

But so far, the pit could not take her. And it was hard to be properly afraid of something that no longer threatened her.

I'll lose my edge-

Azula caught that thought in a grip of steel, pinning it mercilessly down. It was flawed. Somehow. But how?

"Highness."

Agent Bolin, one of the youngest and most closed-mouthed of her Dai Li. With reason, apparently; Dai Li didn't work alone, yet according to Ty Lee, his partner had somehow chosen to stay behind with the Earth King. The airbender said his aura was still gray with the shock of losing someone he trusted.

Trust. What a laugh. She almost did laugh, as Bolin walked downrange and started carefully pulling shafts from targets. Imperfect aim or not, she could feather him between the shoulder-blades before he could blink.

But that would be wasteful. As casually, carelessly wasteful as letting Ty Lee shudder in terror until her mind broke, when Azula could soothe some of that fear away. And the Dai Li followed her because she was not wasteful. Not careless. Not foolish. As Long Feng had been all three.

The Dai Li trusted her not to be needlessly cruel. What a very odd thought.

Some fear is useful. It keeps you alert. Keeps you pushing forward. Too much fear, and the body overrules the mind. You saw it in Ty Lee. If she's too afraid, she can't think...

Cold. Ice in her soul.

Am I... too afraid of failing Father?

Fear led to impatience. Both led to sloppy work. And she should have managed Ba Sing Se far better than she had-

Bolin offered her the shafts, not glancing at the deepening shadows beyond raised stone. "We should get onto the ship, your highness."

"We're leaving just after dawn," Azula said coolly. The better to impress locals with fire, if it became necessary. "Surely there's no need for you to leave solid ground sooner than that."

And why wasn't Hai coming to tell her this? He was senior of the three Dai Li whom Agent Chan had assigned as her personal guard. Much more calm and unruffled than his partner Delun. Even if he did have the same attitude toward Earth Kingdom mail as a magpie-raven did toward shinys. Not coming to see her was an insult-

They know better than to insult me.

So there was a problem. Something Hai wanted to head off, personally.

"Princess." Bolin barely hesitated. "Agent Hai would prefer it if you would move over running water. As soon as possible."

Azula arched a dark brow.

"There's something out there. We can feel it." Under the shield of his hat, Bolin looked honestly frustrated. And worried. "We don't know what it is. Lady Ty Lee is helping them look."

"Ty Lee?" Azula repeated, not at all sure she'd heard correctly. "Is helping you look for a spirit?"

"She said it reminded her of something." Bolin frowned. "Something she didn't remember before."

Well. That was a different beast entirely. She hadn't been able to track all the details of what Ty Lee's beloved Elders had done to her, but Agent Hai had privately agreed with her that it sounded very much like certain... rumors that had always attended the Dai Li. Completely unfair rumors, he'd hastened to add, given all Dai Li techniques had been taught by Avatar Kyoshi herself.

Which means all the rumors are probably true, Azula thought wryly.

Amusing, but not her concern, except where it could help Ty Lee. Which Agent Hai had been doing, using Delun's nervousness to everyone's advantage. The acrobat couldn't help but try to cheer up such a glum, straitlaced fellow, and willingly chattered at him about anything and everything.

If she's remembered one thing, she's probably remembered everything, Hai had told Azula in private. If she hasn't... you can learn a lot from what someone won't talk about.

A useful tactic for the future. So long as she had someone else to listen to the torrent of noise.

"If you don't know what it is," Azula pointed out now, "running water might be the worst thing you could do."

Bolin hesitated. "True, your highness. But-"

"Your highness."

Azula turned.

Noblewoman, dressed for travel, the princess decided, taking in the long, crimson nails, the rich but subdued reds and tougher silkwool of the woman's robes. No senbon up her sleeves, though I'd bet on kunai in her hair. Rooted stance... firebender.

A firebender whose glance flicked to the bow in Azula's hand with only the slightest hint of narrowed eyes.

Hate and disgust, Azula calculated, as the woman dropped into a precise obeisance; noble to greater heir. Well covered... but not good enough. "And you would be?"

"I am called Nawahime, your highness." One hand made a subtle motion near her sleeve.

One of Father's spies. Ordinarily that would be good, not to mention entertaining. But now... "I will take your report. In private."

Bolin stirred. "Your highness."

She stepped just close enough for him to hear her whisper. "Make sure she hasn't been near Ty Lee."

Unhappy, he bowed and withdrew. Wise man.

Azula toyed with an arrow as the spy rose. "So. What is the news?"

"The Avatar is within your grasp, your highness."

That was unexpected. "The Avatar was declared dead," Azula said levelly.

"For purposes of morale." Nawahime's eyes were cold as her own.

"Not something you should joke about, Lady Nawahime." Binding rope princess? Father's spies were a bit too flamboyant, sometimes.

Which was good evidence that this was one of Father's spies, and not one of those Byakko ran for the Fire Lord. Old Lord Kuzon had made a habit of finding the most incredibly ordinary people to spy for him, and Kotone had apparently kept up the habit.

"Forgive my presumption, Princess." A slight bow. "My network in the Earth Kingdom was badly damaged by Earth King Kuei. But the Avatar was foolish enough to set foot outside those lands, and now... now we have found him again." Gold eyes blazed. "The Southern Water Tribe took the Kichigai by force and treachery, and the Avatar set foot upon it. They were spotted at harbor only a few days' sail from here. Seize him, and our victory is complete."

Taken a Fire Navy ship? Clever, clever barbarians. That explained quite a few interesting tidbits of intelligence. "Is there anything else?"

Nawahime's eyes narrowed.

"Don't be a fool." Azula kept her voice light, almost pleasant. "I'm not my brother. The Fire Lord's plans will take your report into account. That's all you need to know."

"To not act when your enemy is within your grasp." Nawahime's voice was iced silk. "To allow or even aid his escape... are you certain you are not your brother?"

For a moment, the world seemed to flicker red.

Calm. Control. "Who do you think you are?" Azula said, sharp as shattered glass.

"The pieces are set. The endgame is at hand. And a pawn thinks itself a queen," the spy mused. "You let your enemy run, and assume he will race into your grasp? That is a mistake-"

Ready for treachery, Azula lashed out with blue fire.

Nawahime... caught it.

Impossible.

"Silly child." Nawahime bounced the ball of flame on her fingertips, blue burning hotter and fiercer than summer sky.

Impossible, Azula thought. The last firebender to bend blue flame was...

"But you do favor my line, somewhat. Even with Byakko written across your face." Perfect lips pulled back in a snarl that showed far too many teeth. "Ursa's daughter. Damn the Fire Sages, and damn that puling whelp Shidan! I should have killed her in her sleep before she ever tainted Ozai with the scent of her hair-"

"You take that back!"

Because yes, Ursa was a fool, and a traitor, and Grandfather's killer, and she'd always loved Zuko best-

But she was Mother. And no one, no one had the right to say such filthy, hateful things-!

...Heh, Azula almost chuckled, as blue flames snarled and twisted over sand. Looked like she could pull off a good imitation of Zuzu's fiery rages after all. Good. The more Nawahime underestimated her, the better. Whoever - whatever - the spy was, she was good, and Azula needed every edge she could get as she spun and slashed and parried-

The hand that caught her heel-strike should have shattered like glass.

It didn't. It held. It squeezed.

Bones splintered. Muscle seared and flayed, charred by blue flame. The ground came up, and the world blacked out.

Get up, Azula told herself, somewhere in the gray haze. You're the Fire Lord's daughter. You are the strongest firebender in your generation. Get up.

Haze faded to almost-clear, to the sound of her own shallow gasps. Azula blinked, trying to move past the pain. Trying to think.

"Foolish child. Did you truly think you could fight me?"

Clawed fingers pierced her cheek, and fire burned into her mind.

"...An interesting plan."

You're in my head. You can't be in my head, get out-

"Crush your enemy in his own gamble. Ruthless." Almost a purr. "Worthy of Sozin."

I'll kill you for this, I swear!

"What. Is. This?"

Fire, searing across her shelter from despair-

Azula twisted. Dug fingers into sand as the world roared back, and threw.

Damn. I was hoping to hit her eyes.

But the creature had blinked, just for a moment. Azula wrung it dry, rolling aside from claw-tipped fingers, up and to her feet-

Foot. The other was a mass of blinding pain, and she was not going to look down. She didn't have to, as Ty Lee landed beside her and sandstone rose to block fireballs in a crash of sand and glass. "Azula!"

"Alive!" Azula snarled, as Dai Li dodged fire and rained stone back on the creature. "I want that thing alive!"

"Thing?" A dark laugh. "You don't even know what you are."

She knew that tone. She'd heard that tone, from Azulon and Father and in her own ears-

"I'll teach you."

No.

No time to think, as the creature eeled around rocks like a summer-dance, like Zuzu playing; robed arms were out and looping and the sparks, oh those beautiful deadly sparks-

No time to think. So she didn't. Only stepped in front of the target-

It's just pain just pain you know what she wants she was in your head she hates weakness hates life hates Air you know-

-And move.

Uncle could do it. Zuzu could do it. It couldn't be that hard.

Thunder cracked, and the world burned.

...Azula blinked, feeling lashes sweep over sand. She was lying on sand. Tasting sand, and salt, and that odd snap of a smell that followed lightning. And breathing hurt.

Burns. Burns inside, but not like fire.

Someone was screaming.

But Ty Lee never screams...

"-Bury her! Sink her and don't let her come up, oh spirits no, Azula-!"

"Uh," Azula managed. Blinked again; shadows, light, Ty Lee gripping her hand...

And a swirling whirlpool in the sand, surrounded by grim Dai Li. Good.

Blink. And the world had shifted again, Bolin and Dalun lifting her while Hai cursed spirits and spirits-in-flesh to turn the air blue. "Don't know if the scrolls the rebels in Ba Sing Se have been scattering to the Earth Army are right, and this is not how I wanted to find out-"

Sealed sand shattered. A whirlwind of blue flame roared up, coalescing into scales and mane and fangs...

A dragon. Azula's heart shuddered. The dragons are dead.

This one looked alive, hovering over them, breathing in-

Ty Lee shrieked, impossibly loud, pitch climbing high until it made the inside of Azula's ears itch. The massive head flinched.

"Here!" Hai shouted, outthrust hands compressing sand into a rising rattle of razor shards; Ty Lee bent and whipped-

A gale slashed shards through azure wings.

Shrieking outrage, bleeding, the tattered-winged dragon fled.

All the while, Azula's head rang with mocking laughter.

"Foolish child. You've set the stage perfectly.

"Did you think the Avatar was my only enemy?"

And the world slid sideways, and she had to tell them, had to warn...

Ty Lee. Gripping her hand. Angry and warm and alive, thank Agni, alive.

Ty Lee was here. It had to be safe. She could just-

"Azula!"

A/N: Given some of the questions I've been asked about Ozai, Azula, Zuko, and the whole dragon-child mess, I thought I'd share a few genetics terms: hybrid vigor and hybrid breakdown.

A lot of people are familiar with hybrid vigor. Cross two very different pure strains, and the offspring can be more successful than either parent. There are various reasons for this, ranging from a lucky genetic outcome (not all hybrids do well) to the extreme that some genes (or gene complexes, bunches of related genes) are over-expressed because the other half of the hybrid's DNA doesn't have a "match" to them. (See mules and ligers.)

Hybrid breakdown is a little more complicated. It basically hinges on the fact that because of chromosome crossover (part of how most organisms form gametes to reproduce), we do not inherit genes and gene complexes as discrete units. Not always.

Say we have two "pure" strains to begin; call them red and green. Imagine each individual with their set of genes; a pair of chromosomes, two long strings of colored beads. (Humans have much more than one, but let's keep it simple.) Red parent has two strands of red. Green has two of green. Before they reproduce, crossover happens - but since they are pure strains, red crossing over with red still gives you a strand of red, and likewise for green. So your hybrid has one red strand, and one green. A good setup for hybrid vigor, and reasonably simple.

The problem comes when your hybrid reproduces. The red and green strands line up to crossover... and the resulting single strand that goes into the offspring (and its genes) is a patchwork of red and green. You may literally have part of a gene from one of your hybrid's parents, and part from the other. The resulting gene may not work. It may work somewhat, but not as well as an all-red or all-green gene. (This, BTW, is part of what's called outbreeding depression.) Or it may not work at all... which can be lethal.

Now, if your hybrid dragon-child is breeding back into a plain vanilla human line (for example, Azulon and Ilah), this can be survivable. The "mixed" gene can be compensated for by a "plain" human gene, and all should be well. Plain dragon would also work - in the case of Sozin and Tejjina, Tejjina's "plain" dragon genes would compensate. Again, it works. (This is called introgression.)

The problem comes when a hybrid has offspring with another hybrid.

Hear that? Yes, that is a Hell Is That Noise. That is the sound of a million possible very bad genetic outcomes, cackling in unholy glee.

You now have the chance for mixed, barely functional, weirdly functional, or otherwise scrambled genes on both sides. And one of the most complicated, delicate, jury-rigged bits of evolution we have, so dependent on healthy genes, is a sane, intelligent brain.

Long story short: There is every reason Sozin, Azulon, Ozai, Iroh, Lu Ten, and Ursa should be sane and rational. A few of them might incline more to the draconic definition of sane, but they're sane.

Zuko and Azula, though, are screwed.

...This also explains why Azula the prodigy bent at four. Some parts of her genes are human. Some are dragon. The mix is not predictable. It is entirely possible for Azula to have some traits that are more dragon than Zuko, and others that are more human. And the same for him. It's even possible that one of the pair is almost entirely human. Though the odds are against it.

Crossover also helps explain how long-buried traits like Fire or Air heritage can resurface without being strictly dominant or recessive. Get enough scattered pieces of one allele to combine, and poof! Somebody's got a heritage the family tried to bury generations ago.

FYI, this is also why stories with "nations of half-elves" tend to have me tossing them across the room or Headdesking. Genetic inheritance does not work that way. If by some chance it did, we'd probably be talking about a situation of codominant alleles at one major locus, which means that of every four offspring, 2 would be half-elves, one elf, and one human, and you don't see that happening...

I know, I know. A Wizard Did It. I'd just like to see a story where someone thought about this...

Shidan is giving Ozai way too much credit for sanity. Everybody makes mistakes. Eshe is Ancient Egyptian, meaning life. (All the Touzaikaze have Ancient Egyptian names. They're from a desert, it fit.)

I used the milpa system as inspiration for Fire Nation agriculture, and put in a bunch of actual Andean crops in here. They're exactly what you'd want for volcanic and high-altitude environments. "Oogami nuts" = lupin seeds. And yes, one type of Vietnamese transparent noodles (miến dong) is made not with mung beans, but with a crop that originated in the Andes. This amuses me, just like pizza being an Italian dish (tomatoes, heh) and "American as apple pie" (apples coming from Eurasia). Sometimes, people are just cool.

I've had this background for Tao in mind all along, especially after the prison barge episode. I know, in Real Life the reason Katara isn't worried about maltreatment is because this is a kid's cartoon. Even so. If people consider the Fire Nation monsters, and it's a more realistic setting... I'm sure some were.

And while shamans and medicine men may have been honored in many societies, more often they were respected - warily - because they were weird and dangerous. The social outcasts, barely accepted by the rest of their group. The outsiders. And yes, sometimes of mixed blood. Which is a lot more daunting in societies where your group is The Real People and everybody else is not. (And if the Earth Kingdom is modeled after ancient China - yes, that is exactly what they think.)

I know I'm hard on Aang. I find him really, really hard to write. (For one, I can't remember ever - ever - being as naive about the vicious things people do to each other as Aang is portrayed in canon.) Azula is easier for me to write than Aang.

But if Aang weren't Aang, this story would not have a happy ending. And it will.

...Well, mostly happy. With this many Doom Magnets? Sometimes, breaking even is good.

"How big is Asagitatsu? Would it be like Mt. St. Helens? Or Krakatoa? Santorini used to be a volcano too." Yes. Yes, it did. So did (or more accurately, is) Lake Toba.

en. wikipedia wiki/Toba_catastrophe_theory

...What, did you think Koh was leaving things to chance this time?

Chapter 48

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Lava. Smoke. And an unsettling emptiness of people, like a missing tooth. The only good thing about being on Crescent Island was the Fire Nation wasn't looking here.

Yet, Aang thought glumly, huddled in a ball against black rocks. He wanted to be huddled up against Appa, like Katara and Sokka and Momo and even Toph's rock tent...

He did, and he didn't. It felt better being alone.

What am I doing?

He'd said he was sorry to Katara for hurting her. Over and over and over again. For some reason, Toph wasn't buying it.

...Buying truth. Earth Kingdom. Crazy. Truth was in the air. People said it, or they didn't. You couldn't buy the air!

And he was sorry. He hated it when Katara got hurt. But this wasn't like the fire with Jeong Jeong. He hadn't been playing around. He'd been listening to a lesson, and Tao had - and they weren't even supposed to be there, Toph had pretty much said they were spying on Tao, how could they blame him for blasting stuff when nobody was supposed to be there?

"It's not my fault," Aang muttered. "I'm sorry. But you guys were the ones spying."

Not his fault. But the North Pole wasn't his fault either, and he still felt awful about it.

But I had to. They weren't just going to go away. Aang winced. I said I was sorry. And Katara's okay now. Toph will figure that out in the morning.

Tap. Rock against pebble. Tap. Softer in sand. Tap. Leather on rock and sand, boots-

Aang whirled on the little spirit, earth rising with his clenched fist to grip something almost as ephemeral as smoke. "Why can't you just leave me alone?"

A squeak, leather on leather. And leather came from killing things, and everybody else used it, Water Tribes and Earth Kingdom and Fire Nation, and he was so sick of everyone-

Someone yanked a shred of earth away from him, one wire-thin sliver of stone peeled back so leather could wriggle free. "Boots! Out of there!"

Toph. Who else? "Make that go away," he said, still mad.

"He was trying to." Toph stood like the tiniest of mountains, dust whispering around her feet as the little spirit scrambled behind her. "Think I'm feeling a pattern here."

"What?" Aang blurted out. Because she wasn't - she couldn't-

She can't what?

His thoughts were all tangled, and all he could figure out was that she ought to be mad - which was crazy, he was the one who should be mad, no one was making her go after the Fire Lord!

Which made him feel guilty, because Toph didn't have to go after the Fire Lord. But she was. Which made him madder. Killing was wrong, and if he had to - had to stop the Fire Lord, then she shouldn't want to do it too-

"Twinkletoes!" Toph had her hands out, as if she could brace against the breeze. "Think like a rock!"

"I don't want to think like a rock!"

...Ouch. Now his throat hurt.

But he'd gotten this far. And he had to say it to somebody. "I'm an airbender, Toph. I'm a monk. That's who I am. That's who I want to be. I don't want to be like you!" He threw his hands down, rock shattering away. "I don't want to be like any of you!"

"Wha- whoozit - we getting attacked by earthbenders?" Sokka sat up, Boomerang in hand.

Weapons. Always weapons. Always being prepared to hurt people. It wasn't right. Why couldn't it all just go away?

"Aang." Katara was still wrapped in her bedroll; usually the Fire Nation was warm, but there was a cold wind from the north tonight. "I know we should have told you about the ship. But... we just couldn't find the right way to say it-"

"There isn't any right way to say it, Katara!" Aang gulped. "I thought - I thought your father was like a teacher. Like Gyatso. I thought he was listening to me! But all the time he was - he-" He shook his head, hating everything he was saying. But what was he supposed to do? "When did everybody turn into monsters?"

"What?" Katara looked like someone had slapped her. "You... think Dad is... Aang, how could you?"

Toph cracked her knuckles.

"How could I?" Aang said in disbelief. "I'm not the one who killed everybody on a whole ship, and left blood everywhere, and - your dad says before the Fire Nation came you used to kill your own people, and-"

"Okay! Everybody, stop." Sokka stood up; eyes alert, even if they were still shadowed with sleep. "Toph. Katara. Make sure we didn't attract any attention. Aang?" He walked right up to the airbender, face grim. "Let's go for a walk."

Dark, and black sand, and only their own footsteps along the shore. Sokka sighed, looking up at the moon. "She helped you ride a wave all the way back here, huh? Wish I could have told her thanks. And know she heard it."

Aang ducked his head, feeling a little guilty. Yue talked to him when he needed help. Sokka? He'd been in trouble lots of times, and the moon hadn't done anything.

The Avatar always had the spirits' attention. Somehow, that didn't feel comforting.

"I'm sorry," Aang blurted out. "I know your dad's not... he's trying, I guess."

Sokka took a deep breath, and slowly let it out. "You know, if we could stop the war right now, I'd do it."

"Well, yeah." Aang frowned. "Sure you would. Anybody would."

"Aang. Just listen, okay?"

Confused, Aang nodded.

"I hate the war. I hate what that Fire Nation's done. To us, to the world... to Mom." His jaw set, determined. "But if General Fong was an idiot, he was right about one thing. The longer the war goes on, the more people get hurt. And... I don't think Mom would want that. She'd want it to be over. So Dad and the men could come back, and we could start living instead of fighting. If we could stop the war right now, with nobody else getting hurt - I think Mom would want that."

That's not what Zuko said Katara wants, Aang thought, trying not to get mad all over again. How could Zuko think he knew anything about Katara? She was Water Tribe. A healer. She'd never put swords to his neck just to get a gate open. She wasn't anything like him at all.

"Attacking on the eclipse - people are going to get hurt," Sokka stated. "Some of them are going to die. But we've fought a lot of firebenders. They're not dumb. If they can't bend, they'll try to back off until they can - and then we'll have Ozai. We'll have him, Aang. So he can decide if he's going to do the right thing."

Aang swallowed. "But if he doesn't..."

"If he doesn't, that's his fault," Sokka said bluntly. "A chief has to do what's right for his people. If he won't - then we do what we have to do." He grimaced. "I wish I could give you a better plan, Aang. I really wish I could. I wish I could say, we're going to do this, and it's going to work, and Ozai's going to see sense if we have to pound it into him. But - I can't. This is all I've got."

Aang wiggled fingers in the air, not sure what to say. But it felt a lot less angry in his head. "I thought you wanted to fight the Fire Nation. That's what you said, when you and Katara got me off Zuko's ship."

"Yeah, I did," Sokka nodded. "I did then. Kind of seen more than enough fighting since." He chewed on his lip, thinking. "It's like you with earthbending. I like learning how to fight. I liked sparring with the rest of the warriors. It means I'm a man of the tribe. It's what I'm supposed to do, you know? I'm Dad's son. I've got to be a warrior. But if I never had to fight anybody else again for real? I could live with that." He frowned. "Aang?"

"...I gotta sit down." Breathe. Feel the air. Maybe he was in the Fire Nation, but the wind was all around him. Wind was always there.

Sokka crouched beside him. "You okay?"

"I'm confused." Aang tried to put the pieces together. "Didn't your dad teach you to fight the Fire Nation?"

Sokka gave him a look askance. "He taught me to fight so I could protect the village."

"But you came along with me," Aang objected. "That's not protecting the village." That's not what your dad taught you. How can you do that?

Sokka kept looking at him. "Aang, if we pull this off, you're going to save the world."

"...Oh." Aang had to rub his head, hair and all, because that - he just hadn't thought of that. Protect the world, and of course Sokka protected the village. Wow. That was the neatest way of getting around teachings ever.

"Oh?" Sokka echoed. "Why would you ever think we'd leave you alone with this mess? We're friends. Friends help each other out. Like the guys in your temple, right?"

Aang had to look away. "Not when it's not fair."

"Huh?"

"Come on, Sokka." Aang rolled his eyes. "Katara told you."

"No," Sokka said slowly, "I don't think she did. What are you talking about?"

"It was during the storm," Aang insisted. "You know."

"I know we got so sick after that, I thought I was an earthbender," Sokka said wryly. "All I remember is Katara saying something about playing airbender games more, since you hadn't gotten to do that in a while. Like a hundred years, right?" His grin faded. "I'm missing something. Help me out."

"Katara didn't tell you," Aang said, stunned. And hurt. "I told her, it was awful... the other kids wouldn't let me play, and - she didn't tell you?"

"She didn't," Sokka stated. "What do you mean, they wouldn't let you play? You're a great guy. I'd take you on my team for a stickball game any day."

"Yeah," Aang said, trying not to be mad about it. "Who wouldn't want the Avatar on their team?"

"What? Aang, that's not-"

"The Elders told everybody," Aang said; getting it out fast, before it could hurt too much. "I couldn't be on the teams anymore. It wasn't fair. Everybody said, the only fair thing to do was not let me play. So they didn't." He swallowed. "So I can't - you guys shouldn't have to fight the Fire Nation with me. It's not fair. And the Avatar's supposed to make things fair."

Sokka stood still a moment, staring. "Your Elders did... right. Aang? Give me a minute, okay?" Straightening his shoulders, he walked around some cooled lava, out of sight.

Aang strained his ears, even trying to feel with his feet the way Toph did. That sounded a lot like cursing. And something hitting sand, hard.

Why? What'd I do?

A last, incoherent "Arrgh!" A sigh. And Sokka came back, still looking like he wanted to break nuts with his bare hands. "Okay," Sokka got out. "Before I go completely nuts - did Gyatso try to fix this? Did he do anything?"

Aang frowned. He hadn't thought about that in a while. The Elders had made their decision. "He wasn't happy about it," he said at last. "He said maybe we should take a trip early, and go see Bumi and Kuzon. You know what kind of crazy stuff Bumi pulls; it wouldn't matter if I was the Avatar. And Kuzon would've just teamed up with Shidan, and me against a dragon? I bet that would have been fair." He grinned a little, thinking of it. "But the Elders heard about it, and they didn't want Gyatso to train me anymore, they were going to send me away, so - so I ran. And got frozen. And then you guys found me."

"Gyatso was a good guy," Sokka said quietly.

Lump in his throat, Aang nodded.

"You know, you and Katara have a lot in common," Sokka went on. "You both worry a lot about fair. Maybe sometimes you shouldn't."

Aang's jaw dropped. "But-"

"We're fighting the whole Fire Nation. We have to win. And Ozai has to lose. That means we don't fight fair." Sokka looked serious. "A fair fight means more people die."

"But I'm supposed to keep things fair," Aang protested. "I'm the Avatar."

"The Avatar's supposed to keep things balanced," Sokka stated. "Right now? That's not happening. First we stop Ozai. Then we worry about what's fair." He held up a lecturing finger. "And that means you've got to stop ditching us, Aang. Sure, it's not fair we have to fight the Fire Nation. It's not fair anybody does. But somebody's got to." He spread empty hands. "We said we'd help, Aang. Not, we'll help until it gets too dangerous. Not until we get bored. Not until we get scared. We know what we're up against. What you're up against. You're not going to do this alone." Sokka gave him a wry grin. "That wouldn't be fair."

Aang grinned. "You've got a cool definition of fair."

"Just one condition."

Uh-oh.

"You need to think about what you're bending," Sokka said seriously. "You're an incredible bender, Aang. Maybe Kuzon and Bumi were used to that, but we aren't. Now, Katara's not going to tell you this, because she's got this crazy idea she shouldn't have been listening in on your lesson-"

"Well, she shouldn't have," Aang said, more than a little annoyed. If she hadn't been there, she wouldn't have gotten hurt. "Those were private."

"Since when?" Sokka said skeptically. "I watch you train with Toph and Katara all the time."

"That's different!"

Sokka eyed him. "Aang? Man to man, I'm warning you. If you say it's 'cause they're girls, Toph is going to bury you. And Katara's going to help."

"Huh? No!" Sheesh; what did girls have to do with it? "They're kids." Sokka looked blank. Great, just great. How simple did he have to make it? "We're not supposed to train in private. Not without an elder." And if Tao wasn't an elder, who was? Even Guru Pathik might not be that old.

"You trained Katara in waterbending," Sokka pointed out.

"Because she really wanted to," Aang shrugged. "Master Pakku said the Water Tribe doesn't train girls. I'm not Water Tribe."

"Kind of noticed," Sokka muttered. "Okay. So this doesn't happen again? Tell Dad when something's supposed to be private. When we think private, it's a lot more... you know, guys' mysteries, and stuff. Or girls' mysteries - and nobody wants to cross Gran-Gran. Regular lessons, history and stuff? That's for everybody. Dad didn't know."

Aang heaved a sigh. "But I told Katara!"

"Maybe she didn't get it," Sokka said practically. "You're kind of hard to figure out sometimes." He waved a hand. "Anyway, not the point. I saw the temples. I guess when one of the monks got upset and whipped up a breeze, it didn't hurt much. You were all airbenders; if some wind came your way, you could handle it." He paused. "But we're not airbenders, Aang. We don't see it coming. Like Toph didn't, in the Rumble. You've got to be more careful."

Now that wasn't fair. "What do you want me to do? Hold my breath forever?" Aang flung up his hands. "I'm hard to figure out? Your dad's the one who- who-" He didn't want to think about it.

But I've got to.

"How can your dad be so nice and still like to kill people?"

He couldn't see much in the starlight, but somehow he just knew Sokka was red. The older boy was making that weird little stifled growl, that didn't sound friendly at all.

But Sokka ducked his head and breathed a few times. And nodded to himself. "Okay. I'm going to start with something really, really simple. I hope." Another breath. "Aang. Where'd you ever get the idea my dad likes killing anybody?"

Aang tensed, ready to bolt, or bend, or something. If Chief Hakoda was like Sokka's teacher, that had to hurt.

But he didn't sound angry. At least, not a lot. "Well... he did it."

Sokka eyed him.

"What?" Aang blurted out. "He did!"

"I'm thinking." Sokka paced the sand, back and forth, fingers poking absently at the leather wrapping Boomerang's grip. "About our trip. And elephant koi. And Pakku. And everything."

"...That's a lot to think about." And what did any of their trip have to do with what Chief Hakoda did? They weren't trying to kill anybody. Sometimes - sometimes they'd had to. But that was totally different!

"No kidding," Sokka said under his breath. "Let me get this straight. When people do something, it's because they like doing it?"

"Well - not everybody," Aang admitted. "You have to do what your teacher says, when you're a kid. And everybody getting attacked by the Fire Nation - I know they don't want to fight back. They just have to. But your dad..." Maybe he shouldn't say it? But Sokka had asked. "The Fire Nation wasn't attacking your village anymore. They hadn't come in years. So he had to want to leave, to go after them. To - to kill them."

Sokka looked him up and down. Glanced aside, rubbing his head.

"Sokka?"

"Keep it simple," Sokka said, half to himself. "Okay. So when Zuko attacked our village, it was because he wanted to?"

"No, he didn't! He was lying!" Aang said heatedly. "So if he was lying about that, he could have been lying about anything. And nobody else was talking, so I couldn't tell if they were liars, too. I had to get them away from you guys." No matter what it took.

Sokka rubbed his head again. "You thought Zuko was lying, but you didn't think Jet was."

"But Jet wasn't lying," Aang said reluctantly. "He was after the Fire Nation all the time. He wanted us to help him stop them. He just didn't say he was going to hurt other people to do it. He thought that old man was an assassin. Because... well, I guess because if the Freedom Fighters realized he was just an old man, then Jet would be wrong. And Jet was their teacher."

"My head hurts," Sokka muttered. "Teachers can't be wrong?"

"They can't be that wrong! The Elders would never let anybody teach who'd trick someone into getting people hurt!"

Sokka winced. "Um. Did you notice Jet didn't have any Elders?"

"Well, he should have! But he didn't lie. Like Long Feng. Remember? He never said he didn't know where Appa was." Aang shrugged. "He didn't start lying until he was talking to the Earth King. Boy, that was dumb."

"This has got to make sense," Sokka said under his breath. "Somehow. I just don't know how yet."

Aang glared at him. "It makes sense when nobody's trying to kill anybody!"

Sokka laughed.

Huh?

"You're right." Sokka grinned at him, just a little rueful. "You are absolutely right."

Aang blinked. "I am?"

"When nobody's trying to kill you - yeah. It makes sense," Sokka nodded. "When nothing in the world can get up the mountain to hurt you... when nobody fights, and nobody's ever hungry... when you can't even show off for a girl, because there aren't any there... yeah. I guess it does make sense." He stared off into the darkness. "Man. They must have hated your guts."

Aang wanted to flinch. Swallowed hard, and stood his ground. "You say that like you think the Fire Nation was right!" It hurt, how could Sokka - how could he ever - ?

"I never said that, Aang. And I never will," Sokka said sharply. "They were wrong. Sozin was wrong. This whole war - there's no words for how wrong this mess is. I'm saying I think I understand. Just a little."

"You understand the crazy people?" Aang said skeptically. "Kuzon wasn't like these guys. Nobody in the Fire Nation was! I don't know what happened!"

"What about Shiyu?" Sokka was looking at him, very intently. "And Jeong Jeong? Those Fire Nation guards at Gaipan? Jet was ambushing them for months. But when I told them the town was going to flood, they listened. They got everybody out." He paused. "Was Kuzon like that?"

"I guess," Aang said at last. "I didn't... Gyatso never let us go to the Fire Nation in storm season. He said people would be busy. So I never knew what they did about floods."

"You never saw them backed into a corner." Sokka nodded. "It makes a difference, Aang. It makes a big difference when there's nowhere to run to. And that's why Dad took the fight to the Fire Nation. He knew they'd be back. He knew they weren't going to stop. Just like Ozai's not going to stop. Unless we make him."

Aang's heart sank. "Yeah."

"Aang." Sokka looked serious. "Why are you fighting the Fire Lord?"

"To stop the war!" Aang said, disbelieving. "What kind of question is that?"

"I'm fighting to stop the war. Dad's fighting to protect our people. Katara's fighting to protect you. And Toph's in it because she promised, and she wants us to win." Sokka crossed his arms. "So why are you fighting? Not the Avatar. You. Aang."

"Because I have to," Aang insisted. "I am the Avatar, Sokka. Roku told me if I don't stop the Fire Lord before Sozin's Comet comes, he's going to burn everything." He had to look away. "But sometimes... sometimes I wish he'd never told me that." It's not right. It's not fair. I don't like this. I don't like any of it!

But Roku was his teacher. He had to keep going.

"Aang?" Sokka was quieter. Worried.

"Being the Avatar sucks."

"Yeah. I hear you." Sokka pulled him into a one-armed hug. "Wish we could have been in that fire chamber with you. Maybe if Roku saw you weren't alone in this mess, he could have given us some better advice."

"You think so?" Aang said hopefully.

"Hey, why not? Water Tribe. We've got a reputation." Sokka let go. "Come on. We'll get Toph to talk her hide-behind into hiding behind something else for a while."

"You mean you're going to try," Aang said, skeptical.

"Darn right. What else is family for?"

Agni, save me from family feuds. Huojin pointed toward the span of the hull. "You, over there." Pointed toward a niche of boxes. "You, over there." Laid a deliberately heavy hand on the loudest yelping citizen. "You? Come with me."

A rising babble of protest. Corporal Shoni glanced at him, and Private Rikiya had a particularly disturbing grin.

"I will hear each of you, separately." There was a trick to pitching your voice to cut through hysterical people without shouting them down. Captain Lu-shan was good at it. Huojin was... well, he hoped he was passable. And he was very grateful for a few borrowed marines for backup. I miss you, Captain. A lot. "We are going to sort this out, if I have to get the general and his tea down here to do it."

That caught both fuming families and the yammering onlookers off guard, as he'd known it would; promising a chance to preen instead of cause trouble. Good.

"But if we don't sort this out," Huojin went on remorselessly, "we might have to call down the prince and his tea, instead."

...It wasn't really silence. But the complaining died down to almost a whisper. He could see people sweating.

Heh. You make a mean smoke-sugar, kid. But everybody knows about your tea.

Blame Amaya for that. The healer had tried to keep her student up on his lessons, between all the rest of his plotting, planning, and scattering snow over Captain Jee's decks. And that particular one was driving her to distraction. Healing was as much about herbs as bending, and Amaya apparently could not figure out how a young man who could time an herbal decoction to the second of most potency couldn't brew tea regular people could drink without flinching.

Having once made the painful mistake of accepting a cup from Sergeant Kyo's marines, Huojin thought he could guess. It was... bracing.

Unfortunately, Amaya had expounded on it to Iroh. In detail. In what she apparently thought was private.

Only as a wincing Private Sukekuni had explained, when Huojin had asked what the problem was, nothing in a ship's corridors was private. Inside your quarters might be, if no one heard it through the bulkhead. A few other places on the ship. The showers, surprisingly enough; everyone could see everything, but no one would admit seeing anything.

Which seemed to be the only thing that got their prince through the day, sometimes. He'd seen Guards with less scars.

Sorry about bringing up the tea, kid. But at least it calmed them down. "All right," Huojin said to Chuanli; a fussy nit-picker of a builder, good for laying stone but not for being trapped in a big metal box for weeks. "What's this whole mess about, anyway?"

Several arguments, a few amused marines, and a girl's outburst of tears later, Huojin trudged back into his family's nook. Stepped carefully around Lim and Daiyu's patty-cake, and sagged dramatically to the floor.

"Daddy!"

Ah, buried in hugs. All was right with the world. "Everybody staying out of trouble?"

"Um..."

Uh-oh. But nobody was bleeding. And real trouble would have the Wens in from just a few feet away. Huojin pried open an eye, asking Luli a silent question-

Oh. "New hairstyle?" I am so dead.

"Meixiang is dealing with Jinhai." Luli looked ruefully amused, shaking out hair that now just brushed her shoulders, without ornaments.

"Ah." If he paid attention, he could hear murmurs that way. Interesting, how you got into the habit of not listening to your neighbors.

"It wouldn't have been so short if he hadn't insisted he could even it out," Luli observed.

"Right." Huojin looked at his daughters. Who were trying to hide suspicious grins. And failing.
"What did you do?"

A pair of innocent blinks. A likely story.

"Meixiang offered them the chance to cut his hair," Luli said dryly.

The grins got a little wider.

Huojin sat up to look their girls over, fairly sure who'd been the ringleader. Both of them looked like nice, sweet little girls. And Daiyu really was.

Lim? Not so much.

"Okay, precious. Give."

"We said we'd think about it," Lim said, all wide-eyed innocence. "'Cause Mom and Dad say you should always think before you do something crazy."

Huojin tried not to snicker too much. "He's not going to sleep tonight."

"Nope!" Lim bounced on her toes. "Just like you do in a 'terrogation!"

"Shh!" Daiyu had a finger to her lips. "Don't give it away!"

"Wouldn't dream of it," Huojin said solemnly.

Luli stifled a laugh.

Darn. She's onto me.

Then again, she always had been. Which was why he loved her. Looks were fine, skill with jade was definitely a plus to a family - but someone who understood? Priceless.

"So what was the problem this time?"

"Oh brother." Huojin debated collapsing back on the floor. Nah, he was tougher than that. Maybe. "The argument was over a comb. Boy One gave it to Girl One, Girl Two says he promised it to her, Girl Three - who's his sister - swears it looks like something that went missing from her cosmetics box... and after a few rounds of this we find out she was seeing Boy Two, who the family does not approve of, and maybe she gave it to him..."

"Ouch," Luli agreed.

"The problem is, we've got too many people jammed into a steel can, and at least another week to go," Huojin sighed. "Lee did this for three years? No wonder he's-" Kids are listening, Huojin, pay attention. "A little odd," he finished.

"Maybe we could make the ship stop and get off?" Daiyu said hopefully.

"Not yet," Luli said firmly. "If we stopped, we'd have to get everybody back on, and you know what happens when you help me pack and unpack our things, right? Things get lost, and they take time to find and," she barely hesitated, "we just don't have the time. Not yet."

Daiyu's face crumpled a little, but she nodded. Huojin hid a wince. They'd tried not to tell the kids the whole, ugly truth. No kid needed to know there were people out there who'd kill them just for being born. But that the war that had been on the other side of the Walls was here, and real as any monster under the bed... yeah. They knew. They were trying to be brave; really, really trying to be the best little girls they could be until the war went away again. And he was not going to get mad and hit something. First, he was a Guard, and even if you were born outside Ba Sing Se, you did not let your temper get the better of you.

Second... the people who needed hitting weren't here.

"Don't worry," he told his girls instead. "I know captains. Jee's going to do everything he can to get us off this ship as fast as possible."

Not that he wanted to even breathe to his daughters why. Cabin fever was bad, but probably survivable. Coming under attack from the Fire Navy while he still had civilians on board? That had to be near the top of Captain Jee's nightmare list. Right under being blown apart by a volcano.

It worried him that they hadn't been attacked yet. From what Huojin understood of the messenger hawk system, every officer on this coast ought to know Suzuran was a target. Something he'd finally managed to nerve himself up to send in a note to Zuko, given catching the kid with two spare minutes to himself was about as likely as walking on water-

Someone cleared his throat outside the doorway. "Guard Huojin? May I come in?"

"Lieutenant Sadao?" Huojin stood; Sadao was probably a decade younger, but he was second in command of the ship. "What brings you here?"

Sadao held up his note. "The prince knew most of what you asked, but he's not up to date on the most recent communications protocols, so he asked the captain. And Captain Jee pointed out that if you're wondering, a lot of people probably are. And people from Ba Sing Se respect the Guard." He smiled at the girls. "Um. Hi."

Lim gave him her mother's considering look. Daiyu's eyes went wide at the armor, before she hid her face against Huojin's chest.

"Daiyu!" Luli scolded. "I'm sorry, she's young..."

"No, no, it's okay," the lieutenant said quickly. "My baby sister, Haruko - she was just that age when I left for the Army. It's good for children to be wary of outsiders." He smiled a little. "She's got her own place in the glassworks, now. The last letter I had from Mother, the family just threw out some upper-class boy who was trying to talk her into running off to the colonies... what?"

"You said the Army," Huojin pointed out. "This doesn't look like land."

"Story of my life," Sadao sighed. "There was a paperwork mix-up, and... trust me, you don't want to know."

Oh, but I do, I really do, Huojin thought. That was a problem with Guards; curious as pygmy pumas. He'd thought Ba Sing Se won the gold for bureaucratic screw-ups. This sounded like the kind of story that might make Captain Lu-shan crack a grin. So how do I get you drunk enough to tell it?

"Anyway..." Sadao folded himself down to sit; a neat trick in armor. "Hawk messages are good, but they have limits. First, hawks only go to who they're sent to. It's not everybody who'd be looking for us. Just the officers. And most of them are going to be careful what they say. One of the Fire Lord's ships, in a mutiny? That's just not supposed to happen."

Okay, that kind of made sense. No one expected a Guard to be on the take, either. Which meant the rare times it'd happened, Lu-shan had threatened to rip the perpetrator's head off with his bare hands.

"Second, someone's got to send messages in the first place," Sadao went on. "Gaipan probably sent plenty, but before that?" He smirked a little. "Do you think Princess Azula is going to want to admit we took a whole fleet out from under her? She's the Fire Lord's heir. She's supposed to get results."

"Oof," Huojin muttered. "I'd be a little slow sending that report, too."

"And if she has sent in a report, people know who's on board," Sadao nodded. "You think anyone wants to be the lone ship against royal lightning-bending?"

Lightning. That was still a hard thing for Huojin to wrap his mind around. Fire wasn't scary enough? "Eep."

"And then there's the bounty hunters." Sadao grinned. "Now that's funny."

Luli gave him a measuring look. "Bounty hunters are funny?"

"Well... kind of, ma'am. The price on Prince Zuko's head? It's enough to get the serious scavengers after it. Guys like the Rough Rhinos, or worse. And people like that tend to have phoenix-eagles." Sadao saw blank looks, and elaborated, "They're about the only thing that can catch messenger hawks. If they get caught interfering with military communications, they're dead, but..."

Huojin added two and two, and had to grin himself.

"Even with all that mess, someone should have at least hailed us," Sadao said soberly. "So either there are spirits getting involved - I'm not going to count that out - or the ships we've come near have orders not to make contact."

Luli chuckled behind her hand. "You sound like they think mutiny's contagious."

"Ma'am, we have two princes on board," Sadao pointed out. "We have fire-healers. If anybody on those ships has ever even wondered if the war is wrong, if anyone's willing to risk their neck and their families because they believe in General Iroh, and General Jeong Jeong, and the prince - it could be."

"We're dangerous," Huojin said, stunned. "A freighter and a bunch of Earth Kingdom junks without even catapults, and we're dangerous to the Fire Navy."

"People have heard about Admiral Zhao hauling off Fire Sages because some of them were loyal to the Avatar," Sadao nodded. "If the Fire Lord knows the Avatar's alive, and if Princess Azula's made her report he does - yes. We are dangerous." He paused, uneasy. "Until the Fire Lord can put people under the command of someone they'd never dare be disloyal to."

"Yeah?" Huojin said warily. "Who?"

Rest. Be calm.

A thrumming in her blood. A delicate, subtle warmth, like sunlight moving across the back of her hand.

Rest. Be calm. You have been wounded, but all will be well.

Firm, without the stab of claws. Yet she knew the claws were there.

Rest. Be calm. Breathe-

Azula blinked. Painted metal overhead. Silk under her. The sway and scent of the sea-

"Azula!"

Pink. Gently comforting hands. Which were firmly holding her down from any sudden moves. Not to be borne.

But this was Ty Lee, and the airbender was allowed a few liberties. For now.

"Breathe. Slowly. Keep your heart rate down. I know you have the training." Seated by her bed, the white-haired firebender met her gaze, pale gold unflinching even as his whiskers twitched. "You came entirely too close to dying. Your Dai Li have worked a miracle to keep you stable, and I have healed the worst of the damage. But you are not wholly well. Not yet." A slow, rumbling breath. "Be easy. I did not mend your heart to kill you without cause."

Bolin was here, Azula noted, but his seniors were not. So there was trouble. More than just one unreliable lord.

Trouble... and a dark red shadow in the corner of her quarters. Mai.

Don't react. Feel as angry as you want. But don't give them anything. "Most would say you have more than enough cause, Shidan of Byakko."

The dry smile showed far too many teeth. "Good afternoon to you as well, granddaughter."

"So tell me." Gingerly - she could always knife him later - Azula allowed Ty Lee to help her sit up. Ankle felt intact; surprising, but useful. But something under her breastbone was sore, in a way that made her uneasy. Careful. Move carefully. Reach for their fires. He's bound to Byakko, I won't be able to take him - but he'll underestimate me. Everyone does. And then I'll have Mai again. "Why shouldn't I have you imprisoned for dealing with a known traitor?"

"Because you want to know who attacked you," Shidan replied, gaze never leaving hers. "And why."

I know what attacked me, you old fool-

No. Anyone who'd survived her father's suspicions this long was no fool. "Who, then?"

"Her name is Makoto of Asagitatsu. And she will be back to kill you." He glanced at Ty Lee. "And you especially, young onmitsu. The only thing Makoto hates more than the blood of Byakko is the blood of Air."

Asagitatsu. Her heart seemed to stutter. Old, old history; scrolls she knew Zuko had never seen. Some, her father had lent her. Others... well, if they left a lock she could pick, they obviously didn't mean to keep her out. "The Blue Dragon Mountain is a myth."

"A legend, deliberately lost." Shidan's expression did not change. "Asagitatsu exists, and is poised to erupt and slay once more. And while your father might welcome disaster that would weaken his enemies, you have traveled the Earth Kingdom, and the colonies. You know how much we would lose, even if we evacuated."

Azula narrowed her eyes. "Oh, of course. You propose to buy your freedom with the promise of quelling another volcano." She smirked. "Even if it existed, the Fire Lord knows what you've done with one. He'll never let you take over two."

"I never said I intended to protect it." He matched her, smile for razor-edged smile. And fire - slipped aside.

They're afraid. They're afraid of him, just as they are of me. This isn't like Long Feng. If Shidan wanted Bolin... I'd have to fight for him.

He wasn't pushing at Bolin. She could feel that. But his fire wasn't letting hers near Mai, either.

He thinks he can hold loyalties, even when I stand against him.

...What if he's right?

Agni. It was so odd to see a naked killer in another firebender's face.

"I may wish to ward it, yes," Shidan went on. "But I have not the strength, nor the blood. Which is why Makoto attacked you."

Now we're getting somewhere. "Dragons aren't supposed to be stupid," Azula said bluntly. "Why attack me, when I didn't even know there was a volcano to stop? I am an heir of Sozin. She couldn't be sure she'd kill me."

"She never planned to." No mercy in pale gold. Only cool interest. "You, granddaughter, are bait."

How dare he suggest that. She was no helpless Earth Kingdom noble lady; she was Ozai's heir! She could never be bait-

Facts clicked together like painted shells. Azula drew in a sharp, angry breath. So Shidan didn't have the power? He lived on a water volcano. He knew its ways, and how a more powerful firebender might calm a mountain never tamed in living memory. Power was useless without knowledge. "She claimed to be one of our agents. She knew an onmitsu could find you."

"But I didn't!" Ty Lee gave her a beseeching look, wide-eyed. "No one knew where we were going. I was trying to keep you safe! His ship just - just showed up."

"Taking to sea was wise, were you dealing with an ordinary dragon," Shidan observed.

"Unfortunately, Makoto has powers beyond any the dragons have ever claimed." He shrugged slightly. "It is a gift of my blood, that I know when one of mine is near death. She knew wounding you would draw me out." He smirked. "Though I think her own rage may have caught her off guard. One of Sozin's line, willingly learning the bow? Choosing to protect an airbender? She must have thirsted to strike you down on the spot." His smile softened. "I am proud of you, granddaughter. You can see past your rage, to do what is necessary for your plans to succeed." A quiet sigh. "I am proud, and glad. Your mother was wrong. I do not have to kill you."

Azula closed her mouth, chilled. She didn't know what to say. She'd never not known what to say.

It's like looking into a mirror. How odd...

"Lady Ursa would never say that!" Ty Lee put herself between Azula and pale gold. "She's your mother, she loved you-"

"She loved Zuko," Azula said harshly. "Never me. Not ever me!"

Smoke, curling from her covers. Damn it.

"She loved you both, and she feared you both," Shidan said mercilessly. "And she was right to do so. Ironic, that she chose to fear the wrong child." He turned a palm upward, cupping dancing flames of gold and green between pointed nails. "But you were clever, and determined to survive. You knew Azulon approved of your skills, but not the viciousness your father smiled to see in his child. You knew, and you could not bear for the father you worshipped to cast you away for power. So when Azulon gave Ozai his orders, to destroy that which he loved... you lied."

He can't know. She would not let herself pale. There's no way he can know.

"Ursa... your father injured her too deeply for her memories of that night to be reliable," Shidan went on. "But Zuko? He remembers. How unfortunate for him that Iroh truly does love your father, despite everything. For all his wisdom as a general, when it comes to family? Iroh has not thought, and he has not listened. Azulon, slay Ozai's heir, when Iroh had just lost Lu Ten? Threaten the line of succession further? No." A decisive shake of head, white whiskers flared. "Not that man. Not the Fire Lord who planned that there would be a line to hold Byakko, and one indebted to the Fire Lord. But order Ozai to kill his most favored child..."

Ty Lee made a small, hurt noise. Even Mai looked pale.

Azula stared back at him, jaw set.

"Azula always lies." Shidan's voice was far older; but for that moment, his rhythm was purely Zuko's. "Iroh does not listen, and he does not believe. I speak to him of dark dragons, I tell him the truth, and he cannot hear it. But Zuko knows you. And Ozai."

Azula took a breath, centering herself. "He wouldn't have done it. I was the true heir. He wanted me."

"So you wish to believe," Shidan nodded. "But whatever your beliefs, you are clever, granddaughter. Clever, and ruthless, and determined to survive. You saw a threat. And you acted. All it cost you was your mother... and your brother's nightmares."

Azula sniffed, smirking. Nightmares, indeed. As if that was the worst she'd ever done to her brother-

"Though that is the least of the harm you have done."

Damn, Azula thought, feeling her grasp after others' fire - slipped aside, yet again. How did he do that? It was like trying to parry your own shadow in water.

"You say I have cause to kill you? Oh, indeed. But if I was forced to abandon Zuko, bound never to venture near the palace, or the Fire Lord... how much more was I forced to abandon you?"

That... hurt.

Shidan crushed the flames in his hand, gaze locked on hers. "You were a monster, and you survived Ozai. I do not condone the monster. But I know the will to live." He pointed at the raw ache across her chest. "Iroh's block is clever, but risky. That you came as close as you did to performing it correctly is a testament to your skill, and your determination. In and down and up you channeled it, yes - but the lightning must miss your heart." He shook his head. "Through the stomach, granddaughter. A nail's thickness higher, and no healer of this world could have saved you."

Fury crawled through her veins, thick and ropy as the capital's lava. "No lies," Azula spat. "You're Mother's father, and you act like you care?"

"I never lie."

Breathe. Don't set him on fire. Not yet.

"I am not one of your father's scheming lords." Shidan's lip curled, flashing fangs. "I have no loyalty save to Byakko, and Agni; no hunger for power, save what is needed to hold our island safe. Kotone and I run spies for the Fire Nation, and Azulon allowed us to do so, because he knew we held those loyalties beyond breaking." Pale gold watched her, a cat with a cricket-mouse. "Your father has been less brilliant. Or perhaps more confident that Makoto stood as his ally, without hates and wishes of her own. And indeed, she is his ally. But she is also allied with others, who bear humans no will but malice. If you believe nothing else of me, granddaughter, believe this: Makoto is your enemy."

Azula's eyes narrowed. "Because of you."

"Indeed." Wry humor flickered in that gaze, tempered with something... darker. "I survived, when she very much wished me dead. I escaped her. Not once, but many times, over a very long life. I have taunted her with my survival, dashed it in her face as a thrown gauntlet. And how have you ever felt, when Zuko survived you?"

Furious. Outraged beyond bearing, as if gravity itself had turned traitor, and everything she grasped floated away like mist. She controlled her world, she predicted her enemies, and how dare anything merely human shatter her plans-

Fury. Soul-shaking rage. The hunger to destroy, to strike and strike again until even ashes were shattered into nothingness.

And all of that fury was coming for her.

"Help me up," Azula said through gritted teeth. At Ty Lee's stammer, "I have to stand!"

"She must," Shidan nodded. "Our only chance is to force Makoto to strike at a time of our choosing, instead of hers."

"Bait," Azula said grimly, swaying on her feet. "I assume you've told my guard your plans?"

"He didn't give us a plan, your highness," Bolin said plainly. "He just - told us what dragons can do. What Makoto can do." The man looked pale.

"I know somewhat of airbenders, but I am not the most versed in a Dai Li's strengths and weaknesses," Shidan shrugged. "You have no reason to trust any plan I might suggest. So I have advised on tactics. Strategy is yours. As would be wisest, in any case; I have fought Makoto before. She knows what I may do. You should be far less predictable."

Right again, damn him; she wouldn't have trusted any plan of Byakko. So he'd saved them both the time of arguing over it. Clever. "Agent Bolin?"

The Dai Li swallowed dryly. "We're trained to deal with spirits, Princess. But this... this is bad."

I'm scared.

She could feel it; though he never said the words, and likely never would.

"You're trained, and you know more about fighting dragons than anyone in the world, besides my uncle." Azula said bluntly. "We're alive. We're going to stay that way." Believe. Believe in me, and in yourself. You are mine-

Fire shifted. Bolin stood a little straighter. And Shidan watched with the fathomless patience of a predator.

I still can't touch Mai.

Shock might do what more subtle measures could not. "Whose side are you on?" Declare for my side or his, Azula thought, and I'll have my excuse...

"You can't lie to Makoto." Mai sounded almost bored. "You can't intimidate her. You can't manipulate her." A graceful brow rose. "This should be interesting."

Worried as she was, Ty Lee smiled.

Heh. She'd missed the razor of Mai's wit. Strategy, Azula thought. I need a plan. "Dragons breathe and control fire, and prefer to attack from the air. We don't need to sail with the wind, so she won't have as much of an advantage - engineers."

"Prepared to vent the boilers on orders, with firebenders to damp any blazes until it's done," Bolin nodded.

Good. Venting the boilers would put them dead in the water, but better that than blowing up. The coal supply, the auxiliary storage, and the catapult fuel; those were the major flammables on the ship. Control those, and she'd avoid unexpected attacks. Speaking of which... "You said she had other powers besides those of dragons." Azula glanced at Shidan. "What powers?"

The ship shuddered, vibration shivering through her feet like the scaled brush of a cobra-weasel against her throat.

"Water spirits." Shidan's gaze was distant; she felt his fire reaching carefully out, probing like whiskers-

"Get the men off the deck!" Shidan roared, bolting for the outer hatch. "Isonade!"

The hatch hurled open on horror.

For a moment, just a moment, Azula stood there gaping. Water spirits couldn't be real. That sea-wreathed curve of fin and barbed hooks, shedding waterfalls onto the deck, savaging anyone who didn't move fast enough, couldn't be real.

The moon going black, when there could never have been a natural lunar eclipse, and reports say Uncle committed treason to protect a spirit... that wasn't real?

Spirit or not, if the tail was that massive the creature had to be enormous, and if she controlled something that big against a ship-

Makoto's been in my mind. She knows I abide by Father's wishes. I am a firebender. First, last, and always.

Bony hooks slashed overhead, ringing off Shidan's steel and Bolin's stone, drenching them all with chill seawater. Cold shook her like a lion-dog's jaws.

Douse our fires. Azula bit her lip against the cold burn in her chest, letting Ty Lee yank her clear. Make us spend our chi just staying alive. Weaken us, have the isonade tear the ship apart, and she won't need to fight. Just pick us off, one by one.

Brilliant. Exactly what she would do.

How do I fight... me?

Azula grinned, savage and joyous. There. So clear.

"Get me the blasting jelly!"

Chapter End Notes

Something that's always bothered me about that bit with the Southern Air Temple in "The Storm". Not only did the Elders blow apart Aang's whole life by telling him he was the Avatar early, they told every kid in the Temple.

Wow. Way to go, ancient wisdom. Ostracize a twelve-year-old from every peer he's got. On top of that, by not stepping in with the kids, you tell the Avatar - the guy who's supposed to restore balance to the world - exactly what you think "fair" is. Great idea.

Let me quote Oleg Atbashian here:

"If some people had wings and others didn't, and the government wanted to enforce 'fairness,' soon no one would have wings. Because wings cannot be redistributed, they can only be broken. Likewise, a government edict cannot make people smarter or more capable, but it can impede the growth of those with the potential. Wouldn't it be fair if, in the name of equality, we scar the beautiful, cripple the athletes, lobotomize the scientists, blind the artists, and sever the hands of the musicians? Why not?"

In the mindset of the Southern Air Temple, the only "fair" thing is for the Avatar not to play.

Compare that to the Fire Nation. Where you must fight, you must succeed, you must be prepared for an Agni Kai if you're a firebender. Fair doesn't come into it; as we saw with Avatar Kuruk and a guy out for groceries, anyone can challenge you at any time.

If Sozin hadn't started the war, the attitude the Elders were inculcating in Aang would have started one.

Chapter 49

Chapter Notes

Some dialogue from "The Painted Lady" in here. So just to be on the safe side - Avatar is owned by incredible people who are definitely not me.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Water was flowing, yet water was dying.

It wasn't supposed to be this way. The breath she took in the headwaters, tumbling over granite and obsidian, should have been renewed by slower sips along her winding track; skirling eddies, the in-breath of shelled life, the splash of fish. She should have rejoiced in her people, laughing and playing pranks with nets as they fished and swam.

But she was ill, and they were ill, and all were dying.

Where is Jang Hui's lord?

Lost and gone, feverish memory reminded her; to greed, to death. The clans remaining were helpless, humans weakened beyond her fragile power to mend.

Where are my kin-who-were?

Lost and gone, felled by Sozin's orders. Some wings yet flew, she sensed it - but few and far. Agni's eyes and ears were not here.

Where are the firebenders? Where is a Sage to hear me?

None to be found. War had swallowed the benders with their lord, and all Jang Hui had left was poisoned hope. No one had the power to draw her forth...

My name.

She heard it ruffle the river. Felt it thrum through the town pilings, as power moved. Shivered, as it lingered like a mantle cast about one who was not hers.

Who dares?

One night, she might endure, enraged. Two, even, she might have suffered, to let a little mortal fool escape with but a warning. Three-

The mirror was ice, was water, was her. She looked into a painted face and alien blue eyes.

You claim to be the Painted Lady? I accept.

Breath. Heaviness of bone and muscle, lacking the fluidity of water. A scream of terror in the back of the human's mind. "Hush."

A young voice. Hmph. Old enough to know better, no matter what protests now rose from a trapped mind-

Oh. How very, darkly amusing. "I am a Fire Nation spirit, so I cannot be real? Silly child."

Rage and fear and demanding-

"Hush," the Painted Lady said firmly, taking her first steps in borrowed flesh. "I am a river. I have no wish to be you. You took my name. You took my place. So now you will help me mend my ills. And then you and yours will leave, or I will blaze your invasion from here to Shirotona."

Affronted outrage.

"You were trying to help?" The river spirit hissed, water lapping sand. "Then help. As a human. My name, foolish girl! It binds me, it is bound to me, as your flesh and bone are to you! As well skin your own brother and wear him for your robe. How dare you? I could plunge you to the river bottom to drown, and no spirit would say I had done anything but justice!"

Fear. Disbelief. And again, fury.

"Oh? What else should you expect of a Fire Nation spirit, hmm?" She reached out to the water, testing the power this bender carried. Yes; it might be enough. "Tell me. What did your spirits do, when they were offended? Were they gentle and forgiving? I hear otherwise."

More outrage. She walled it off. If she truly did not wish to harm this girl, she should not lair in this body too long. She knew the poison's source. Time to end this.

"Hello, Painted Lady spirit!"

Human. Yet not. Was the boy another possessed soul?

I want no interference. Summoning the water that was herself, she danced upstream. Toward human-made venom, born of hate.

Wind rattled behind her, carrying shards of words. "Excuse me... friend's sick... Hei Bai..."

The thwack of flesh against a roofpole made her giggle. Chase her at night over her own river, would he?

Touching down on the riverbank, she paused to judge exactly where the factory was. Human flesh felt distance far differently than a river's flow-

"My name's Aang." The young boy grinned at her. "I'm the Avatar."

The Avatar. She drew a borrowed breath, water curling up from the river around her. "Where have you been?"

He rocked back on his heels. "Um... I was frozen in an iceberg. And... I guess you're mad. A lot of people... spirits... are." He braced himself, and faced her squarely. "But I'm here now. I'm going to defeat the Fire Lord. We'll stop the war."

"Defeat the Fire Lord? You created the Fire Lord." Human eyes needed to blink; she let water sink down halfway, considering the spirit before her. "Agni has not forgiven you that."

"But I didn't do that! Avatar Kyoshi did. You can't blame me for what I didn't do!"

"I did not say he blamed Aang." There. She could taste the factory in the water. "I have no time. Mortal life depends on my speed."

"It does? Where? Wait, let me get my friends! Katara's a healer, she can help-" He stopped, gray eyes wide in disbelief. "Katara...?"

She smiled; a borrowed, dark smile. "So that is the mortal who stole my name. You should have warned her, Avatar. I run even to the sea - and the waves that washed our dead tell me you know better than anyone, spirits are not safe."

He fell into an airbending stance; hesitated, apparently realizing violence might not be the best answer. "Let her go!"

"I cannot." The Painted Lady kept her words simple, almost gentle. He was the Avatar, but the human in him was a child. "She has affronted me. She stole my name. I must have my revenge."

"She didn't mean to!"

She cocked Katara's head, lifting the veil with a painted hand. Letting him see how much was not paint, but a spirit's power spreading into mortal flesh. "Avatar. You told the Fire Nation long ago, intent means nothing. You bound us to that. I must have my revenge." She tried to soften her voice, and pointed upriver, toward the factory. "If I am able, I intend to take it there."

"...You want to destroy the factory?"

"It is what your mortal friend intended, before she stole my name the last time." The Painted Lady stepped out onto the river, flexing a waterbender's power so the surface held under her footsteps. "When this is over, be certain it is the last time. You declared the Fire Nation merciless and cruel, Avatar. Even Agni can only soften your curses so much."

"I didn't-!"

She looked at him, unblinking, as the rolling river bore her up. Earth smothered. Water drowned. Fire burned. "You are the Avatar."

And she had work to do.

Ground by a sick river, Toph thought queasily, patting her earth tent back into said grassy ground, or up in the air on Appa. Decisions, decisions.

Up in the air was sounding better all the time, though. Aang would take Appa's reins, which meant Boots could tiptoe and squeak around her in the saddle. As long as he did it quietly. The little spirit was very quiet, these days.

She was as mad about that as she was about Katara. Only nobody else seemed to get what Aang had almost done to Boots, and Katara seemed to think Aang was upset covered everything.

Resting her hands on the wiry leafiness sprouting from the earth, Toph tried not to get mad at that all over again. Instead, she wriggled her fingers in dewy blades, listening to the perky sounds of birds near dawn, as she felt down through earth to bedrock.

Even the rock's different here.

Earth Kingdom rocks felt like rock. Solid, or wispy with wind like sand, or soaked with water in limestone. These rocks felt like fire.

Not fire here and now. But had-been fire, once-was fire. Like glass, and heat, and a ringing crystal tingle she'd only felt so deep she'd never had a name for it before.

Fire and sand and glass. Darn it, she missed Sparky.

Tao's got to be wrong. He's got to.

She was not going to lose Zuko to some stuck-up spirits' ideas on what people should and shouldn't bend. No way. Bring 'em on; she'd show those spirits what it meant to take on a real earthbender.

Besides, Tao had to be wrong. Zuko'd told her straight out: he hadn't been trying to bend water. Not even as much as she had, poking at the salt in the sea. The moon had drowned him first.

Sparky's gonna be okay. He's got to be.

A season, the shaman had said. She had to grab Zuko before the end of summer. She had to prove Tao was wrong.

But Sozin's Comet was coming, and the eclipse was coming faster, and helping Aang had to come first. Darn it.

What really got to her was, she was pretty sure Zuko would agree with her. The sooner the war stopped, the less people would die. And if the war did stop, and they helped Aang stop it - maybe they could head off that nightmare Zuko had slashed them with, about what Earth and Water wanted to do to his people.

He believed it was going to happen. She'd felt that, to her bones.

Not if I can help it.

Toph pushed at fire-touched stone, and felt how it pushed back. Every rock had its own particular twist of Earth's stubbornness. Some were solid strength. Some a gliding resistance like sheets of mica. Some had the brittle tension of a fracture zone. Only these rocks-

"Great! Both gone!" Scrubbing at his eyes, stumbling in what must still be dark, Sokka snarled at the camp in general. "I tell Aang not to sneak off anymore, and what happens? Katara starts sneaking off. So either she's sneaking off for him, which is not what I had in mind, or - what the heck is she doing? We can't get noticed before the invasion. Sure, Aang's the Avatar, but there's a lot more of these Home Guard types than I thought. If even some of them are firebenders like Teruko - what are you doing?"

"Feeling rocks," Toph said, matter-of-fact. Duh. "They've got to be on the river or miles from here. And they've been gone a while. Ground under their sleeping bags? Not warm."

"Nice trick," Sokka said thoughtfully. Flung up his hands. "Gah! What are they doing?"

"Sit down, Snoozles," Toph advised. "Wait 'til it's light enough. I can't feel them. We're gonna need your eyes."

"Good to be needed for something," Sokka grumbled. Flopped down by Momo's curl of fur, rousing a sleepy chitter from the lemur. Reconsidered, and sat up again, leaning toward her. "What are you up to with the rocks?"

Toph grinned at him. Too bad he wasn't the guy she had to teach earthbending. Sokka wanted to know things. Aang never asked about stuff. "Bet you think earth is earth, right?"

"Umm..."

"Well, kind of. I could throw boulders around all day. But if I wanted to do something fancy, like get you out of a crack? Earth Kingdom rocks break in layers, like this." She waved flattened hands across each other. "This stuff? Breaks a lot more like glass." She flicked fingers out, miming shattering. "So I'm poking at it first. Before I have to do anything tricky."

"I am so glad we added you to the group." The way Sokka rolled his shoulders told her he was grinning. "Nice to have somebody who doesn't make me panic half the time." He shifted, the sound of his voice aimed a little to the side. "Or talk me out of talking to him. Darn it."

"Lying without lying?" Toph tried not to smirk. Aang's excursion into a Fire Nation school had been nerve-wracking for everybody.

"Arggh." Sokka buried his head in his hands. "Yeah. That."

"Gotta admit, books don't do much for me," Toph said. "So maybe I don't get what the mess is."

"Not sure I do, either," Sokka admitted. "Wish he'd grabbed one of the books. Maybe I'd feel different if I saw what they said about the Water Tribes. So Sozin screwed with history and wrote about conquering a big Air Nomad army that didn't exist. Hello? We knew the Fire Lords were bad guys! We know they want to send those kids - darn it, they're kids! - out to kill people." He blew out a breath. "I hate to say it, but... I don't think they could do that if they thought they were the bad guys."

Toph frowned. "Not sure that's what's getting to him."

"No," Sokka agreed, tensed and thoughtful. "No, I don't think it is. It's like he thinks teachers always know what they're doing..."

Toph wiggled her toes in grass, waiting for Sokka to put whatever had popped into his head together.

"No," Sokka said at last. "It's not that simple." He brought his knees up, leaning on them as he lined up his words. "What he says about the temples? Kids had to listen to teachers, and everybody had to listen to elders. Outside of that, everybody did what they wanted."

"Yeah, right," Toph scoffed. Paused, taken aback by Sokka's steady pulse and breath. "Seriously?"

"Aang says Zuko didn't want to burn our village down," Sokka said bluntly. "Which means when he said he'd do it anyway, he had to be lying. Even when Aang thought he was telling the truth."

Toph made a strangled noise.

Sokka nodded. "That's pretty much what I said."

"But- that- he-!"

It fit, darn it. Aang trained as long as he wanted to train, then he was after butterflies. He helped who he wanted to help, he went off on vacations when he knew he had to master the elements by the end of summer...

And wasn't that part of why she'd run off with everybody in the first place? No parents wrapping her up in cotton like a glass doll. Nobody telling the greatest earthbender in the world what she couldn't do.

But there's a difference between can't do and shouldn't do, Toph thought. A big difference.

A difference she'd had pounded home by a humongous spider-squid-thing. Blind didn't mean she couldn't play with water. It did mean she ought to bring someone with eyes. To watch out for the man-eating monsters she couldn't see.

"I think what's getting to him," Sokka went on, "is that a hundred years ago, people here had to know the truth. The Fire Nation had to know there wasn't any Air Nomad army. But the books say there was."

"You're saying, he thinks the people who wrote the books wanted to lie about it," Toph guessed.

"Not just the books," Sokka said soberly. "All the parents, and grandparents, and everybody. Even Kuzon went to work for Sozin."

Toph snorted. "What was he gonna do? Take on the Fire Lord all by himself?"

"Yeah. I guess he didn't want to do that," Sokka said sourly.

Oh. Oh, ouch. "So Katara's kind of right," Toph realized, stunned. "If she didn't want to listen in on Tao, she just had to... Aang thinks that's like lying." Her stomach grumbled; she headed for where smell and weight on the ground told her Katara had stashed a bag of berries.

"Yeah. And now they're both gone... hey, where'd that come from?"

"Katara got 'em yesterday," Toph shrugged, munching.

"And she didn't share? Man, some sister."

"Says the guy who brings back Dock's clams instead of hunting for some real meat." Toph stuck her tongue out at him.

"Yeah, well, Aang gets upset when I- why is your tongue purple?"

This is bad. This is really, really bad.

Blowing up the factory? Sure. Great idea. Watching a spirit move in under Katara's skin? Awful.

He'd tried asking. He'd tried demanding. He'd tried begging. He was the Avatar. The spirit of the whole world. He wasn't supposed to let stuff like this happen!

And none of the stuff Tao had told him about reminding spirits of justice and balance worked. None of it.

"She had no right to use my name," the Painted Lady had snarled at his last try. "You seek justice, Avatar? Better for your friend if you do not! She is naamacaura! Justice would be her drowned body washed ashore, liver eaten, to show all I am not mocked! Ask Tui and La, if you think I lie.

"But your friend is fortunate. I was once other than a river. I remember what it was to do kindness. As she sought.

"So bury your pleas. And I will bury my justice."

Looking back on it later, he was surprised he'd been surprised. The inside of the factory did kind of smell like blasting jelly.

BOOM.

Whoa, smoke. And wind. And lots of smoke. And a strong hand grabbing him by the collar, dragging him clear.

"A-Aang?"

Faltering voice. Paint flaking off skin. Confused blue eyes. "Katara!"

She held him close, shivering despite the flames rising behind them. "I was - I was inside it, I could hear you. I just couldn't get out..."

"I'm sorry!" Because he was, he really was. He was the Avatar, he was supposed to fix things. And he couldn't keep one spirit from hurting the best person in the world. "I'm so, so sorry..."

"Less sorrow, Avatar. More thought."

He knew who that unearthly voice was, even before Katara went rigid. Letting go of her, he glared at moon-shimmer and painted skin. "You're not going to hurt her again!"

"No. I have had my revenge." A floating step forward, that somehow never left the water's surface. "You are brave, thief. Agni favors courage. And you meant to help my people. So live. Do not steal from me again."

Katara blanched.

"You..." Inhuman eyes narrowed at Aang. "You are not nearly as brave as you think, Avatar. Life-stripper. Assassin of clans."

Okay, now he was starting to get mad. "I keep telling you, I didn't kill your people! Kyoshi did."

"As the Ocean moved without your bidding, to rend and slay? He says not." She stepped backward on the river, mist rising about her. "Every dawn, Agni looks down on the death of his people. He does not forget."

"Dragon," Katara blurted out. "You weren't always a river. You were a dragon." Still shaking, she pointed through fire-shot darkness toward the village. "How can you still care about them? After what they did?"

A shadow in mist, the Painted Lady halted. "Once, they lived and died with us. But you..." A painted finger rose, claw-tipped. "You had not the courage to face Fire's children. So you stole from them, Avatar. You stole what let their clans and ours be one. Now even the strongest fade and die, like flying sparks.

"But you kept the gift for yourself."

Mist faded, and the river was empty.

"What was she talking about?" Aang said, exasperated.

Katara tugged on his arm. "Aang-"

"I know I'm supposed to be the bridge between the living world and the spirits, so why can't one of them talk to me? Without going around in circles? I didn't steal anything-"

"Aang, let's go." Something cracked in burning rubble, and Katara flinched. "Let's just get out of here."

Yeah. Good idea.

Scrambling with Katara back down the riverbank, Aang couldn't help but grin. The factory was ka-blooeey, the village was going to get better, and this was going to be a great story!

Too bad, Sokka. You missed all the fun!

Schedule thrown off, Katara lying about Appa being sick with tongue-purplizing berries, sister possessed by angry spirit, and now village about to be burned to the waterline by Fire soldiers. Sokka ticked them all off on his fingers as he watched jet skis close on the village. "The universe hates me."

"Plan would be good," Toph muttered, standing a little closer than usual.

He couldn't blame her. Everything was happening on the water, which meant her only warning if somebody lobbed a fireball this way would be everybody else ducking. "I'm working on it..."

"It's not fair!" Aang was glaring at the river, wind rippling sludgy water. "They believe in you! They trusted Katara to help because they thought she was you! Why won't you help them?"

Katara edged back from the water, and Sokka tried not to growl. "Aang. You guys just got away from that spirit. I don't think you want to wake... her... up..."

Mist rose, and he forced himself not to run.

She's pretty.

But not human. He could see it, the same way he had in Yue. Even if she hadn't been transparent.

Wait a minute. Hei Bai and Wan Shi Tong were solid...

She swept them with a glowing gaze, and held out a hand. Beside him, he felt Katara moving forward-

Oh hell no.

Moving fast, Sokka grabbed the spirit's hand.

...Okay, not my best plan ever...

The world went foggy, all his muscles going limp. Like strength was flowing out of him, into the gripping fingers that were... becoming more there. Smoke, instead of translucent mist.

A whisper tingled his ears like spring rain. Tell the Avatar...

"She's still sick, Aang," Sokka managed. "She used up a lot of power helping you blow that place. She can't... I don't know, reach here, without some help..."

Jumping in, Aang grabbed the Painted Lady's other hand.

Oh good, Sokka thought, as the spirit shimmered into presence and the exhausting drain stopped. Maybe I can fall down now...

Toph grabbed him, bracing him as the Lady let go of his hand. "Don't pass out on me now, Snoozles."

Brave words, but he could hear the tremor in them. "You okay?"

"I can see her."

"But she's on the water... whoah. Is it that sludgy?"

"Not with my feet," Toph said tightly. "I see her."

Yipe.

"I have never been a strong spirit." The Painted Lady's voice was mist and water-trickle, oddly louder near Aang. "In times of need, they would send a Sage to lend me strength. None have traveled here in a very long time." Inhuman eyes regarded Aang. "You called."

"The villagers need your help," Aang said quickly.

Painted brows rose. "They have not asked for it."

"That didn't stop you before!"

"Night, and mist, and mortal invaders to take the blame." The Painted Lady did not blink. "Yes. Before, I walked."

Sokka gulped. "Mortal invaders? Um, guys... I think she means us..."

Her smirk flickered like moonlight on water.

"Yep," Toph said under her breath. "She means us."

"Daylight, and witnesses, and you wish to pass unnoticed," the spirit continued, implacable as a flood. "Walk? And have them believe me more than legend? No."

"Yes!" Aang insisted. "If they know you're here, they'll stop hurting you!"

"Young." Inhuman eyes narrowed. "If the legend is known as truth, Fire Sages will seek me." She tossed her veil. "I am the river! I will not be bound!" A wave of a hand pulled mist around her, and she stepped away from the world-

And was yanked back, eyes blazing, as Aang swept his arms over the water. "I am the Avatar, and I'm telling you-"

"Vizvaasahantr!" The sludge of the river seemed to congeal, as the spirit fisted clawed hands. "Asmadruh!"

"Get ready to yank up a wall," Sokka muttered toward Toph. "This, does not look good."

"Wait!" Katara's voice was still shaky, but she stepped toward the river anyway. "You're afraid. I know, I felt it. They hurt you. They could hurt you again. And the Fire Sages can do worse than that, can't they?" She shook her head, dark hair brushing her borrowed cloak. "But the Sages take their orders from the Fire Lord. And we're going to stop him. I know I didn't believe in you. All the horrible things the Fire Nation's done; how could they have spirits? But you're real." She reached out, touching Aang's shoulder. "All my life, I believed the Avatar would return. No matter what anyone said. And he did. He's here to help all of us."

"Brave thief," the Painted Lady murmured. "You, I would help." Her gaze shifted back to Aang. "But you... what hope do you offer spirits, child of wind? Serve you, or be bound? I am Agni's child! I defy your chains!"

"Whoa! Stop!" Between a ticked-off spirit and an even more ticked-off Avatar, Sokka realized. Like I didn't learn with Hei Bai... think!

Something he should have done before he got between these two. But when he'd moved, the spirit's fury had seemed so familiar...

Zuko. She feels like Zuko. In a really, really bad mood.

Meaning they were doing this all wrong. Sure, she was a river spirit; but a river touched by fire. Like Toph's rocks.

I'd better be right about this. "Aang. Stop pushing. I think she's loyal to Agni." Sokka didn't take his gaze off the spirit. "That's the problem, right? He's the Avatar. And you're not a strong spirit. He can make you help. But if doing that means going against what Agni wants-"

"Why would Agni want to stop her?" Aang pounced. "I'm trying to bring the world back into balance!"

"Why would the Fire Nation want balance?" Katara said bluntly. "They're getting what they want."

"No." The Painted Lady was still as deep water. "What we want, was stolen long ago. And every time we have neared it, every time we sought to restore ourselves - you have stolen it. Again. Avatar."

"I keep telling you, I didn't steal anything!"

"Maybe you didn't," Toph put in. "What about Roku?"

Aang's head whipped toward her so fast, Sokka felt the breeze. "What?"

"Actually, I'm guessing Kyoshi," Sokka said, throat dry. "The fire-healers. That's why Agni's mad. Isn't it."

"Aamaavaasyavidha." She inclined her head. "You have a flicker of the flame. Seek further." A deliberate blink, and she regarded Katara. "I would help you. But I risk - much. If the Sages know I am more than legend..."

"They won't hurt you," Aang insisted. "We're going to stop the war."

"We can't promise that," Sokka said bluntly. "I don't know what Tao told you, but in the Water Tribe? You never give a spirit a promise you can't keep." He shrugged, deliberately casual. "But we've got a waterbender, an airbender, and an earthbender. And somebody told me, deception's legit when you're taking revenge."

All eyes were on him. Even glowing ones, under intrigued painted brows.

"So..." Sokka grinned. "Is there any way we can make this look like some other spirit got mad?"

The Painted Lady, Sokka reflected, had a truly wicked grin.

"Tell me, little thief," she murmured, like water running under ice, "do you know how to make a river run backward?"

"First," the Painted Lady had said, "we need the air to be still."

On the one hand, Katara wanted to rush into the village, where the general had already set one house ablaze. On the other - she hated it, but Sokka was right. The village needed more than just what she could do every night. They needed something that would last.

And she'd never, ever admit it, but it was kind of funny, watching the faces Aang made as he tried to get air to stand still.

But they're burning down the village! Who's going to notice there's no wind-

In the crowd, Dock jumped, staring wide-eyed at smoke rising straight up. Other gazes followed his, the crowd suddenly afraid of more than just firebenders.

"Then the ground must shake, strongly. As far as you can reach, little earthbender."

Katara had forgotten just how far Toph could make that. Ground rolled and swayed and broke, cracks reaching the river, filling with water. Her stomach lurched; she had to hang onto Sokka just to stay standing. On a slope above them, solid earth shivered into mush, sucking down rocks like quicksand.

"Now - and here I will help you, thief - we will pull the river back, toward the sea..."

It was like holding Appa's reins, if Appa was in a very, very touchy mood. She swayed sideways, and water pulled-

The river. She's helping me move the whole river.

Well, not all of it. But all the water in sight of the village had pulled away, leaving deep sludge bare to sun and breathless air.

And now there was panic; soldiers scrambling for jet skis, mothers after children, fathers clearing the path toward boats and ready to cast off ropes...

"And then, little thief, we will hold."

Oh spirits, it hurt, the water was too much-

"We will hold."

Too much - but this was water, and she'd promised-

"We will hold - until that coward General Mung moves, and I will have him!"

Sokka gripped her shoulder. "He's running, Katara! Go for it!"

Sweat blurred her vision, but she could just see red armor fleeing. Gritting her teeth, she flung-

The river roared. Katara felt it raging through her own veins, as if her heart surged in that torrent. Roiling water flooded backwards, and no town or boat could escape it...

A slender figure of mist and violet robes rose from the water. Pressed her hands together, like a wedge-

Like a firebender parting flames.

Water split and curled around Jang Hui, crashing back together to shred jet skis in a scream of steel.

"No!" Aang released his hold on the wind, breezes skirling off in the water's ebbing wake. "You didn't say you were going to kill anyone!"

"You did not ask."

Katara blinked, feeling water shift-

Mist billowed, and the spirit was beside them, a toe's breadth from the shore. "You helped craft the form of a tsunami, Avatar. Did you truly believe no one would die?" She lifted her hands slightly, and let them fall; river lapping gently up on the shore. "You seek for answers you should have within you. But if you cannot find them - there are those you might ask." Waves rippled up farther, carving eerie symbols in the sand. "Asiheti suhasta milati..."

There was more, a long, liquid utterance that sounded like nothing Katara had ever heard. But Aang blinked, and Toph and Sokka both tensed.

Wait. I have seen those symbols before. They look like - like the script on Zuko's letters...

"High Court," Aang blurted out. "Why'd you do that? We can't read High Court!"

"Do you not?" The Painted Lady glanced at him from under her hat, eyes dangerously mild. "The Avatar balances all the world. Or is that... just a legend?"

Wind blew, and only the river remained.

Chapter End Notes

■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ naamacaura; stealer of another person's name.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ vizvaasahantR; destroyer or stealer of confidence.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ asmadruh; inimical to us.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ aamaavaasyavidha; belonging to the new moon.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ suhasta; skillful or clever with the hands.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ asiheti; swordsman or soldier armed with a sword.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ milati; find.

Chapter 50

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

A dank stench of seawater and muck wafted over the deck as Jee's sailors set the dredge down in front of assembled benders and other purely curious onlookers. Mud, rocks, various clams and starfish... and familiar, eerie blue glinting in the morning sun. Zuko let out a breath, relieved. Well - kind of. Given what he planned to demonstrate, he was just glad the sailors were keeping the bystanders from getting too close.

"You've anchored here before," Captain Jee said in an undertone, standing beside him. "I trust your judgment on the bottom."

"Anchoring's not the problem," Zuko said, equally quiet. "Handling the anchor after you get it up - some people aren't going to believe this unless they see it." He stepped into plain view of the crowd, paying as close attention to where Langxue and Amaya were as to the firebenders. This was going to be interesting. "All right, everyone. What I wanted to show you-

"You can have ice under water?" Jinhai was on his father's shoulders to see better, not quite bouncing. "No way!"

"This is no ordinary ice," Iroh stated, eyeing it much as he might a sleeping scorpion-viper. "There are reasons the Fire Nation has had little interest in the coast near the Northern Air Temple, and they have very little to do with how short winter days may be."

"If your trainers covered this at all, they probably called it a hazard." Zuko pitched his voice to carry; they needed to hear this. "If we're not careful, it will be. But if we are... this could be useful." A slash of his hand broke a fragment off feet away; a beckoning curl of fingers, and the shard settled in his gloved hand. A sharp breath out-

Flames licked up from the highest edge of ice, blue and flickering yellow. Under the heat, water began to drip away.

"Fire-ice!" Langxue looked like someone had poured marine tea down his throat; awake and jittery. "I haven't seen that in... a long time."

Naval firebenders shifted, obviously recalling obscure warnings out of the mists of training. Jee cleared his throat. "As you can see," he said confidently, "in small quantities, it's reasonably safe. But if it fouls the anchor we need to chip it off. The usual techniques of melting large sections of ice away... I'm sure you can imagine what that could do."

"Fire-ice." Shirong cast a glance at Teruko before fixing his attention back on the chunk melting and burning in Zuko's hand. "You're burning water? How?"

"It's not just water," Zuko smirked. "How much do you know about natural gas?"

"Natural - oh." The Dai Li looked taken aback. "Guanyin's merciful veil. That stuff is here?"

"Large deposits abound in these mountains. Even leading under the sea, it seems," Iroh nodded. "When it bubbles through deep water, the fire-ice forms, and can lie there for centuries. Unless an unlucky ship drags it to the surface, and there is a spark."

"It takes a lot more than a spark to set it off," Zuko said, trying to head off ripples of unease in the crowd. "You have to melt it first, and you have to melt enough so there's gas in the air to burn." He flattened his palm, stretching the ice in rhythm with his fingers. Huh; didn't quite bend like pure water. Interesting. "I investigated this when we were searching here before." But I couldn't bend water then.

And now he could. He'd thought about that, back in Ba Sing Se; fire-ice, and desperation, and protecting his people in a dangerous world.

We fight with what the world gives us. And here... it gives us fire.

"Natural gas," Langxue said, half to himself. "The ever-burning fires of Asagitatsu."

"Ever-burning-?" Shirong's breath hissed between his teeth. "Of course! No wonder the Face-Stealer... a natural beacon for Fire Nation dead. Guanyin herself nurses fire here; it wouldn't take much for fire-spirits to intervene for those buried. With the fires out, the blessing would be corrupted, and-" His gaze fell on Jinhai, and the other young Wens. "...It'd be very bad."

"Not only Guanyin." Iroh smiled at Amaya, eyes warm. "You know we believe Agni La's brother. But long ago, it is said, Agni was also called the Grandson of the Waters."

"Grandson of the - a fire spirit?" Amaya said in disbelief.

Iroh inclined his head. "Today, I believe, we may show you why."

"Is the fleet in position?" Zuko asked Jee.

"More or less," the captain said dryly. "I did warn them what you had in mind. I don't think the other captains quite believed me."

Zuko almost grinned. "Some people just have to see it."

"See what?" Tingzhe Wen gave him a look askance.

"Asagitatsu will only be won by courage," Iroh declared. "It is time to tell her we are here." He stepped back, a circle of flame lighting around him, breathing with his breath.

Zuko matched his rhythm, reaching not for the fire within, but for the world without. There was water, and there the stirring of it that must be wind over waves, and there another stirring that whispered a promise of flames...

There, and there, and - Agni, so many!

Uncle's kiai seared away thin wafts of gas mixed with air, the great ring of fire blazing out to cleanse harbor air in brief, harmless flickers of flame. Zuko spun with that shout, gripping the strongest of those sparks, twisting-

Fire bloomed like panda lilies, a hundred licks of flame weaving from the waves.

Not a problem for Suzuran. But he really, really hoped the other captains believed Jee now.

"Fire on the waters." Amaya gripped the railing, staring at the sea as if she'd never seen it before. "Fire from the water... How will anyone know what to be?"

"I guess we'll just be what we'll be, huh?" Saoluan gazed over fire-wreathed waves with a smile that matched Teruko's for the promise of sheer mayhem. "That's the story Shidan gave us. We didn't use to be different peoples. Just one people, with a lot of different games." She laughed out loud. "So what next, prince? Here's fire and water, but that's just half the balance. What are you going to do? Pull wind from a stone? Or - ooo, I know! - mountains from the sky!"

Zuko traded a glance with his uncle. And maybe he couldn't match Iroh's beaming grin, but he could definitely smirk.

Taken aback, Saoluan turned a slightly panicked look on Langxue. "Um. He's not...?"

The young waterbender eyed Shirong. Who was looking suspiciously at Teruko. Who was trying to look innocent. "Is that why you wanted us to bring the pumice, sir?" she asked.

Zuko's smirk deepened. "Lieutenant. Did you know Agent Shirong is under the impression that rocks can't float?"

"They can't," Shirong insisted, looking like he very much wanted to panic, if he could only think of a safe direction to run.

"Yes," Zuko said deliberately. "They can."

"So. The Avatar, and your brother, are still alive."

Kneeling in the shadows cast by the Fire Lord's screen of flames, Azula deliberately put certain things out of her mind. She would not think of that desperate battle against the blue dragon and her watery creatures. She would not consider the rumors now snickering through streets and palaces, of exactly what might have happened for the princess' vessel to limp into harbor a battered, half-sunk wreck. She would not even twitch at the thought of Mai and Ty Lee waiting in her quarters with the Dai Li, all desperately trying to pretend they were the loyal servants the Fire Lord would demand.

Above all, she would not wish for white whiskers, and a laugh, and razor-edged kindness.

None of that exists. There is only here. Only now. "I have no proof that they are dead, Father," Azula said levelly, head still down. "Both were gravely injured, but were last seen in the company of proven healing benders. For the sake of our nation, I will assume that the Water Tribe boy has managed to convince the more reckless of his companions to keep their heads down, and we must prepare for the invasion of a living Avatar on the day of the eclipse. An Avatar who will not only strike in our weakest moment, but may yet find some way to repeat that disaster at the North Pole."

Flames burned higher. "A disaster caused by your fool of a brother, and your traitorous uncle."

"Unfortunately, I've found information that may not be the case." Azula kept her voice even, tinged with disgust for treachery. "My most recent sources implicate Admiral Zhao, instead." Best to leave the main source in anonymous silence.

"He had my favor, daughter."

Dangerous ground. Well, she'd expected no less. "When he was tasked with the invasion, yes. However, Ba Sing Se's Dai Li appear to be as capable in spirit matters as our field Fire Sages. In their experience, spirit-slaying of this magnitude would have to be somehow linked to an offense by the official in charge." Now she did raise her head, expression cool and interested. "Given the fleet order of operations only lists General Iroh as an advisor, and doesn't list Zuko at all, I doubt even their most idiotic actions could have set that water-monster off."

Silence, save for the crackle of flames. An old tactic, but a good one.

Her knees ached from kneeling. Surreptitiously Azula warmed her hands, soothing away the worst of it. I'm not a traitor, Father. I'm not - whatever Makoto might have told you.

If the dragon had told him anything. Shidan might not lie, but he could have been deceived.

And Father knows I am his most loyal and ruthless servant. He knows that.

Yet if that were true, why leave Ty Lee ignorant of herself when Azula needed her? If only she'd known Ty Lee was an airbender when they'd first hunted the Avatar; the war might be over even now. The little monk had been lucky to date, but he was fragile. Vulnerable, in a way no one but another airbender could exploit.

Aang believes he acts for the good of the world.

That the Fire Nation was itself part of that world didn't seem to penetrate that shaved skull of his. But that was all right. Let him believe fire was nothing but evil. Then let him meet Ty Lee as she truly was.

I'll give you a dark mirror, little Avatar. Will you see? Or will you try to break it?

Best to be prepared if he did turn to violence. She would not lose Ty Lee to an arrogant little idiot-

"You encountered some difficulty in your return."

Damn. How could she have forgotten one of the first rules of survival? Never, ever get so caught up in your own concerns that you ignored Father. "I did," Azula stated, marshalling her thoughts. "It was interesting. None of my crew had ever encountered an isonade before." She allowed herself a smirk. "Then again, I doubt the isonade ever met blasting jelly before. And it won't have a second chance to improve its tactics."

"Blasting jelly."

Two words, and she wanted to cower on the floor. The very neutrality of his tone was a slap in the face. Fire was the superior element; firebending, the ultimate combat art. Well enough for ordinary soldiers to rely on tanks and drills and inventions. One of Sozin's line should be above all that.

"There wasn't time for subtle measures. I had to save my ship-

"Never," Ozai's voice knifed across hers, "did I think to hear Shidan's words from my own daughter's lips."

He knows.

It froze the marrow of her bones. She couldn't move. Couldn't think. Mai, Ty Lee, her agents - they'd never have betrayed Shidan's presence. They were far too smart to think they could escape her revenge. It had to be her crew. Hadn't she proved with Zuko time and again that low-ranked seamen were a weak point, willing to bend to anyone of higher rank? They'd talked, no doubt of it-

Breathe.

Breath was fire. Breath was control. And control was everything.

So Father knows. Move accordingly.

Easy to think. Almost impossible to do. Shidan had come for her because he'd known she was dying. Because he wanted her to live. He'd healed her. How could she say she'd just let a healing bender walk away? Not out of gratitude, no, Father would never stand for that... but she doubted he'd like the real reason any better.

He risked his life for me. Like I did for Ty Lee. I risked my life, it doesn't make sense-

Only when Shidan's blades and fire had defended her, it did. There was something more than loyalty and vicious self-interest that moved people. Something she didn't have words for. Yet. But it was bright and sharp and demanding, like the skill that flung Mai's blades. And she wanted it.

It wasn't like firebending, or anything else she'd mastered by years of honing innate talent into perfection. It was different. Hard.

But Shidan had challenged her. He'd stood in her own cabin, knowing her strength, and challenged her inner fire. Blocking her with that brightness, that flexed and taunted and could not be destroyed, any more than she could shatter moonlight on water.

"Learn, granddaughter. And remember. We fought the sea itself, and lived. Not because we are stronger, or more cunning! Because we are.

"When our ancestors marveled at the flames, Agni saw the spark within us. He saw we lived, as fire lives; we spark and burn and die, as earth and air and water can never do. And so he chose us, and twinned that spark with his own. And in our ears he whispered, 'Be.'

"You are a firebender. Within you, you nurture Agni's spark. How fiercely you burn! But fire is only half your strength. Find the spark that is human, granddaughter; that is dragon, that is life. Find that, and you will never be defeated. Even in death."

Find the spark, the strength within herself. Believe.

"He had information too sensitive to risk passing through ordinary channels," Azula found herself saying. She kept her voice even with an effort, and hoped it was as true as it felt. Father would know if she lied. Father always knew. "There's a volcano in the north of the Eastern Continent that's threatening to get cranky. Byakko plans to send firebenders to calm it down again. He wanted me to be sure this was no move against our empire's interests."

True. She knew it was true. But who had told her? When?

And why did seeking after the memory of those words bring only a touch of warm hands and razor edges, comforting as the knives that let her sleep?

A ripple in the fiery screen. "And you believed him."

If she hadn't been awake, those words would have jolted her alert. That statement had more thorns than an orchard of rose-orange trees. "If I recall, Mount Shiroto is due for another few centuries," Azula said plainly. "They can divert some of their benders elsewhere for a time without endangering our islands."

Sparks snapped in the flames. Azula refused to flinch, but sweat prickled down her spine.

"Shidan of Byakko would save our enemies, and you think he does not move against the empire?" Ozai's laugh was dark. "You have much to learn, Azula."

Of course she did. She was only fourteen. Old enough to defend her own honor, and the empire's, but not old enough to have read every scroll in the palace library. Cunning and intelligence took you far, but there was something to be said for the accumulated weight of her ancestors' viciousness.

Even so, she couldn't picture what she might be missing. "We have colonies on the northern edge of the continent," Azula observed. She'd been in Onsenzakura to capture Zuko and Iroh; the locals might not be as refined as citizens of the caldera, but they were loyal. "They expect us to handle such perils, or warn them in time to evacuate." She stared through the flames, face a calm mask over unease. "It would need to be a significant tactical advantage to counterbalance those losses."

This time, the silence felt smug.

This is wrong.

Honestly, why should she care if the northern colonies died? If their dying served a purpose for the empire, a useful purpose that would crush their enemies forever - it might be worth it. But to let Fire Nation citizens be wiped out by a volcano? Lords ruled because they bent fire; because they were Agni's children. Peasants gave loyalty because those lords had the power to protect them.

Allow our own people to die by fire, and everything we have built will be shattered.

Surely her father had considered this. There must be a greater goal. An ultimate strategy that would give the Fire Nation ascendance over all others.

Calm. You know the game. "I would be honored to have the benefit of your intentions, Father."

"You would be, indeed."

Just the slightest curl of disdain to his lips, audible in his tone. Azula cringed inside, as if a stone door had slammed on her fingertips. That was no. That was fool. That was you are not and never will be worthy-

What did I do, Father? What have I ever done to make you doubt me?

"Did you never wonder how Byakko found you?"

And everything in that question screamed of trap. But for who? "He's a spy," Azula shrugged. "That's what he does. I expect Mai will be even more useful, having had the chance to observe his methods."

Useful, to be sure. But to whose side? Mai had made it clear she would neither forgive nor forget Azula's manipulations in her relationship with Zuko. But.

"You're his sister," Mai had said, while they struggled to keep their ship from taking on water. "He wants you to survive this war. And he's got a plan. You'd like it. Some of it's vicious enough even for you."

"I'm here to help Zuko, and Ty Lee, and you. Because they care about you. And Shidan cares. He's a lot scarier than he lets the Fire Lord think. Trust me."

Interesting to have that confirmed now, by what Fire Lord Ozai was not saying. No sneers of Byakko's powerlessness. No contempt for a clan that held as much stiff-necked independence as it did only through luck and a water volcano's whims.

He's not saying anything, Azula realized. He wants me to talk. To tell him what I know.

And he hadn't mentioned Makoto at all.

Impossible. If he knows about Shidan from my crew, he has to know a dragon attacked us. A dragon! When they're all supposed to be dead!

Unless Shidan was right, and Ozai hadn't learned of Grandfather's presence from her crew at all.

No. It can't be. Father wouldn't lie. Not to me.

But he wasn't lying, was he? Not mentioning Makoto wasn't lying about her. Just as not mentioning Mai's heritage hadn't been lying to Zuko.

Father would never treat me like Zuko. He wouldn't!

Two options. Either her father was allied with Makoto, or he wasn't. On the face of it, wasn't seemed far more likely. Sozin's line had slaughtered dragons. Even Uncle Iroh. And Makoto had tried to kill her. Her father would never allow that.

...But she knew what she'd heard, six years ago. She knew.

I was a child then. Not nearly as useful. I am now, I took Ba Sing Se - I am the worthy heir!

An heir who'd only survived by earth and air and forbidden healing. Her life was balanced on a knife's edge, especially now that she'd delivered her warning of the Avatar-

Ice trickled down her spine. Nawahime claimed to be our spy.

And the first rule of spies was, never use information that could be tracked to only one source.

He wasn't surprised that the Avatar might be alive. He wasn't furious. He wasn't disdainful. He wasn't surprised.

She'd been used. A plausible source of information, to cover what Makoto had provided.

She let us get away!

The room was flashing red and black; Azula made herself breathe normally. Yes, Ty Lee had surprised Makoto on the beach. Yes, shards of stone had dealt serious damage to those wings. But dragons bent fire, breathed fire. And there had been no firebenders left on that beach to fight her.

That bitch!

The Fire Lord's heir, used as a stalking ostrich-horse to cover a dragon's trail. She'd never felt so angry.

Makoto used me for her own gains... and to hunt Shidan.

And that, Azula found, she could not forgive. There was no reason to kill Shidan. He'd been ordered never to approach the Fire Lord, or the palace; he was no threat to Sozin's line. He'd always acted, would always act, to protect Byakko. And Byakko was the last guard of the west; the farthest point to cry justice to Agni before the sun sank into the sea. Beyond their island was only untamed ocean, and they stood against the sea's power like their mountain itself.

Only a fool quenches the flame that guards him. I will not be threatened by fools!

Yet the Fire Lord was no fool.

He's still waiting.

Still silent. Not a whisper, not a crackle of flame to hint to her what Fire Lord Ozai wished to hear. She would be walking blind through a maze, praying with each word not to plunge to her doom.

So be it.

Words arrayed like Mai's hidden blades, Azula began.

...Sweat, dripping along her collarbone and spine, turning formal armor clammy and torturous with salt. Azula willed the discomfort out of her mind, stalking toward her chambers, a smile on her lips that made passing servants cringe.

One more corridor. Just one more.

She wasn't even certain, now, just what she'd said. Some plausible weave of Shidan's network observing messenger-hawks, engine speeds, winds, and currents, and from that calculating that if a message had come in here, the ship itself must be found in a specific area of there...

She'd dropped a significant hint that security in the naval yards needed tightening in the midst of that. After all, if the speed of imperial vessels was widely known - well.

A good stroke. It may have salvaged everything. One more door...

Ty Lee was on her almost before the door was decorously closed, babbling a pink mile a minute as Mai efficiently got her out of clothes and armor and into a broiling-hot bath.

Cold. I was so cold.

"Who do we need to maim?" Mai said bluntly.

Azula blinked, relieved to see her own hideout knives had been carefully placed in reach on the tub's little ledge. "No one. At the moment." Her eyes narrowed. "Why?"

Choose your words, Mai. You know we're being watched.

"I come from an ambitious clan," Mai said levelly. "It's good to be of service to our people. Where's anywhere better to work?"

...Oh, lovely. That was truly lovely. Almost poetic. Every word the strict truth. Azula had to smirk.

She wouldn't have dared say that to me before.

Which was actually... interesting. Loyal servants were valuable. But someone who wasn't loyal, yet wasn't actually an enemy; who had goals that ran in parallel, but weren't the same - it kept her alert. Kept her focused.

And if what she suspected was true, they were going to need all her focus to survive.

He won't let Makoto move against me. Not now. Not until after the eclipse, when the Avatar has been crushed.

But once Aang was in hand...

Calm. Control. And ignore the little whimper that wanted to climb the back of her throat, that looked at her father and wanted to beg why?

Why doesn't matter. Makoto wants me dead, and she's working with Father, and I...

I will not end up like Zuko.

There was one way to be sure. One piece of information she could learn, that would tell her once and for all if she was secure as the heir, or if she might be... expendable.

Sozin was over eighty when Azulon was born. Azulon was in his sixties when Father was.

Fact. And fact. She'd be a fool not to consider the possibility.

"I know it's been some time since either of you were in the city," Azula said casually, meeting gray and gold gazes. "But I was wondering. Have you heard any interesting gossip? Especially about... oh, gifts of cash. And silk."

Who's getting married? Who's negotiating it?

Put that together with a visit to the Dragonbone Catacombs, to check the Sages' records of family alliances, and she'd know.

You can't put Mother aside. You can't!

Ursa was banished. Ursa was legally dead. He very well could. She hadn't succeeded as heir this long by ignoring the facts.

"Could be fun." Mai tapped black-painted nails against a blade, scanning the bathroom walls for any alterations that might hide listening holes. "Can you balance on a clothesline?"

"Sometimes," Ty Lee nodded, obviously considering it. "Even if the line's not supported, there should be buckets and racks I can use. Good idea!"

"Clotheslines?" Azula said doubtfully.

"Ask questions while Ty Lee's putting on an act, they never know what they said later," Mai said plainly. "And if you want to know something... delicate..." A shrug. "You'd be amazed what laundry can say."

Azula stared.

Mai's hand moved, miming flat and silky.

Oh. Sheets. That was... um. More than she'd wanted to know. Eww.

You're the heir. Do what you must to survive. "Creative," Azula acknowledged. "We're going to need to be very creative in the next few weeks, ladies. Our nation needs us to be very, very useful."

A subtle warning. But from Mai's stillness and Ty Lee's nibbled lip, clear enough.

If we're not useful, we'll be dead. If Father thinks I'm not useful anymore...

Well. He was going to be wrong. One way, or another.

"Useless," Sokka muttered, knowing it would be lost in the thump of earth, the splash of water, the dying crackle of flames. "Way to let a guy pitch in."

Dispirited, he walked away from the bending slamming around the meteor, eyeing tiny licks of flame Aang and the girls hadn't gotten to yet. Weird. You'd think dry grass would burn like tinder.

It was burning; just, not the raging fire he'd expect in this crazy nation. More of a crawling crackle through the stems, leaf after dry leaf casually catching and flaming, rhythmic as Gran-Gran working hair off a hide-

"Fire and steel, boy! Just what do those young fools think they're doing?"

...It was a very manly eep. He'd swear that to anybody. Here he'd been thinking of Gran-Gran, and-

Well, she wasn't Gran-Gran. A little too tall and pale. Wrinkles not quite in the same places. And Gran-Gran would never have worn red and gold, or pulled her hair back with a red flame ornament. Or had the hilt of a sword peeking over her shoulder.

Okay. So he was staring. She had to be a grandmother; maybe even somebody's great-grandmother, she looked that old. And she was armed. It kind of made the world go sideways.

"Well?" She prodded his shoulder, just above the Fire Nation's weird armbands. "Speak up, cub. Water and earth, bending here? If the authorities catch you, you'll be up a frozen mountain with no sun, won't you?"

Gold. She's got gold on her robe hems. "Aren't... you the authorities?" Sokka managed.

"Heh. Heh heh heh..." Fists on her hips, she laughed, loud and clear as a talking drum. "So the cub has eyes. And can use them." She smirked at him. "Still waiting for my answer, boy."

What were they doing? Wasn't it obvious? "They're putting the fire out."

"In summer?" She looked as if he'd just offered her a rancid fish. "Why?"

"Um, town over that way?" Sokka pointed. "Night, nobody up, grr, fire, argh?"

"It's summer," the old swordswoman said dryly. "If you think their fire towers aren't manned, especially at night, you haven't been in the islands long enough. And if you think putting a summer fire out solves anything..." She narrowed her eyes at his friends, and drew in a breath that filled ancient lungs. "Stop that now."

Water splashed to the ground as Aang and Katara stared. Toph let earth fall with a thump.

"Well. Manners enough to listen, at least." A wizened finger pointed at Toph. "You, earth-girl. Put that turf back, and mind you get it roots-side down. A grass fire's harmless, but if we start a ground fire, Shu Jing will skewer us all. And rightly so." Another jab. "You, waterbenders. Make yourselves useful and soak the roots before she lays them back. A spark underground can linger for weeks before it flares to the surface again, and I'm not going to be the one to impart that joyful news to the fire-watch-"

"Sokka, get away from her!" Toph stomped up a wall of earth between him and the white-haired woman. "She doesn't have a heartbeat!"

Say what?

"Clever girl."

Sokka backed away behind the dirt shield, watching what had seemed to be a stubborn old lady... fade.

Translucent now, the woman shook her head. "You still need to tend that turf, girl. I'm but a ghost, wandering where I loved. Let a ground fire begin, and you'll wake far darker things than I could ever be." She spread empty hands. "This was my domain once. I would not see it harmed."

"Spirits can lie," Aang flung at her.

"Spirits, yes," the swordswoman said dryly. "I am a ghost, little waterbender. Your teacher should have taught you the difference."

A ghost. Sokka felt the hairs on the back of his neck going straight up. Spirits were spirits, and you never knew quite what they'd do, or why. Ghosts? They'd been people once. And, well - people could be downright evil.

"Um." Aang pulled out his sure I know what I'm doing, trust me smile. "I wouldn't say Master Pakku told us all about ghosts..."

Oh great, Sokka realized, heart sinking. He didn't listen to a word of it.

"You have Sokka's name," Katara broke in, swallowing hard. "Give us yours."

"One, for four to use?" The ghost looked almost amused. "Not a fair trade, little water-child."

"Sokka's name, and we do what you said to stop this... ground fire," Katara offered. "We'll trust you that far."

"Ah; now those are fairer words." The ghost nodded, satisfied. "In life, I was called Temul." She pointed toward a particular patch of turf. "Douse that one first. I can feel the spark in it."

Katara flicked water up from the ground, soaking it into the spot with a flattening wave of her hand. "Is it out?"

Gold eyes half-closed, and the ghost nodded. Toph frowned, but flipped turf back where it'd come from.

"You're just going to do what she wants?" Aang grumbled, waving up his own globe of water.

"She's someone's ancestor spirit," Katara said seriously. "Remember what Master Pakku said. We wouldn't see her if it wasn't important."

Sokka gave Temul a look askance, remembering awkward moments on a beach with somebody's hands fisted in his tunic. "I thought proper ancestor spirits showed up in family temples."

"Oho, been listening to the Fire Lord's propaganda, have you?" Temul smirked. "Think about it, young one. Not everyone is rich enough to have a temple, are they? So if the only living souls who can gain counsel from the dead are nobles... well." A sweep of her hand, toward the horizon. "It's so much easier to tell lies."

"The whole war is a lie!" Aang protested. "How can people not know?"

"Now that, little waterbender, is a long story." Temul nodded toward the ground. "Earth first. Perhaps we'll have explanations after." She chuckled darkly. "And if you think I lie, consider this. I'm dead. There's very little left the Fire Sages can do to me." A sharp smile. "They're not about to disturb Sozin's ashes so he can kill me twice."

Sokka stopped in his tracks. "You... Fire Lord Sozin?"

"As I said-"

"Long story, got it," Sokka sighed. "What the heck is a ground fire, anyway?"

Drifting along as the others damped and righted turf, Temul arched a white brow. "What does it sound like?"

"It can't be what it sounds like," Sokka argued. "There's ice in the... um." He looked down into one of Toph's deeper holes. "I keep forgetting you guys don't have ice down there."

"You must come from very near the poles," Temul mused. "So you've never seen grass fire. All you have on the taiga are crown fires. No wonder you're fearful of the flames."

"Hey, last time I checked? Stuff burning down, generally bad," Sokka shot back.

"Then come and watch. Come," she nodded to the others, as Toph snugged down one last soggy square of turf. "Let me show you life in the midst of fire."

Yeah, right, Sokka thought skeptically, one eye on the fires burning merrily closer to town fields as Temul drifted toward a darker forest. If anybody's in those watch towers, they better get moving...

Fire climbed a low bank at the fields' edge, and stopped.

Say what?

Katara stared through the night. Reached out, like feeling at a fur. "There's water behind that hill!"

"That hill's not a hill," Toph stated, head lifted in surprise. "People made that."

"So amazed, young ones? Did you think because we cannot bend it, we cannot use it?" Temul tched. "We are all Agni's children, gifted with fire or not. These islands are our home. We know them; fire, earth, sea, and sky. Especially the sky." Her gaze grew distant; the air seemed to ripple with heat. "Death comes as summer dies. Those who cannot read autumn's storms may lose more than their own lives."

Autumn, for airbenders. From the horrified look on Aang's face, Sokka knew things were about to go downhill fast. Quick, think, do something- "How does anything stay alive in the middle of that?" Sokka blurted, pointing at flowing flames.

Attention flicking back to him, Temul held a finger to her lips. Crouched down, and stepped noiselessly forward, pointing to black mounds where the fire had already burned through.

Funny looking black mounds, Sokka realized, as all of them tried to sneak closer. Two large ones, with a bunch of smaller ones so close they looked like chicks nestling up to an arctic hen-

Out of the black, fluffy yellow peeked out. "Peep?"

"Quack!"

"Turtle-ducks!" Aang pounced, handing Katara a squirming, yellow-fuzzed turtle-duckling with a soot-stained shell. "Why'd you let the fire go here? They could have been hurt!"

"Quack!"

"Hey! I just want Katara to see - ow! Quit it!"

Avatar mobbed by turtle-ducks. Sokka tried not to snicker. Really.

"They're not hurt." Katara rubbed a fluffy head with her fingertip, then put flailing webbed feet down. "Here you go, little mother... just look. They're not hurt at all." Her eyes were wide. "But we saw the fire!"

"A grass fire." Temul watched the little flock waddle off toward the hill, and the water beyond. "They burn fast, low, and cold. No, no; don't believe me. Put your hands on the ground and feel." She nodded toward Toph. "Or ask the one walking barefoot in the ashes."

Sokka gulped. They'd walked right after a fire, and Toph hadn't complained...

Biting his lip, he touched sooty ground.

Hot.

But just hot. Like stone in the summer sun. Not searing-hot like a wood fire, or even boiling-hot like cookpot water. Just hot.

"It's not wise for humans to walk into a grass fire. We're not as sturdy as turtle-ducks." Temul smiled wryly. "Watch the fire. See how it moves. What it likes. It won't eat rock or water. Even a patch of raked sand can turn it aside." She gestured at the fields and town. "Had that meteor not struck, Shu Jing would have set a burn in only a few weeks. Every year, this land burns; every summer, smaller fires stave off the larger. That is the duty of Shu Jing's lord, and he sees to it well."

"Wouldn't it be better if it didn't burn at all?" Aang said skeptically. "I mean, traditions are good, but..." Temul's eyes narrowed, and he gulped. "Okay, sure, you're right."

"Do you think the grass is dead?" The ghost sounded honestly curious.

"Um... smoke? Ashes? All black?" Aang pointed out.

Toph dug her toes in, the open edges of her shoes shushing on ash. "Feels like some pretty long roots down there."

"So there are," Temul agreed. "Soon there will be rain. New growth will sprout like emerald flames, for all that lives here to feed upon. And because the wiregrass has burned, it will flower, and set seed." She gave Aang a stern look. "Without fire, the wiregrass dies."

Aang looked like he really wanted to sit down, if he could just find a spot without ashes. "But... trees," he insisted. "The Hei Bai forest - the Fire Nation burned it down! It was awful!"

"What kind of forest?" Temul rested her hands on her hips, as if she had all eternity to wait for the answer.

"What kind?" Aang echoed. "How could anybody tell? They were all black and smoking!"

"Not a woodworker, are you?" Temul gave him a dark look. "I thought all children of the Water Tribes touched wood to see if there might be a shipwright in them."

"Oaks," Katara said quickly. "They were oaks, mostly. Remember the acorns?"

Sokka rubbed his head, and scowled. "How could I forget?"

"Hardwood forest." Temul looked grim. "Steel and fang, what do they teach young idiot firebenders these days... that was a foul deed. Hardwoods rarely burn. And like your taiga, when they do, it's crown fires. I lived over two centuries, and I can count on one hand the number of those forests I've seen burn."

Two centuries? Sokka's jaw dropped. No way!

"You're Temul of Shu Jing!" Toph's shoulders tensed; Sokka felt the ground twitch under them. "You knew Avatar Kyoshi!"

"That I did." Air itself seemed to catch fire over her shoulders, burning blue and lethal as Azula's flames. "Why do you seek news of a murdering Avatar?"

"She wasn't a murderer!" Aang protested. "I mean, Chin the Conqueror died, but if he hadn't been so dumb, he wouldn't have just stood there-"

"I did not see Chin the Conqueror fall." Temul's voice was ice. "See the storm tear the ocean over your village, waterbender. Feel the waves carry you out to sea! Fight to swim, to live, for day upon hopeless day. And when all is lost, when the ocean seeks to swallow you whole - then, hope there is a net to save you, as I was saved, flung by the dragons who loved us!" Azure fires flared and crackled, burning in a black darker than night. "Then, you may speak to me of murder." Folding her arms, she began to fade.

"Wait," Sokka called out hastily. "Please."

Faint as mist, she growled at him. "You try my patience, cub."

"You're a firebender," Sokka quipped, dragging out pages of symbols copied from sand. "You guys are never patient." Got it. "You're a noble, right? You read High Court?" He gulped at her look. "Please? We need help. If Sozin killed you - we're trying to fix things."

Something seemed to move in the darkness behind her, like a storm of wings. "You never asked why Sozin slew me."

...Eep.

"The Painted Lady gave us this message." Aang stepped up beside him. "Do you believe her?"

"Her mark on two of you grants you safer passage than you know." Temul's gaze rested on Aang. "She may believe in you. But Jang Hui has been without hope a long time. Shu Jing is stronger than that." Delicate as fog, she touched the paper. "I have no wish to trespass on favors she has granted."

"You're not going to help?" Aang flung down his hands, obviously not bending. "We're trying to do what's right!"

"A proper citizen of the Fire Nation, even the most boorish lout raised in the colonies," Temul stated dryly, "would know that spirit-matters should be taken to his loyal lord for advice and aid. For lords have strength to face the spirits that even a skilled firebender may not."

"Earth and water," Toph pointed out. "We don't have lords."

"So you do not. But you, girl." Temul leveled a stare at Katara, glittering gold. "You carry a vendetta, do you not?"

"I- that doesn't-" Looking at Aang, Katara shook her head. "I won't use that. Zuko meant it to hurt us."

"When the infection is deadly, Agni's knife must cut deep." Temul's gaze never wavered. "Did you think you carried only ink and paper? The prince's blood marks what is yours by right. Every spirit in this land knows whose gift you bear." She lifted a pale brow. "And every lord knows it is his duty to assist one on vendetta in her search. Piandao of Shu Jing is a true lord, honorable and just." She stepped back. "Seek him, or not, as you will."

Sokka blinked. The night was empty.

"Can we trust her?"

Sokka did a double-take. Aang, not sure about somebody? "I thought you could hear when somebody lied."

"When they're talking, yeah. It's in the air." Aang looked a little white around the eyes. "But - you know how Toph said she didn't have a heartbeat?"

The earthbender shivered. "Freaky."

"Yeah." Aang gulped. "She wasn't breathing, either."

Sokka traded a glance with his sister. Camp and get warm, Katara mouthed at him.

Good idea. The hairs on the back of his neck had been standing so long, their feet were starting to hurt.

But Aang needed an answer. They all did, or nobody was going to get any sleep tonight.

Trust a ghost? Don't trust one? Dad, I wish you were here, I don't know-

Oh. So obvious.

"I think," Sokka said, "we need to find out why Temul died."

Chapter End Notes

Yes, "fire ice" really does exist. Check out methane clathrate on Wikipedia. Canon put natural gas deposits right on the edge of a continent at the Northern Air Temple? Then fire ice would be there, in Real Life!

I have my reasons for the Sanskrit. (Wow, people figured that out fast!) One of them being, well... look up Agni in Wikipedia. Very interesting entry - especially as lightning is recognized as one of his offspring. Please don't take anything non-English in this story as linguistically accurate. I do my best, but I'm no language expert, only an amateur who loves playing with words.

About Aang denying responsibility for Kyoshi's actions - true, in canon, in "Avatar Day" he went all-out to clear Kyoshi's name. (And found out she was guilty - by Chin Village's definition of guilt - anyway. Heh.) However, in this fic, Sokka and several other people (Iroh, Yangchen, others) have since pointed out that Aang is not the same person as Kyoshi. Or Roku. Or Kuruk. And so on. The Avatar Spirit reincarnates, yes. But the human who is the Avatar is different, every time.

The Painted Lady, and Agni, don't hold Aang responsible for Kyoshi's actions. They do hold the Avatar Spirit responsible, as Kyoshi had to use that to set up the Fire Lord in the first place. Each Avatar is responsible for what they choose to do with the power they command. Agni's beef with the Avatar Spirit goes back many, many thousands of years. Agni's beef with Aang is a straight line back to the North Pole and Koizilla.

Also take into account the fact that Agni's beef with the Avatar may have more than one source. In mythology, spirits associated with fire are often treated warily by humans and other Powers, with good cause. The other three elements are. But fire doesn't exist without consuming something else. So when the spirit of the world incarnates as a human, putting human values on what a spirit does (as Yangchen all but said was the purpose of the Avatar, in the whole spirit world quest Aang went on after he was hit by lightning), then that incarnation is dealing with three apparently "friendly" elements... and one that has to eat other things to exist.

In a situation like that, if there's a dispute, who looks like the guilty party?

By the way, spirit of fire versus spirit of the whole world? Just who do people think holds the upper hand in that one?

Chapter 51

"A hundred years ago, people wanted to talk to you," Aang grumbled, walking away from the weapons shop with Sokka trudging wistfully behind. They'd split up from the girls to cover more ground talking to people. He was beginning to think that might have been a mistake. A few snickers from Katara would have snapped Sokka out of playing with every weapon in the place. For hours.

The owner hadn't been any help either, even when it was obvious Sokka couldn't afford to buy that sword like Temul's. He'd just smiled and given Sokka tips on grip and swing, matter of fact as Gyatso talking out the best way to throw a cake at somebody.

Which was one of the things Aang didn't like remembering about Kuzon. Most of the time his friend had been fun, if a lot more quiet than anybody should have been. But wave sharp steel around? Kuzon's eyes would just light up. Like weapons were fun.

Sokka's eyes had lit up like that. Just for a minute. It made Aang feel kind of queasy.

"He wanted to talk," Sokka said, finally looking away from the shop. "Just not about Temul. Can't say I'm surprised."

"Because Fire Lord Sozin was their great hero." Aang rolled his eyes. Why couldn't these people ever tell the truth?

"That's part of it," Sokka thought out loud. "But mostly... well, she's a ghost."

"And most people can't fight spirits. Yeah, I get it." That was the Avatar's duty. Again. Did Sokka have to keep making him feel guilty about getting frozen for a hundred years? He hadn't meant to land in the ocean.

"No, Aang..." Sokka closed his eyes a second, and shook his head. "Didn't Gyatso ever tell you to keep an eye out for your family-" He cut himself off, glancing to make sure no one was in earshot. "Right. No family. Come on, we need to talk."

What does family have to do with ghosts? Curious, Aang followed him into the shadows inside an ostrich-horse stable, giving a skritch behind the beak to one blood bay that tried to nibble his headband.

"Okay," Sokka said, keeping his voice low. "I don't know how it works here, but Gran-Gran always said ghosts were different from spirits. Spirits - well, spirits are Avatar stuff. Ghosts used to be people. Only after they died, they stuck around, because... they can have a lot of reasons. The scary ones want someone dead. Lucky for everybody, there's not a lot of those around. The rest of them try to look out for their family. Maybe they show up in a dream, to tell you a name that'll keep a new baby safe. Maybe they just show up in front of you, so you jump back, and you don't step on the ice-snake. That kind of thing."

Spooky. "Nomad," Aang pointed out, cheered up. "If we don't have families, I bet our ghosts don't either. And we don't want people dead. So I guess we wouldn't have ghosts."

Sokka frowned. "Kind of not the point."

Right. Temul was a firebender. Had been a firebender. A spooky firebender. But if spooky was tied to family, maybe it made sense. "You mean, people won't talk because they think a ghost would be trying to help them." Aang chewed on that. "I guess she was, if things were supposed to burn." They could still smell the smoke now. It had made Appa all twitchy this morning. Hang in there, buddy. We'll be back soon.

"Aang." Sokka looked dead serious. "We're not Temul's family."

"But we were there to help," Aang pointed out. "That's enough."

"Not according to Gran-Gran."

"Your dad says Gran-Gran doesn't know everything." Aang blew out a breath of relief. Now he knew what Sokka was worried about. "Come on, Sokka. If she wanted revenge on somebody, why would she show up to help us?"

"I don't know," Sokka admitted. "That's what bothers me."

Aang grinned at him. "You worry too much."

"Maybe," Sokka shrugged. "Dad would be worried, if he were here. He's not. So I've got to do it... oh. Hi."

Stable boards rattled and creaked, without feet walking on them. At least, no feet they could see. Ostrich-horses snorted, backing away from stall doors. Aang drew in a breath-

Boards creaked quickly, like something scurrying out.

Aang let air sigh out, not bending. "Why does Toph like that thing?"

"Why do pirates like reptile-birds?" Sokka stuck his head out the stable door. "Hey, guys. I thought we were meeting up outside town?"

"We need to head toward the other side of town." Katara stepped out of the sunlight. "I think we found something."

"You think this is the right place?" Aang whispered in the darkness. Sure, he was getting better at earthbending. But being shut in one of Toph's tunnels, away from the wind - it was kind of spooky. And Boots' tip-toe steps behind them didn't make it any less spooky.

He wasn't going to do anything to Boots, though. Not as long as it stayed just tip-toeing. Toph had been muttering about burying him up to his chin so he could practice bending with his face, Bumi-style. It was way, way better to let Boots distract her from plans like that.

"It's the only place around here that seems to have guards," Katara said seriously. "I don't know if it has anything to do with Temul, but it has to be important."

"Spooked guards," Sokka muttered. "You getting any... I dunno, Avatar stuff feelings?"

Yeah, right. Aang put a hand on the dirt to check where it was before he bent it. Tao had told him a lot about clearing his mind and letting the earth talk to him, and none of that had done any good-

Something tingled under his fingertips. Pain. Grief. Sad, like the gray rains before winter, and yet-
"Hot! Get back!"

"Seriously?" Moving confidently through utter darkness, Toph pressed her hand where his had been. "Feels like earth to me."

"It was hot," Aang objected. "Burning hot." But his hand didn't feel burned. Just achy.

"We must be in the right place." Katara's dress rustled. "The fishmonger told us, before she looked around and acted like it didn't matter. The burned ground. At sunset."

"Guards are all out of sight." Raising her hands over her head, Toph lifted.

Air! Aang scrambled out into the fading afternoon in pure relief. How could anybody like living underground-

Black. Black everywhere.

"No..." He had to bite down on the urge to yell it, so loud the Fire Lord himself would hear. Everything was black. Dead. All dead. How could anybody do this?

"The earth burned." Toph was pale, feeling with her toes like she'd stepped into a swamp full of leeches. "It's all burned." She swallowed. "It doesn't feel good."

"It hurts." Aang shuddered. "Maybe we should just go- Katara?"

She was on her knees in the ashes, water wrapped around her hands. "I want to help," Katara said softly, to no one he could see. "If anyone's got a problem with that, let me know."

"You're going to try to heal the ground?" Sokka said in disbelief.

"We helped heal a river. Why not?" Frowning in concentration, Katara moved her hands, a gentle inch at a time.

Something twinged. Not a bad twinge, Aang thought, as black seemed to soften, just a little. Just - weird.

Shaking his head, Sokka walked a few steps away, tracing the edge of dead black with his gaze. "Look at that. It's like somebody cut this whole clearing out with a burning knife. What happened here?"

"Not a knife." Toph moved a little closer to Sokka, still walking like she wished she couldn't touch the ground. "It's like - kind of a bowl pulled out sideways." She made a scooping motion with her hand. "Right by the edge, it's shallow. Over there-" She pointed toward the darkest spot of ground. "It's deep. Really deep."

Katara looked up. "Maybe I should-"

"No!" Aang wasn't sure why he said it. That spot just felt wrong. "Stay there. I think it's helping."

"Almost sunset, anyway," Sokka said thoughtfully. "Funny; the way people didn't want to talk about this, I was sure we'd see something..."

The world faded.

"...Eep?"

Grass waved around their feet, oddly chill. Silent ranks of red armor ringed them in the mist, bare faces just as grim as skull masks. Sokka grabbed for Boomerang, but there were just too many-

"Don't move!" Aang hissed.

Hand clamped on the wrapped grip, Sokka froze. "Aang?"

"They look like they're breathing. They're not." Aang tried not to gulp. "Just- get over here. I don't think they see you." He scanned the armored ranks, as Sokka tip-toed over. "I don't think they see us at all."

"They're standing right there!" Katara whispered.

Aang shook his head, trying to figure it out. "They don't feel like spirits. Not even like Temul. More like - ghosts of ghosts."

"Oh yeah," Sokka breathed. "Makes perfect sense."

"Temul of Shu Jing." Ornate red robes. A golden flame in a white topknot, gleaming in the sunset. An expression Aang knew, somehow, even though he knew he'd never seen the old man in his life. "I offer you one last chance to yield. Admit your wrong, and save your life."

"Fire Lord Sozin." The voice was familiar, yet off, as an ancient firebender stepped onto the gray grass that had been blackened earth. "I will not. You malevolent creature."

"Temul!" Katara stood up straight, water whipping into her hand, ready to lash out. "Aang, we've got to do something!"

"It's not her." Aang hadn't been sure until he said it, but he was sure now. "It's not, Katara. And that's not the Fire Lord. I think - this is what Tao called a phantom..."

"Stubborn old witch!" Steam blew from Sozin's breath. "My men tracked them here! They were carried west on your ship! You dare not deny it!"

"I do not deny it. I'll snarl it to the skies!" Temul flung in his face. "They're gone, you paranoid monster. Gone, and ever beyond your reach!" She snarled low in her throat, gold eyes blazing. "Make yourself a monster, and it's your own hell to burn in. You will not make monsters of my clan!"

"Tell me where they are." Flames flickered around elegant hands. "Or all your clan will die."

"Women and children," Temul snarled. "Helpless women and children, you'd hunt down and slaughter. Those nuns couldn't hurt a flutter-wasp, even to save their own children! Especially to save their children. Their elders saw to that."

What?

"Women and children." Sozin's smile was thin and cold, as armored ranks parted to reveal pale faces above dark chains. "All that's left of your clan, is it not?" Pale gold narrowed. "Submit."

The phantom's gaze swept those weeping and grimly silent. "Be brave," she breathed. Looked up-

Aang jammed himself back against Sokka's shoulder, grabbing blind for Katara's hand. That stare; that horrible, heart-thumping, breath-stealing stare...

"I will never yield to you." Temul lifted her hands in a graceful arc, open and patient as the sea. "Save your threats, and fight."

Fire roared.

Aang couldn't breathe. Or he was breathing too fast; he wasn't sure. He could feel Sokka's arm warm against his shoulder, Katara's fingers tight and sweaty on his, Toph behind them all with her toes dug into the ground. He'd seen firebenders attack, Zuko and Zhao and Azula-

Even Jeong Jeong hadn't thrown fire like this.

Sozin stabbed like a spear of sun, striking with punches and kicks of blazing fire. Temul melted back and sideways, twisting his flames aside, curling them back on the Fire Lord like ruby whips-

"Suki," Sokka breathed. "She fights like Suki."

Like Katara, Aang thought, not wanting to say it. Never wanting to say it. Fire should blast and burn. It shouldn't flow like water, cling and sear like lava...

Watching this, he could finally believe the stories he'd heard of Master Pakku's battle against the firebenders. Sinking tanks into ice with a push of his hand. Riding a waterspout to ravage Fire Nation soldiers. Because maybe Sozin was old, and Temul was ancient, but the flames hissed and crackled for them stronger than any bender he'd ever seen-

A sweeping kick, and Temul was down; Sozin crouched beside her, dagger of flame above her heart. "I will find them," he stated, cool as if he asked her to tea. "And the Avatar."

"Young fool." Blistered red, Temul's lip curled. "Finish what you've started."

"Oh, I intend to." Sozin's smile could have cut steel. "For those who defy me... Shu Jing will be an excellent example." He raised his voice, without looking over his shoulder. "Start with the youngest."

"No-!"

Fire cut short her cry; left her gasping in the ashes, black seared through flesh and lung and bone.

"Firebending comes from the breath." Sozin had Azula's smile. "No breath... no fire."

Turning on his heel, he stalked toward chained children.

Breathless, Temul's lips still moved.

You will not, Aang felt in his lungs, in his bones; a spark all the way down to his spirit. I am Temul of Shu Jing. I am the blood of dragons.

Charred and blistered, one hand moved to white hair. Flipped out gleaming steel.

Fire is life.

Steel sank deep into her own flesh, crimson welling over ashes.

Agni, spare my children-

Yanking everything from Katara's waterskin, Aang swept ice over them.

The world burned.

...Ow.

Sokka blinked. Winced, and squeezed his eyes shut against the stabbing light of dawn. Aang's school uniform was bunched under his right hand. Katara's bony shoulders were under him and Aang. Toph was a small, light weight against his left arm. And everyone was breathing. Thank goodness-

Wait. There was something on top of them. Felt kind of like... a blanket?

Hand-like paws thumped down weight on the back of his head. Patting him, Momo chirped.

"No, Momo," Sokka muttered. "Go back to Appa. He's gotta be worried."

"He's not the only one."

Older. A guy, definitely. Worried, but with the kind of laugh Dad had up against icebergs. Sokka blinked again, pain or no pain.

"Here. Water should help."

Dark hair and beard, with just a little gray. Gray eyes - and wasn't that weird to see on a Fire Nation guy? Robe and trousers, all red and black and gold-

And a sword. Like Temul's sword. Only at his side, not over his shoulder.

Sokka gulped water, and swallowed. Touched the blanket over them, and tried to blink away the headache. "Um. Thanks?"

"I couldn't risk moving you at night." The swordsman gave him a hand up to unsteady feet. "The curse had already struck you down, but left you alive. I didn't want to give it an excuse to think twice."

"Curse?" Sokka squeaked.

"But it's dawn now. Nothing more should happen," the swordsman went on. "We should go before anyone else notices you. The Guard gets a bit touchy about intruders in the area." A flash of a smile. "They're supposed to prevent that. Cuts down on the horrible, agonizing deaths."

"Deaths?" Sokka gulped, looking down to check everybody was still breathing-

The ground's not burnt.

Oh, it was still pretty black, everywhere they'd been lying. But there was a difference between black and dead, and they'd apparently been smack in the middle of it. Though there was red on one of Aang's hands, and some of Katara's hair was singed at the edges... "The fire - it was a phantom, he said. It wasn't real."

"Real can be more flexible than most people know." The swordsman bent to gather up Aang. "Come on. Let's get away from any annoying reports."

Reports. As in, official notice that people with their descriptions were in the area. Yeah, that fit nicely into bad idea territory.

Grunting as he picked up Katara, Sokka followed. Hang on, Toph. I'll be back.

It wasn't just Zuko, Sokka decided a little later, as he helped load groaning kids into the back of a farmer's cart. Komodo-rhinos were just born cranky.

"Thanks, Jinsuke," the swordsman said, walking alongside as the gray-haired farmer clicked his animal to a walk.

"No offense, Lord Piandao, but thank me by getting shut of that betobeto," Jinsuke grumbled.
"That's a horrible thing to wake up to, that is!"

Something stomped the ground, kicking up dust as Sokka gaped. Lord Piandao? "Boots found you?"

A happy rattle.

"Interesting allies you have." Piandao rifled through a familiar sheaf of papers. "But I suppose someone so young, on vendetta, needs all the friendly help she can find." He smiled. "I'd heard legends of friendly betobeto before, but this is the first one I've ever met."

Squeaks of leather, almost lost in the creak of wheels.

"Hmph," Jinsuke snorted. "Still like to turn a man's bones to water... Vendetta, is it? Where's your parents, boy?"

"Dad's in the war," Sokka said shortly. "And Mom..." His knuckles whitened; he let go of the side of the cart before wood could break. "Gran-Gran... the village needs her. There isn't anybody else." Spirits. So true. In more ways than one. "Um... can we have those back now?"

Piandao handed them over, looking over wincing children and one suspicious lemur. "Breakfast should help. And tea." He shook his head. "Very strong tea."

"For a curse?" Sokka muttered.

"For the headache." Piandao smirked a little. "We'll have to see about the curse."

Well, young prince. You've given me an interesting problem.

Piandao sipped his tea as the Avatar's little band of innocents dug into breakfast. Truly innocent, despite the deadly havoc they'd wreaked across the world. Only someone who'd never been tangled in politics and espionage would have kept both sets of vendetta papers together. Much less kept the prince's letter in with them.

A very interesting letter. Full of all sorts of thorny implications.

Toph Bei Fong has the prince's trust.

You didn't use even an honorable opponent's letter as a cover unless you trusted that they would understand the need for the deception. So the Avatar's earthbending teacher had the trust of the Southern Water Tribe and Prince Zuko. That had potential, if the girl was any kind of diplomat. Or even if she weren't. Put two enemies in a room with a third person neither wanted to insult, and they might at least talk to each other.

Prince Zuko is no longer loyal to the Fire Lord.

Something the White Lotus had been scheming toward for years, ever since Zuko had been banished. Over the past centuries the Fire Nation had tested Kyoshi's decree and their own souls to destruction. There were very few loopholes. Citizens of the Fire Nation were subject to the Fire Lord's will, and all the spirits' vengeance for defying it. But a banished prince was not a citizen. He was only what he was; a firebender born of royal blood, subject to execution if he ever entered Fire Nation waters again. Kyoshi's decree could no more hold him than it could an arctic eel.

Prince Zuko does not trust the Avatar.

Much more problematic, and a situation the White Lotus had never counted on. Of course Kyoshi's actions had left the Fire Nation suspicious of Avatars. But Roku had not been disliked, outside of Sozin's court, and the White Lotus had been certain that any royal heir without such a personal grudge could be brought around to friendship. Especially once they'd found out who the Avatar was. Aang was apparently friendly, honest, open...

Unfortunately, from Zuko's letter, he was all that - and a walking disaster area.

I wish I could chalk that up to learned pessimism, Piandao thought, staring into his tea. If anyone's earned the right to be cynical, that young man has. But given the reports he had of Princess Azula, and of the Avatar...

Agni. What a mess.

No help for it. White Lotus plans to encourage the Avatar and the prince to form an alliance would have to be amended. Hopefully, General Iroh was working on that.

Putting Prince Zuko and Katara in close contact at any time, under any circumstances, is likely to end... badly.

Frost and fire, but that was the snarliest polite letter Piandao had had the misfortune to read since the last time he'd intercepted a copy of Shidan's letter to War Minister Qin. Which, when you read between the lines, had told the War Minister that if he thought Byakko was holding back resources from the war, he was free to come look for them. Of course, the seas around Byakko were very rough, and there were creatures in the open ocean even a warship would want to avoid...

No fool, Qin had never accepted that invitation.

That the prince had resorted to that intensity of written venom - the girl was an enemy. Then, now, and probably forever. Which made Zuko's gift of a lawful vendetta... very disconcerting.

Admit it, old soldier, Piandao told himself, watching the quiet scuffle between Sokka and Toph over tea sweets. You should have known better than to believe any reports on Ozai's son at face value.

And there was the sticking point. He'd dealt with Pakku enough times to have a fair idea how strongly the Water Tribes felt about revenge. And he'd studied enough White Lotus records to sift some of the bias out of Temul's occasional ghostly rants; the Air Nomads had valued a peaceful solution to every problem, even if such solutions might strike other nations as completely unjust. He knew what Zuko's gift would have done.

Stab the Avatar's bond with his friends, through the heart.

He knew it. And so had Zuko.

The skill that had crafted that letter wasn't as much of a surprise as it should have been. Temul had been there when he'd pulled a half-drowned six-year-old princeling from the river, muttering ghostly imprecations about what good was it to be an old soul if you couldn't remember how not to die?

He'd asked her about that, many times. She would only smirk, and had told him then not to bother teaching the prince the sword. Anyone out of Shidan's line would never be satisfied with only one blade.

So the fact that Zuko could launch such a deadly attack didn't surprise him. Sixteen or not. No matter what Azulon's and Ozai's opinions on the young prince, Zuko was as much a child of Sozin as Lu Ten had been. No one in that family was stupid.

That Zuko had attacked the bond between the Avatar and his teachers - that was worrisome.

We need to restore balance to the world. We need the Avatar, and his teachers, alive and sane.

The prince claimed he'd broken loyalty to Ozai, yet he'd struck in a way that could only further the Fire Lord's interests. Why?

Worry about that later. For now - I need to fix the damage. Somehow.

"So..." Sokka let go of some of the sweets to pry Toph loose. "You said something about a curse?"

Aang gulped.

"Most of Shu Jing knows enough to avoid it." Piandao deliberately did not smile. Avatar or not, what they'd done was dangerous. They needed to know that, before they stumbled into something worse. Some place there wouldn't be a friendly ghost to warn them off.

Unless she didn't warn them.

Possible. Very possible. He hated to think that about an ally; and Temul was his ally, as she had been Kuzon's. But Kuzon had never been one of the White Lotus. Rage and revenge bound Temul to this world, and one of the spirits she'd vowed vengeance on now blinked at him from gray eyes.

He didn't think Temul would have enticed them into the curse. But not warn them? All too possible.

"We're from the colonies," Katara tried to look shy. "We didn't know."

"So your vendetta says. Gaipan. We have relatives there." Not that he officially knew where the remnants of Temul's clan had fled. But practically, yes. Some had been there. Whether they were still there now, after reports placed the prince's motley fleet at the scene... who knew? "Generally speaking, if there are armed guards around an area, it's a good idea to stay out. People have burned to death there before."

"But it was a phantom," Aang objected.

"It was," Piandao acknowledged. "It was also Temul's last stand. Where she called down Agni's wrath, like a dragon-child of legend. When the wind and sky are right, when memory stirs in burned earth... that fury rages yet again." He gentled his voice. "I've seen it myself; luckily, only from the edges. I was able to dive clear without more than a burned robe. If you were inside... I can guess you have questions." There's innocence, and then there's stupidity. Which is your burden? "It wasn't like what they taught you about Fire Lord Sozin in school."

"No." Aang swallowed. "He burned through her chest! He left her on the ground, he was going to torture people in front of her while she died-!"

"He was provoked," Piandao said dryly. "Some legends call Sozin a dragon-child as well. They tend to get vicious under stress." He gave Aang a measuring look. "If you saw that much, then you know how she defied him."

"She saved people." Katara sat up straight, defiant. "And he killed her for it!"

"As was his right in an Agni Kai," Piandao stated. If you don't know that much, it's a wonder you haven't been caught. "As she would have had the right to kill him, if she'd won. Even against the rightful Fire Lord." He shrugged. "Torturing her clan after she'd fallen... no, not even the Fire Lord has that right. I suspect that's why Agni answered her plea. Even when those she'd risked her life and clan to defend were none of our people."

The waterbender fumed. "It shouldn't matter what people she saved-

Sokka jabbed Katara with an elbow. "Why'd she do it?" the Water Tribe boy wondered. "Why save airbenders? They attacked the Fire Nation. Right?"

You pass as one of us much better than your friends do, Piandao thought. Interesting. "That's what your teachers told you. But if your vendetta led you here, you need to know the truth. There was no attack. And no Air Nomad army." He didn't let his gaze linger on Aang. "There hasn't been an Air Nomad army for a very long time."

The Avatar bit his lip. "The Fire Lord lied."

"He did," Piandao agreed. "No one expected it. He was rumored to be a dragon-child, and dragons never lie." He sighed. "Almost never. Dark dragons can, they say. But no one realized Sozin was one. Until it was too late."

Toph puffed away her bangs. "Temul knew."

"Not soon enough to save herself," Piandao corrected her. "Though I wonder if she would have tried. She was old; so much older than any of us. I doubt she would have wanted to live in the world Sozin made." He smiled ruefully. "She almost got him. And he had to spend so much time pacifying Shu Jing, the airbenders were long gone. Even her clan managed to get away. No one still alive was about to swear loyalty. Not after what he did to Temul."

Sokka squinted at him in consideration. "But you're here."

"I'm adopted." Piandao had to chuckle, remembering that hair-raising night after he'd forcefully impressed on the military that he was retired, and staying that way. "A word of warning, young man. Never let yourself become help in a domain where a ghost wants someone to take care of her people."

He still remembered that midnight, waking to Temul's considering gaze.

"My kin are scattered. My domain is unguarded. Byakko sends aid - but they are not Kuzon.

"You need a home. And Shu Jing needs a great name."

He'd been a lone wanderer. A threadbare swordsman, perfecting his art no matter what nation he had to learn from. An orphan, abandoned by firebenders ashamed to know one of their offspring was powerless.

At dawn, all that had changed.

"You were adopted by a ghost?" Toph looked a little rattled. "I've heard of people setting up marriages between ghosts..."

"You have?" Katara looked aghast.

"Contracts," the little earthbender shrugged. "Sometimes it gets families to stop fighting."

"In the Earth Kingdom." Temul's chill touched the room, as she misted into the world behind the children. "Remember where you are."

She's here. In broad daylight. "Where's the danger?" Piandao demanded.

"Sitting in front of you, lord of Shu Jing." Blue flickered around her; not quite flames, not yet.

"Your compassion saved your lives, little healer. But you won't always be there to save him."

Soundless steps circled the little band, and Temul leveled a look at Aang that made Piandao's heart freeze. "You have a very great deal to answer for. Kuzon."

Oh. The swordsman winced, as the Avatar gave a nervous laugh. This is going to end badly.

"Heh heh... how'd you know my name?" Aang said brightly. "When we met the other night, well..."

"We were careful," Katara said firmly. "We didn't know you."

"You still don't." Temul was smoke and mist and chill, focused on her prey. "That name is not yours to use."

"He's dead, Temul," Piandao said forcefully. "I doubt he'd mind."

For a moment, her glance could have frozen lava.

He's not? We saw him die!

"I mind." Temul fixed her attention back on the youngsters. "Byakko was never a near ally, but they were constant, and their dragons were often kin of ours. So when a young boy not even third in line as heir came to me with a wild tale of what the Fire Lord meant to do..." A dark smile.

"Perhaps I should show you."

Temul stepped around one of the many gaping holes in the Western Air Temple's floor, glaring at the green below with the same fury she wished to turn on Sozin. "Eldest Sister. If you'll only listen to me-

The ancient nun held up a long hand, waving her words away. "Temul of Shu Jing. Manslayer. We know of you, and your actions toward airbenders."

Most of which boiled down to, get your idiot wind-raising, crop-munching, marauding children and their bison the blazes out of my domain before I light you on fire. A few times she had killed, true enough. But what did protecting her domain have to do with warning of an oncoming catastrophe?

Ah, yes. The life of one man outweighs the world, the nuns would say. Damn windy nonsense.

"Since we assume you would not have visited us if your intentions were evil..." The nun glanced meaningfully toward one of many sheer drops, a puff of wind rising with a twitch of her fingers. "We will repay your good intent by not recounting such slanderous words to your rightful monarch."

Might as well shout into a hurricane. "The Fire Lord. Is coming. To kill you," Temul enunciated.

"My own people believe you let the storms come without warning, so we might die. They're angry. They're not thinking straight. At least consider what you'll do if someone attacks! This place isn't defensible-"

"We do not all need violence to be at peace." The white-haired nun, who couldn't have been half her age, glanced at the sword over her shoulder with a lip curled in distaste. "No one can harm us here."

"Because everyone's always ridden a sky bison to reach this place?" Temul snorted. "I can think of at least three ways to-"

"Enough."

Snarling under her breath, Temul held onto her temper with both hands. She was a great name, ruler of more fire than this nun would have seen in a lifetime. No one insulted her like this! If the boy and Shidan hadn't been so utterly convinced of their warning...

"There is no will to harm here, save what you bring with you," the nun said icily. "You may take your leave. At any time."

Which had better be soon, hung unspoken between them.

Well, old ally. I tried. Temul inclined her head, a shred of courtesy. "Good luck. You're going to need it."

An old woman could stomp dramatically away. It just took practice. And careful glances, for those damn holes in the floor.

Can't get a ride down to the harbor. Not yet. I'd maim somebody.

She roamed the quieter corners of the temple complex like a red shadow, avoiding stray nuns with practiced ease. What she needed was a quiet spot. To slice steel through air, not flesh willingly deaf and blind.

Idiots, idiots, idiots-

Steel, whispering through air.

Softening her steps, she followed the beckoning call. Interesting.

This was one of the forgotten sections of the Temple. Dust lingered on flagstones before blending into what might have been a wild garden, and vines growing from balcony to ceiling screened the clearing from any casual flyers.

On the edge of stone and earth, a swordsman danced.

Her blood seemed to freeze. So light. So impossibly fast, as if the small man raced the wind with each strike...

Onmitsu!

And yet - no red in dusty brown robes. No flashing fingers that would disable, stun, or kill. No bodies. Though there was a young nun, hand covering her mouth, gray eyes wide with fear...

Not of him. Of me.

A whirl of the nun's arms; the gust nearly blew Temul off her feet. The young woman moved in like a phoenix-eagle with one chick, wind whipping black hair. "Shih, run!"

"Peace!" Temul got out against the gale. "Peace, young one! I bring no fight here!"

"He's not going back!" The nun whipped her airstaff up to a credible guard, eyes glinting like she could already see herself beating Temul over the head. "You tell the Fire Lord-"

"I'm not here for the Fire Lord," Temul cut across her words. "If he knew what word I brought, the assassins would be on me already." She braced herself against the dying wind. "But you'd know about that, wouldn't you, Shih? Or should I say... Demon of Taku?"

Gold eyes were half-hidden by black bangs. "You are not giving Gyate reason not to fear you, lady of Shu Jing. That you are not." A faint smile shadowed his face. "It is all right, Gyate. If Temul meant us harm, there would be a host of onmitsu with her. And a net."

"Fat lot of good that'd do." Temul brushed off dust, studying him just as he was studying her. The invasion of Taku had been over thirty years ago; the man before her had to be in his fifties, at the least. Yet he moved fluid as a teenager, and there wasn't a strand of gray in jet black.

A chi-user. And the onmitsu let him go?

Well. She doubted they'd let him do anything. The Demon's swords resting in front of Sozin's throne had been salt in the smarting wound of Roku's casual rout of the Fire Army. If there was any one man Fire Lord Sozin had hated in the world as much as Roku...

Temul blinked, Gyate's fear and fury suddenly making sense. "The Eldest Sister doesn't know you're here, does she?"

Gyate blanched.

Temul hid a grin, as Shih interposed himself between the young lady and her gaze. Oho. So it's that way, is it? Amazing. Certainly she'd had to deal with the consequences of wandering Air Nomad boys before; usually just youngsters with broken hearts, but sometimes - well, more serious. But Air Nomad girls? Never. "I won't say anything. You have my word."

Twin breaths of relief. Temul watched them sigh together, and felt a twinge of regret for her late husbands. She'd stopped marrying after the third; it was too heartbreaking when they couldn't master bending enough to last. "But you have to know how dangerous this is," she said, trying to be gentle. "If your children aren't benders..."

"He was." Gyate's face crumpled, gray wet with tears. "And now she is, and - it's only a few more months until she's old enough, and..."

Shih drew her closer, face grim with sorrow. "I am here. I swear I will be here."

A nun, grieving her children? Unheard of. As out of place as an ex-assassin in a Temple-

Oh, Agni. This is my chance. "Here is exactly where you'd better not be," Temul said swiftly. "My ship is in the harbor. Take the children out to see it. All of them. And any of the young nuns you can talk into keeping you company. Go."

"Take the children?" Gyate drew back, gripping her airstaff with white-knuckled fingers. "Go against the Elders?"

"Who will, no doubt, be in pursuit. By air," Shih said practically. "Even with a week's lead, they would find us."

"The Elders don't have a week." Temul would not reach for her blade. But oh, she wanted to. "The rumors are true. The Eldest Sister won't believe it. Frost shatter it, I don't want to believe it. But the comet is coming. Sozin means to use it." She scorched Gyate with a glance. "Everyone still here will burn."

"No." Gyate paled. "You're telling the truth. How can you be...?"

White brows rose, as Temul looked her over yet again. Not quite as young as she looked. Yet that shaven forehead still had no tattoos. "You're not a master." So how do you know I speak the truth?

"I just - I know." Her fingers wove into Shih's. "Not with everyone. But people who train with swords..." She shifted her shoulders, uncomfortable. "You breathe a different way. I know."

"So you believe me." One crushing weight off her shoulders. Another, far more deadly, gripped Temul's heart. If she'd been able to convince the Elders, if even one had listened - all the Temple could have vanished in mist of their own making, with no trail for Sozin to follow. Now? Agni, help us.

"Prepare for a long ride," Shih told Gyate. "Convince those you can. I have... some words to exchange with the lady."

Glancing worriedly between them, Gyate nodded. Leapt over and off the balcony railing, and soared away.

"If you're thinking of pulling some damn fool suicidal last stand," Temul growled, "don't."

From his start, she knew Shih'd been planning exactly that. "Those who do not leave will be helpless-"

"They're airbenders. They're not helpless." Temul paused, then drove home the knife. "And they don't love you."

Shih was pale around the lips, hand near his own hilt. "Those of Air are not allowed attachments to this world."

"Since when did being allowed stop anyone?" Temul said dryly. "She's pregnant again, you know."

Shih went white as milk.

Ha. Got him. Honestly, how could men be so blind to the signs? "Gyate needs you, Shih. Your daughter needs you. And the little one coming needs you. Keep that sword of yours sheathed. They need the assassin's stealth. Not his death."

The black phoenix tail whipped in negation. "I swore I would never be the demon again!"

"Not even to save them?" Temul kept her tone calm, no push of Fire behind it. A man had a right to his vows. "They'll need you, young man. Especially after I'm gone."

"After-" Shih cut himself off, gold eyes cold with calculation.

The Demon of Taku. Centuries of control, and Temul still felt the urge to shiver.

"Sozin will kill you."

Temul shrugged. "I know he'll try."

"He will. One way or another. He cannot afford to let such defiance stand. If you claim it is not disloyal to stand against this war, if your life shows that to be the truth..." Shih winced. "You will never keep this act secret. He will know you were here. And he will kill you."

All too likely. But she wasn't dead yet. "Which is why all of you will be leaving my ship before we reach Shu Jing," Temul said levelly. "With luck, friends will take you elsewhere. I don't know where. I refuse to know."

Shih inclined his head, acknowledging that grim wisdom. "Why?"

Spirits. Hadn't she asked herself that a thousand times, since a desperate boy and his dragon had landed on her ship?

"Because I'm all there is," Temul said at last. "I hate airbenders; I always have. But if I turn my back now, children will die." She lifted burning eyes. "Not while I still breathe."

My people will not be murderers. Not while I live...

Piandao's mansion faded back in, and Sokka gulped for air. It was a phantom. It wasn't real.

Though given what had happened last night, he hadn't tried to go anywhere near that flashing sword of Shih's. If it was half as sharp as the Kyoshi Island blade it looked like, he'd be lying on the floor bleeding to death while he was still trying to figure out what just happened.

Sokka shook his head, bumping fists with Toph to reassure him they were both still real. What did just happen? If Temul showed us the truth, then - people tried to warn the Air Temples? That can't be right.

"The problem with airbenders," Temul growled, padding around the protective stance of Katara and Aang, "is they don't listen."

"That's not true!" Katara protested. "He-" She bit her words off, alarmed.

"Oh, grow up," the ghost snorted; a weirdly solid sound, from mist and flickers of blue flame. "I've known what all of you are since the moment you set foot on this island. Avatar."

"That's right. I'm the Avatar." Aang took a step forward, gray eyes determined. "So you're not going to hurt anyone."

Piandao, Sokka noticed, had just quietly moved out of the line of fire. Oh, so not good.

Temul laughed.

So not a nice laugh, Sokka gulped, ice dancing down his spine. More a hungry laugh. As in, spirits, I can't believe he was this dumb. And now I get to squash him.

"You? Try to command me? You've had poor teachers, Avatar." Temul bent her head, just a little, misty gold boring into gray. "I am a Fire Nation ghost, little boy. A dragon-child. And you are no Fire Sage." Her smirk glinted with teeth. "Spit on a bonfire. You'd have better luck."

Sokka started. I know that smirk.

He'd seen it before. Lots of times. Just not on an ancient grandmother-ghost. That twitch of fingers, about to blaze sparks from white knuckles. The way lips pulled back, as if their owner was about to sink fangs into your throat. The sense of coiling, like an ice-viper about to strike. Those glinting, pale gold eyes...

"Stop scaring the boy, Temul," Piandao said firmly. "You're not going to hurt him."

"No." Temul's eyes were half-lidded; a viper gauging the distance to threat or prey. "No, not yet." She straightened, the sense of menace easing. "Listen to me, airbender. Do what all your Elders could not. Hear me."

"No! You listen to me!" Aang stepped almost into that ghost-blue flame, glaring back. "We didn't do anything to you! And I'm not Kyoshi! Stop blaming me for Sozin's war!"

"Sozin's war, is it?" The smirk flickered back. "Tell me, boy. Where is your bison now?"

Aang went red. "Don't you dare hurt Appa!"

Wind picking up. Sokka shielded his face with his hands, backing against Toph in case they needed a quick way out. Great. Now what can I do?

"Hurt him? Agni, boy, what do you think I am?" Disgust dripped from Temul's voice. "Just like all the other Temple brats. You never listen."

"Strangers have a hard time listening to what we don't say." Piandao's voice was scarily level, for a guy about a yard from a growing whirlwind. "Aang, calm down. Appa is fine. I have someone I trust on watch to make sure he doesn't stray too close to the village. Temul might frighten him; she has a history with your people. But she'd never hurt him."

"You knew who we were." Katara glared at the swordsman as the wind died down. "You lied to us!"

"You're wearing a flame in your hair," Piandao said dryly. "Who lied first?"

"That's different!"

"It always is, for the Water Tribes," the swordsman observed. "You don't believe any fight against outsiders is fair. Not unless you win." He leaned back. "To a certain extent, I respect that. A swordsman who passes up an advantage on the battlefield is foolish, and usually dead. When you fight to survive, there is no fair." He gestured around the room. "Try to see what I see. I am the lord of Shu Jing. The man responsible for protecting these people. And Prince Zuko's letter is rather explicit on the catastrophes that can happen when the Avatar decides to make himself obvious." A red-and-black shrug. "What would you do? Tell the whole truth? Or take the chance that by allowing yourself to seem deceived, trouble will pass your people by?"

Ouch, Sokka thought. And ouch again, for a different reason. "You kept the letter with the vendetta?"

"I wasn't going to use it!" Katara barely glanced away from Piandao. "How can you believe anything Zuko says? He's an exile."

"Exile, yes. Traitor? I think not." Piandao didn't glare back; just met her gaze, patient as the sea. "I know exactly why Prince Zuko was exiled. Do you?"

"Sparky's not the problem here." Toph stomped a foot on the floor, cocking her head to faint echoes. "I want to know what you meant about Appa."

Her finger wasn't quite pointing Temul's way, but the ghost didn't seem to mind. "Your beast is currently munching his way through one of Jinsuke's more hidden fields," Temul said dryly. "It'll take years to heal that damage."

Piandao sighed. "He'll have recompense from me-"

"Say that again after you go down and dig the results," Temul growled. "Fertile char-loam smashed down to bricks. Tons, that creature weighs! Mark my words; it will be a decade before that pasture is fit for any more than cutting straw!"

Piandao winced.

"You're worried about Appa walking on the ground?" Aang said in disbelief.

"Yeah," Sokka said, before Aang could add anything about that being ridiculous. "I think they are. Toph, you said the rocks here were different. What about the dirt?"

Cracking her knuckles, Toph led the way outside, stepping off stone into the biggest garden Sokka had seen outside Ba Sing Se. Worked her toes into the grass. "Huh." Beckoned over her shoulder. "Boots off, Twinkletoes. I think you need to feel this."

Doubtful, Aang stepped onto green, eyes closed. "It's earth."

"Yeah. But not like back home." Toph shuffled her feet, rippling grass like a tiny badger-mole lurked beneath. "There's salt in it, even all the way up here. And it's light. Like feathers next to wood." She bent to put a hand on the ground, squeezing and expanding. "Whoof. Doesn't bounce back much, does it?"

"Not easily," Piandao agreed. "I'm no farmer. But I know enough to know why we have roads, and ship as much as we can by water." He eyed Aang. "Before there was a Fire Lord, riding komodo-rhinos across another domain's fields was grounds to start a clan war."

"And your damn bison outweighs a dozen komodo-rhinos, and you landed on our grazing every year!" Temul was mist and fire and snapping eyes. "And every year, the same excuses. 'Oh, they didn't know! Oh, they're only children. Grass grows back; what do firebenders know about earth?' You never listened!" Blue blazed around her. "That, and all the damn lies!"

"We don't lie!" Aang shot back.

"You don't lie to each other!" Temul snarled. "You knew damn well you could lie to us! And all of your outcasts did!"

"Outcasts?" Aang's eyes were round as melons. "We didn't have outcasts!"

"So you don't know." Temul's voice seemed to slither in Sokka's ears, scales sliding along his throat. "A master airbender, the Avatar, and your own people didn't think enough of you to tell you the truth." She stepped into Piandao's shadow, gaining solidity out of the sun. "This truth I know, from over two centuries dealing with your kind. Every year your Elders decided who could still live among you... and who could not. The liars, the cheaters, the killers - oh, they were not true Air Nomads. Or so your Elders would say, before they'd herd away the bison and dump the outcast off the mountain. On the rest of us."

Oh, man. Sokka swallowed hard, heart somewhere around his ankles.

"Your people were too noble to kill," Temul went on. "Too pure. Execute a criminal? Oh no; you'd only ban them from ever speaking to you again. And make them go away. And when they hurt one of us? When they murdered one of us, and we had to kill them?" She clicked her tongue, gold eyes glittering. "Oh, what horrible, violent people firebenders are. How uncivilized. How monstrous." Lips curled in a snarl. "If Sozin had wanted your Elders alone, I would have been first behind him!"

"But - Sozin was a monster. And you saved people," Aang protested. "How can you say killing airbenders was wrong, and then you wanted to kill the Elders - I don't understand you!"

"The first intelligent thing you've said all day." Temul hmped, fading. "And you never will understand, if you cannot listen."

Aang stared at where she'd been. "...I thought listening was earthbending."

"The way you think of it, I suspect it is." Piandao glanced at his empty shadow. "That's a problem, for outsiders dealing with the great names. Most of our lords grow up speaking High Court. In that tongue, there are two words that mean listen. There's znu, which is the listen you're used to. And then there's kansatsusuru."

"I'm going to guess that one isn't," Sokka sighed. "So what's that mean to anybody who isn't clipping their nails with rocks?"

Piandao lifted a brow at that. "Hard to translate. Dragon-words generally are."

"Dragons don't talk," Aang said firmly.

And Toph twitched at that. Sokka narrowed his eyes, remembering what she'd told his dad on a beach weeks ago. Zuko had told her things; about his loyalties, about the Fire Nation. What else had he told her?

"Not to you," Piandao agreed. "To us? They had ways. Kansatsusuru... the best words, I think, would be watch closely. Stop talking, and look at what's going on. See and feel the movement around you. Where it is. Where it was. Where it's going." He smiled ruefully. "I can imagine generations of firebenders, pointing at the ground and yelling at nomads to listen. What a mess."

"Watch the fire," Sokka said, half to himself. "See what it does. Gah! No wonder we can't talk to you guys."

"There aren't many in the Fire Nation who would believe the Avatar came to talk." Piandao glanced over them all, face sober. "Not to them, and certainly not to Fire Lord Ozai."

"But I do," Aang insisted. "I don't want to fight anybody. There's got to be a better way. The war's got to stop. If the Fire Lord makes you fight, and I stop him..." He shook all over, like Appa shedding water. "Why did you let her say things like that? Why did she show us stuff that didn't happen?"

Piandao's look reminded Sokka of Pakku about to lecture on the minuscule chance of his current student beating a sea slug. "That was a phantom of the past, Aang. It did happen. You saw what she saw."

"Then she didn't know what she saw," Katara said firmly. "Gran-Gran told us about airbenders. If someone had warned them before the Fire Nation attacked, they would have - well, they would have done something!" She crossed her arms. "Besides. Demon of Taku? Why would an Air nun hide someone like that?" She shuddered. "General Iroh's just called a dragon, and he broke into Ba Sing Se! How do you even get a name like that?"

"By killing the Fire Lord's enemies," Piandao answered. "Suddenly, violently, and without a trace. That's what onmitsu do." The look he turned on Katara was oddly sad. "You might be surprised to know what names you have in the Army's formal reports. That blast at the Northern Air Temple was... impressively deadly."

Sokka winced. Katara paled.

"We had to," Aang said, shaken. "They were going to kill people in the Temple!"

"Yes, they were. You had every right." Piandao looked reflective. "Shih thought he was in the right, at Taku. It was what he'd been trained for from birth. Yet he was one of the first to realize what Sozin really was. So he vanished, rather than be ordered to kill again."

"I don't buy it." Katara's eyes narrowed. "If he was such a great assassin, why not just kill Sozin? He could have stopped the war right there." She nodded toward Toph. "If it was real, she would have told us."

"I don't know," the earthbender admitted. "I saw it. Like the Painted Lady. I couldn't feel it. I don't know who's telling the truth. All I know is, there's salt in the soil. All the way up here."

"So maybe she was telling the truth about Avatar Kyoshi. That doesn't mean she was about anything else." She shot a dark look at Piandao. "I don't know how the Fire Nation got to the temples, but it must have been something nobody saw coming. If Temul did warn them - she should have tried harder."

Piandao, Sokka noted, really looked like he had a headache. "Oh, she did warn them."

"You weren't there-"

"I didn't have to be," the swordsman cut Katara off. "Sozin's Agni Kai is recorded in our history - along with Temul's so-called treachery. But there's one thing that isn't recorded; that you didn't see last night, or here and now. Temul knew exactly who was going to be helping the survivors from your temples. And she took that to her grave to save them." He turned a cool look on Aang. "I've heard you knew him. His name... was Kuzon of Byakko."

Katara started to say something. Stopped. Swallowed.

"Phantoms chill your soul, even if you don't feel it," Piandao said plainly. "You should be safe to rest here."

Silent as shadow, he stepped back inside the mansion.

"I guess he's okay," Aang said brightly. "Kind of weird, but... Sokka? Where are you going?"

"To apologize." Sokka headed for the back door.

"Why?"

Sokka stopped. Sighed, and wondered why parts of his life just refused to make sense anymore. "Maybe you don't believe Temul. But Piandao does. And he helped us."

The swordsman wasn't hard to find. Sokka entered one of the better lit rooms to the subtle scent of ink, and the shush of a sleeve as Piandao painted.

Lump in his throat, he knelt.

"Is there something you need?"

"More like something I have to say." And even this was weird. You didn't kneel on ice. Not if you liked your knees. "People... people are complicated."

The brush moved on; slow, steady motion. "So they are."

"Aang likes things simple."

"I see."

"He's kind of under a lot of pressure," Sokka said wryly. "Save the world, stop a war, try not to get killed?"

"Everyone has to save their own world." A pause, as the brush dipped in ink. "Some of us succeed more than others."

There's just one world, Sokka almost said. Aang's problems are kind of bigger than ours.

But he didn't. If Temul was mad because Aang wasn't paying attention, well... He was no Avatar. But he could at least try to figure out a lady who'd died rather than let Sozin-

Oh.

"Temul didn't hate airbenders," Sokka said, working it out. "She was mad at them. She wanted them to leave her people alone. But she didn't hate them." Like Zuko doesn't hate my sister. Temul looked just like he did; steamy breath, snapping sparks, the works. "That's the world she wanted to save. Someplace where maybe you didn't like the guys on the next mountain over, but you weren't trying to kill them."

Another deliberate stroke of black across paper. "Did she succeed?"

Sokka thought about that. "No. But... she kind of didn't lose, either."

The brush stopped. "Go on."

Oh boy. Sokka's mouth was dry. He tried not to gulp too loudly. "She died. And she's stuck here as a ghost; Gran-Gran always said that was a bad thing. But she died doing what she wanted. And people remember her. As long as somebody remembers there's a right thing to do... then it's not hopeless. No matter what."

"Very true." Piandao rinsed his brush in water. "Kuzon might have given up a long time ago if it hadn't been for Temul. He was lord of Byakko at fifteen, his nation had erupted in war against the world, and most of his family was dead. All he had was his betrothed, his dragon, and a very prickly ghost." A slight glance toward him. "She'll talk about him on stormy nights. She's cursed him for letting the onmitsu get the drop on him so young, but I've never once heard her wish she hadn't listened to him."

"Listened to-" Sokka's jaw dropped. "He got her to warn the Western Temple?"

"He didn't have time to stop," Piandao nodded. "Not if he hoped to get to the Southern Temple before the comet. So he found the closest ally he could." Gray eyes weighed him. "So you believe she did warn them."

Sokka chewed on that. "When Aang took us to the temple, he said there was no way anybody could get up there without a sky bison. But the firebenders did. If the nuns thought that too... um. Aang's kind of good at ignoring things he doesn't want to hear." He thought a little harder. "Yeah, I think I do. It fits, you know? Katara... well, she thinks Aang's great, so all the airbenders had to be. But Aang keeps saying they didn't have evil people, they just didn't, and that's - people aren't like that. Not real people." Oh. Oh, man. "And if that's what they did, throw out people who lied so you had to deal with them... Aang pulled something like that on Zuko. He went ballistic."

"The Avatar..." Piandao clapped a hand to his forehead. "That letter begins to make much more sense."

Sokka rolled his eyes. "Yeah, well, it'd probably be crystal clear if you ever met the jerkbender-"

"Oh, I have."

"...Um." Sokka tried for a grin. "Really?"

"He was a six-year-old brat who couldn't swim, but tried anyway," Piandao recalled. "I always thought Azula dared him into the river, but Ursa wouldn't hear it... I had to pound the breath back into him. If Temul hadn't told me where he was, we'd have been short one young prince."

"You taught him how to swim?" Sokka said, incredulous. "Do you have any idea what he did?"

"No." Piandao looked intrigued. "What?"

"He followed turtle-seals into the North Pole, and..." Er. Maybe he shouldn't mention the whole Spirit Oasis thing, for the fishes' sake. After all, not too many people knew there were special koi fish up there; Zuko and Iroh weren't talking, and Zhao was kind of gone...

Zhao.

Gone or not, he still hated the firebender. Admiral Zhao had gotten to the Oasis - and the Moon - before they could all get back from Zuko's little detour. If Zuko hadn't shown up, Aang would have been there-

If Zuko hadn't shown up... Iroh wouldn't have been there.

Yue wouldn't have known she could save the Moon. The Northern Water Tribe would have been destroyed. And without waterbending, how could Aang ever be the Avatar?

No. Think hard. It's worse than that.

If Zuko hadn't pulled his climb through ice stunt, Aang would have been there. Meditating. With his spirit somewhere else.

Katara said his eyes were glowing. He was in the Avatar State. And Zhao already knew he couldn't hang onto Aang. You knew Zhao; bigger temper than his sideburns. If he'd found Aang helpless, he would have...

Sokka buried his face in his hands. It didn't happen. Aang's alive. You've got to make sure he stays that way.

"Sokka?" Piandao had risen from his writing table, brows drawn down in concern.

Sokka shook his head. "I think... Zuko screwed up, and saved the world."

Piandao laughed.

Laughing's good. I can still save something here. "I don't know if I can say I'm sorry for my friends," Sokka said. "I'm not even sure it means the same thing to the Fire Nation. Zuko didn't seem to think it did, not when Aang..." Think. If listen means watch carefully - damn. "Of course he didn't," Sokka sighed. "Aang says he's sorry, then goes and does what he's going to do anyway."

"And would that be accepted in the Water Tribes?" Piandao asked.

It stung - but he didn't sound sarcastic. Sokka hoped. "Not for long. We're all stuck together in igloos for the worst part of the winter. There's nowhere to get away from people seeing you're not doing what you said-" He cut himself off. "Islands. Ships. You can't get away either."

"Not the way nomads could," the swordsman agreed.

"And all we do now is travel," Sokka groaned. "A month in Ba Sing Se drove him nuts. A day in our village, and he was out tripping over booby-traps in forbidden ships. Aang is never going to sit still long enough to get you guys."

Piandao nodded. "That sounds like a problem."

"And I'm supposed to be the idea guy." Sokka knuckled his head, hoping to jar loose a plan.

"Idea guy?" Piandao arched an eyebrow.

"Katara's the last waterbender of our tribe. Toph's the greatest earthbender in the world. Aang? He's the Avatar." Sokka shrugged. "I come up with ideas. Sometimes they work. Outside of that, I've got Boomerang." Touching the weapon behind his back finally jarred something loose. "Wait. Drowning, Zuko - you're the guy who uses chi to fight!"

Piandao leaned back a little, head raised with a skeptical tilt. "Who told you that?"

"Zuko," Sokka admitted. "He said I should - um. Never mind, we already screwed up, I should get everybody out of here before Aang tells Temul she didn't see what she did..." Darn it, he had to ask. "Is General Iroh right? Did waterbenders really use swords once?"

"The art of the sword belongs to no one nation," Piandao stated. "That said, yes. The Kyoshi Warriors favor the katana, but the longsword is still taught on Kyoshi Island. Temul learned from them long ago. She's been one of my teachers over the years."

"She taught us about ground fires when that meteor came down," Sokka recalled. "Do you think, maybe... no, she doesn't want anything to do with Aang."

"You're not Aang." Piandao gave him a speculative look. "Swordsmanship requires kansatsusuru, and you do need that. But chi... that requires a living teacher." He waved toward Boomerang. "Show me."

Chapter 52

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Kuei peered up at the stone ceiling, watching the Dai Li and Amisi coordinate on top of pillars they'd raised to reach overhanging stone. "So, if I have this right... she's going to bend sand into glass? I didn't know anyone could do that."

"It has to be the right kind of sand." Eshe watched just as intently, scratching behind Bosco's ear when the bear whuffed at her. "And you have to have sunlight. If the Dai Li hadn't made openings all the way to the surface, this wouldn't work."

Openings his agents had been very dubious about making, even if they could reinforce the stone so the ceiling was even stronger than before. They were fairly sure the Fire Nation wouldn't search this area of the city for tiny holes; they were not absolutely sure.

But they were willing to try this anyway. At least half the refugees belowground were of the blood of Fire, and even if they'd chosen Kuei as their lord, they missed sunlight.

I miss it, too, Kuei admitted to himself. The green crystals gave light, but it wasn't the same. And that wasn't just his opinion. All their elder healers were adamant that the children couldn't stay underground forever. Growing bones needed light.

Kuei had confirmed that in his own books, and their fledgling earth-healers added a final seal of agreement. It wasn't just the children. Without the sun, everyone's health was slipping.

Eshe's people, Guanyin bless them, had an answer.

"Airbenders who live underground," Kuei said to himself. "No wonder no one ever found you."

"Air and sandbenders." Eshe gave him a look like a sparrowkeet considering the merits of more seeds versus flight. "Our caverns aren't like this. The sandstorms' full force never enters, but sometimes the wind howls down the chambers like a thunderstorm, and you can see stones glow blue in the darkness, casting sparks to any fur..." She looked into memory, gray eyes wide with wonder.

"That sounds exciting," Kuei ventured. It was the most he'd heard of the Touzaikaze homeland since they'd arrived. "But are you supposed to be telling me this? Your people have kept their secrets a long time."

"Is that why you didn't ask?"

Sometimes, Kuei was really glad he wore glasses. If he'd stared right into those earnest gray eyes without any shield... well, he wasn't sure what he would have done. She was just - well - pretty didn't fit, not really. The noble ladies of Ba Sing Se were pretty. Looking at Eshe was like sneaking to a palace window to watch a thunderstorm roll in. Tasting the wind, and knowing it came from somewhere else. Seeing the gray slant of a downpour far across the city, long before the rain could dampen palace stone... "Your eyes are like the rain."

...And maybe the earth could just swallow him now? Please? Where was a Dai Li when he needed one? "I mean, I'm sorry, I know the sandbenders don't like rain, you call it dead water, I'm sorry-"

"I like rain."

"-Because living water is wells, and that's- you do?" Kuei blinked at her, feeling like a cat-owl caught out at noon.

"Rain feeds our river, Sarasvati," Eshe nodded. "It just rains very far away."

"...You have a river?"

"She comes from the mountains, far away." Eshe sketched her tale in the air with flicking fingers. "Our stories say the mountain trappers called it the Ghost River, because it vanished into the earth. But a long time ago, Ancestress Kamut wondered if that was true. Was the water taken by the spirits, or did it only travel where we could not follow? So she took her bison to the thirsty earth, and felt for water."

Kuei blinked. Took off his glasses to polish them with the sleeve of his robe. Looked at Eshe again, wondering if he'd read those motions of flowing hands correctly. "She was a waterbender?"

"She was a snow-child from the North," Eshe told him. "The stories say a long time ago, things were different there."

"Different." Kuei shook his head at the magnitude of that understatement.

"It took years, but she traced the river under the sands to where it surfaced again, in the Caverns of the Winds," Eshe went on. "The river carves the caverns, and the stone protects the river from the sand's thirst. It's beautiful. But it was guarded."

Kuei watched her hands flicker through the ancient thorn-mazes of protection. "By a spirit?"

"We call her the river, but her heart beats with the mist beading stone," Eshe nodded. "As I live hidden, so will you, she said. Bring me tales of the world beyond stone, and I will be content. And so we did." Her hands sketched a flight of arrows, loosed. "So when the White Wind swept over the world, we had a home to hide in."

"The White Wind." Kuei put together fragments of lore, and frowned. "Violent Air Nomads. That's still hard to imagine."

"So are the tornado, the sandstorm, hard to imagine," Eshe observed. "I've heard of the hurricanes that strike to the west, and I'm not sure I can imagine them. Storms so large you could not fly across them in a day and night; so fierce, you'd be a fool to try. The White Wind would come, and raid, and burn what they did not want, to spread more grasslands for their herds." Gray eyes were sad. "They pierced the hands and feet of benders who opposed them, and roped them to their bison as living shields."

"Oma and Shu." Kuei shuddered. "Who could fight that?"

"The Fire Nation."

Kuei thought of that, and a train crashed into Ba Sing Se's harbor, and the general his Dai Li said had held the city under siege for six hundred days. "...Oh."

"And you," Eshe nodded. "When we saw what you had done here, I knew our shamans were right. That you were a true king, who cared for his people."

"By killing them?" Kuei said bleakly. Quan and Bon told him what the Dai Li were doing on his orders. And their results. Though the agents fiercely insisted that reports wait until after he'd had some sleep. They refused to wake him for anything short of an actual emergency.

"And I hate to say it, sir, but people dying in Fire Nation reprisals is not an emergency," Agent Quan had bluntly stated. "If there's anything we can do about it, my agents are already acting. If there's not... I'm sorry, your majesty. There are only so many of us. And we still have to keep the spirits to a low roar, or everyone might die."

"Yes," Eshe said now. "I am a healer. Sometimes, to save the body, the flesh must be cut. When you act, despite them - you do as my elders say the Fire-archers did ages past, when they shot. You will not be stopped by violence toward the innocent. That is the only way to save lives in the future."

Kuei swallowed dryly. "Agent Bon said... something like that."

"I know it's cold comfort, sir," Bon had told him a few days ago, after a particularly bloody night, "but we're starting to see some interesting patterns in the Fire Army responses. A few of their officers are keeping the deaths to a minimum. They're executing saboteurs, absolutely - but they're doing everything they can to avoid the decimation orders. There's a Captain Sanya overseeing the trains by the Wall, a Master Sergeant Yakume in the dockside of the Outer Ring..."

It was unsettling, having the names of the sane men among your enemies. On the one hand he was glad to know even Fire soldiers could still be human. On the other... part of him had to wonder if they should be his first targets. If his people knew that every red uniform was an enemy...

He was horrified that he could even think that. But he had to. Ba Sing Se was bleeding. He had to make the right choices. Even if... they were horrible choices.

No. No, I won't order that. Those men are trying to be human in the middle of hell. I won't see them killed for that.

Instead, he was going to gamble. And pray. It was an awful gamble. It made him sick just thinking about it. But he had to try.

Treat my people like human beings, and I'll leave you alone.

The object, after all, wasn't to wipe out the Fire Army. It was to tie them down. Harass them. Make holding Ba Sing Se so costly in men and supplies, the Fire Lord didn't have forces to throw against the Avatar.

And they could do plenty of that in districts where the officers were vicious madmen.

"I hate people dying," Kuei blurted out. "I've only known we were at war a few months now. And I hate it." He winced. "It sounds so small. Everyone else grew up knowing there was a war..." Something green moved near the ceiling; Kuei glanced up, saw an agent had just shifted a little, and let out a breath of relief. "Everyone except the Avatar. He seems to be a happy young boy, but - it must be awful for him."

"If it's hard for you, it must be worse for a child?" Eshe had a glimmer of a smile.

"Well - yes?" Kuei hazarded. "I don't really know much about children."

"Sometimes they can be more resilient than adults," Eshe informed him. "I had to be, when the Owl drove us from the cool river to the sands. We still had the oasis where the river drained, we weren't as destitute as some of the tribes, but it was hard. Some of us died."

"Why?" Kuei wondered. "He's a knowledge spirit. Why would he try to destroy your tribe?"

"Those who speak to the wind say something promised him great knowledge, knowledge no human had possessed in uncounted ages, if he would let us wither in the sands," Eshe stated. "But we would not die. The wind told us where the locust-beetles would fall; the sand where the water hid, so we could draw it out. We did not die."

Her knuckles were white. Daring, Kuei took her hand. "I'm glad I helped. I just... I wish I'd known enough to do it before."

"Earth is strong." Eshe didn't pull away. "But a badger-mole alone can't see very far." She nodded toward the ceiling. "It doesn't have to be that way."

Amisi made a motion like leaves swirling in a hot wind, sand spiraling up and out of sight...

Light.

Kuei took off his glasses and rubbed his eyes, thinking it had to be his imagination. Little prickles of gold in green shadows, like sparks in a spirit-haunted night. And then more, and more; light dappling down like sun through a thick canopy of trees.

It wasn't bright. It felt like standing in deep shade, without the full warmth of noon. But it was sunlight.

Whuffling approval, Bosco lumbered forward, gold and shadow playing over his fur. Flopped into the middle of sun-spots, and rumbled a happy groan.

"Kamut left us water's gift," Eshe said proudly, as awed onlookers pressed forward, letting light sink into thirsty skin. "Waterbenders know they can change what water is, not just its shape. And even in earth and air - so can we."

"Waterbenders melt ice," Kuei muttered, fitting the pieces together. "She can melt sand... spirits. No wonder you're not afraid of the Fire Nation attacking the desert." If his Dai Li's pit traps were effective in Ba Sing Se, how much more would glass-ceilinged pits be in the endless dunes? "I know an earthbender who'd love to learn what you do. I wish I could send one of you to teach her. The Avatar needs every advantage he can get..."

The Dai Li were coming down now, tired but satisfied. Agent Quan spoke a few words to some of the first earthbenders to come down with them, then nodded, and made his way through the delighted crowd to his king. "I'm still not sure how she did it, your majesty. It was as if she were spinning the sand, like koala-sheep wool." Shaking his head, he glanced up at the ceiling again. "But it's solid work. It'll hold. And I have to say, having daylight down here will make our work much easier." He grimaced. "There are too many spirits who feed on darkness. And on our hate for it."

"I remember," Kuei whispered. He didn't remember much; he'd only been four. But he knew. It was one of the reasons he'd let Long Feng have such a free hand. He knew the Dai Li were needed.

I shouldn't have done that. I should have asked more questions. Pressed harder. Asked you to tell me...

But if I did - would you have answered? Or just found another way to get what you wanted?

He didn't know. It hurt, not knowing.

Eshe reached out, but didn't quite reclaim his grasp. "What's wrong?"

Oma and Shu. Where to start? "A few weeks ago, Princess Azula killed one of my most trusted advisors," Kuei said quietly. "He'd betrayed me to use her. He'd been betraying me for years. But I still miss him."

"And now you have an alliance with his killer's brother," Eshe nodded. "So you wonder if you've betrayed him, too." At Quan's studiously neutral look, she added, "I am a healer, Agent Quan. Flesh won't heal if the mind is not willing. Betray the living, and we know they may forgive us. Betray the dead?" She shook her head.

The agent pondered that, frowning. "He was your advisor, sir. But he was our leader. I still don't understand why he thought he could use the Fire Princess and not have her turn on him. Girl or not, she's Fire royalty, and tales say those nobles are vicious as a nest of scorpion-vipers. But before she came, he led us to protect Ba Sing Se, and you. That's why you made an alliance with Prince Zuko, isn't it, sir? To protect our people." Quan lowered his head, casting his gaze into thoughtful shadow. "The leader I trusted would never have been betrayed by that."

It ought to help. Really. And maybe it would, someday. But Kuei still remembered being four years old in the dark, with the Dai Li guarding him until dawn. He'd trusted Long Feng.

Now I have to trust myself. Amaya never let me down. I have to believe Lee won't, either.

The prince had kept his word so far. The rumors kept getting wilder - he really didn't think Zuko's rag-tag fleet had fought off a swarm of kraken-orcas - but the facts they could sift out of the stories seemed clear. Zuko was heading north, picking up war refugees on the way. And the Fire Navy seemed to be tripping over itself figuring out what to do about it.

What was not rumor was the chilling message passed to the Dai Li by someone they knew gathered information for the Fire Nation. A very thick stack of a message, most of it in Professor Tingzhe Wen's verifiable hand.

Zuko's addendum to that was short, but enough to give Kuei nightmares.

Eleven hundred years ago, Avatar Yangchen and her yāorén were murdered. We found the volcano the Face-Stealer used to do it. We're going to stop him.

Half the world away. There was nothing Ba Sing Se could do. Kuei knew that. I just wish I knew what was happening! "Agent Quan. Is there any news?"

"We're working on it, sir," Quan said sympathetically. "It's not always easy to get people past Princess Azula's agents. Though whoever Prince Zuko's made contact with on the Fire Nation side, they're good. They've got some of the most bizarre ways of getting information through..." He craned his head to look over the crowd. "Agent Bon's made it back."

"I'm surprised you could get him to leave." Kuei smiled a little, watching Amisi being cheered by the crowd. "He takes looking after me pretty seriously. And I thought... well, I'm probably wrong..."

"You're not." Eshe's smile was bittersweet. "That's why he's been taking more missions above. He knows his duty. Just as Amisi knows hers, to you and our tribe."

Oh. That made his breath catch, in a way all the pomp and danger and spirits in his life as the Earth King couldn't. This was two brave people, people he knew, putting duty ahead of their own hearts. Because of him.

No. not me. Because Ba Sing Se needs the Earth King. Kuei sighed. "I told your Uncle Runihura that any alliance with the Touzaikaze does not depend on... um. Personal arrangements."

"He doesn't believe you," Eshe shrugged. "In the desert, all ties come down to blood."

"Then he didn't listen when I told him of Ba Sing Se," Kuei said firmly. "The royal family is the heart of Ba Sing Se. If my parents had been miserable, it would have hurt the whole city. I need a wife who can face the spirits. But someone unwilling? I can't do that. I won't."

"You should tell her that." Eshe's eyes searched his, looking for... spirits, he wished he knew. He'd give it to her, if he could. "She needs to hear it from you."

"I will," Kuei promised. He noticed Quan was still standing there, studiously looking anywhere else. Though the faint smile on the agent's face said he wasn't above listening. "So where should I look to find you a wife, Agent Quan? I have to admit, after hearing Healer Eshe's tales of her ancestress, I'm tempted to forward a letter to Prince Zuko asking to open diplomatic relations with the Northern Water Tribe. Healer Amaya can't be the only adventurous soul up there."

Quan blinked. Twice. "...Sir?"

Eshe hid her giggles behind her hand. "Now you can walk in our sandals for a while."

Quan glanced between them. Straightened his shoulders, and peered over the crowd again. "I think Agent Bon has something... I'll be right back, your majesty."

"I think that was a strategic retreat," Kuei observed, trying not to giggle himself. Oh, the look on Quan's face.

"He's very focused," Eshe agreed. But her eyes still danced. "You're right, you know. Amisi is like the drifting sands; someone like her might wear him down, but neither of them would be happy. Agent Quan needs someone much more traditional."

"Now there's an idea," Kuei said half to himself, walking over to scratch Bosco where the bear lolled in the light. His friend leaned into it, groaning with just the right bit scratched. "Throw all the noble young ladies at my Dai Li instead of me... No, really!" he added, as Eshe wrinkled her nose. "Maybe most of the nobles wouldn't be interested. But some might."

"Your majesty!" Agent Bon hurried through the crowd, grinning fiercely. "You don't want to know how we got this, but - there's news!"

Kuei took the feather-light pale silk; rolled up no thicker than his thumb, yet unfolding into a long skein of inked characters. By now he could recognize Shirong's strokes, sharp as a stone-block print.

Earth King Kuei, 52nd in the royal line of Ba Sing Se, may this find you in good health and spirits,

Sir. Let me humbly remind you one more time to consider your precise wording when dealing with the Fire Nation. Otherwise, you may be... surprised. It's not always a bad surprise, but it's generally alarming.

I'm certain you recall the area negotiated, and that the ledgers of the Earth Kingdom note it as almost entirely unpopulated, aside from the refugees in the Northern Air Temple. In this letter I'll cover some of the reasons why it's unpopulated, and why I believe you made a very fair bargain. In short, sir - between the climate and the wildlife, you'd have to be crazy to want to live up here.

And that doesn't even get into the volcano.

Let me tell you about Asagitatsu...

Earth shoes unnaturally steady on the pitched ground, Shirong gave Langxue a hand up to the ledge the four of them had picked as a good place to halt and assess the terrain. "So that's Asagitatsu?"

"Looks like," Saoluan shrugged, still catching her breath from the scramble as she eyed the black rock mound near the head of the ragged valley. Wisps of steam hung around it, source of the warm winds that funneled up to the Northern Air Temple, but as yet there was no hint of sulfur in the air. The warrior planted hands on her hips, tilting her head back for a good look. "I thought it would be bigger."

Zuko gauged the low cone with too many decades' experience murmuring in the back of his head. Low being a relative term in this spine of mountains; four thousand feet if it was an inch, yet just a foothill compared to the fourteen-thousand-foot peaks ranked around the Air Temple. If it hadn't been for the vast valley cradling it, as if someone had scooped a thirty-mile hole in the flesh of the earth, you wouldn't even have known it was there.

They're not from the Fire Nation. They don't know.

"Do you want to give them the bad news, or should I?" Langxue said wryly.

A deep breath, and Saoluan scowled at them. "What bad news?"

"Don't be too hard on them. I missed it the first time I was here," Zuko admitted. Peered eastward, where black specks of gliders fluttered over the Air Temple's peak. "On the edge of disaster, and not a clue it's coming."

"They know we're here." Shirong plucked absently at a brown hem, obviously missing his uniform. "The reports said they had bombs?"

"Mostly annoyance stuff. A few dangerous ones." Zuko squinted at the Temple, recalling everything he could of the Mechanist, his band of refugees, and how both might have met Aang's little group. "Aang left them here, in his people's home. He must think they're good people. Which means they don't use force except as a last option. They probably hope we'll see them up there and just go away."

Fists on her hips, Saoluan eyed him. "You don't think much of peaceful people, do you?"

"I don't think much of a man who lets his people think they're peaceful, while he designs war machines for the Fire Nation," Zuko said harshly. "Every day they were up there he lied to them all. Even his son." He shook his head, tamping down the pulse of fury. "Teo's crippled. He's not stupid. What did Ji think he'd do when he found out the truth?"

Langxue grimaced. Saoluan and Shirong traded glances, the warrior making a go ahead motion. "He probably didn't want to think that far ahead," the agent said plainly. "No one wants their children to think less of them."

Zuko raised the brow he had left.

"No one sane," Shirong allowed. "But I see your point. A man willing to lie about that isn't the most trustworthy neighbor. Much less a good partner in an alliance." He inclined his head. "I don't like it either. We'll watch him." He gestured at the steaming cone. "So what are we missing?"

"I guess it's easier to see if you know the depth soundings," Zuko said wryly.

Langxue snickered. "Fire Nation."

"Huh?" Zuko tilted his head, befuddled.

"If you ever need to hide again, don't let anyone ask you for directions," Langxue elaborated. "Everybody else does flat maps."

"Flat maps?" Shirong said carefully.

"I know," Zuko grumbled. "You'd think captured enemy maps would be useful. But no. They've got roads and buildings and camp locations, sure, but elevations? Hah! You have to send a surveyor with every scout party; 'a little steep' covers everything from a slight incline to mountain-goat trails..." Belatedly, he saw Shirong and Saoluan's dark looks; the warrior's sharp-edged, while the agent's had more of an air of bemused tolerance. "...Sorry."

"Sometimes you have a rather unique perspective," Shirong said judiciously. "How steep it is really makes that much difference?" He frowned, thinking. "Oh. Of course it does. You can't move troops and supplies with earthbending. It has to be engines, or muscle power." He looked around the encircling peaks again. "But what does how high mountains are have to do with how deep the water is? Much less a volcano."

"Let me show you." Langxue streamed some water out of his waterskin, forming a rough, elongated bowl of water that froze with a gentle push.

"Lopsided," Saoluan pointed out.

"It's supposed to be," Zuko put in. "Look. There's the cliff walls around this valley." He brushed the highest edge. "Here's the growing cone." A lump of ice in the middle, a bit of fog drifting off it in the summer sun. "High tide is here," he etched a line midpoint on the slanted bowl's rim. "And... stretch this out a little more, right... here's the deep harbor, where we set the fires. And this rim all the way out here is that shallow part Captain Jee was nervous about getting over. Our draft's a lot less than that, but if another big ship had gone down here and we didn't know about it - might have gotten sticky."

Shirong stared at the ice. Whipped his head up to look at the rough, half-oval shrub-spotted stone wall they'd climbed halfway up. Down again, at the loamy, ashy soil at his feet, obviously the result of centuries of greenery. "...No."

"Oh, yes," Zuko smirked.

"But - that - you didn't!"

"I did tell you," Zuko said wryly.

"On a volcano!" Shirong shouted. "You said on! This is not on! This is the utter and complete opposite of on!"

"With something this big?" Zuko shrugged. "It really doesn't matter."

"You... gah!" Shirong flung up his hands, sputtering to the skies.

"So... we're not living on a volcano?" Saoluan said warily.

Pointing to the cone, Langxue's grin would have terrified a leopard-shark. "That's not Asagitatsu." He waved his hand at the massive stone bowl that cupped the valley and harbor, as if a monstrous dragon had raked the mountains to let the sea surge in. "This is Asagitatsu."

Saoluan swallowed, gripping her swordhilt. "I picked a heck of a day not to bring a drink..."

"Sis?" Langxue lost the grin. "Are you okay?"

Two strides, and Saoluan crushed him in a hug. "I'm going to keep it together. I will. Just - tell me something. Because I'm not brave. Not with something this big." She eased her grip. "This mountain, this... thing. It killed an Avatar. It killed you. Tell me we've got a chance."

"We've got a chance," Langxue obliged. "Maybe a better one than I thought." He glanced at Zuko. "This place is watching you."

Huh. He'd thought he felt prickly. But he'd also thought he knew why. Stepping to the edge, Zuko pitched his voice to carry. "And I thought that was the lieutenant."

"Not funny, sir," drifted up from a particularly thick patch of brush.

"Didn't you tell Captain Jee," Shirong started.

"Yes. I told him I'd be fine," Zuko sighed. "I told Uncle I'd be fine. It's not like I'm the one who got taken prisoner by the Earth Army. I had to track him down, and I did. One komodo-rhino, and me, in the middle of the Earth Kingdom. I think I can handle a day hike with some experienced benders..." Wait. He'd heard that faint buzz before-

Rattle-viper!

Blaze, loop, snatch-

His flame-net lifted out a diamond-patterned rope of muscle, scales gleaming red-brown and iridescent blue. Teruko's pale face was visible through seared leaves as he tugged the creature toward him. "Sir? What is that?"

"Trappers call it a rattle-viper." Zuko brought it up to the ledge, cursing himself for an idiot. "Damn it, I knew I was forgetting something... Get up here, Lieutenant. Sometimes they're not alone."

Armor barely creaking, Teruko scrambled up onto their ledge. Joined the rest of them gathered close, but not too close, to what he'd caught. "That's not a snake!"

"You know that, and I know that. Try telling the locals." Zuko eyed the six stubby legs along the long coil of scales; more clawed flippers than anything else. "Most of the time they're underground. I think they hunt pika-squirrels. But they like to warm up on big rocks like this. Or sometimes branches, if they're close to the ground."

Teruko looked back at the thicket she'd been hiding in. Winced. Rounded on him. "Sir..."

"I forgot!" Zuko said defensively. "It tried to kill me, it didn't; it was a few years ago. I forgot. They don't want to bite you, Lieutenant. They just get confused. Hear that?" The blue-patterned tail thrashed against binding flames; a buzz like a cricket-mouse, but deeper. "That's, you're annoying me, back off or I'll bite."

"Do I want to know exactly how you know that?" Shirong had a familiar bemused look, as though he could already guess the answer.

He wanted to sink into the stone, or burst into flames. Given he was still pinning down an annoyed rattle-viper, he did neither. "It was only a few months after I was exiled," Zuko said stiffly. "I didn't know how bad my left eye was then. I didn't see it." He crouched down, pointing with his free right hand. "And he didn't really see you, Lieutenant. See those eyes? Blind as a badger-mole. All he knew was that you were big and warm. He thought you were going to eat him."

"Don't tempt me," Teruko grinned. "We could bring him back for Asahi."

Zuko smirked. "She's probably hunting them out of the landing right now."

"Ostrich-horses eat snakes?" Saoluan eyed them, waiting for the joke.

"They love snakes," Shirong told her. "We have to keep them away from the granaries in Ba Sing Se, or the rats get to be a problem." He frowned. "It thought she was warm?"

"They don't usually bother people," Zuko shrugged. "Firebenders... we're a little warmer. I think they think we're snow tigers." He thought about that. "Langxue? Give me a ball of water. A small one."

Brows raised, Langxue tossed him a shimmering globe. "You've already got it trapped."

"Just watch." Zuko heated the water in his right hand, not quite to steaming. "You might want to back up a little."

There was suddenly empty space all around him. Zuko fought the urge to roll his eyes - you'd think he'd said he was about to do something dangerous - and cast the ball in front of the rattle-viper.

Tongue flicking silently, the scaled head oriented on the water.

Careful, be ready to grab it again if you have to... Gingerly, Zuko let flames fade.

The scaled length lunged, fangs sinking into water a brief second before it let go, tail twitching in excitement.

"Doesn't look like a pika-squirrel. Doesn't smell like one, or move like one. All I can guess is that it's the heat." Zuko watched black venom swirl in the hot globe. "I did something like this with fire once. Let's see if this works a little better." Twitching his fingers, he swooped the globe off the rock and over the side.

Wriggling fast, the rattle-viper followed.

Trickier when you can't see what you're bending, Zuko noted, guiding the water he felt. Let's try... He thrust a hand out, rigid as water crackling into ice.

Heh heh heh...

Smirking, Zuko brought a frozen globe back to them, studying the dark streaks in pale ice. "I bet he's wondering where dinner went." He tossed the iceball in his hand. "Think we can bring this back to Amaya? I remember her scrolls say it's easier to bend out a poison if you know what it feels like."

"Give me that." Langxue snatched the venom-ice away before it could land again, shaking his head. "Why do dragons always have to poke things?"

"It's our job," Zuko said innocently. Shidan's memory-tale had been clear on that. "Agni can't be everywhere. So we have to poke things for him. And then humans showed up-"

"And fire's never slowed down since," Langxue muttered. "Lucky for us, I guess. We'd be toast right now if Fire didn't really like humans." He nodded toward the harbor, where you could make out flickers of fire if you squinted. "The Face-Stealer has power over the drowned. He has to come at us through the sea. For now, you've got that blocked. But it won't hold long." He swept his gaze over them. "We need Asagitatsu on our side, and we need her now."

Shirong folded his arms. "We were going to just scout the ground today."

Langxue rolled stained ice between his fingers. "That was before we got jumped by something lethal."

"The rattle-vipers live here," Zuko argued. "It could have happened to anyone."

"But it happened to Teruko." Langxue jabbed a finger her way. "When she's in your service. The Face-Stealer knows we're here. Makoto's going to know we're here. We have to move now."

Face the spirits. Without Uncle. Mouth dry, Zuko could only shake his head.

"We have to," Langxue said, more gently. "I know you two have never done this before. But I have." He tapped a foot on the ledge. "We're in Asagitatsu's power, but not too close; this is as good as we can get and not be rude. We've got Makoto's blood with us. We've got a yāorén of Earth and Fire. And we've got two warriors to watch our bodies while we're out. We're not going to get a better shot."

Shirong gave him a sober look. "How many yāorén fought Asagitatsu the last time?"

"That's just it. We fought her," Langxue said grimly. "We lost. This time...we have to find another way." He met pale gold. "I hear you're good at that."

Agni. They'd discussed dealing with the volcano-spirit, hashed it out over and over on the long cruise here. But he thought he'd have more time.

"Fire Navy marines, sir," Teruko murmured. "The difficult we do immediately..."

"The impossible takes a little longer," Zuko finished. She's counting on you. They all are. "How do we start?"

A/N: The Mongol use of human shields, and particularly hand-piercing, is historically attested to by several sources, including those on the Mongol invasions of Japan. For a samurai's view of the invasions, you might be interested in the picture scrolls commissioned by Takazaki Suenaga, the Mōko Shūrai Ekotoba.

I'm told most people don't have much experience with agriculture, particularly what's required for large grazers. So I thought people might be interested in a little background on why Temul was not just "chasing off trespassers" from her domain.

The conflict between nomads and settled peoples goes back as least as long as there have been cities. They have dramatically opposed ways of exploiting their environment to make a living. Settled people almost always depend on plant protein and calories for most of their diet.

(Northwest Coast salmon-gatherers were a rare exception.) Nomads depend on animal protein from their herds, and sometimes grain they trade for (or extort, see Mongols) out of settled peoples. Nomad herds graze, and the nomads harvest meat, milk, and other products.

So when two people look at a cultivated field, a settled person sees food growing - food they plan to put on their table, there's a limit to how much surplus you can produce without modern techniques. A nomad, however, sees a place to graze his herd. These two uses are generally not compatible. For more modern history you might look into the range wars of the American West and the invention of barbed wire.

Now add to that the fact that sky bison can fly. Fencing your crops isn't going to help.

On top of that, nomads and settled people have very different ideas of property. To a settled person, it usually includes their house, their land, their crops; a right of possession generally demarcated by some kind of boundary, property line, what have you. To a nomad, you own what you carry with you. Which means if a nomad finds something they want that's not nailed down, they take it. If they can get it loose with a crowbar, it's not nailed down.

Across the world, to settled people, nomads are thieves. To a nomad, settled people are wimps.

Canon, Air monks and nuns were not thieves. But something we see Aang do over and over again is turn Appa loose to graze. The way Appa demolishes haystacks and bales, that's kind of like turning an elephant loose. Which would be a conservative estimate of Appa's energy costs; something that big ought to be eating a lot more.

Now picture a small party of Air Nomads - say, a dozen - landing near someone's farm to graze.

To a subsistence-level farmer, the damage done by even a handful of elephants in one day means the difference between a good year and starving to death. It only takes a few incidents to turn a settlement's mood from toleration to torches and pitchforks. Add to that the fact that, given their druthers, the dragons would eat the bison. Large herbivores in their territory, that don't belong to their humans, who are eating their crops? That's a no-brainer. And all it takes is a few instances of that to wind up with angry, heartbroken nomads.

Bottom line: unless there's a lot of space between settlements and nomads, or good leadership on both sides, peaceful coexistence is not going to happen.

Chapter End Notes

One phenomenon not always recognized in genocides is the rescue. For some reason, even in a world gone horribly wrong, there are people who will risk their lives, fortunes, everything they value to prevent atrocity. This has been studied, particularly in Europe in WWII. Researchers came to a startling conclusion.

Rescuers don't start with noble intentions.

In cases when those rescued actually survived, rescuers had no intentions of doing anything as noble and selfless as saving someone's life. They believed they were simply ordinary, everyday people, faced with a choice: if I do this, now, I can help.

If I leave the dinner leftovers by the shed, where someone is hiding. If I stamp this set of papers, when I know it was faked. If I say this is my second cousin from out of town, I'm sure there's just been a misunderstanding...

None of these people deliberately set out to defy the law, their own society, and their own beliefs. Yet all of them ended up doing just that. Because of one key event, one "trigger": This is another human being in trouble. And I can help.

Temul is modeled after a few of these real-life rescuers, particularly a rather crotchety French countess: arrogant, bigoted, with most of the other unlovely traits Temul has. Who nevertheless was responsible for saving dozens of people. The scenario in the story - Kuzon and Shidan dropping out of the sky to beg one of the few people they could trust who could get there in time - is also modeled on how many real-life rescuers got dragged in. A friend of a friend, who needs help. No one else can do this. Please.

You don't have to be a saint to save the world. You don't even have to be nice; accounts of organized crime in WWII are fascinating reading, and Han Solo has many historical counterparts. Sometimes, all you have to be is the right person in the right place, with your eyes open.

I'll take that over a saint, any day.

Chapter 53

Walk. Look. Keep your eyes open; what the heck does a volcano-spirit even look like?

It was an effort just to look; the air was clammy on Zuko's skin, mist and shadows everywhere. Which made no sense. Asagitatsu was a dragon's home. Where was the sun?

Walk. Look. This isn't safe for any of us. Wouldn't be, even if the Face-Stealer wasn't planning something...

Zuko stepped as quietly as he could on the black sand of the boundary's shore, trying not to stir the spirit-mists too much. Helped that he wasn't in armor... or the sandals he'd climbed in this morning. Instead he was in the Blue Spirit's soft boots, dressed in near-black from head to toe, and he just knew this outfit was going to be trouble.

Behind him, Shirong ghosted over wet sand in earth shoes, Dai Li uniform as oddly dark as Zuko's own outfit. The rim of his hat burned with faint blue foxfire, and the man was obviously holding onto his nerves with both hands.

Ahead, mist eddied around the only one of them who looked halfway comfortable here. Langxue's past lives were a dim blue-gold haze around him, yet the Kyoshi robes he wore were just as inexplicably midnight-dark as theirs. "This way," the waterbender murmured.

Zuko scowled. "How do you know?" His voice didn't sound right. He hated that. "We're walking down a shoreline. We can't-"

"Don't say can't." But Langxue sounded as much amused as forbidding. "This isn't the living world. Anywhere can be anywhere. The shore will take us to Asagitatsu. Because we need it to, and because we are yāorén."

Zuko's scowl deepened. "Bending two elements doesn't mean much where you can't bend."

"You don't believe in much, do you?" Langxue looked out into the misty dark, where the shush of waves lapped the shore. "She's out there."

"So's a lot of other stuff we don't want to see," Zuko muttered. "Just wait. Next thing you know, we'll be climbing the Southern Mountains in a thunderstorm."

"Somehow, that wouldn't surprise me," Shirong said, just as low.

Zuko glanced at him. "Are you alright?"

"I want my chains." Shirong patted his sleeves absently. "I want them quite a bit, and I don't seem to have them. And we're somewhere none of us can bend. There's a certain degree of comfort in knowing you can slam a rock wall between you and the kamuiy trying to eat your face. I miss it."

"Hit them with your hat," Zuko suggested.

"Your sense of humor knows no lower bounds," Shirong said dryly.

"I'm serious. It looks like Azula's fire is still on it-"

Oh, he could have kicked himself. Naming names was always a bad idea around spirits. Naming Azula when they weren't trying to find her?

Langxue halted with a strangled curse, as mist glittered with foxfire. The wind shifted, bringing a scent of brimstone.

Damn it, I knew this was going to be bad. Why didn't Langxue give us any details-

Wait. A threat from the shore? When the spirit world itself was supposed to be across the water?

Koh and Makoto are deceivers.

His dao sang free, and waves crashed down.

"You're fretting."

Caught staring up the side of the caldera Zuko and his companions had ventured up, Iroh turned back to Amaya with a bemused smile. "A privilege of the aged."

"Oh?" She waved a hand at the rough settlement being carved above the marks of storm surge, and gave him a look full of mischief. "Strange. I haven't met that many aged men who could press enough weight to startle earthbenders." The waterbender chuckled. "Everyone has to help with unloading, hmm? I think you've cured most of the slackers."

Ah, yes. That had been the intended result. Though he had been hoping for a few more personal consequences.

Blue eyes twinkled at him, and Iroh tried not to grin too broadly. Well. Perhaps he'd succeeded in both goals.

"Men. So transparent."

Iroh raised gray brows, the picture of innocence.

"He'll be fine," Amaya said firmly, stepping closer. "He's armed, he's prepared, he's not alone-

"And the last time he was here, my nephew was bitten by something with venom and too many teeth, and I did not find him for two days," Iroh said plainly. "When I did find him, he had used fire to clean the bite, and was still moving slowly." He sighed. "He claimed to be fine then, as well."

"This time, he's not alone." Amaya took his arm. "Come on. Captain Donghai wants to talk to you."

"I fear I already know what for," Iroh murmured. But he let her draw him to the makeshift docks, regardless. Getting those built had been some hours of adventure in itself; Fire Nation experience in temporary pontoon docks warring with Ba Sing Se familiarity with shaped stone. In the end Zuko had put his foot down; they'd build at least three docks, one in each style and one combination of both. No one, the young prince had pointed out, truly knew this harbor well. It might be the best dock design was as yet undetermined.

Donghai's floating firetrap was moored at one of the Ba Sing Se docks. Iroh couldn't blame the man; best to work with what one knew. He also couldn't blame the other shipmasters who looked as if they wanted the craft anywhere else. Though any ship that impossibly fast couldn't be the near-wreck that it looked.

Donghai himself was on top of the weather-beaten deckhouse, watching with a wry smile as his crew unloaded some very familiar pottery jars. He glanced their way, mouth pressing into a grim line; waved to his first mate to carry on, then dropped to the deck and headed for the dock like the tramp of doom.

Oh dear.

"You." Donghai wasn't trying to tower over him, but the Earth Kingdom captain had a good foot over his height and a very determined glare. "I never, ever, want to see another Freedom Fighter again, as long as I live."

Iroh looked politely interested. "Something went amiss with your passengers?"

"Oh, you could say that..."

Which opened the floodgates on a wild and gallant tale of an innocent ship sent on a course straight through hell. Contrary winds, evilly plotting mini-warriors, hacked-through locks, a poisoned galley, innocent men cozied up to by a charming demon in the form of a young rebel, and an onboard attempt at revolt that had summoned up a watery half-platypus-bear-half-strangleweed demon that had almost sent them all into the briny deep before a mad rescue force of seagoing nuns had roped the mystic menaces with prayer beads and chanted demons and rebels both into submission.

Iroh applauded. "Well told!"

"...You didn't believe a word of it," Donghai accused.

"Well..."

"The part about the nuns was true!"

"Of that I have no doubt," Iroh said graciously. "I have visited that abbey myself. They have the most delicious scents." He nodded toward the jars. "Which I am certain many of us would wish. But we may be short of funds."

"Actually," Donghai's voice dropped, and he glanced guiltily aside, "some of those are for your volcano."

"Excuse me?" Iroh tried not to smirk too widely.

"I said it's for your- Look. The abbess is crazy, okay? But she saved my neck, my ship, and my crew. I owe her one. She said it'd be worth our while." He glanced north, across the harbor to the ocean. "Something about getting in on trade up north? I hear they've got pelts and ivory nobody's seen in about a century... huh." Donghai shaded his eyes with a hand. "Saw your little gauntlet coming in, and didn't that give us all gray hairs. You could have told us when they go out."

A chill trickled down Iroh's spine. "They are not supposed to go out."

Swaying from foot to foot on stone-braced wood, Amaya suddenly looked ill. "The harbor. There's something wrong in the water."

"Get to shore!" Iroh commanded. "Now! Captain-"

Donghai was already leaping ahead, up on his ship with cutlass drawn. "Make ready to repel boarders!"

If that water takes us under, Shirong realized, we're dead.

That much, Langxue had briefed them on. An Avatar might wander the spirit world at will; a human couldn't. And yāorén were human, living bodies anchoring them to the living world. They might have the power to wade into the shallows, but crossing the waters would douse the flame of life within like a snuffed candle. Without a skilled healer to bring them back...

I am not going to die here!

Bending or not, the stance would help him stay standing, even as water-

Black sand surged, and waves shattered like ice against it.

What the...?

To his right, pale flames flickered, dancing on the dao that had slashed another wave away. Zuko's eyes were wide, and if Shirong hadn't seen him bend with splinters of stone stabbed in his chest, he'd have thought the young prince was about to faint.

"Sorry." Langxue stepped back toward them, subtle shoves of his fingers pushing dark water into mist. "You had to find that out for yourselves. This isn't the spirit world or the real world. You have to bend spirit as well as your element. If you're not desperate, it won't work." He kept his eyes on the waves. "I didn't think he'd find us so fast."

Silence across the sea. Ominous, brooding silence, punctuated by a waft of something that... spirits. Shirong had dealt with plague kamuï before. This was worse.

Langxue rolled his eyes. "Get serious. They're new. I've been here before. I know your stink."

"Well, well." A dark chuckle rolled out of the night. "If it isn't little Hyourin. But there's no fire in you. Why is that?"

"Get ready to duck," Langxue said under his breath. "Why do you care, you grain-eating mulberry-caterpillar thief? We're not drowned. And we're not going to be."

"Oh, brave words, little spirit-slave. Why don't you say them where I can SEE YOU!"

Langxue's arms slammed into a block, mist crackling into opaque white. In the waters behind it, something sinuous cursed.

"Guess you forgot. This isn't the Spirit Oasis," Langxue said coldly. "You can't come over here. And there's no way we're going over there."

A click of mandibles. "So rude. And the Avatar was such a polite little boy."

Langxue tensed, teal eyes dark.

Zuko touched his shoulder. "Don't let him get to you," the firebender murmured. "He takes what he knows and twists it, and makes you so mad you can't think. I know. Just focus on the mission."

Focus, Shirong thought, trying not to let his teeth chatter. With the Face-Stealer just across a little water. Wonderful.

"Yeah," Langxue breathed. "Thanks." He shook his head. "Go. Find the spirit. I'll keep him distracted."

"But," Zuko started.

"Go!"

Shirong traded a glance with Zuko. Took in the firebender's determined look, and gave him a brief nod.

Silent as mist, Zuko slipped into the shadows.

Langxue did a double-take, as Shirong nonchalantly stepped behind him. "What the hell do you think you're doing?" he hissed.

"Our friend is sneakier than I could ever be," Shirong murmured back. "And the way our neighbor talked about fire..." You might need it.

"You're both nuts," Langxue snarled under his breath.

"Don't you want to know what he asked, Hyourin?" Chitin snicked in the dark. "I suppose not. It must be shameful to know how much you've failed. How ignorant your poor, hapless Avatar is..."

"Thanks for telling me. I guess I owe you a gift," Langxue fired back. "And I know just the thing. I got it from my best friend, but I'll share it with you. Just like the good neighbors we are.

"Ninety-nine bottles of wine on the wall,

"Ninety-nine bottles of wine,

"Take one down, pass it around,

"Ninety-eight bottles of wine on the wall..."

Huddled behind ice, Shirong covered his ears against the howl.

"That's not what it looks like," Private Sukekuni said numbly, eyes wide as his squad dropped their guard on stacks of naval supplies to head for the screams. "I mean, it can't be what it looks like. Stuff like this just happens in spirit-tales..."

"You have exactly five more seconds to panic," Rikiya said wryly, gripping his shoulder. "Then, we've got to do something." He eyed the sergeant. "Boss? What do we do?"

"Moriaki, Shoni, get the civilians to higher ground," Sergeant Kyo ordered. "The further they get from the water, the weaker they should be. Fushi, with them; they're going to need you to fry anything that gets past us."

"Suzuran," Fushi protested, glancing toward their base ship with a jitter of panic.

"Is a lot better off than we are. They've got tar! Move, people! Get some earthbenders, and then-"

"Up the slope!" Tingzhe Wen ordered his children and anyone in hearing distance, one hand keeping his frightened youngest balanced on Asahi's back. "Away from the water!"

He didn't know if it would save them. Those... things... rising from the harbor weren't like any spirit he'd seen in Ba Sing Se. But if they came from the sea, they likely drew their strength from it. And distance couldn't hurt-

A shaft of sun filtered through the sudden mist, gleaming dully on rust-red armor as it lurched from the water. And another, and another...

Guanyin, protect us.

Standing at the railing above the anchor chain, Jee shook his head. This can't be happening. It just can't...

It was the gray that made his mind freeze like a South Pole iceberg. Jee was an officer. He'd seen enough combat to know what it did to frail human bodies. Shattered armor, gaping rents in flesh; even the inevitable ravages of sea life on eyes and lips and any other flesh sea and ice could liquefy. He knew the horrors of death.

But dead was dead. Dead flesh didn't move-

Freezing cold gripped the captain's ankle, and yanked.

Jee kicked out fire, suddenly furious at the whole world. The drowned were legends. Spirits were legends. The Avatar was a legend.

And legends had no place trying to kill his crew!

Sodden flesh didn't flinch, even as the blast knocked it loose. But an engineer's wrench dented the damned thing, breaking fingers that clung to the chain. The corpse peeled free, tumbling back into dark waters.

"Stay ready!" Jee barked. Swept a hand at shaken crew. "Weigh anchor! Reverse engines! Get some water under us! Lieutenant!"

"Sir!" Sadao was white-faced, but there.

"Remember my orders about you, tar, and anything else remotely flammable?" Jee pointed down the rising chain, where other sopping corpses were squirming to board them. "Forget everything I've ever said."

"Y-yes, sir!"

Jee turned his back as the flames started, tar slurping down the chain to catch and burn. Right now, Lieutenant Sadao's inadvertent pyrotechnics were the least of their problems. "Does anyone know what the hell we're facing?"

"The drowned." Meixiang held Jinhai from the other side now; all Asahi's mane and feathers were bristled, as the hen paced away from the harbor with a low, rattling hiss. "The unsanctified drowned - and there's so little here to burn them..."

Burn sea-soaked corpses. That's not going to be easy, Tingzhe thought darkly. "Does anything else stop them? What do they want?"

"Us."

His wife was afraid. His beautiful, brave, determined Meixiang, who'd outlived Azulon's hunters and Ba Sing Se's disdain - was afraid.

Someone will pay for that.

"Suyin! Go with your mother. Get everyone you can away from the harbor," Tingzhe said firmly. "Jia-"

"I'm staying." Jia hiked up her robes, ready to run. Swallowed. But stayed.

"I rather thought you might." Tingzhe looked to his oldest as lurching bodies neared. "Min. I've survived a black night before, but you're the one who's trained for spirits."

"Walls," Min blurted out, suiting action to word with a stomping stance that shot rugged sandstone spikes up to catch in armor and rotting flesh. "Keep them back. Buy time..."

Jia took a deep breath, and clapped her hands together. Sandstone swirled up, locking boots in place-

Something slurped and tore, stained bones pulling free. Jia went white, frozen...

"Hah!" Tingzhe punched, a wave of sand knocking the footless creature back. But there were more, and more.

"Walls." He gripped his daughter's trembling hand, stood shoulder to shoulder with his grim, pale son. "Indeed. Now!"

Arms swept out as one, and sand moved.

Fire crackled over the bay as Suzuran fought off waves of corpses; arcs of bent flame, the head-swimming scent of burning tar, the sudden boom as sparks touched natural gas over the water. The ship was wreathed in her own flames, a blazing target to draw eyes of the quick and the dead alike.

Most eyes, Huojin thought grimly, forcing himself to breathe deep. Not all. "Away from the water, keep calm, away from the water," he repeated firmly, hurrying fellow refugees inland with voice and looks and the occasional shove. Thanking the spirits for Luli, who'd picked up Dayu and dragged Lim in her wake toward the last place they'd seen Suzuran's marines. He'd never be able to keep calm if his girls weren't heading for safety.

Please let them be there. I'm just a Guard; I'm not trained to fight spirits, damn it!

What a laugh. Spirits might be hurt by the sword at his side. Not easily, but he might stand a chance. What good was steel against the walking dead?

The world is wrong. The world is all wrong-

"This way, young man!"

Corporal Moriaki; Huojin had never, ever been so glad to see red armor. The medic had a small girl clinging to his shoulder, but balanced as if she weighed no more than a feather. Shoni and Private Fushi darted past them both; Shoni grim, Fushi bouncing and wide-eyed with determination.

"Come along, quickly now," the medic urged. "Our sergeant has a plan. This way!"

This way was apparently down a narrowing funnel of earthbent stone that eventually took a sharp twist right to curl around a hastily- raised hill. Huojin raced to catch up with Moriaki, trying to fit the walls and blasts of flame he heard behind them into some kind of coherent strategy. "This is a plan?"

"It is, if the legends hold true," Moriaki called back. "Are you familiar with tales of the drowned, Guard Huojin?"

"Are you kidding?" If he'd come face to face with a mirror, Huojin thought he would have smacked the crazy man first and asked questions later. Anyone that terrified wasn't going to listen to reason.

"Water just kills you! It doesn't - I've never - this is crazy!"

"Not madness, my boy. Malevolence incarnate," Moriaki said gravely. "But our straits are not quite so desperate as you might imagine."

Dead men walking - well, lurching - and it wasn't desperate? "Are you insane?"

"I very much hope not!" Moriaki waved his free hand, hurrying the fainter-hearted along. "My father dealt with a drowned when I was a young lad. Dangerous, yes; if they catch us, they will kill us, and their curse will take our bodies as well. But they are not ghosts. Quite simply, Huojin - perilous as they may be to the unprepared, they are not intelligent."

Huojin glanced back at the closing slurps of wet flesh, and shuddered. "Smart enough to come after us!"

"Not us, young man. The flame of life." Moriaki chivvied slower runners up and around the twist like a koala-sheepdog, eyes narrowed as if he were counting seconds in his head. "The force which moves them is utterly cold; it would drink the world's lives to be warm again. And so, our bait."

Huojin nearly tripped. "We're the bait?"

Saving his breath, Moriaki didn't answer.

And I thought it was just Lee who was crazy - what the heck?

Ice was sliding uphill past them, gleaming white and blue. Another few frantic strides, and he could see General Iroh, Sergeant Kyo, and others guarding Amaya behind a stone wall, as she drew frozen lumps from the harbor's depths.

"Ah!" Moriaki grinned toothily. "Excellent idea!"

Excellent? The only thing even remotely related to excellent was getting away from the shambling bodies rounding the ice-laced curve-

"Now!" Iroh ordered.

Fists punched, and ice erupted in flames.

I'm running out of time.

Zuko paused on a piece of misty shore that looked just like every other blasted piece of shore. Except this one definitely didn't have Langxue and Shirong on it. Or Koh, which was the only good thing about this mess. "How do I find a spirit that doesn't want to be found?"

"You don't."

The dark ocean shimmered under the mist, his reflection shifting into something neither dragon nor woman. "Foolish child. How dare you trespass on my realm?"

"Your realm?" Zuko dared. "Thank you, Great-Grandmother. I must be getting close."

"Impudent cub! Asagitatsu will never accept one tainted with Shidan's blood!"

"Azulon must have set your blood boiling, matching up Father with Mother," Zuko said wryly. Azula. Think Azula. Get her mad. "What did you think, because he was the second child he wasn't important enough to worry about?"

"You dare-"

"And why shouldn't Azulon have approved the match? Asagitatsu and Byakko were allies, once." Zuko scanned the fogs, looking for thin spots. He had to be close. She'd never be this furious if he wasn't. "When did that change? When did you change it?"

"I will destroy you!"

"Maybe," Zuko acknowledged. "But not here. Not now." He stepped closer to the water, glaring down the twisting reflection. "You are ancient, Great-Grandmother. Powerful. And you hunt those you think have wronged you to the ends of the earth. For that, you have Grandfather's respect, and mine. But you are still our enemy... and still a dragon, bound to the living world." He shrugged. "So go ahead and threaten us. I hope it makes you feel better."

Water stilled. "Dragon, yes. Bound to the living world, yes. I cannot touch you here... without aid."

Ice seemed to clutch his heart, as the reflection stretched up and out-

"Aid, I have." The blue dragon coiled in the air, jaws gaping. "Time to die."

...I am so, so stupid.

Flames covered the world.

Saoluan was trembling in place, like a komodo-rhino scenting battle. "We have to get down there!"

"No." Teruko took a deep breath, feigning calm with practiced skill. Usually it was easy, even when enemy ships were trying to ram them. Staring at the unearthly horde lurching from the surf after the civilians? Not so easy. "We have to stay right here."

"People are dying! Your people!" The Kyoshi Warrior cast her an accusing glance, made all the angrier by the facepaint. "Don't you even care?"

"Yes."

Saoluan took a step back. On solid rock, fortunately.

"People are going to die down there," Teruko said grimly. "But in case you forgot, our prince, and your little brother, and Agent Shirong, who's a decent guy for someone with rocks in his head - they're stuck here. Until and unless they pull off a miracle, and talk a volcano into listening to us. If they can't, if something comes up here to stop them, and they fail - this volcano is going to blow. And then everybody down to Ba Sing Se could die."

"So we're just going to stand here." Saoluan's fists clenched. "That's horrible."

"Yeah," Teruko said quietly. "Welcome to the war." She narrowed her eyes, peering at suspicious ripples in the brush. Flexed her fingers in anticipation. "And cheer up. Looks like the monsters are coming to us."

I wish Uncle had talked a lot more about dragon-slaying.

A fleeting thought, in the midst of duck and roll and twist the water, now!

Makoto's azure breath shattered chilled waves into salty steam, thickening the fog. Her wings beat down, a gale nearly blasting him from his feet, as she circled for another fiery pass.

Agni, she's huge!

That was the only thing saving him. Her head alone was large enough to snap him up in one bite; her claws swords, that would pierce him through. But her wings and body were sized to match, and not even the most skilled bender could ignore mass.

A sparrowkeet can turn on a copper coin. She can't.

Land and fight, or strafe him to death. Those were her only options-

Makoto blew out a subtler breath, and gestured with both claws. Flame coiled in on itself, and sprang.

Oh, that's just not fair.

Zuko slapped his hands together to part the flames, teeth sinking into his lip as blue fire fought like a live thing. This wasn't like Azula's fire, unstoppable force meant to crush her opponents to ashes. This moved, breathed, hungered; it sought fuel, ever more fuel, and he was all there was to burn-

The faintest whiff of sulfur.

Will braced, Zuko rolled into the flame.

Makoto's fangs slammed into sand inches away. The dragon spat out half-melted glass, whirled-

Not fast enough!

Throbbing fingers grabbed the midnight-blue mane, let the fling of her head yank him off the ground. Zuko crouched in midair, twisting with and against the whiplash force-

Slammed into blue scales, and clung, face buried in her mane.

"Fool! My flames will sear you wherever you lie-"

"No," Zuko gritted out, twitching as fire gnawed through clothes to skin. "They won't. I knew Grandfather. I know Father. I know Azula. So I know you." He spat out blood, forced himself to think past the pain. "You hate, and you torture, and there's nothing else real in the world but what you want." He gasped at the searing heat; breathed in, and snarled. "If I die right here, you won't get to watch."

The roar of fury shook him, body and mind. Zuko clung tighter, focusing on how hard scales dented his cheek, how mane-strands tried to cut his fingers, how the spikes of Makoto's neck pressed against chest and gripping legs. Anything, besides the fiery agony clinging to him in turn-

Wind gusted, and gravity yanked upward, lurching in his stomach.

Wingover. She's diving!

"The sea is still," Makoto sneered, wings clamped tight as she fell. "It may be but an instant, but I will see you die." A flutter of dark laughter. "A pity. And I had thought your sister his true heir..."

Her grief tore through him, keening to the marrow of his bones. Her Sozin; her dark, murderous love who knew how much she hated. Who was willing to burn the world for her, starting with those lying beasts that had weakened her clan so much they had to die. Who had been stolen from her too soon, far too soon; the Avatar's curse claiming the soul that should have ravaged the world at her side millennia longer-

True grief. True rage. Enough to make any soul want to die.

...Azula always lies.

Shut away feeling. Shut away the fear of the ocean falling toward them; it could only kill him if he let it. So he wouldn't.

The sea was Makoto's attack. Block it.

Carefully not thinking, he let go.

Beauty Looks at Mirror.

Foaming waves surged; froze. Makoto's wings beat hard, trying to pull up-

Dragon's Chi Spreads Across River.

Ice softened and rose, sliding under Zuko as he skidded down the wave face; ice to slush to water to shore, oh this was going to hurt-

He tumbled as Makoto crashed, ice splintering like a pack of glaciers grinding together. Seas roared; the dragon screeched...

Silence. Utter, ear-ringing silence.

...I think I won.

Makoto had come from the sea through his reflection. She'd returned to it through his Mirror. The symmetry alone ought to bar her from the spirit world's boundary. For now.

Ow ow ow still on fire-

He yanked the shreds of the Blue Spirit's shirt off, remembering too well how this flame had fought him. Better to get it off first, and crush it at leisure...

Huddled in a nest of charred cloth, blue fire cringed.

Zuko's breath caught. No, he had to be crazy. But on the fringes of the spirit world, who knew?
"Are you... alive?"

Flames seemed to uncurl a little. Wavered at him.

"You are." Carefully, Zuko picked up the cloth; damp sand might have quenched it where his own will would not. "What do I do with you?"

Home?

It was a whisper in his blood; hopeful, but wincing like a frightened child.

Home? Please?

"Living flame," Zuko breathed, heart beating fast. "Fire under Makoto's control... where's home? I'll take you, I promise. As far as I can."

Come!

Endless agony, his back and shoulders on fire, a thin trickle of his life feeding the fire cradled in his palm. Yet it only seemed to be a few steps, before mist rolled back-

A mountain of bright, asagi-blue scales, faint slumbering breaths rippling the water about her. Pale, mizuasagi green sheathed the softer under-jaw and throat; true shinsu red streamed in her damp mane.

It's her.

Across the water. In the spirit world. Damn it.

Home! Flames crackled, pleading. Home, home, home!

Zuko swallowed. Looked at the shore, and the water, and the volcano-spirit that couldn't be in any natural sleep. "I promised."

Think. How can I do this without killing myself?

Zuko eyed the distance. Checked what was left of his equipment. Knife, dao, pants, boots. If he'd just had his firepot!

Langxue, you and I are going to talk about this place. And how you show up equipped for it. Later.

Crossing the water would mean crossing into the spirit world. He was fairly sure if he did that, he'd be dead. With no sort-of-helpful Moon spirit around to drown him back to life, and no healing bender currently there in the living world. Langxue and Shirong were busy.

This, was a bad plan.

If he'd had a firepot, he could have just tossed the flame over...

Well, I don't, Zuko told himself fiercely, toes scuffing sand in frustration. So think about what I do have-

Sand. Black, volcanic; glittering like the fiery stone it had once been.

I don't have Toph to help. But I've got to try.

Crouching down, Zuko scooped up a gritty lump, and breathed fire into it. It doesn't have to be perfect. It just has to hold together a few minutes.

Ice would have been so, so much easier. But bending didn't work in the spirit world. Meaning a bowl of ice would melt halfway across that pitiless sea, and then where would his flame be?

Another breath, and he kneaded sand like wet sugar, trying not to think about how only will and bending kept molten glass from his skin. Need it round enough to throw, big enough to hold some fuel...

It drained him, like holding a fireball steady. By the time he'd shaped a bumpy, sort-of-sandstone hollow, the world was tilting around him.

Home?

"Just a little longer." Zuko tucked shirt remnants and blue flame into the rocky hollow, swept into a low stance that ended palms-out to deflect-

Ice froze in a slim footpath from the sand, just above the water's surface. The path grew farther into the mist, farther-

Clamped onto his chi like a lamprey, sucking, hungry...

Zuko dropped out of stance, deliberately punching a fist into black sand. "Hah!"

It was like tearing the sucker-fish from his own flesh. It hurt. But the frightening drain stopped.

"Water is Fire's opposite," Zuko croaked; one of Uncle's old lessons. "But if you want to stop water... use Earth." He coughed, getting his breathing under control. "Okay. Stop before the ice ends."

Spray-wet ice, a storm-slick metal deck; there wasn't much difference. Zuko walked the ice-path with careful skill; not rushing, not lingering. Technically the ice was still connected to the shore, so he wasn't crossing the water.

But if a spirit shows up, I don't want to count on technicalities- Oh boy.

End of the road. Dark water lapped at pale ice, turning it translucent and fragile.

"Far as I can go," Zuko said firmly. Back up a step to firmer ice, gripped the lumpy bowl, and sighted on his target. Right... there!

A half-spin, and he threw.

Crack. Craaack...

Time to go. Either the fire would make it or it wouldn't-

Scrambling back to shore, Zuko had to glance toward the plummeting bowl and its shrieking trail of azure flames. Fused sand arced down, struck-

Dead on the nose.

Shattered.

There are some things even the darkest spirit magic can't hold someone comatose through. The tender snout twitched, inhaled flame-

Zuko didn't hear the roar as much as feel it; an overpressure that flattened the world, shattered ice-

Oh, damn.

He went down, into the dark. Cold, so cold... he tried to hold his breath, but the air was slipping...

I'm dying.

What do they say, third time's the charm?

Uncle. Grandfather. Sorry...

Pressure. Not the squeeze of hungry water. Something long and sharp, like a fistful of swords.

Coughing. Freezing. And the odd sword-cage that gripped him was... warm?

Massive gold eyes blinked at him. A tender nose snorted flickers of blue flame. :Cub?:

Like Shidan. Like Ryuuko-hime. Images, not words.

Shivering, Zuko reached back. :My people, wounded. Sheltering caldera. Danger to come. My people, against the darkness-that-steals-souls...:

Too much water. Too much cold. He couldn't...

Darkness.

And oddly, the flick of a warm tongue.

Saoluan slashed and kicked at the half-dozen bodies in front of her, fan-shield smashing the closest away, stomping yet another severed hand underfoot before it could drag her down. Who'd have thought proper sword-training could backfire so spectacularly? Cut off somebody's hand, they usually weren't a problem anymore.

But the drowned didn't bleed. Didn't flinch. Didn't stop, bits and pieces still wriggling toward her, and the unconscious benders beyond. "There's too many of them!"

"It's not outnumbered," Teruko panted, a lash of flame knocking wet corpses from the ledge to tumble and squelch down. "It's a target-rich environment!"

I'll give you target-rich, you walking sparkler-

Clammy cold seized her calf, and Saoluan stumbled. No!

She lashed out even as they dragged her down, a scarf-cut that opened one from shoulder to hip. It flopped, putrescent masses oozing, but bore her down into waiting fingers.

Cold...

Flesh like wet ice sucked the life from her; just as so many of her sister warriors had had their lives sucked away years ago, withering into dying crones.

Let me die. I should have died.

But... there weren't enough hands trying to tear her apart. Not enough-

Langxue!

Fear and rage fought the drowning darkness. "Teruko!"

"Agni!" Fire exploded, sizzling in waterlogged flesh-

Earth shook.

Terror clutched Saoluan's gut, worse than even the shredding hands. Monsters were monsters, but earth was stable. Unmoving. Eternal-

Shaking like a bowl of seaweed gel, lurching bodies flung about like children's jacks. She felt the vibration in the stone under her, like struck crystal, like singing...

The cone roared.

Aching, Saoluan twisted her head in the death-chill grip, eyes wide as smoke and flame and other rose into the sky. A dragon. It's a dragon...

Misty wings beat, a warm wind of summer and flame. Asagitatsu danced in midair, exulting in free flight. Swooped, rolled, turned-

Saw them. Inhaled.

Better fried than sucked dry. "Do it," Saoluan breathed.

Fire swept down like a wave. Saoluan flinched, waiting for agony-

The weight on her... crumbled away.

The warrior blinked through ashes, staring as flames washed across her skin; red and green dancing in bright blue, all warm as sunlight. To living flesh.

The drowned burned, white flames dissolving even armor into pale ash.

:Breathe.:

An order. Spots still flickering in her vision, Saoluan didn't even try to disobey. Fire slid down her throat, burned-

:Mine.:

Somehow she was still breathing, dizzy and tired and weirdly hot, like she'd baked herself in noon sun. But alive. "Langxue!"

"Ow..."

Saoluan gave him a pat-down check as he sat up, squinting against the wind as misty wings soared down into the settlement. "Are you okay? What happened?" And was it panic playing tricks on her, or was that white streak of hair just a bit wider?

"We won," Langxue said thickly. "I think." Held his head in his hands. "Spirits. I forgot how much that hurts."

"Note to self." Curled on himself, Shirong wasn't even trying to move. "Taunting massive face-stealing centipede spirits is not a good idea."

"Worked, though." Langxue pressed the heels of his hands against his forehead, wincing. "Gave Zuko time to... oh, no."

Teruko had her ear to the prince's chest, face grim. Tipped his head back, pressed her lips to his, and breathed out-

A gurgling cough, and Zuko turned on his side, gasping out water.

Only training let Saoluan keep her grip on her sword. The green robe had charred away from the firebender's back, leaving long streaks of weeping blisters. "What the hell happened to you?"

Langxue's reaction involved more colorful language; Saoluan grinned sheepishly as she recognized her own drunken curses. "I told you to stay out of the water!" Langxue finished.

Still coughing, Zuko flicked him the finger.

"If you can move, sir," Teruko offered a hand, "you need to see this."

"Oh hell. The refugees-" Saoluan started to slip off the ledge.

Langxue caught her wrist. "I think someone's handling it."

White flames gouted and died across the caldera below, fanned by wings of smoke and summer wind. Asagitatsu circled her domain once more, red-maned head searching for any last trace of undead flesh...

Soared upward, satisfied, gliding back down to mantle her wings over the cone. Gold-smoke eyes stared across the distance to them, hot as the sun.

:You may try.:

"You may try," Iroh murmured, watching over Amaya and his battered nephew. "Not the most warm of welcomes."

"Laying the restless dead to peace in pillars of flame? That was warm enough for me." Amaya moved water-gloved hands over Zuko's burned back, smoothing away redness into whole skin. "We wanted a chance. Sometimes the spirits give us exactly what we ask for."

"Hmm." Iroh nodded. "How are the burns?"

"He'll be sore a few days," Amaya said practically. "They're not what I'm worried about." She moved her hands a bit lower, feeling along Zuko's shoulderblades. "He needs to rest, Iroh. If someone has to sit on him to make him. Light duty, I think your marines call it. No heavy lifting, no extensive bending. If it's possible, I want him sleeping in the sun whenever he can."

Iroh frowned. "Surely the burns are not that bad."

"I told you, it's not the burns. This is the second time he's drowned." Amaya pressed her ear to skin, listening to sleeping breaths. Lifted it again. "I'm worried about his lungs. You firebenders need your breath."

Troubling thought. "But he will be well."

"If he rests." Letting water flow back into a bowl, Amaya sat back from her slumbering patient. "I wonder how he convinced Asagitatsu."

"I am certain he will tell us. Later." Iroh felt in his sleeve, unaccustomed to feeling this shy.

"Perhaps this is not the best time. But if the promise of today holds true, we will remain in danger for some time to come. So there will not be a better time." He let carved wood fall into his palm, gold chain bundled against it; feeling every delicate curve he'd seared into the rubywood disk over the past week. "Lady Amaya. Will you honor an old man with an honest answer?"

"I would always give you an honest answer, Iroh..." She saw what he held, and stopped, startled. "Oh."

Don't laugh, Iroh thought ruefully. I can live with any answer but laughter.

Slowly, she smiled. Reached into her medicine kit, and pulled out familiar red cord. "Did you know Saoluan has very good taste in wine? And a generous heart when it comes to trading for her little brother."

Dead bodies and mayhem be damned. It was a magnificent day. "Is that a yes, my lady?" Iroh dared.

"You old scoundrel." Blue eyes danced. "Who else am I going to find willing to stand with me no matter what goes wrong? Of course it's a yes!"

Grinning, Iroh embraced her. Ah, it had been too long.

Somewhere in the middle of tender touches, there was a sneeze.

Nibbling an ear, Iroh hesitated. Glanced over Amaya's shoulder, as she shook with silent laughter.

Ah. One aggravated, pale gold glare. "Nephew. We were just-"

"Chasing butterflies?" Zuko coughed, still grumpy as a winter-woken platypus-bear. "Counting robe threads? Practicing breath control?"

Amaya chuckled. "Is that what you call it?"

"Ask Private Rikiya. When he's being polite." The glare faded, into something just... tired. "Is everybody okay? If you're... busy... everybody's probably okay..."

"Everyone's been seen to," Amaya reassured him. "You're the worst still to heal."

Of those who will heal at all, Iroh thought soberly. "Our people have matters well in hand. Asagitatsu's fires are restored, and we have her permission to live here. Langxue states that the Face-Stealer has no more power to strike us now, and will not be able to gather more for some time. Though to seal out malign power more securely, we still need a name."

"Dragons' Wings," Zuko muttered, eyes sliding shut. "She called me cub... and that's what we are. Shelter, for those who need it." He winced, and shook his head slowly.

"Zuko?" Amaya asked.

"Go 'head with what you're doing," Zuko mumbled. "Just..." He swallowed. "I'm tired."

"Then rest, nephew." Iroh pulled the sheet up around him, and laid a hand on wild black hair. "Every man needs his rest."

Sighing quietly, he let Amaya guide him out.

"He's upset," the waterbender murmured.

"Not with us," Iroh said confidently. "He only misses his mother. And what he wished to have with his father, had my brother not been such a blind fool."

"He's upset," Amaya repeated, giving him a serious look. "It's common when a widowed parent marries again. You've done your grieving for Natsu. Now he has to grieve her memory." She waved a stern finger. "Take it seriously, my friend. It hurts children to let that go. He's a young warrior, and we shouldn't let him be selfish - but a little grief is his right."

Hmm. They'd see about that. "Only a friend?" Iroh teased.

"Find somewhere a little more private, and we'll see how friendly you can be," Amaya winked.

"Ah. As my lady wishes." Offering his arm, Iroh grinned. A magnificent day, indeed.

Chapter 54

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Ghostly cackling woke Piandao in the darkness.

The fact that I don't even flinch anymore is probably a bad sign, the swordsman reflected, listening for any other sound out of place in the quiet of his bedroom. Nightingale floors would raise the alarm for most intruders, their silencing wedges removed for the night to sing under careless footsteps. But an airbender might step lightly enough to evade even those. "Old friend?" Just in case it wasn't Temul.

The familiar ghost faded out of the night, a subtle blue glow lighting her smirk. "Asagitatsu has woken."

She might as well have poured ice water down his spine. "How bad is it? Agni, we're going to need all the waterbending healers we can plead for to treat survivors, and Pakku's down south. Talking to the Northern Water Tribe's going to be murder-"

Temul held up a patient hand. "I didn't say she'd erupted."

Piandao squinted at her. Took a moment to rub sleep-sand from his eyes. "What's happened?"

"Makoto leaned on stolen fire too often." Temul grinned. "The young prince stole it back." A corner of her lips curled up, showing teeth. "Let the Avatar tremble. Asagitatsu has a Thief once more."

"Kuzon wouldn't want that," Piandao argued, gathering covers around himself against the ghost's chill. One more day. Just one more, and they'll be gone and safe.

Temul was his ally, and always had been. But that didn't make him blind. She'd been quiet, all these days he'd trained Sokka. Too quiet.

Kyoshi, and then Roku, and now Aang. Three Avatars who haven't listened.

The Avatar Spirit versus a Fire Nation ghost. It shouldn't even be funny. The spirit of the whole world was more than a match for one human soul...

But she isn't just a human soul, is she? Piandao admitted to himself. She was a dragon-child. And Agni loves her.

"He wouldn't, would he?" Temul said lightly. "Who do you think young Zuko is?"

She'd hinted that before. It still shook him to hear it said. "He doesn't remember-"

"He does." Temul's tone was steel. "He is Agni's knife. He knows who he is. Who he was. And why Agni offered him the choice."

It's worse than I thought. That letter to Katara, with all its carefully-crafted viciousness - and Zuko knew? "Kuzon spent his life searching for the Avatar-"

"He spent his life searching for Aang," Temul cut him off. "For an airbender only a few years younger than he was. To the last, he thought his friend alive - and awake. Suffering with us the tides of war. Learning. Not just of bending, but of human kindness, and malice, and the desperation of survival. And what have we, in Avatar Aang? Not a bender of Kuzon's years, who knows even the best of us fail. A twelve-year-old child, who can no more understand an Agni Kai than I can fly!"

Her fury was a cold wind through his hair, driving snow in the midst of summer. Piandao faced it as he would a blade. "That's not Aang's fault."

"Oh? And has he been blind and deaf since he woke to our world once more?" Temul's eyes narrowed, as she stalked nearer. "Face that letter, Piandao. He knew she was the Avatar's teacher, and still he strove to tear them apart. Rage drips from those pages, old friend. And it is no spoiled princeling's spite. You know better."

He did.

That was what frightened him.

Parry, duck, stab- yeep!

Yeah. That one was going to leave a mark. Even if Piandao had only slapped him with the flat of the blade.

A few days ago Sokka might have rubbed the bruise, maybe with an exaggerated yelp if he were up against somebody like Ty Lee - who didn't really want to hurt people, just to get them out of Azula's way. Now, with his teacher? He just backed off a bit, lowering his blade. "What's wrong?"

"Reading your opponent. A valuable skill." Piandao sighed, and sheathed his sword. "How have you been doing with the poetry?"

Okay, that hurt more than the bruise. "You guys have the weirdest characters ever."

"Not characters. Akshara." Piandao smiled, amused. "You realize the Painted Lady's message was a test. I can help you gain the tools to pass it - every swordsman should be a jitakshara - but I doubt the spirits would take it well, if I directly interfered." His smile turned sober. "As you may be interfering."

"Aang, sitting down with a book? Not gonna happen," Sokka said ruefully. "And he's one kid, supposed to fix the whole world? That's not right." He gave Piandao a determined glare. "She wrote that stuff on the beach in front of all of us. If she just wanted Aang stuck with it, she could have done something else."

"True enough," Piandao allowed.

"Besides," Sokka grinned, "anything where you can say her-hands-busily-picking-flowers all as one word - that's kind of neat." He scrunched his face up, thinking. "So you're worried about spirits? I thought Temul was being too nice."

Piandao straightened, alert. "You've seen her."

"Not much," Sokka admitted. "She comes at night, and I've been sleeping. Toph says she walks them around the valley and points out things. Different kinds of rock. How water can hide in weird places; I never would have thought a plant could drown bugs and eat them..." He eyed his teacher. "This is bad? She's stayed away from Aang. We made sure of that."

Piandao frowned. "I don't suppose you know the story of the lion-dog who didn't growl?"

"No. But I think I can guess." Sokka grimaced. "So she's up to something. Like what?"

"If I knew, I might worry less." Dark gray brows drew down, thoughtful. "Where exactly has she taken you?"

"Okay!" Toph felt the feather-light shift of ground that was Aang pumping a fist in the air. "We're going to show once and for all there's nothing wrong with Appa walking on the ground."

Oh, this is gonna be good. Leaning back against a warm rock, Toph let grass tickle her feet, trying to see if she could wriggle her toes in time with Katara's breathing. Someone had had ostrich-horses fenced in here not too long ago; she could feel how they'd scratched up the earth to get at bugs, and lightly trampled some areas in clusters of nesting bodies. Right now, though, it was a hiding place for one grumbling sky bison who liked the grass, but not the tubers Piandao's farmers had offered along with bales of hay.

Given she didn't have much to do besides try to train Aang and laze in the sun, Toph had started counting bales of hay. Old habit; maybe she was blind, and tiny, and her parents had wanted to keep her away from the whole world - but she was still a merchant's daughter. Counting was like Sokka checking over Boomerang, or Katara tallying up the food. It was what you did, to make sure your world was in order.

Counting bales of hay - well, she didn't like the numbers. At all.

Maybe I'm remembering the counts wrong.

She hoped so. 'Cause if she wasn't... her dad had part ownership in at least a dozen farms. He always tallied up what they needed to spend for the winter. And Appa had eaten his way through enough bales to keep a small herd of cow-pigs for a week. If Temul had been telling the truth about bison dropping out of the sky, and Sokka thought she was - hoo boy.

Tao said the Earth Kingdom just looked away. Let the massacre happen.

He thought it was because of Chin the Conqueror. Toph wasn't so sure. Chin had been a long, long way back.

Earth keeps grudges, all right. But everybody keeping a grudge that long? When people they know are gonna die right in front of 'em? I don't think so.

If Tao had asked her, Toph would have put her money on a lot of ticked-off farmers. Who'd decided once and for all they weren't going to have their crops eaten anymore. After all, everybody said the Fire Nation had killed the Air Nomads.

So what happened to the bison? They could fly. Some of 'em must have got away and run wild. Why aren't they out there?

Because they weren't. Unless they were hiding better than a badger-mole under a mountain-

Aang windmilled his arms, breaking her train of thought. "And now the amazing Appa will walk across this ordinary piece of ground!"

Feeding Momo some of her berries, Katara chuckled. "He's already walked all over here, Aang."

"Even better! Come on, buddy."

A shaggy rumble, and tons of sky bison tiptoed across the grass.

"There!" Aang said, satisfied. "And now-" He jumped.

Prepared, Toph was braced like a rock when his feet struck the earth, rippling dirt and grass and rocks like wind through her hair.

Katara yelped, bowl almost jarred out of her hands as her seat shifted. Momo pounced on spilled berries. "Aang!"

"Sorry, Katara. But see? Everything's fine!"

Everything was flat, sure. Like a pancake. But just like a pancake, open up the skin, and inside things were a lot different.

Familiar footsteps heading their way. Good; at least two people ought to get what she was about to do.

Toph dug her fingers into the earth, pulling it up to settle like a favorite blanket.

"It's... Toph!"

She didn't know what it looked like, but she knew what it felt like. All the pressure that had been put on the earth fluffed up in reverse, Appa's paw-prints round as dumplings. "That's what's left in the dirt, guys."

Silence. She felt Katara's shift of unease, Aang's heart beating faster. "But... but... Kuzon never said anything!"

"Kuzon wasn't an earthbender." Sokka walked around the pawprints, head tilted like he was looking them over. "Wow. Appa did that?"

"Well, what's he supposed to do?" Aang faced the surer footsteps, muscles tense. " Not walk on the ground? We did it all the time when we saw Kuzon!"

"Which leads me to wonder where, exactly, you saw Kuzon." Piandao rubbed his chin. "From what I know of Byakko, they're as careful with their terraces as we are with pasture. The only place that wouldn't suffer would be the lava fields."

From the way Aang's toes stiffened, Toph knew he'd hit home.

"Temul hates sky bison," Katara pointed out. "You know she's exaggerating."

The swordsman crouched to run his fingers through the grass. "True. One sky bison won't crush the earth here forever. Ten? Fifty? That would be a problem." He straightened. "Aang. One thing you need to think more about is time. Alive and dead, Temul has seen this land through over three centuries. One wave washes ashore, and nothing seems to change. Watch those waves over a decade and more? Entire islands can vanish."

"Then you should have told us!" Aang stepped forward, vibrating in place. "And you should have kept talking until we listened!"

"Eyes or ears," came a familiar, weightless voice, "your people don't listen."

Temul. Toph shot to her feet, trying not to sweat. She couldn't feel the ghost's weight, couldn't hear breathing, couldn't sense anything. Except the odd certainty that Temul was right in front of Aang, scowling dark as a silent room.

"You don't know that," Aang shot back. "You hate airbenders. You don't know anything about how we live!"

"But I know how you die." The ghost's chuckle made Toph shiver. "Shall I show you the last to die here? I think you'll find what they were doing... interesting."

In blazing summer, Toph's teeth chattered. So cold...

Center, Aang repeated Tao's lessons in his head. Be like a whirlwind - let the vision whip through, but keep touching the earth. Don't let the vision pull you all the way in; a bridge has to stay on both sides.

He could still see the pasture, though grass had faded like fog. But he could also see somewhere else. Feel somewhere else; the jolting footfalls as Temul ran through the storm, the way gravity frayed as the ghost leapt up to rain-soaked rooftops. The silent curses as she damned now-dead Fire Sages and onmitsu shamans to a watery grave; they'd bound her by her own family scrolls, stolen at moon's dark...

Onmitsu, Aang thought. Assassins? Like Shih? And how could you assassinate a ghost-

Lightning flashed, and he saw what she'd seen. Knew what she'd known.

No! No, no, it can't be, it can't-

Ranks of assassins. Waiting to kill Kuzon. Watching, as Kuzon killed as many as he could of them, because those were their Elders' orders. Because they needed the secret Kuzon kept from them with his life... and because every onmitsu who fell was already avenged. Because-

No no stop it this can't be real!

-Kuzon had already let them close enough to kill him. She could see that by the fire not flashing with every blow, the blood bubbling with each breath-

Stop it stop it you're lying-!

-Because Kuzon knew them, as she knew them. Better; she'd only seen their parents and grandparents a handful of days on shipboard, and never seen these children in life-

No, Air Nomads don't do-

"...Ja Aku..."

He knew the name, that split second before Temul called down lightning as Agni's own deadly wrath. He knew it, not Temul, remembering the worst day of his life a century ago, and a smile that wasn't a smile at all.

"That's the only way it's fair."

His memory. Not Temul's. And it hurt - but any hurt was better than looking through the eyes of the ghost who'd killed his people, who watched Kuzon die even now with less grief than pure, unrelenting rage-

"Stop it!"

Daylight. Grass. Appa behind him; Katara's arm around his shoulders, as they all shook.

A few feet away, Sokka was almost pale. "Kuzon was killed by airbenders?"

"He was killed by onmitsu of Air Nomad descent. I doubt more than one or two were trained airbenders. It's the Fire Lord's most dearly kept secret." Piandao stood between them and the storm-shadowed ghost, blade drawn. "Enough. You'll break the boy."

"Then let him break." Pale gold eyes flickered with lightning. "I will have my revenge. On the Fire Lord. On the Avatar. Our deaths are on them both!" Blue fire blazed about her hands-

Shattered like ice, against a shield of upraised earth.

Toph?

"Not going to let you do this." The little earthbender stepped to Piandao's side, bare feet precise as the swordsman's blade. "I get you need revenge. I believe you. But you say you're gonna hurt Aang for Kuzon? No way!" Her arms were raised, ready to snap into fists or a block. "You didn't ask him!"

"Toph?" Katara had her waterskin uncapped, ready to spin icy shields or stabbing icicles around them both. "What are you doing?"

Toph didn't even twitch an ear their way. "Kuzon's got a right to his own revenge." Sightless eyes fixed on Temul. "You don't get to take it for him."

"Clever girl." A whisper, like the down-draft before a storm. "But you have no idea. He is here. He is my enemy. I must."

"Enough already!" Toph batted words aside like mosquitoes. "You showed him - you showed us - we believe you, okay? Kuzon... he never... he tried, and..." She swallowed, and shook her head, wordless.

Eyes narrowed, Katara stepped in. "You can't go after Aang when Kuzon chose to die."

Sokka winced. "Katara..."

"He could have lied!" The waterbender glared at Temul, mist or no mist. "He could have told them what they wanted to hear, and lived to help Aang! But no, he's a firebender, a lord, and he had to die because of your stupid, stupid honor-"

"Katara," Aang croaked. Not wanting to say anything. It hurt so, so much. "He... couldn't have lied to them."

She froze. Turned toward him, in dawning disbelief.

"They were... they were trained by somebody I knew, back at the temple," Aang managed. "They would have known. Anything he said... they would have heard a lie." Airbenders trained killers. Airbenders trained murderers. Kuzon died because - because-

He didn't want to think about it. He didn't want to know what he knew. Didn't want it to be real, ever.

But Kuzon had never, ever met Ja Aku. Not before he'd run away. If Temul knew his name now...

It can't be real. But it is.

He didn't know what else Temul wanted to do to him. He didn't care. Nothing could hurt worse than this.

"Aang?" Katara had water wrapped around her hand, ready to heal. "Don't let her beat you. You didn't do this. You didn't do any of this." She glared at the ghost. "And everybody who did is dead. You've had your revenge."

"A bold lie, from one who would see my nation drowned for one woman's murder." Temul's gaze was implacable as lava. "You'd have us all pay for one man's evil." She pointed a long, bony finger. "And who will pay for his? Would you offer your life, little waterbender?"

Aang gulped. Because of course Katara would. She was perfect, she was kind, she was just good...

She... wasn't saying anything.

Sokka stepped forward. "I would."

"Sokka!" Aang wasn't sure which of them yelled it first.

"You're playing with fire, son," Piandao said quietly, gray eyes dark with worry.

"No. I'm offering a temporary alliance to Kuzon's friend," Sokka said grimly. "Because Kuzon was Aang's friend, and Aang's my friend. And I trust Aang." He gave Temul back glare for baleful glare. "You don't want to hurt Aang. You want to hurt the Avatar. Well, guess what? Unless Aang gets all glowy, the Avatar Spirit isn't here. All your revenge would do is hurt a kid who never did anything to you." He took a breath. "You were Kuzon's friend. If you can torture somebody and call it revenge - then none of us knew him."

Don't do it! Aang wanted to yell. Because if Temul had been Kuzon's friend...

Then I didn't know him, Aang realized, throat closed with fear and... he didn't know what. But it hurt. There hadn't been anything left of his firebender friend in that old man killing - dying - in the dark. Killing airbenders. Being killed by airbenders.

I don't know anyone anymore.

He should have yelled it. But he couldn't. Temul was a ghost, not a spirit; and he could push Boots but he couldn't push her, even when he wanted to - and if every Fire Nation ghost was this scary he couldn't blame Kyoshi for wanting them chained down, he just couldn't. How could the Avatar balance the world if just a ghost could stand in his way?

"You have faith in your friend," Temul mused. "A warning, young man. Faith where there is no loyalty is clasping the scorpion-viper to your bosom. So long as it is chilled, it will need you. But when it warms..."

Sokka didn't flinch. "That's my problem."

Aang choked. Twice. Temul had called him a - and Sokka was agreeing with her? There was no way he was going to sit still for-

Toph stepped on his foot.

Temul's gaze flicked his way as Aang yelped, and the storm about her seemed to thin. "You are brave. But you do not understand revenge." Ghostly fingers tipped Sokka's chin up. "You will."

Thunder cracked, and the ghost was gone.

Sokka folded like dropped laundry.

"Sokka!" Katara dashed around Aang, water-wrapped hands feeling over her brother as Piandao held him on his lap. "What did she do to him?"

"I don't know." Piandao touched fingers to the side of Sokka's neck. "His pulse is steady. His chi's ringing like a struck bell. But I don't think he's injured."

"How would you know? You're not a healer!"

"I've been on more battlefields than you've seen summers, young lady. I do know something of who will live and who will die," Piandao said dryly. "He made Temul an offer. I think she took it."

Toph cracked her knuckles, and started heading back to the mansion.

"Where are you going?" Aang blurted out.

"Packing," she tossed back over her shoulder.

"What? Sokka's hurt!"

For a moment, she stopped. "If Katara can fix him, she will. If Master Piandao can fix him, he will. Sokka's gonna wake up. Or he won't." She swallowed. "Any way you slice it, we've got to leave. So we can get you out of here."

Now, that was just not fair. "I didn't do this!"

"No," Toph bit out. "You just didn't stop it."

Feet struck the ground, and she rode a green wave away.

No, Aang admitted to himself. I didn't.

Why?

Because... Temul wasn't something he could do anything about. He couldn't bend to stop her. He couldn't push her, the way he did other spirits. And he couldn't fly away from a ghost.

And it wasn't supposed to be this way! He was the Avatar, and Toph expected him to go up against a ghost like somebody who couldn't even bend?

Like Sokka?

No. It wasn't the same. The spirits hadn't made Sokka a bender. That was their decision, and Sokka had to live with it. They had made him the Avatar. He was supposed to have the power to fix things.

Ghosts are just wrong.

Toph was right. They had to get out of here.

But someday, when he knew enough, he was coming back here. Because he was the Avatar.

And Temul was never going to hurt one of his friends again.

Sokka blinked. Squinched his eyes shut. Blinked again.

What the heck?

Five worried faces stared down at him as he lay against a garden boulder; one of them green-eyed and fuzzy, Momo's ears twitching as the lemur counted one lemur-scratcher back in the land of the living, and jumped back to Aang's shoulder. Toph was pale, Aang was downright grim, and Katara's eyes had that red puffiness that meant she'd been crying.

What'd I miss?

Wait. Temul, Piandao getting suspicious, finding Aang-

"Back with us?" Master Piandao said, brows arched with a hint of warning.

"Y-yeah," Sokka managed, sitting up. He didn't know why the great name of Shu Jing wanted to use the suniyuktabhasha, instead of Uccanyayalaya, but you followed your teacher's lead-

Oh no. No way...

And Katara was yelling at him, and Toph was breathing out with a relieved grin, and Aang was perking up and pestering him with a dozen variants on what happened?

Good question.

Even that thought felt wrong, a jumble of words that should have been familiar and sounds he shouldn't have known, and ow.

"Api kuzalam?"

"Naiva," Sokka answered, Brain still trying to get up to speed. -"I think she did something to me..."-

Oh. Damn. Four sets of eyes staring at him, and only one had understood that. "I must have been driving you a little too hard," Piandao said lightly. "Quoting poetry in your sleep can get you in a great deal of trouble, young man." He winked. "Though not nearly as much as quoting it when you're awake."

"That was poetry?" Katara said skeptically. "It sounded like somebody trying to sing Seal."

"Seals don't talk," Sokka sighed. Trying not to let his whirling thoughts show on his face. What the heck did she do?

"That's what you say."

"You okay, Snoozles?"

Toph. Feet firmly on the ground as usual, and how had he never seen that careful balance for what it was; a ready stance that could take her anywhere she had to strike...

Sokka held his head in his hands. "Aang? I think I got your headache."

That cut off the airbender's chatter. "You mean, all those spooky threats, and talk about revenge, and scorpion-vipers - and she just gave you a headache?" Aang sputtered.

"Sorry about the scorpion-viper thing," Sokka said sheepishly. Aware - really, razor-edged aware - of everything he wasn't saying. Aang can hear lies. But if I'm not lying... "I had to bet on what I knew. She was angry, and she just wanted someone to listen. So I didn't argue with her. Not about stuff that wasn't important."

"Not important?" Katara's fingers brushed her bare midriff, inches from her waterskin.

"She already hates airbenders," Sokka pointed out. "That's what you did with the Painted Lady, right? Let her have her revenge. Just take it a way that most people don't get hurt." He rubbed his head. "I can take a headache." I hope.

"Yeah," Aang chuckled. "But you know, that was crazy."

"Hey, if it's crazy and it works..." Getting to his feet, Sokka let the world tilt back toward level. Looked past them, where a giant white-and-brown fluffball snorted. "You've got Appa packed already? I thought - well..."

"You have the basics, and a keen mind," Piandao observed. "Come back when time is more on your side." He smiled. "I understand you have a schedule."

Great. He was never going to live that down.

"Come on, let's go before she goes after Appa for munching the garden," Aang urged, latching onto his wrist.

"I'm coming," Sokka said, impatiently twisting out of the hold to Aang's surprised squawk. "Give me a minute, okay?"

Finally. All of them scrambling up on Appa, out of earshot. Sokka swallowed. "Master Piandao..."

"Even as a ghost, Temul is a dragon-child," the swordsman said plainly. "There are old stories of what they can do to the minds of men." Gray eyes met his. "How badly did she hurt you?"

"Not as bad as she would have hurt Aang." Sokka was sure of that, if nothing else. "She messed with my head. I'll deal with it. Aang - he's the Avatar. We need him in one piece."

Piandao watched him. "For his power?"

"No," Sokka said firmly. "Because everybody else thinks he's the only guy who can fix the world. Which is crazy, he's just a kid - but they don't see that. All they see is the legend. They need that. So, yeah. Better me than him."

"Spoken like a true tactician," Piandao nodded. "Be careful." He stepped forward, and-

What the heck?

He hadn't been hugged like that in weeks.

"Burning characters into silk is a fine art, not much practiced among firebenders these days. But it used to be the way all the great names kept their family scrolls, and Temul is as old-fashioned as they come," Piandao said, still holding him. "You should know that Temul retrieved those scrolls from the onmitsu. My name is in them, listing my adoption. And as of this morning... so is yours."

"Say what?" It wasn't a yell. More of a manly squeak. "But- but don't you guys ask before you go kidnapping somebody into your tribe, and I'm not a girl, and - oh spirits, Teruko said you did husband-stealing, and Temul's way too old for me, not to mention dead-"

"You're not a husband. You're spoils of war," Piandao smirked. "And she's been at war with the Avatar a very long time."

She wanted revenge on Aang. She took it. "I'm Water Tribe!"

"I don't think she cares." Piandao grinned, stepping back. "So be careful about heroics around impressionable youngsters. Especially young firebenders. I doubt Aang would be very happy if you attracted your own clan."

...Dad's going to kill me.

Chapter End Notes

Akshara- letters of the alphabet. Also, sword.

Api kuzalam? - Are you all right?

Naiva - hardly; no!

jitakshara - one who has mastered his letters. Or, if one were making a pun (and Piandao would) - one who has mastered his sword.

Suniyuktabhasha - "built language"

Uccanyayalaya - High Court.

Chapter 55

"Death by Sokka's dad," Zuko grumbled under his breath as they waited on the middle dock. "Not the way I wanted to go."

Shirong gave him a telling look. "I'd hate to think you had a way you did want to go. Do we need more guards?"

I don't need guards! Zuko wanted to snap. But didn't. He knew exactly what advice Amaya would give to anyone who'd drowned. Or who'd been set on fire. Or faced off with spirits. Much less all three. And that would be rest. Stay calm. Take it easy a few days. As if they had a few days.

"Chief Hakoda is an honorable man," Zuko said instead. "If he planned to raid us, I think we'd know about it by now."

"Hmm."

"Besides. Wood's flammable."

"True." Shirong looked cheered by the thought.

Zuko tried not to raise his brow. Just what had people told Shirong about the Water Tribe, to spark that bloodthirsty a reaction?

One word. Katara, part of his mind pointed out.

Ah. Right. That mess. Maybe it would have been better to get Uncle Iroh off the cone after all.

No. Priorities. We need to figure out how to vent Asagitatsu, or none of this is going to work.

And Uncle had only proposed a couple days ago. Zuko was not going to subject Master Amaya to a whole fleet's worth of disgust for her necklace.

I can handle this.

And if he couldn't, Lieutenant Teruko, Archer Nagamasa, and Nagamasa's people had set up an interesting little crossfire. Arrows might not be much good against the drowned, but the Yu Yan were deadly against mere human foes.

Agni favors the side with the ranged weapons.

Breathe. Mentally check over his appearance one more time. Sheathed dao; there was no way Hakoda would be coming on shore unarmed. Copper-trimmed brown robe to replace the green the spirit world had seared to ash. No waterskin in sight; the bay would have to do, if he were pushed that hard. Hair pulled back with an old-fashioned flame ornament, and who knew how Madam Wen had kept that among her jewelry.

Not exactly princely standards of appearance. But Hakoda had seen him in worse.

Attitude. Take your stance. Wait.

From the looks on men's faces as Hakoda's ship pulled up to the dock, they were not happy to see him.

So what else is new?

The chief himself stepped onto the dock with the air of a man picking his way over swamp tussocks. The warriors behind him looked even less thrilled. "Prince Zuko. I didn't expect to see you here."

"Chief Hakoda," Zuko acknowledged. "I could say the same. Not too many people want to get close to an active volcano." And how close you are... we'll just let that lie for now. "The hawk we sent you came back without a reply."

"I didn't know what to say." Hakoda glanced at Shirong. "Are you still allies of the Earth King wasn't a question I expected from a Fire Nation exile."

Wait for it. Wait...

"And you of all people should know Ba Sing Se has fallen."

"The city will not fall while its true king reigns," Shirong said levelly. "Ba Sing Se might be occupied, but my people still fight."

"In more ways than one," Zuko stated. That better have been enough diplomacy. We don't have time for this! He jerked his head toward the temple mountain far above. "Sokka's been up there. So you know who's up there, and what he's done for the Fire Nation in the past. We're here to see his little airborne rebellion doesn't get derailed by a smart commander with archers and a good store of burning catapult ammunition. Gliders burn."

"You would know," Hakoda said dryly. "For such a helpful camp, this looks a lot like the start of a Fire Nation colony."

This is Dragons' Wings. This is hope... But he'd never understand. "Call it what you want. We told you why we're here." Zuko tried not to grit his teeth. "Why are you?"

"Where's your uncle?"

...Do not fry condescending Water Tribe barbarian, Zuko told himself. "General Iroh is currently working on how to talk a very cranky volcano out of blowing the Northern Air Temple off the map." He caught his breath. "If you want to talk to him, you can wait until he's found a good time to take a break."

"Unfortunately, it's true," Shirong said into the disbelieving silence. "I've only recently reported to the Earth King just how close Asagitsatsu is to erupting; we had no idea when he and the prince negotiated their treaty. Our own earthbenders have confirmed the danger, and the Earth King has full confidence that our allies can handle this. If anyone can."

Hakoda gave him a narrow look, but turned back to Zuko. "Then where's Captain Jee?"

Ready to turn you all into flaming splinters. For a moment, Zuko let the implied insult lie. He might not know. He might not...

But he'd seen that flick of calculating eyes at court before. How hard can I push, a noble's stance would snicker, before he disgraces himself with unmannerly fury?

Because that was always what happened. He couldn't play the game to save his life. All he could do was listen, and feel the venomous barbs sink home, and endure until he could escape...

Burn them. Drown them all.

No. Bad idea. Asagitatsu's flames were all that stood between them and more drowned; borrowing them to kill would not be wise.

But oh, it was so tempting.

"Chief Hakoda." Shirong's voice sounded like it'd taken a dip at the North Pole. "Am I to understand that you prefer not to deal with the authority the Earth King and the volcano's spirit herself recognizes as the lord of Dragons' Wings?"

Which, on the surface, gave Hakoda an out. All he had to do was say yes.

And if he did, Zuko knew, Shirong - and everyone else who wanted their settlement to be respected as theirs, by humans and the spirits - would cheerfully toss the entire Water Tribe fleet out on its ear.

Which meant things were about to escalate, quickly; and damn it, he didn't want a fight-

"Hey! Water Tribe!" Saoluan chirped. Waved from the shore end of the docks, Langxue weighing up the situation beside her. "We're going to go ask the gliders if they're going to start acting like neighbors, or try dropping bombs on us. Want to come?"

...And thank Agni for spyglasses, and giving your allies quick briefings at the drop of a blue-sailed disaster. Zuko watched Hakoda's expression veer from surprise to outrage to carefully-stifled dismay. And tried not to grin.

This time? I win.

Lifting all three of them and a pile of supplies up the mountainside on a circling snake of ice, Langxue finally sighed. "Okay. That was a little too close."

"You said it," Saoluan agreed, glancing back at the bay far below. "Did you see those fires jumping out there? I thought we were going to have crispy Southerners in another minute."

Actually, he'd been watching the water surge furiously around the dock pilings. Another minute, a few more vicious words, and it would have been razor-edged ice.

And we'd have been short one Water Tribe fleet.

Well... probably not. Zuko had a grip on his temper. Just, not one Langxue wanted to test to destruction.

"My daughter could tell you how dangerous he is," Hakoda said grimly.

"Katara, right?" Langxue snorted. "I'll take deliberate threat over spoiled brat starting a riot any day. Why didn't you tie her up? You're her chief. And you could have used ropes."

...Which might not have been the best thing he could say, Langxue realized, catching Saoluan's wince, and the incredulous outrage on Hakoda's face. "You expect me to attack my own daughter?" Hakoda exclaimed.

"It's what we do on Kyoshi Island, if a waterbender won't control himself." Saoluan gave the chief a searching look, eyes framed dark in a white-painted face. "But we usually use ropes way before it gets to riots. A waterbender who's too mad to listen, pulling on people's hearts? People die. That's the kind of thing that gets you thrown to the Unagi." She held up a gloved hand. "Little brother? Stop the ice."

Oh, this is going to be good. A downward slash of his hands halted them; Langxue stepped off onto solid earth, and crossed his arms with a cold, neutral face. See? Not bending. Being polite.

Only from Hakoda's frown, he didn't recognize the stance at all. What the heck?

"We've only heard what the crew on Suzuran could tell us," Saoluan said matter-of-factly.

"Wouldn't surprise me if they exaggerated a little. They were probably expecting a full-scale tsunami if she didn't stop. Something that would break Suzuran's back and send her to the bottom. Just like the invasion fleet." She shrugged. "So. What happened?"

Hakoda looked down the slope, toward the harbor. "You expect me to believe they thought Katara could sink their ship?"

"She's the Avatar's teacher," Langxue said bluntly. "She probably can."

Hakoda started to object... and stopped. Looked Langxue up and down. "Could you?"

"Metal, and that big? Probably not," Langxue shrugged. "Captain Jee's been up against waterbenders. He knows to steer into the waves. But wooden ships? Water Tribe ships?" He winced. "Yes. I can."

Hakoda took a step back. "You have."

"No!" But that wasn't all the truth. "I didn't. But... when I was a kid..." He hunched his shoulders at the memory. "After the storm - the Shengs took me in. But the first time we went out fishing, and a wind came up - they threw me overboard. They had to."

The chief's shoulders stiffened, blue cloth rippling. "They threw you-"

"I had a rope!" Langxue bit his lip, trying to squash a flare of anger. How did this Water Tribe chief think he had any reason to judge his village? He'd been tossing waves in a tantrum; at least their way, no one had died!

"His family died in a storm," Saoluan said quietly. "He got washed ashore. Nobody believes he sank the ship-"

"Yeah, right," Langxue snarled under his breath.

"-But even a kid waterbender can do a lot of damage in a panic. Make waves worse. Lurch the water in the bilge, so the ship heels over at just the wrong moment. Freeze the water, right in the planks, so the whole hull splits at the seams. Nobody in the village would take Langxue out on the water. Not for years. Not until he could tamp it down and not feel instead of think. It wasn't safe." She frowned. "Your tribe lives out on the ice, right? Has Katara ever lost her temper? Really lost it?"

Blue eyes narrowed in a way that said Hakoda knew exactly what Saoluan was implying. "My daughter would never harm her people."

"You think Langxue wanted to hurt the Shengs?" Saoluan fired back. "Benders get upset. They bend. They don't always know they're bending. Not unless you can yank them around to see it." She let a breath sigh out. "Zuko said Katara was about to start a riot. Trying to get your warriors to start killing people, when all he wanted to do was leave. On the island? Would've been my job to sit on her. So what did you see happen?"

"I saw the arrogant young son of the man who ordered my wife's death. Laying hands on my daughter." Hakoda's mouth was a grim line. "The last Southern waterbender. The hope of our tribe."

"Who was that close to smashing up your whole fleet, just because she got ticked off!" Langxue snapped.

"My daughter might need practice with her bending, but she would never deliberately harm her tribe," Hakoda said firmly. "Waterbenders are blessed by the spirits. We show them honor and respect. We don't abuse waterbending children when they make a mistake. And we don't murder them." He pointed down toward the harbor. "That firebender is the son, and grandson, and great-grandson of men who've done their worst to destroy the world. Why are warriors from Kyoshi Island anywhere near these... people?"

And if Zuko had heard that tone, Langxue knew, the ships would be ash even now. And I'm not sure I'd try to stop him. "He saved my life."

"Did he," Hakoda said flatly. "Why?"

Because he's in the same spooky boat I am. Because we both got drafted by the spirits - your La in specific. Because he's a good guy, even if he is twitchy as a rattle-viper on a hot rock. "You know what? I don't care. I was going to die. He got me out of it. Now we're on top of the volcano that killed Avatar Yangchen, and he's trying to stop it from taking out Avatar Aang. I'm going to help. What are you going to do?"

Hakoda looked him up and down again. Less the look he'd give a kid, and more one he'd grant one of the tribe's young warriors. "That lump of smoking rock can kill an Avatar?"

"Oh, let me," Saoluan said with gruesome glee. "That rock?" She pointed down to the cone. "That's just an itty-bitty tip-toe of Asagitatsu." She waved her arms wide at the whole caldera. "Your ships? They're sitting in Asagitatsu."

Hakoda choked. "That firebender didn't- you're living in-!"

"Didn't you know? Firebenders like living in volcanoes. Gives them an edge." Langxue smirked a little. "Like waterbenders living in ice."

Blue eyes narrowed, obviously considering that.

Huh. Wonder why? None of the colonies on the Eastern Continent are in volcanoes. What's he after-

The western islands. Had to be. Zuko was right.

An invasion. Oh, monkeyfeathers.

"So yes, Asagitatsu can kill an Avatar," Langxue said, before Hakoda could bring up something even more unsettling. "And it did. Ba Sing Se and the Northern Water Tribe both have records. Avatar Yangchen died here." He felt it in his bones. He knew it, as he knew the landscape they'd skimmed over; ghosts of autumn foliage fading into the herbs of mountain summer. I knew this place. Long ago.

Hyourin had known it. He... well. He kind of wished he didn't.

"Airbenders are really vulnerable to breathing ash," Langxue made himself go on. "They're meant to breathe really high, really thin air. They don't... have as much protection as us lowlanders." And nowhere near as much as dragon-children. Ash and smoke just did not kill them the way it would most humans. "Their healers can fix ash - at least, that's what the stories say - but when's the last time anyone saw an airbending healer? If Asagitatsu goes - if Aang gets downwind of it, even as far away as Ba Sing Se..." He winced. "It could kill him."

"My daughter's a healer," Hakoda objected.

"Great," Langxue drawled. "Does she know how to handle mortar in somebody's lungs? That's what it's like." He shuddered. "It's a really ugly way to die."

"Hey." Saoluan rested a hand on his shoulder, careful to keep clear of his draw. "Relax. The Face-Stealer works through the sea, right? We'll be fine up here."

"Yeah, I hope," Langxue muttered. Trying not to see memories of those choked and dying from Asagitatsu's first rumbles centuries ago; gasping, breathless wrecks of bodies, crying for breath that could not come. Trying not to feel Hyouurin's terror, as they'd realized Asagitatsu would not be stopped. Not by an Avatar. Not by anyone.

Trying not to remember heat and failure and dark-snow-flecks of glass shredding his lungs from the inside out-

Don't. Don't think about it.

In dreams he saw them all; choking, burning, dying. In dreams Zuko failed, and Asagitatsu mocked them with lightning-laughter from burning clouds as the drowned swarmed over them. His spirit could only watch, powerless, as dead flesh tore them apart...

In dreams, the dead all had Saoluan's face.

Langxue drew in a breath, trying not to shake. Pushing the horror away. "Sorry. I just... keep seeing it." You could have died. You could have died right in front of me. And I wouldn't have known until it was too late.

"The Gnawer?" Hakoda looked as if he wanted to jump down-slope and roll back to his fleet. "What did Zuko do to offend him?"

"Kept breathing," Langxue growled. Pulled on the lighter pack - he knew Saoluan would fuss at him if he took the heavier one, sheesh, he wasn't a baby - gathered up ice with a curl of his hands, and started walking. And made himself just... breathe. In and out. Calm. Zuko's not the only one who wants to break things.

It wasn't just how close Saoluan had come to dying. It was the price, the damned infuriating price of being what he was.

We stand between. We can walk to the very shore of the spirits' sea, and come back.

And all it cost was prying a yāorén's spirit from his body. Just a little.

Spirits weren't supposed to come loose from live bodies. It left a mismatch in your chi. A ragged edge to everything you thought, everything you felt. And the only way to fix it was to spend time just being. And hope you healed.

But he wasn't about to explain that to Chief Hakoda. Not to someone who knew firebenders had a temper... and who'd deliberately pushed Zuko's as far as he could.

"We don't know why, but the Face-Stealer wants Asagitatsu to erupt," Langxue said instead. "We ended up fighting for our lives against dead men." He glared up at the sky, where gliders circled. "And they just watched."

"Easy," Saoluan murmured. "How much can they see from up there, anyway? We came on Suzuran. And the last time the Fire Nation- oh."

For a long moment, the twisted darkness in front of them didn't make sense. It was hard-edged, but not rock; flecked with orange-red, and specks of dirty tan...

Bone. Those are bone fragments.

And now Langxue could see where metal had torn, a jagged rip through the emblem of Ozai's Flame. The massive steel and iron carriage had twisted, the way only wind and unforgiving stone could manage. Bones were half inside, half scattered around the chilling wreck, shattered like ice dropped from the top of a cliff.

He looked up from the rusted chain and crumpled grappling hook, searching the cliff face for scars. Found them, thousands of feet above. "They never had a chance."

"They were attacking the Mechanist's people," Hakoda said levelly.

"So what? I can't feel sorry for them?" Langxue flared. "They saw it coming. You know that, don't you? Either a bomb, or the Avatar, or your daughter; something blasted them loose, and they fell. They knew they were falling." He closed his eyes, and shook his head. "At least if somebody stabs you, you know they were just better than you."

"Dead is dead," Hakoda began.

"He means they could have left ghosts," Saoluan cut him off. "That's bad for all of us." She jabbed a gloved finger down toward the water. "We were fighting drowned corpses because their ghosts were in the Face-Stealer's power. Have you ever tried killing dead bodies?" Her voice edged up a little, shaking at the edges. "I know you guys like to fight, but trust me. It's not fun!"

"Sis." Langxue caught her hand. Pulled her arm around him in a deliberate hug. "It's okay. We'll tell Zuko. He'll get someone up here to... do what it takes for a memorial." He scowled at the chieftain. "You think Zuko's the enemy? Fine. But there's no shamans up here. No priests. No sages! Nobody who can lay Fire ghosts to rest. Except two princes, who are trying to keep us all alive. The royal family aren't chiefs like you. They've got the authority to deal with ghosts. Whether they like it or not." Sea-green eyes narrowed. "You know spirits can cross into our world on solstice nights. But you've never seen a horde of Fire ghosts, because they're Fire, they're summer, and you have midsummer sun. Here? We don't. What do you think's going to happen to that Temple, if Zuko doesn't do something before the solstice?"

"If the volcano doesn't get us all first," Saoluan muttered.

Hakoda's brows bounced up, and he looked over shattered metal again. "Why?" he said at last. "He's Ozai's son."

And to Water, family was everything. "And he's Shidan's grandson," Langxue shot back. "We met that cranky old dragon. Byakko thinks the war is crazy."

Hakoda folded his arms. "Crazy or not, you're a Kyoshi Islander. And you're willing to speak for the prince who burned your homes?"

"Yes."

Hakoda's eyes narrowed. He shook his head.

And if that wasn't a silent, you're all insane, but I'm not rude enough to say it, Langxue would take dishes duty for the next week.

"Like you said, we're Kyoshi Islanders." Saoluan smirked, with a coy toss of her hair. "The same people who sat this war out for a hundred years. How come you're not mad at us?"

Oh great, Langxue almost groaned. That's not going to work-

"We're at war with the Fire Nation," Hakoda said levelly. "We need all the help we can get."

Painted brows arched, Saoluan jerked a thumb back toward the harbor.

"...You can't be serious."

"You don't have to like him," Saoulun shrugged. "Heck, you don't even have to really trust him. Think about it. He's an exile. Any of the Fire Lord's guys who land here are going to come straight for his throat. Not your Mechanist friend's."

Hakoda started to speak, and thought better of it. Looked back at the harbor. "Hmm."

Langxue tried not to bounce on his toes. The man was thinking. They had to give him a little time.

Frowning, Hakoda looked up to the Temple far above. "Are you really worried they'll drop bombs?"

"We have natural gas coming up all kinds of places. We're not sure where all of them are, yet." Langxue settled the pack on his shoulders a bit better. "We don't know what they're planning. So we're going to find out. How about you?"

"I suppose we'll see, then."

He doesn't trust us, either. Terrific.

But around the next bend in the path was the metal cable-carriage-thing Zuko had described; with luck, their way up.

Here goes everything.

They don't make sense, Hakoda thought, standing in the shadows of the Temple's main courtyard as Langxue and Saoluan shared out those bulky packs they'd dragged up on the metal platform ride - and hadn't that been enough to set an honest man's teeth on edge, dangling in the air higher than birds?

Yet the contents of those packs were even more disturbing. Rice. Dried fish. Other bits and sundries Hakoda recognized as Fire Nation and Earth Kingdom travel supplies, everything as lightweight and travel-tough as a man could make it. Even the sugared limon slices for the children had their place; if you had some unthinkable aversion to sea prunes, which most other nations did, you needed those on shipboard.

"He knows you're hungry." Hakoda kept his voice low as he spoke to the Mechanist. No sense taking chances even with Kyoshi Islanders. Not when they seemed to think Ozai's son was trustworthy. And not just for a truce. They could say whatever they liked; those two were living with the Fire Nation. That was... unsettling. "That's dangerous."

"I'm afraid General Iroh has always known a frightening amount about us." Ji tapped his monocle absently, watching his neighbors. "I think he may have been one of those who argued for us to be left alone here to begin with. Well... mostly alone." He sighed. "I suppose we didn't really think it through. The Avatar was here, we'd won our freedom, we were well stocked for the winter..."

And now summer was on them. Hakoda nodded, gauging the appearance of the wives and children gathered around the gifts. Measuring looks of worry, and guarded relief. They're not starving yet. But they know it could happen, if something doesn't go right soon. "There's nothing up here you can hunt, or gather?"

"There are fruit trees, and some gardens run wild that we've reclaimed. The chicken-pigs can forage for themselves, mostly. And there are a few fish in the high streams we can get to. Outside of that - no, not much." Ji sighed. "Even if there were, the gliders can only carry so much weight. Our balloon does better, but it's quite visible. I would hate to repay our relatives down the slope for their grain by bringing them unwanted attention."

"Relatives?" Hakoda straightened, curious.

"Not everyone from our village wanted to build a life in the air," Ji admitted. "Even of those who came with us, a few couldn't handle living in the Temple. Especially our herbalist, Chunhua. She stayed long enough to be sure Teo was healing... well, as much as he ever will. Yet she just kept getting frailer, like a drying reed. She says it was because she couldn't feel the turning of the earth, or some such poet's nonsense. Though I suppose she has a point, of sorts. The seasons aren't the same up here. It's the wind that drives what we can do, and when." He brightened. "But you've brought us a challenge, yes? Wonderful!"

Bemused, Hakoda followed him down corridors and through odd doors, stopping at a room more cluttered than an Earth Kingdom armory. Ji spread Sokka's scribbling over a half-covered desk, and sat to study it with a happy sigh.

"Sokka's never been very artistic," Hakoda felt compelled to add.

Wooden fingers clacked as Ji waved it off. "Minor representational details! Blueprints can come later. What matters is the idea to be explored, and tested!" He gazed at the paper with the look of a man who has seen the hunt of his dreams...

Frowned, and turned the paper around. "What am I looking at, exactly?"

Drawing on his memory of that excited conversation with Sokka, Hakoda reached past him, moving the image a quarter-turn right. "Metal fish, with waterbenders inside." He just hoped there were as many waterbenders in the Foggy Swamp as Sokka said. Waterbending where there wasn't any ice? Unreal.

Waterbenders on Kyoshi Island. That's more than unreal.

Saoluan was right. He was angry at them. If he'd known to send Katara there for training; if they'd broken their precious neutrality and helped, even a few years earlier...

If's catch no whales, Hakoda reminded himself firmly. You've got a load in the net. Don't lose it.

"Firebenders and water don't mix. Usually," he amended, recalling a certain irritating prince and towering spouts of flame-wrapped waves. He'd never seen anything like it before that day, and he hoped no one ever saw it again. "Sokka thinks if we go under the water..."

"Like the drill, carving through a medium they never dreamed needed to be protected," the Mechanist said, half to himself. "The size will be the tricky part."

"The size?" Hakoda echoed, not certain he'd heard correctly.

"The larger they are, the more air they can contain," Ji said matter-of-factly. "But larger 'fish', so to speak, will also be more difficult to push through the water. You've seen that with ordinary ships, I'm sure."

Hakoda scowled. "The Fire Nation never seems to have any trouble."

"Oh, they do. You'd be surprised how much trouble they do have, even with coal engines to power them," the Mechanist said absently. "That freighter in the harbor? It's not the size for one of their massive cargo ships, or their troopships. It could probably put on enough speed to outmatch your fleet. But it's certainly not one of their fast assault ships. Cargo or speed; they can do one or the other. That one tries to do both, so it's probably not much of a success at either. I can't imagine why it's still in service, unless they just didn't bother breaking it up for scrap..." He tapped the drawing. "Mining. That's what we should draw from. Miners know how much air we need, and how much weight a bender can move. With those numbers - yes. We can do this. Wait, I have some scrolls around here somewhere..."

Hakoda found a patch of wall that didn't have something propped against it or hanging from it, and settled back to watch Ji hunt knowledge down. He wanted some time to think, anyway.

What is Zuko up to?

The young man was the Fire Lord's son, when all was said and done. He had to be up to something.

Which was why he'd played angry Water Tribe barbarian to the hilt. Firebenders never looked past it.

...Well. Almost never.

It wasn't all an act. He'd like nothing better than to ambush that spark-throwing noble arrogance and lay him out cold behind an igloo. Preferably in the middle of a winter night. Bad enough he'd bound Katara in his fire. But that letter-!

He almost killed my daughter. With a piece of paper.

If Zuko could do that with just ink and words, Hakoda didn't want to know what he could manage with armed men. And a ship. And a bay that was actually a volcano, where the very water was on fire.

...And Bato was right. He was an idiot. Pricking at a youngster's overblown ego might have been fun, and even necessary. But meeting Zuko over water where fire already burned? They'd seen him use oil before.

Not your brightest day, Hakoda admitted. You keep seeing a firebender. When it seems, in his head, he's a warrior.

That was hard to grasp. The tribe elders who'd discussed waterbenders with him as he was growing up, and Kanna especially, had always given him the impression that benders never used steel. The spirits had gifted them with power, and using any lesser weapon would be an offense in their eyes.

Apparently, neither Zuko nor Langxue had had a Kanna in their lives.

And we've seen where that's led the Fire Nation, haven't we?

Led them, and their so-called royal family. Why was Langxue so convinced they needed Zuko to deal with ghosts? Iroh, Hakoda could believe might deal with spirits. Elders of the tribe were always the closest to the spirit world. But a young man barely more than his son's age? Not likely. Langxue couldn't know what he was talking about...

But those eyes.

He'd seen them on a few of the elders, when he was a much younger man. Ancient, distant eyes. Eyes that had been where no human should walk, and seen what no living man was meant to see.

Ancient eyes, that chilling streak of white hair in dark... Langxue was spirit-touched. He knew it, Bato knew it, the whole fleet knew it.

Which was likely why Bato hadn't argued too hard about letting him go off alone. It'd take a braver man than anyone should have to be to walk with a spirit-touched bender...

And the Fire Nation troops had apparently been doing just that. Were they crazy?

Shirong said the volcano's spirit recognized Zuko as a lord here.

Could that be true? And if so - what did it mean for his people?

"Yes. We can do it," Ji said abruptly. "The only problem will be getting enough metal, now that the Fire Nation is no longer supplying us." He paused for a moment, bearded face bent in a wry, quiet smile. "Well. Perhaps they'll supply us even now. Those monstrous tanks ought to be put to some good use."

Under other circumstances, Hakoda would agree with him. Turn your enemy's weapons against him? It was only fitting.

But if Langxue were spirit-touched...

"There might be a problem with some of those tanks."

Saoluan squashed the urge to creep across the stone courtyard-glider landing spot. Straightened her shoulders, and walked jauntily over to Langxue's side. Like they weren't staring out into a gulf of nothing but air and clouds. "Wow. That is a long way down."

"Yeah," her little brother said absently. Hand out, flattened, to feel the warm wind rising over stone. "Um. I think maybe La picked the wrong person."

"What? You mean you're not dying to fling yourself off the side with nothing but some bamboo and cloth holding you up?" Saoluan teased.

"No."

Ouch. Well, that was definite. "Hey, first things first, right?" She kept her tone light, reaching out to grip that thin shoulder. "They're already flying. You just find somebody you can teach to bend.

Let them handle the swooping through the air part."

"But I'm supposed to do it!"

She heard the metal-on-stone of someone heading their way with a cart, but they weren't in earshot yet. "Did she say that? Seriously. Did she? Maybe you've got air, but you're water. Teaching airbenders, if we can find any - that's going to be plenty of work. You can't teach someone swordsmanship if you're worried about cutting yourself. Why should you have to teach flying?"

"I'm not afraid of flying!"

"Seriously?" A cheerful young voice broke in, over the rumble of approaching wheels. "Katara was scared her first time, and she'd been flying on Appa for months."

Saoluan looked; blinked, and looked a bit farther down. "Teo, right?"

Wheeling his chair up to them, the boy smirked a little. "What gave it away?"

"It's the ears," Saoluan said, mock-serious. "Your father's are a little more singed, but they match."

Teo laughed, bringing his wheels to a halt. "Is everybody on Kyoshi Island like you?"

"The whole island would float away if we were," Langxue muttered.

"Already did that, once," Saoluan said cheerfully. "Hey! Maybe that's why Chin Village still hates us. Kyoshi didn't just kick Chin's ass; she did it hammered!"

Both boys were staring at her, appalled. "You know, if Oyaji heard you say that," Langxue managed, "he'd have dumped us both off the island. Boat or no boat." He paused. "On the other hand... boy, would that explain a lot."

"You think an Avatar would get drunk?" Teo sputtered.

"Sure. Why not?" Saoluan shrugged. "They're human, right? Kyoshi saw the kind of burned villages Chin left behind. Who wouldn't get drunk?"

Teo stared at her. Drummed his fingers on one wheel, suddenly thoughtful. "We don't hear much about Chin the Conqueror up here." He hesitated, deliberately. "A lot about the Fire Nation."

"We saw the tanks," Langxue nodded.

Teo's jaw set, stubborn. "We can do it again."

"Don't see why you'd want to," Saoluan said casually. "Zuko doesn't have tanks." She gave him her best I am a Kyoshi Warrior and can whip your scrawny little butt look. "Didn't you guys read the treaty Zuko sent up here? The Earth King gave him Dragons' Wings so there wouldn't be any more tanks heading up here. Or other problems."

"Other problems?" Teo said warily. "You mean like that smoke dragon we saw?"

"Asagitatsu is going to be part of the solution, not the problem," Langxue said confidently. "But what she was after... yeah. That other problem."

"You mean the other Fire Nation soldiers?" Teo pounced. "Everybody saw the armor! And you let that thing light them on fire?"

Saoluan bristled, ready to give this ungrateful little brat a piece of her mind-

"You were too high up," Langxue said; a quiet statement of fact. "You couldn't see it. They were already dead."

Teo swept an arm across to brush away the argument; Saoluan squinted, as wind suddenly gusted dust in her eyes. "Anything that burns like that is already dead. Yeah, I know, I've seen what happens with natural gas-

"No." Langxue's voice was level. It prickled the hairs on her neck. "They were already dead. We were being attacked by drowned men. Bodies, from the Invasion of the North. Controlled by a spirit who wants us all dead. Including you."

Teo shook his head. "That's not possible. Dead is dead. Sure, the Avatar's a powerful bender. But spirits don't really get involved in our lives."

Langxue raised an eyebrow.

"...You're serious."

"Wish he wasn't," Saoluan shuddered. "You ever hack something to pieces and have it keep trying to kill you? Spirits are real. And some of them are very, very bad news."

Teo looked between them, eyes wide. Put his head down, lip gripped between his teeth as one hand fingered a wheel.

Shifting her weight from foot to foot, Saoluan waited.

"Come on," Teo said at last. "There's somebody you need to talk to."

Which led to climbing ramps, passing in and out of walled areas, and finally rounding a bend into a long, cozy hall that'd been taken over as a mass kitchen, full of pots rattling, bowls clinking in sinks, and more eager kids helping out than Saoluan had ever seen in one place. She could already smell their rice cooking.

"Aunt Changchang," Teo called over the tumult and splash of soapy water. "Auntie, they need to talk to you."

"Throw in all the fish-scraps and fern-bits," a heavyset matron in dark green was directing one of the girls tending a bubbling pot. "A little rice will make those go a long way, child. Teo." She glanced up. "I know you know better than to get tangled up near fires and boiling water, so...?"

"It's important."

"I imagine so." Wiping her hands on a towel, Changchang patted a tiny dishwasher on the head. Made her way toward them, and off to the right of the doorway, out of the way of concentrating cooks. "Well, now. You have a problem your father can't put right with a pulley and some genius?"

Teo shifted in his chair, obviously uncomfortable. "They say we have a problem with spirits."

"Do they, now." Changchang focused on Langxue. Held his gaze for a long breath, and sighed. "Oh, child. What were they thinking? You're so young for this. Even my Great-Gran Changpu was older, when the earth started whispering to her... come here."

Gulping, Langxue let her hug him, eyes scrunched shut. "I can do it. I have to."

"I know. I know, child." Changchang patted his back. "But don't you forget the rest of us can help. Great-Gran was spirit-touched, long before these youngsters were ever born. Maybe we can't fight what we can't see. But we sure can help you kick its sorry ass."

"Auntie?" Teo squeaked.

"You knew someone who was spirit-touched?" Saoluan pounced. I do not feel jealous. I'm his big sister. He could use an Auntie.

"She knew the flood was coming," Changchang said firmly. "Not soon enough. But some of us made it." She let go. "So. Tell an old Auntie what's so bad, the Great Spirits tossed some child from Kyoshi Island all the way up to the top of the world?"

Langxue swallowed, and scrubbed his eyes. "It started over a thousand years ago..."

Chapter 56

Chapter Notes

Warning, Azula. And at least one dead body.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"You know, sneaking looks so much easier when Zuko does it," Azula commented.

Holding up the feet of a very dead man so they didn't leave drag marks in the palace's secret passages, Mai walked on, shaking her head.

"I mean," Azula grunted slightly, shifting the lump of meat and bone on her shoulder, "his bending was always so pathetic, and Mother was always babying him... you'd think, if he could do it, it couldn't be that hard."

Azula. Complaining. Despite the situation, Mai almost smiled. "He always liked stalking better. You like the kill."

"Not this one," Azula grumbled. "It's inconvenient."

Trying not to think too hard about the cooling clothed lumps in her grip, Mai rolled her eyes. "A dead Fire Sage is a lot more than inconvenient."

"They'll report him missing, and when they do Father's going to find him. I know," Azula said grimly. "He'll dig up the gardens, dredge the harbor, yank up the wells... sooner or later, he'll find the body." She frowned. "We could try disguising ourselves and leaving it in some noble's bedroom. Preferably so the wife could find it first. But they have guards, who will not be as complacent as Ba Sing Se soldiers, and I don't think Ty Lee would appreciate me slaughtering half a dozen people to cover one mistake." She stopped at a corner, and Mai caught her thoughtful look in the green glow of the Dai Li crystal she carried. "I don't think I like it either. It's so... messy."

"Inefficient," Mai suggested. Sometimes, you just had to know what reached Azula.

"Yes! Exactly." Azula considered the angle, lifting her part of the body higher so they could squeeze around the corner without brushing the walls. "Not that they're the best, but they are trained warriors. We might need them when the Avatar attacks the capital. If only for boulder fodder."

"You're sure he will," Mai observed. "Even when he knows you know his plans?"

"He's being advised by the Water Tribes and the Earth Kingdom," Azula said impatiently. "The barbarians still work off a lunar calendar, and the Earth Kingdom just thinks the sun is a useful thing to have for growing crops. Try telling them the moving stars are really other worlds. Or that anyone can predict where they move, and when." She rolled her eyes. "I don't know how Sokka found out what day the eclipse will be, but given he didn't put the actual date in his plan? I guarantee you he doesn't think we know it."

"Good point," Mai acknowledged, backing and filling until she was sure not even a fringe of red robes would brush stone. "You could ask Agent Bolin-"

"No!" Azula's voice snapped, whip-sharp. "Father knows I have Dai Li. He'll question them." Her mouth was a hard line. "They need to know nothing."

Mai winced. "They wouldn't betray you."

"You think they'd have a choice?" Gold gleamed in green light, angry. "I took them from Long Feng. Father could take them from me. He'd make them betray me."

And that would be one betrayal too many, Mai realized. Azula was holding herself together, despite what Fire Lord Ozai had implied about her continued usefulness as his heir. But only because she had someone trustworthy at her back.

"I can't hide this anywhere we might be connected with," Azula thought out loud. "I definitely can't bury it. If only I could make it disappear..."

She halted, a vicious smile spreading over her face. "Turn around. We need to take a different route."

"To where?" Mai obliged, backing up. That smile never boded well.

"The Fire Lady's quarters."

Closed for over thirty years, ever since Fire Lady Ilah had passed. A good place to buy them time, if nothing else. "We could wrap him tightly, and you could use a low flame to steam him dry," Mai offered. "I've heard bodies found in the desert don't even smell."

"Something like that..."

Even left to spider-flies and dust, Ilah's quarters were still rich, red water-silk trimmed with golden sea-silk like the first gleam of dawn. Mai stared past shimmering threads, for a moment wondering what life would have been like as one of the ama diving for pinna mussels. Working half-naked in the sea all day, coming home to a warm fire and a sea-grape-growing husband... there could be worse lives.

But I wouldn't be able to hide all my knives. Tricky.

"Over here."

Mai had seen fire-locks before. But never one that had needed Azula's long, sharp nails to press specific points, and turn, before the door would open.

The stone stairs down were steep, carved for one who had no patience with awkward burdens. The scent of hot rock wafted from the tunnels below, ominous as a noble's court smile.

Staring at the yellow-hot lava in front of them, Mai tried not to swallow too obviously.

"And one," Azula said confidently. "And two, and-"

She'd smelled worse, as the body sank into molten stone. She had.

The princess had a satisfied smile on her face. "The records say Great-Grandmother loved this place."

Mai let her brows climb. "I've never heard much about Fire Lady Tejjina."

"Oh, she was interesting," Azula stared at dancing flames. "She recorded just how close you can bring someone to lava before their hair starts burning off. Among other things."

...And maybe I don't want to hear much now. "Where did you read that?"

"Oh, Father read it first. He told me the stories, every night. The executions, the interrogations... what?"

"These were..." Mai swallowed, somehow not surprised at all. "Bedtime stories?"

"They were mine." Azula looked stubborn. "Zuko had his time with Mother. Father spent time with me."

"He didn't tell her how he spent it," Mai muttered.

"What? Of course he did! Zuko was just too squeamish-"

"That's what he told you, isn't it. It's wrong. If she knew..." Mai tried to keep her voice level, despite the sudden, boiling rage in her veins. "If she ever knew, Azula, she would have taken you and run. Even if she had to leave Zuko behind."

"But she loved him more." Azula had turned to look at her, wide-eyed.

"That wouldn't have mattered." Agni, how to explain it? "Zuko... he protects himself. There are things he won't do. No matter who tries to make him. You... you love your father. You'll try to do anything for him. Lady Ursa knew that. We met Shidan. She's his daughter. If she had to choose, she would have taken you."

For a long moment, Azula was utterly silent. "...We should get back before we're missed."

Mai nodded. And bit her lip on what she wanted to say.

She would have saved you, Azula. Someone would have saved you.

Maybe we still can.

There was, Azula assured herself as she knelt, no way her father could know about the body she and Mai had tipped into the lava river under the city. Or the various interesting tidbits she'd found on certain genealogies. Or the information she'd dragged out of the Dragonbone Catacombs on onmitsu. None. Absolutely.

...She hoped.

Outwardly at ease, she waited.

"You do not support my plan for the invasion."

Azula's head snapped up, indignant. "You are the Fire Lord, Father! Who dares say I do not support you?"

Beyond the flames, Ozai's smile was thin. "If you favored my plan for dealing with the Avatar's rabble, daughter, you would not have been unavailable when Commander Toke brought you rumors of his location."

Trap. Given what she and Mai had found in the catacombs, she knew all too well why.

Oh, there wasn't anything obvious in the records. Her father wasn't crude. But if you'd skimmed the pattern of genealogy requests - as she had - and hunted up who had gotten which advantageous contracts to build or make that couldn't quite be explained in terms of past services and resources...

She was the prodigy. The heir.

But if there was one thing Grandfather had taught them all, it was this: Always have a backup plan.

Azula hid a smirk. Too bad he didn't have one for Mother.

Then again, Ursa tended to improvise rather than plan. Which explained a lot about Zuko.

"Commander Toke has brought me no such rumors," Azula stated. Strict truth, as she met pale gold eyes. "Perhaps he got lost on the way to my quarters. It's happened before. Usually with a servant girl involved." Now, just the slightest raised eyebrow. "Or perhaps his orders didn't cover informing me at all. Information has been a bit... slow... since Ty Lee turned down a request to visit her family. Which was very rude of them. I need her here, for strategic reasons. Especially if the Avatar dares to follow through on his plan. And her clan has information enough to deduce that. Forcing her into a situation where she must refuse an invitation by her clan elders - it lacks grace. And subtlety. What were they thinking?"

She feared she had a very good idea what they were thinking. Get Ty Lee away from her, get her back to where they could mindbend her again...

No. I won't have it.

She'd consulted with Agent Bolin and the rest of her little cadre of Dai Li on just how you might fix someone who'd been broken that way. Just in case her precautions failed, and Ty Lee vanished into their clutches again.

Besides. She wanted her own onmitsu. And how better to win them than by setting them free?

"Perhaps," her father said glacially, "they realized we are in the heart of our power, and need not resort to pretense."

A stab of words; not meant to hit the heart, but to draw blood, weakening her in slow torture.

Endure. Deflect it. "If they think so, they are the fools Ty Lee only pretends to be. We have ample evidence of the Avatar suborning sane, civilized people to his cause. Kyoshi Island, breaking their neutrality. A pacified prison coal rig, up in a riot. A Fire Sage, of all people, bowing his head to the Avatar!"

Azula had to catch her breath there, gripped by true fury. What had Sage Shiyu been thinking?

It doesn't matter. In Boiling Rock, he'll have the rest of his life to regret it.

"Who knows how loyal the rest of them are?" Azula finished, eyes narrowed.

Parry; deflect. Did I deal with your missing Sage? Or is he gone for reasons of his own?

She hated deceiving her father. Even if... well, even if what she'd found evidence for might be true.

But there's no time to convince him it doesn't matter. The eclipse is just weeks away. Our preparations must not get sidetracked. Not now! Not for something as - as pathetic as making sure he loves me.

I am the heir. I have a duty.

"And that's leaving aside the rash of civil disturbances the Avatar's caused as he scouts our nation," Azula went on. The flow of information to her might have slowed, but she still had listening ears. "Nothing else could have destroyed the Jang Hui factory." Her lip curled in distaste. "General Mung got off easy with death. Deliberately dumping the tailings in a working fishery? Fish are as critical to the war effort as steel. More critical, sometimes; we can seize iron from Earth Kingdom mines. It's a little harder to seize fish."

Silence, save for crackling flames.

"I considered sending assassins," Azula admitted. "But simply having the Avatar disappear on a moonless night, or even defeated in a town square... it wouldn't be enough. They have Avatar impersonators trying to get into Ba Sing Se, a hundred years after it was death to have those tattoos! It's madness. One small death won't stop it." She met her father's gaze, spine straight. "He has to die. In a way no one can raise rumors that he's ever coming back."

An elegant dark brow arched.

She would not sweat. "Unless there is information I'm not aware of, that has caused you to change your plan, Father?"

Another taut-nerved silence. For a breath, the flames lowered-

Azula caught the message cylinder half on reflex, face perfectly expressionless. Opened it, and read.

To her most esteemed highness, Azula, daughter of Ursa and Fire Lord Ozai, heir to the Dragon Throne-

Greetings, Granddaughter.

You will be well pleased to know that the strength of our people is not only in ships and bending, but the more subtle flame of resolve, even in those left behind. Byakko remains secure against the perils that lurk in the deeps of the Western Ocean, and we have taken measures to defend against the ancient threat of the North. Should Avatar Aang attempt what Avatar Kesuk nearly succeeded in, our Yu Yan stand ready, and our firebenders will rouse Mount Shirotona, no matter the cost.

Of course, we intend the matter to be solved with far less desperate measures. To that end we have taken further steps to make territory under our clan's control more productive, and bring more resources into the war. Which requires more people than Byakko alone can provide - but there are many left widows or widowers by the Avatar, cast adrift by grief in villages or cities that no longer hold beloved voices. We offer them a way to seek vengeance on our enemies, even as we light flames for the fallen.

As we have sought these survivors, their tales have come to our ears, to corroborate information we have gained from other sources. In brief - the current Avatar well knows what fuels a bender's power, and he has been witnessed probing deep into Avatar Kyoshi's history.

Given the wheel of the heavens that returns Sozin's Comet to us, along with other things, I fear I must impose on the blood between us, and remind you what an Avatar might do on the date in question. Our people will be vulnerable in the darkness; especially our civilians, who know too well what has happened in the past. It would be cruel to abandon them to such a fate - and foolish, when we know the Avatar has already forced Fire Sages into treason.

You are one of the few with the power and inner Fire to command an evacuation, should it be necessary. More important, you have the cunning and tenacity to plan such measures in a way that will prevent the Avatar and his forces from ever learning they have been anticipated - until it is too late.

Let this message find you swift of blade, mind, and fire,

Shidan of Byakko.

Oh - and tell your father that while disguising onmitsu as cabbage merchants may escape the Avatar's notice, our Home Guard is beginning to be bored enough to use the slower ones to troll for leopard-sharks. We have made efforts to curtail this behavior, as the cabbages often draw other creatures. There's only so many nutria-fish a sane man can eat.

...Azula was not going to giggle. No matter how much she wanted to. He remembered me!

And what a delightful dagger of a gift it was. Something to do. Something only she, or a very few other high-ranked nobles, would have the authority and power to do. The Fire Lord certainly couldn't show a lack of confidence in his plans by evacuating the caldera. But Mai was a governor's daughter, Ty Lee knew the common people, the Dai Li were experienced in arranging the actions of an entire population - she had the team to do this. And it needed to be done.

That Grandfather had just oh-so-sweetly tweaked the Fire Lord's nose was icing on the pastry.

He's sending those people to help Zuko. Who plans to be close enough to light memorial flames for the fleet.

A month ago, she wouldn't have thought that mattered. But after dealing with the Dai Li, and Makoto-

Well. Whether or not she wanted to believe in spirits, they clearly believed in her.

And spirits weren't living enemies. She could believe Zuko would fight them without mercy.

This is going to fit so well with my plans for General Fong.

After all, Fire Nation spies had confirmed that the Earth Kingdom general still had every intention of smacking that idiot airbender into the Avatar State and setting him loose on the Fire Lord like a tame waterspout. He'd tried it before, he would try it again.

Unless, of course, he was distracted.

And Zuko is excellent at distractions.

Her brother on his own might simply have made a strategic retreat, Air Temple or no Air Temple. Perched on top of a mountain with the Mechanist, Zuko and his men could make life difficult enough for General Fong that the fanatic might withdraw in disgust - and seek out the Avatar yet again.

Ah, but give Prince Zuko and General Iroh civilians to protect - Fire Nation citizens intent on building a colony, meaning they were a stationary target-

Fong will kill them, if he can. He's done it before.

And for all her uncle's peaceful ways, he would not stand aside and let civilians fall to Earth

Kingdom soldiers. He'd proven that, more than once.

The Dragon of the West still has teeth. He may not use them to attack... but we can still use him for the war.

"Byakko grows bold," her father observed. "They should remember they, too, are in the path of the eclipse."

"Of course they do," Azula said plainly. "That's why he framed it this way. For eight minutes Byakko is going to have to rely completely on everything they've done to calm Shirotona down to that point. And so are we." She shrugged, as if it were nothing to worry about. "We can't afford to take too much offense. Not until after the eclipse. And then - well. We'll either have dealt with the Avatar, or not. Either way, our people won't be enthused about turning too harsh measures on one of our own islands. Especially one that sent a warning to protect the common people."

"Dealt with him, or not?" her father echoed, dry as sand.

"Any plan can fail," Azula said candidly. "Too many people who should know better have acted to support the Avatar. Or not acted against him." She met her father's gaze through the flames, trying not to betray any twitch of her racing heart. "That's the problem with fighting air. Leave any opening, and it might squirm through."

Pale gold narrowed. "Air," he said archly, "is not my current concern. Daughter."

Don't flinch. Don't flinch, don't move-

"It has been decades since Lady Kotone first ordered her husband never to approach the capital," Ozai mused. "In all that time, that toothless old dragon has never - ever - come close to violating those orders." A slight, cruel smile. "Not even in the wake of Lord Kuzon's... tragic, untimely death. Byakko may have some few agents here, but Shidan never crosses the Caldera rim. Wise of him, in the wake of your mother's treachery." Hands fisted in the sleeves of his robe. "And now he calls you Granddaughter. Why?"

Breathe. You have to breathe! "Because he knew it would annoy you?" Azula managed, trying for an air of lazy disinterest. Trying not to think of what her father had revealed, in the choice of words, the calculated glitter of eyes. "Byakko may hate the Fire Lords, but they're just as much a part of the Fire Nation as anyone in the Caldera. The Earth Kingdom and the Water Tribes won't care who any of us are. They'd murder us all, if they could. Byakko knows that." She did smile, then; the calculated edge that sent wise courtiers fleeing. "So if they can't challenge you to an Agni Kai, of course they'll find... other methods to be annoying. What else should we expect?"

Silence, wreathed in the hiss of flames.

"...Sufficient. You may go."

Azula prostrated herself, and withdrew.

He's angry with me.

Well, of course he was, a more rational part of her mind pointed out as Azula made her way through elegant, tapestry-hung halls. She'd just received a friendly, family letter from the man who'd wanted Fire Lord Azulon's head on a pike. Who probably still wanted Fire Lord Ozai's there, outside of the minor detail that leaving the Fire Nation leaderless while an Avatar was running around loose wasn't just an invitation to disaster, it was escorting disaster in, serving it wine, and settling down for an unarmed family dinner.

No. Grandfather wasn't anywhere near that foolish. Yes, he hated the Fire Lord. She knew that. She'd felt it, in the quiet moment between sleeping and waking every dawn. A misty memory of the ship; a warmth of sharp-nailed hands, and a growl, as fire ate the scars from her lightning-ravaged heart.

You are cruel and scheming and ruthless, but you are my granddaughter.

She hadn't dared believe that feeling. That sense that Shidan of Byakko knew what she was, all of it; and if he wasn't happy with what he knew, he at least saw it.

Not the true heir, born too late. Not Mother's hopeless case. Just... me.

Acceptance. Acknowledgement of who she was. It had been too good to be true.

But... the letter.

Zuko couldn't do this. He'd never be able to manipulate enough nobles in time. Mother couldn't; she'd want to warn the whole city, and we can't, it would tip our hands far too soon.

No. What Shidan had offered her was a task that needed someone ruthless. Manipulative. Even cruel, if that was what it took to move the most lives out of the battlefield while keeping their trap intact.

He sees me. He really sees me.

...Why couldn't Mother have done that?

Points of pain stabbed her palms; Azula forced herself to relax clenched fists. It didn't matter now. It didn't.

What mattered were her plans, her nation, and her people. And making sure Ty Lee had some privacy to blast things when she finally read those scrolls on onmitsu. Especially the ones about Kuzon of Byakko.

I think I'd rather face the invasion.

After all, there would be tears. What on earth was she supposed to do about that? Killing things just didn't make Ty Lee feel better.

Definitely easier to face the invasion.

The eclipse would be tricky and dangerous and lethal to some of her people, but when you boiled it all down, it was an invasion planned by barbarians.

And what do Water Tribe raiders know about subtlety?

Step. Slice the air with gleaming black. Retreat and circle, shifting his stance to skirt Boots' soft rattle through the ash...

And all the time, keep an ear cocked to just over the blackened ridge, where Toph and Katara were watching Aang in his spirit-trance.

"You need to focus."

Even after the past few days - and especially nights - Sokka still almost jumped out of his skin at the familiar whisper. "Could you not do that?" he hissed.

Pale as a reflection in water, Temul smirked at him. She didn't seem to be here, she didn't seem to be solid - but the past week had proven her blade still burned chill enough to tag him when he screwed up. "Your friends can look after themselves for a time. Focus on the kata."

Sokka took a deep breath, let it whistle out. "I can't." Dark dust rose around his feet as he waved at the wreckage of an island. "It's... it shouldn't*be* like this." And why he was so sure - he didn't want to think about it.

"No," Temul agreed. "A century is time enough for any volcano to grow green again." Her footsteps raised no dust; wind blowing past her was chill as night. "In the Earth Kingdom, the lord is the land. To a point. Among Fire, the lord is the domain. It's not the same. But there is... overlap." Pale gold searched the landscape, grim. "All the Fire Nation was Sozin's domain. And here... here he blackened his soul with the greatest betrayal. It scars the land, even to this day."

"Like the fire-scar, where he killed you," Sokka realized.

"Like it, yes," the ghost acknowledged. "But this was no mere dragon-child's death. This was an Avatar's."

"Roku died here." Sokka sheathed his sword, turning to run-

"He's in no danger."

Sokka shot her a skeptical look. Tried not to think of how much of the landscape he could see through her.

"You won't want him to stay long," Temul said dryly. "But a few hours will not risk much. I will not harm him. That, you know."

"Yeah, I know," Sokka admitted. Aang could walk right past her, and she wouldn't touch a hair on his head. She'd had her revenge.

Me.

He knew what a volcano should look like. Knew it down to his bones. He walked over ashy soil the same way he would have snow, knowing by look and shadows and the taste of the air what was safe, and what would suck you under like quicksand. He hadn't needed Toph's feet to know there was a village buried back there. And from the feel of the ashes, the kind you got only when the lava came thick and heavy and fast... he had a bad feeling about how many people hadn't gotten out.

"How did it happen?" Sokka threw up his hands. "Roku was an Avatar!"

Temul snorted. "Roku was a young fool of a firebender, plucked away at sixteen and told to master the rest of the elements. You don't set a teenager on volcano-watch! They don't know enough. They aren't patient enough. They don't listen-with-heart-and-eyes-and-whiskers."

Dragon-listening, she meant; and it hurt Sokka's brain that he understood that. A master firebender didn't just look for smoke and steam. He felt the fire in the rocks, the charge moving magma gave the air, the little flames of living things moving away from oncoming death.

"I know one cub that young I trusted with a volcano, and he had a dragon at his side," Temul went on, more quietly. "He'd been raised to the duty. He knew Shiroton, the way you know the icy coasts. And if I'd been living, I'd still have held my breath for years, waiting for Byakko to fall." Her eyes grew distant. "I know two, now. But the prince has had hard years to beat the reckless out of him. He'll hold, if anyone can."

"You think Zuko's not reckless?" Sokka gave her a look. "Sometime, I've got to tell you about him, the North Pole, and turtle seals."

Temul gave him a toothy grin.

Oh no.

"Firebender," the ghost said succinctly. "Breath control."

"But," Sokka sputtered, "diving-"

"Think of the ama," Temul chuckled. "Marines are trained to swim in armor, Sokka. You know that." A chuckle. "Or ask him yourself, when next you meet."

"Right," Sokka muttered. "Like I'm in a real hurry to run back into a guy who cuts his nails with rocks-"

Oh. Oh, hell.

Pale gold eyes. Stone-cut nails. An utter, bone-deep fury when people's words didn't match their deeds.

Like Temul.

Dragon-child. He knew what it was. He knew, and wanted to wince down to his bones.

The guys you never let near airbenders, because the monks say a dozen things and never mean any of them. And when a dragon-child flips out, there's no way to tell the dragon that bison shouldn't be food. Kuzon would have known that... "Why did you go to the Western Temple?" Sokka blurted out. "You knew the nuns would be watching their bison to see if they could trust you, Aang does that all the time. And the bison know you smell like - that you're not..." He couldn't say it.

"Not human, child of Water?" Temul's laugh was a bittersweet rumble. "Ah, yes. We've heard that one before." A soft sigh. "Young one. There was no one else to go. Better to hear their insults - yes, and even their threats - and try to save lives. There is the hunt, and there is slaughter. No true dragon joys in slaughter." A shadowed shrug. "We may be good at it. We may glory that we live because our enemies are dead. But that is necessity, and the survival of the clan. It is not to be sought. I would no more have thirsted for the lives of those misguided, ignorant fools than you would."

But her words were shadows, not sounds; and when he listened, we wasn't we, and you wasn't you. We was the children-of-Flame, Agni's own. And you was-

Adopted-cub-of-my-clan. Sokka stiffened. "I'm Water Tribe."

"By which you mean, you are human," Temul said, half to herself. "Do you know what human is, Sokka?" A sharp-nailed hand gestured toward the scrolls in his pack. "More... do you know what it was?"

Almost against his will, Sokka took out the Painted Lady's message.

Seek the skilled swordsman, that he may set you on the path...

No. No, that was the easy translation. The one he might have read to Aang, weeks ago, if he'd been able to read High Court at all, before Temul had shoved the knowledge of a heir of Shu Jing into his head.

It was easy, and it was wrong.

Seek the skilled swordsman, that he may set those-who-guard-the-World-Spirit on the path. How will the World-Spirit-and-its-bearer end the war if the human-who-is-the-World-Spirit's-bearer knows not what ended the peace?

I speak this so that the human-who-bears-the-World-Spirit must learn to understand. To think, if only for a flutter of heartbeats, in the way of those the World-Spirit-and-its-bearer call alien. Outcast. Not-of-mine.

The children-of-Flame are not alien. The Father-of-Fire stretched his wing over Kingami's-wingless-heart-kin, to join them with the dragon-clans and the spirits-of-the-Fire-Isles, and the World-Spirit did not bid him nay. He chose we-who-bear-flame-and-sword-and-spirit, and he set no limits on that choice. For we-of-wingless-Fire were already change, and destruction, and building anew.

Then sickness scythed down the flameless-humans like grain, and the children-of-Flame cried out to Father-of-Fire. He nursed us, and we took fire's gift to heal those-flameless we could. But the children-of-Flame were too few.

Other powers roused then, curious; and roused the World-Spirit, that they might gather up those Fire did not shield. And the World-Spirit did not bid them nay.

But from them, the World-Spirit-you-bear took a price.

"Forget."

Forget power. Forget learning. Forget all rooted in knowledge that was not of this-world-and-no-other.

But the children-of-Flame were dragon-kin, Father-of-Fire's eyes and ears. The World-Spirit-and-its-bearer could not make us forget.

The children-of-Flame remember what the World-Spirit-and-its-bearer have stolen from us.

The children-of-Flame remember when a hundred years passed as a day.

The children-of-Flame remember what the World-Spirit-and-its-bearer wish humans to never have known.

The children-of-Flame know why Makoto would kill her own clan - all clans - to kill the human-who-is-the-World-Spirit's-bearer.

Will the human-who-bears-the-World-Spirit ask us?

Hands shaking, Sokka let the scroll roll closed. "It can't be true."

"Would it were not." A misty hand knuckled the side of his face, sharp nails carefully tucked away from skin; a chill gesture of comfort. "You see me as old, cub. But there was a time when all humans - yes, even Water Tribe - lived as long as dragons." A dry chuckle. "It's why Fire ghosts are so stubborn. Part of us knows we shouldn't be dead."

Sokka scrunched his eyes shut, unwilling to look. "But it doesn't make sense. Why would the Avatar...?"

"Because we don't fit." Temul sighed. "In all this world, there are four creatures whose lives now outlast humankind. Dragons. Walking whales. Lion-turtles. And a pair of koi fish who are not fish at all."

Wait. What?

"Avatar..." Temul harrumphed. "What an inaccurate word. The World-Spirit, Sokka. It is born into human flesh, yes. But it is not human. You know well enough that while spirits may be cruel, or kind, or even selfless, they are not so for the same reasons as humans. Or even dragons."

Reluctantly, Sokka looked toward Boots' rattle.

He saved Toph's life.

It'd taken him a while to figure it out, between Shaman Tao being grumbly about bending smoke and Toph just flat-out not wanting to talk about the tentacled horror she couldn't see coming. But he'd put it together. The betobeto had tried to warn Toph. Tried to get her away from the water.

And when that hadn't worked... Boots had stayed. Even when a sea-spider could have squashed him like a bug.

"You like her because she's trouble," Sokka decided, eyeing the faint swirl of ashes above the sound of tapping toes. "Because she's loud and stubborn and she shakes the ground - and that scares people. Which is what you live to do. Aang thinks you're her friend, but - it's more of a partner in crime, isn't it?"

Happy stomping, like a crazy guy testing spring ice.

"Right," Sokka muttered. Eyed Temul. "You were alive when Roku was the Avatar. Why didn't you tell him?"

"There was much I did not learn until after my death," the ghost said bluntly. "As for human lives... I did try to tell Roku." She winced, and seemed to huddle on herself, shadow on shadow. "I've never seen any firebender age so fast."

"Wait, wait," Sokka held up empty hands, "that doesn't make sense. You keep old age from biting by moving your chi, and he was the Avatar..."

The human-who-is-the-World-Spirit's-bearer. One of thousands. One Avatar dies, and the next is born...

Dragon-children were born paranoid. That didn't mean they were wrong.

Sokka gulped. "You think it was killing him."

"Killing? Oh, no." Temul's voice dripped irony. "As your young airbender would say, it wasn't killing anyone. It simply... wasn't helping him not to die."

...And he could almost hear Aang saying it, too. Well, maybe not that exactly - Aang hated it when things died, even if they were scrumptious lunches on legs, but... Ouch.

But the wince turned into a shudder, as the implications hit home. "Hold on. If you think Roku was dying because you tried to tell him the truth-" He stared at the scroll tucked into his pack. "That's a trap."

"Yes!" Pale gold gleamed, proud as Hakoda when he'd brought home his first fish. "Yes, cub. Of course it is! She is a spirit. Bound to that river, to these isles. And Avatar Aang comes to strike down the Fire Lord, the great name Kyoshi set above us all? Hate or love him, she must try to stop you!" Stiffness eased out of ancient shoulders, and Temul shook her head. "Bear her no ill will, Sokka. She tried to twist the blow awry, as much as she could. But remember where you are. Remember what you fight. The great names have power over all in their domains. And Ozai is the greatest name of all."

"You mean, everything here's trying to kill us," Sokka concluded.

"Almost everything," Temul agreed. "Be wary. Be careful."

Sokka nodded, thinking that through. "So how are you trying to kill him?"

Temul chuckled. "Ah, but have I do to with Avatar Aang?"

"Um." Sokka pointed a thumb toward himself.

"Yes?" A white gleam of teeth. "Why, here I train an heir of my clan. What a young hothead might choose to do with that training is his own choice." Her smile softened a little; iron, rather than steel. "I am a ghost, Sokka. I am not bound as a spirit is bound. You are my vengeance, and so I can protect you. To a point." She sighed, like cold wind through dead leaves. "But I cannot protect you from yourself. You claim that fool boy as your family, and he is not. He cannot be. The airbender is what he is, and that will never change. You pour your heart into him like water... Sokka. There is nothing in him that can give it back."

"Yeah," Sokka admitted, almost a whisper. "I know."

Cold sparks burned about white wisps of hair. "You know?"

"I'm Water Tribe," Sokka shrugged, almost tempted to laugh. It wasn't funny. Except it was, in a way that would have had Katara checking him for a fever and Toph getting rocks to throw. "I'm not going to lose it if he lies to me. And I'm not going to die." He glanced away. "He's Aang. He's a fun kid. And he tries to do what's right. Maybe Kuzon needed more than that. Maybe he should have gotten it. But me? I'm good. I'm not a bender, Temul. I'll be fine, okay?" He ran that back through his head, and smacked himself in the forehead. "I'm telling the ghost that kidnapped me into her clan not to worry. When did my life get this weird?"

"You've more sense than most, but you're a cub still. I will worry," Temul said frankly. "You love fire when it warms, and hate it when it burns. But it is still fire." The ghost shook her head. "He-who-bears-the-World-Spirit may be your friend. But never think that the World-Spirit is. You and I? One life, against all that lives - and does not live - in the world? No. We are only flickers of flame, that spark and die."

Fire is life.

...And that was just a whole weevil-rat's nest of implications he did not want to think about. Not now. Not when the way Temul's shade was flickering meant she was about to leave, and there was something he had to know. "Temul." Sokka nerved himself, and reached for the formal words.

"Elder. What's a walking whale?"

Chapter End Notes

In Real Life, nutria are a very annoying species of aquatic rodent that's escaped into the Louisiana marshes; they are a major force in destroying those wetlands. Sea-silk is also real, made by pinna molluscs, warm, strong, and golden when treated with citrus juice.

Kryal shares credit on the water-silk-making water spiders. That was fun to come up with.

Chapter 57

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Fangs gleamed in lantern-light, dark as old ivory, each one longer than Zuko's head. Massive claws rested on stone, poised to leap and rend and tear. The tail stretched long and long, ready to beat waves to a bloody froth.

Throat dry, Zuko stepped out of the skeleton's line of sight. "What. The. Hell?"

"Rakko-wani." Fearless, Langxue stepped up to touch the ankle bone of something that would have been able to swallow him in one gulp. "That's what you called them, a thousand years ago. The otter-crocodiles. The walking whales." His face clouded. "The Water Tribes have a name for them, too. Kadzait."

The sea-wolves. Zuko had heard that name before, he knew it-

Not me. Kuzon.

He took another step back and sideways, careful not to jar up against another glass case of... well, he wasn't really worried about that right now. The ancient White Lotus cache Langxue had led them to was stuffed with weirdness. Scrolls, odd rocks, who knew what. But none of it was as impressive as what coiled against the vault's rear wall. Fifty feet if it's an inch. Give it muscle to match, and- Agni. Wani would've been metal splinters. "I've sailed out there for three years. No one I've ever met has said anything about something like this!"

"What, the big bad Fire Prince never heard about sea serpents?" Saoluan quipped.

Zuko resisted the urge to roll his eyes. The Kyoshi Warrior might act utterly nonchalant, but she'd been careful to always keep something between her and those teeth.

I can't blame her. I wish I could go curl up and hide. And he was so, so glad Shirong was waiting up and outside, ready to bend them out if something went wrong. He did not want to be trapped in here if the ceiling came down. An ancient vault, one that'd been old when Hyourin had been here... who knew how stable it was?

And if there was a skeleton, that creature had been alive. If it had been alive, it had a spirit. And spirits might linger.

We've already seen the dead walk.

"The sea serpents were evil. Cast out," Amaya said softly, almost reaching to touch the bones. She hesitated, and dropped her hand back to her side. "But we wronged those who were not evil, and Avatar Kesuk ordered the kadzait to leave us, never to be tainted by humans again."

By her side, Iroh took her hand, and let her lean into him.

"That's not exactly what happened." Langxue stepped away from the skeleton, face still haunted. "I read what the White Lotus found out the last time I was here."

"You mean, when Hyourin was here," Saoluan said firmly.

"Heh. Yeah."

Something about the way Langxue said that prickled hairs on Zuko's neck. Almost without thinking, he took a shallow, open-mouthed breath, calculated to bring in any scent of violence.

Nothing. Just dust and old bones, still with a faint tang of the sea.

"Sea serpents, kadzait - they're all the same people," Langxue went on. "Like dragons." The green gaze bored into Zuko's. "A lot like dragons."

But the stories say sea serpents hunt ships down and destroy them... of course. "Dark dragons," Zuko realized. "The sea serpents are like dark dragons."

"Yeah. Sometimes dragons are born with too much fire and no water. And sometimes... kadzait are born without fire," Langxue said soberly. "I don't know why it happens to our spirit-beasts, and not Earth and Air. Maybe because bison have to land, and badger-moles have to come up for air. But it happens. The kadzait drive serpents off when they figure it out, but before that - they can do a lot of damage. And after that, if they survive out there in the oceans. Some of them did. They got to be huge. Like this one."

"Without fire, there is no honor. No trust." Amaya watched lantern-shadows flicker in empty eye-sockets. "A creature that can only care about its family, and no others. Which means the rest of the tribe can never matter. And that means..." She shuddered.

"Like every gruesome story the Fire Nation tells their kids about Water Tribe raiders," Langxue agreed. "Gets worse than that. Dark dragons... fire-spirits don't usually get to stick around long enough to go bad. Sea serpents? A haima-jiao can move right in." He jerked his head toward the skeleton. "Why do you think it's up here, not buried in the ocean?"

Oh, wonderful, Zuko thought sourly. No wonder his first impulse was to burn white bone to ash before it could jump him. It just might.

"Would it not be safer to invoke cleansing fire by a cremation, then?" Iroh eyed the skeleton as if calculating the necessary coal down to the last lump. "And then commit the remains to the sea."

"Probably," Langxue allowed. "But records say the yāorén back then wanted to be sure those who came later would know what to look for. And they didn't want to keep an honorable soul from decent burial. As long as there's no running water up here, it's safe."

As long as, Zuko thought darkly. Great. Better check with Shirong to make sure this place is watertight. "Couldn't they just use a scroll painting?"

"Heh." Langxue shook his head. "You can't get this creature feels wrong off a scroll painting. From bones, you can." He shrugged. "This place was part of training yāorén to help the Avatar. It's not supposed to be safe."

Zuko made an effort not to snarl. I'll help Aang when he deserves it. Not before. If he'd put together Langxue's stories right, all the last yāorén had died trying to help an Avatar. Leaving nobody behind to make sure anyone else the spirits tagged got trained.

Which means all the same mistakes get made twice. Which is why I'm in this mess. And the whole world is. I am not letting that happen again.

Langxue eyed the bones, a bitter curl to his lips. "It was a sea serpent that went after Avatar Kesuk's animal guide, all those centuries ago. Maybe it was a male trying to sneak in and breed.

Maybe it just wanted to kill things. We don't know. But it killed the creature that kept Kesuk grounded and human. And she just - lost it. Called up the Avatar State. Destroyed everything around the Air Isles... right, the maps are different, part of them are in the Fire Nation now. Fire and storm and earthquakes. Right through the breeding pods."

Amaya blanched. "But she was an Avatar. She couldn't have-"

Langxue winced. "The Avatar Spirit doesn't care about people. The human might. If she cares about anything. Read the records; Kesuk was a pile of spite wrapped up in silk and mirrors. And when an Avatar's angry, when something's threatening them... that poor bastard is threatening the spirit of the whole world. They've got to die." He shrugged, weary. "The animal guide usually drags them back after a few minutes. Without hers..."

Zuko tried not to shiver. He'd seen enough of Aang losing it for imagination to fill in the horrifying blanks. Long Feng was an idiot.

Too bad the Dai Li leader wasn't the only one.

I grabbed Aang without Appa, and he came that close to drowning us all. If Sokka hadn't shown up on bison-back... damn. I owe him one. I hate owing people.

Not that he had any intention of ever telling Sokka about that debt. He'd helped the Water Tribe put Aang back together, and he was helping the Mechanist stay out of the Fire Lord's grip. That ought to be enough for anybody.

Iroh cleared his throat. "I was under the impression that Avatar Kesuk died here."

"She did," Langxue said grimly. "The White Lotus got her in place, and Asagitatsu blew. That's... one of the last times this place got buried."

"And how, precisely, did our order lure a mad Avatar from the very shores of the Fire Nation across the ocean?" Iroh's gray brow arched, waiting for any possible explanation of a miracle.

"Dragons," Zuko shrugged, trying to keep his tone even. That lost look in Langxue's eyes...

I don't know how old Hyourin was, but - he had to be older than Langxue is. Kuzon's memories scare me, and he only died eighteen years ago. Hyourin was eleven centuries ago. How do you handle somebody who was dead and dust before your grandfather's grandfather was born?

"It had to be dragons," Zuko went on, trying not to imagine what had to have been a storm-wracked, desperate flight. "Nothing else could move fast enough. Grandfather said Asagitatsu and Shirotona's clans used to be allies. Of course they'd help."

"Half right." Langxue leaned toward the bones again; shook himself, and moved away. "The records say it was a relay. The dragons had the killer instinct to keep Kesuk going after them instead of people. Anybody with bison went in to catch the ones too exhausted to keep it up..." A shiver. "Between the wind and the lightning, most of those who got tired... didn't have a chance to get clear."

"Then why take the risk?" Iroh gave him a considering look. "The Avatar State passes; we have seen that when Aang is enraged, no matter where Appa may be. Had they waited, she would have calmed again."

For a moment, Langxue gaped at him. "Aang can come out of it without Appa."

"Yes, so his young friends have recounted-"

"He can come out of it without Appa." Langxue made a strangled sound. "That? Is one tough kid."

Zuko tried to connect Aang and tough kid. It made his head hurt.

"But even if Kesuk had been that tough - and from the records, she wasn't - she killed the Moon's children," Langxue bit out. "She wasn't going to come out of it, General. She was a lousy excuse for a human being before she lost it, and - damn it, you don't know." He waved a fist toward one of the stuffed scroll-racks. "Kesuk thought she ought to rule the world, and the Northern Tribe was set to back her. That's why she was there. She knew the dragons wouldn't want to fight while the pods were calving. The boats were going to ride with the kadzait, right up the rivers..." He stopped at the horror on Amaya's face. "I'm sorry. The scrolls say some yāorén from the Earth Kingdom wanted to calm Kesuk down. To see if she could be healed. But after she tore apart the pods, and the islands - everyone else wanted her dead. And there was only one way to be sure."

"Why?" the healer managed. "What makes this place have such horrid power?"

Langxue blew out a breath. "You're a healer. Why can't you strangle yourself with your bare hands?"

"If you were foolish enough to try, you'd pass out." Amaya narrowed her eyes at his nod. "That's not an answer, young man."

"I believe it may be," Iroh mused, touching her shoulder. "The core of the world is fire, and sometimes it twists and rages, shaking the very earth. Volcanoes happen where the fire has raged enough to eat away earth's armor, spilling fiery rock into water and air. Thus the flames are cooled, and the earth's temper soothed." He spread his hands. "If the world itself has decided earth and fire must rage, then if the Avatar, who carries the spirit of the world, bids it stop - well."

"Strangling yourself," Zuko muttered. "It doesn't work."

...And now Amaya's gaze was on him, a thin-lipped scowl of we're going to talk about how you know that, young man.

"We found that out the hard way, when Yangchen fought the White Wind." Langxue hugged himself, shuddering at the memory. "Asagitatsu wouldn't listen to someone who wasn't her blood, and when we tried to tell her we were helping the Avatar, she got even madder, and-" He looked away.

"This time, she said we could try," Zuko said firmly. Swept a glance over everyone there, and caught Saoulun's frown. "You don't think so?"

"Huh? Oh!" The warrior smiled. "No, I believe her. Kind of hard not to. I was just wondering... well, it's kind of silly."

Langxue seemed to perk up a little, if only so he could frown at her. "What?"

Saoulun shrugged, armor rustling. "The Water Tribes are at the poles, right? Except for oddballs like our people on Kyoshi Island. So... why were Water spirit-animals coming to the Fire Nation to calve?"

"A lot of whales do that," Zuko told her. He nodded toward the skeleton. "Those aren't whales, I've never seen anything like that, but they must be close. I've been on some whalers." Only outside Fire Nation waters, ironically. But he'd read how it worked at home. "The sages think it's because the calves don't have enough blubber. If they were born near the poles, they'd freeze."

"Heh!" Langxue looked almost gleeful. Smirked at Amaya, just a little. "You want to tell them?"

"I think I do." Blue eyes lit with humor, as she poked Iroh in the shoulder. "Your sages don't know everything."

"Do they not?" Iroh looked fascinated, even as he did not look at the nephew sputtering in indignation. "I admit, despite the past three years, I know less of the sea than most. There is always another mystery. Why do whales swim to our islands, then?"

"Why do ostrich-horses move out of the valleys onto the plains, before winter has fully past?" Amaya said pointedly. "Because they are hunted."

Zuko took another look at massive, tearing jaws. And tried not to blanch. "They were following their prey."

"Fire and water have more in common than I would ever have guessed," Amaya mused. "We both have hunters as our kin. Dragons as your blood, and the kadzait as our spirits." She gave Iroh a wry look. "Though when we have legends of shape-shifters, it's the human who goes to the sea. Not the other way around."

Zuko blinked, and traded a glance with Saoluan that bordered on eww, with a healthy serving of I don't even want to think about how that works.

"Oh, don't look like that," Langxue grumbled. "People meant to go to the sea are pretty obvious. They don't cry when they're born, and- what?"

Drawing in a sharp breath, Iroh let it sigh out with just a shimmer of heat. "I have a tale to tell you, about Chief Arnook's daughter." He grimaced. "It will not be easy hearing."

Yue. Suddenly, Zuko didn't care about the skeleton. Agni, I wish I were anywhere else.

At least he had a legitimate excuse not to listen to the murmurs, shutting his ears to Uncle's recounting of the North Pole as he poked around the scrolls and artifacts the White Lotus had hidden in the lee of a volcano's wrath. I don't care if this is supposed to be some secret order. It's in my domain, and I want to know just what the heck has been going on here. Avatar Kesuk snapped and went on a killing spree? Agni, what else don't we know about the whole mess?

Professor Wen, Zuko decided, weaving through bookcases to poke into one of the farther corners. That's who I'll get down here. Uncle likes him, and we can both trust him. If there is something in here that has to stay secret, he can referee. Heck, he's an earthbender; if he's gotten anywhere near here, he's probably bouncing up and down waiting to do an... excavation...

Stained white. Rounded and long shapes, brittle as desert wood. Familiar shapes.

Zuko stared at shreds of cloth wrapping dry bones - so many bones - and tried not to swear.

"What?" Saoluan was moving his way, hand dipping toward her sword.

"Don't come over here!"

Amaya almost stepped toward him anyway; Iroh put a hand on her arm. "What is it you have found, nephew?"

"You said, the last time you were here." Zuko backed out of the corner, worked his way back into plain view of the others. "Hyourin never left."

Langxue flinched. Saoluan looked ready to commit murder, if she could just figure out whose head to slice off.

"There wasn't anyone else left, and... we knew we wouldn't last long enough to send a message," Langxue said, barely above a whisper. "Nobody does. Not with burned lungs." He shook his head. "The vault was going to be buried. Lava, wind-blown ashes, the Face-stealer - it was going to be forgotten. And we needed it. We needed it so much." Hands almost reached out; dropped limply back to his sides. "Funny thing about yāorén coming back. We can feel where we died. In any life. You could probably find the exact spot Kuzon died. All you have to do is follow the pain."

Iroh inhaled sharply. "Hyourin and his companions left themselves as markers. So a yāorén might be reborn, and find what must be restored." His gaze bored into sea-green. "What is here, Langxue? What must we know, that has been forgotten?"

"Who Koh is. Why he hates us so much." Langxue was backed all the way against Saoluan, eyes dark in a way Zuko didn't like at all. "The first thing the world needed after life was death. The Face-stealer... he's the Avatar Spirit's child."

Zuko thought of that, and Azula, and everything desperate he'd ever done for Ozai's love. "We are so screwed."

"Zuko," Iroh frowned. "Allowing Lieutenant Teruko's men to watch over you does not include using such language-"

"Oh, I haven't even gotten started," Zuko snarled. "Uncle, you - Grandfather loved you. You don't get it. The Face-stealer's the Avatar Spirit's firstborn. And what did the world-spirit do? Abandoned him. For humans." Knuckles clenched, white; he breathed slow, denying the need to spark. "And then? We killed it."

"Temporarily," Iroh protested; for once, pale himself. "To protect ourselves, and the world's own creatures."

Zuko snorted, anger the only thing keeping him from running screaming. If someone had killed Ozai, while he was still tangled up in trying to get his father's love back... before he'd realized he'd never had it in the first place... I'd have killed them. I'd have done so much worse than killing them. "You think the Face-stealer cares?"

"Not a chance." Langxue shivered. "It really hurts in here."

His lost tone snapped Amaya's attention to him; the healer mouthed a vicious word before steering them both toward the vault's entrance. "Shock. Get him out of here. Away from all this earth."

Sunlight's good.

Spreading his hands, palm up, Zuko tried to catch as much of it as he could. He'd walked among the dead before. It never got easier.

A hint of shadow passed near; he heard cloth barely whisper, as Shirong settled on a warm rock near him. "They don't seem to have left ghosts. Though I wouldn't swear about that - kadzait, did they call it?"

Zuko shuddered. "We need to see them buried with honor."

"I'll ask Langxue about that," the agent said thoughtfully. "If they're all yāorén - who knows what's appropriate."

Good point. But not the first worry on his mind. "I want this kept quiet from Hakoda's men," Zuko said abruptly. "And the Temple."

"It won't be easy to hide that we have an interest here," Shirong mused. "But unless they land, they won't know what." He cleared his throat. "Might I ask why?"

"They're not telling us everything."

Shirong snorted. "You're not that petty."

Want to bet? Right now he felt all kinds of petty. And angry. And confused.

But Shirong was right. He had reasons. He just had to sort them out.

Think. What's in there is proof that... right. Taking a deep breath, Zuko tried to put it in logical order. "Chief Hakoda found out the hard way that a waterbender can pull on people's hearts. Even set people up to kill each other. Aang is a waterbender. And the Avatar." Zuko glanced back at the hole that led to the vault. "And in there are records Langxue says prove a Water Avatar went insane."

"Ah."

"Aang is an idiot," Zuko grumbled. "He doesn't think. He doesn't listen. He jumps on the first thing that seems like an answer, and counts on his friends to fix things if he's wrong. But he's not crazy."

"And you think Chief Hakoda might jump to conclusions," Shirong said neutrally.

"I think that if he finds out that over two thousand years ago, Air and Fire got together and killed a Water Tribe Avatar..." Zuko waved over the ridge toward Dragons' Wings, and up toward the Temple. "Things could get tense."

Shirong laughed. "We're living in a volcano, helping to feed people who still might drop bombs on us, and sooner or later the Fire Lord's going to throw troops our way. And you're worried about Chief Hakoda?"

"He's Sokka's dad," Zuko said practically. "Trust me. If anybody could find a way to wreck every plan we're trying to pull off, he could."

"And he won't take being lied to worse?" Shirong arched a brow.

"We're not going to lie," Zuko said firmly. "We're just not going to tell them everything."

"They burned the bones, then scattered the ashes in the water?" The Earth shaman leaned into the wind sweeping the Temple courtyard, frowning. "Are you sure?"

Wheeling back out to the landing yard to look for some test gear he'd dropped, Teo stopped, and stuck to the shadows. Chief Hakoda had brought Shaman Tao up here, and Dad liked Hakoda. Teo liked him, and not just because he was Sokka's dad.

But Tao, and the ship he and the other Water Tribe men had brought for Dad to break up for the steel...

Well. Auntie Changchang said that was making things a little tense.

And it was a funny thing about a lot of grownups from outside the Temple. They seemed to think if your legs didn't work, your ears didn't either.

"They said they found some half-buried remains, they weren't sure anyone else had done the job right, and they wanted to be sure." The Water Tribe chief looked warily over the edge and down. "If the stories they're telling down there are true, I can't blame them. But it seemed a little... odd."

"Odder than cremation followed by sea burial?" Tao said dryly.

"Respect." Hakoda thumped a fist into a palm. "You don't see the Fire Nation give that to barbarians. You should see the polite request they gave Bato this morning for me. They want the ship's name and honors."

"Of course they do." The weathered shaman thumped his staff on the courtyard flagstones, pacing absently. "You may as well give it to them, Chief Hakoda. One scrap of iron and a few scrolls? I can understand wanting to singe the chin of Fire Lord Ozai's son, but it's not worth the trouble you'd find keeping them. They mark a Fire Nation vessel - and the Ocean is very angry at the Fire Nation. Better to have that anger turned where it belongs." A weathered finger snapped out. "You there, young man. Either be about your business, or come out and join our talk like a man."

Busted. Teo wheeled himself out of the wall's shadows, eyeing them both warily. Chief Hakoda wasn't like anyone from the Temple, but he was like Sokka. He was okay.

Shaman Tao, though... the tall old earthbender was spooky.

"You were eavesdropping on us?" Hakoda frowned, though it didn't look that angry. "Why?"

Oh heck, try the truth. Sokka was okay with that. "You're asking my dad to build stuff for you," Tao answered, trying to keep his voice steady. Up in the air, he could fly rings around both of them. Down on stone, with an earthbender? This could go so wrong. "The last people who did that were the Fire Nation."

Hakoda straightened. "Sokka, Katara, and Aang helped you fight the Fire Nation."

"I know." Teo tried not to grip a wheel too obviously. "But you didn't see my dad's face when he told us the truth. You didn't have to know he'd been lying to you all this time. He was building weapons for the Fire Nation. And he hated it. He doesn't want to do this anymore!"

"You can't have tender feelings in the middle of a war, young man," the shaman began.

"Yes, he can," Hakoda said firmly. Looked Teo in the eye, managing to find that spot adults almost never did, where he was looking at the kid in the chair, not down. "I'm sorry. If I'd known that before I came here..." He sighed. "I still would have asked. My tribe is being wiped out, Teo. Katara's the last waterbender we have. My men haven't seen their families in two years. We've been fighting the Fire Lord, and we've been losing. Avatar Aang, this plan, is our best chance. If we don't beat Ozai now... there won't be another time."

"I know," Teo repeated, throat tight. "But what about after? If you win, are you going to leave him alone? Or..." He couldn't say it. He didn't even want to think it.

"Oh." Hakoda glanced aside, startled. Shook his head. "Spirits, Teo, how long have you been carrying that worry? If we win, we're going home. It's all we've ever wanted."

"So... when will we know if you win?" Teo asked. Because winning here had seemed simple. Drive the Fire Nation off, keep control of the air. And for months, it was that simple.

As winter got into spring, and the larders kept getting emptier... it wasn't simple anymore.

"They're offering to trade fish for some of our spices," Auntie Changchang had said. "And other things later, once they get crops in." The elderly matron had looked over the Temple's assembled parents, and nodded. "I think we should give them a chance."

Give them a chance, Teo thought now. They're Fire Nation. The Fire Lord's brother, Dad says. And his son.

Sure, the adults seemed to think that was the Earth King's seal on the treaty map. And the people down there hadn't asked for weapons. Yet. But they were who they were.

If he was lucky, Sokka and Katara had already showed the Temple who the Water Tribe was.

"We'll win when the Fire Nation stops fighting," Hakoda said, certain. "Just as you did here."

Teo blinked. It was just for a second, but he'd thought the shaman looked sad. Why?

"A fully trained Avatar should be enough to make any resistance crumble, after the Fire Lord is gone," Tao said. "The difficulty, of course, being the fully trained aspect. Have you any idea where we can find a trustworthy firebender to teach the Avatar?"

Hakoda pointed down.

Tao arched an eyebrow, deadpan. "You are joking, of course."

"They say they're not the enemy." Hakoda's eyes glinted. "Let them prove it."

"We are not going to train the Avatar on an active volcano, Chief Hakoda." Tao's staff tapped stone, emphasizing the words. "Particularly not one whose spirit recognizes Ozai's son as overlord. Avatar he may be, but until Aang masters all the elements, he is vulnerable. Especially to fire."

"The spirit?" Teo put in, hoping to head off what looked like the threat of a stare-down. "You mean the dragon in the cone?"

The shaman's attention snapped to him. "You saw it?"

"Everybody in the air saw it," Teo admitted. "There were people running around, and red armor coming up out of the water... and then she was just there, in the mist. And some of the red armor just - vanished in the flames. Like it was never even there." He frowned at the shaman. "Langxue and Saoluan said... man, it sounds crazy. They said they were attacked by drowned bodies. From the North Pole invasion. That's crazy, right? Sure, Auntie Changchang tells us scary stories about the dead who come back to kill people... but those are just stories." Scraping up a smile, he waited.

Tao was silent.

Teo swallowed dryly. "They... are just stories. Right?"

"No," the shaman said at last. "No, they are not." He gave the chief a wry shrug. "Which is why you should turn over the battle honors to those who've asked for them. I've worked enough protective rituals while I was on board to keep the drowned at bay, but once the Mechanist starts plundering the hull, those protections will be less effective. Better to let the Face-stealer's servants find Prince Zuko's people, rather than yours."

Hakoda drew in a sharp breath. "You said the Ocean's rage. Not that."

"And what would you expect the Ocean to ally with, when evil must be repaid with evil?" Tao said sharply. "They meant to destroy not only the Northern Tribe, but a Great Spirit! All the lives and souls of that fleet are forfeit." He winced. "Yet though that may be just, with such power at his command, the Face-stealer may take the chance to use the drowned against innocents as well. As he is already using the darkness wrought in the North to rouse spirits against all living humans. We must defeat the Fire Lord. And it must be the Avatar who does so. He can bridge the gap between our world and the spirits', and bring the Ocean proof his vengeance is complete. Only then will Koh be weakened, and restrained from injuring humankind."

"My children aren't about to let Aang face Ozai alone," Hakoda said pointedly.

"They should reconsider that." Tao held up a hand before Hakoda could protest. "I said they should. I understand what it is to be young, and see your friends in danger. It would be better if Aang acted alone. But if the spirits truly object to a young boy having help to face his mortal enemy... well. I fear they'll find a way to arrange matters to their liking."

Teo felt a little queasy. If the spirits really were out there, they wouldn't do that to Aang. He was one of the good guys.

They're not going to do that. We're going to help. And we're going to win. "So," Teo grinned, "are we really going to be making giant fish?"

Chapter End Notes

Kadzait - wandering wolves.

For an image, look for this: Ambulocetus

Though a kadzait is bigger. A lot bigger.

Chapter 58

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Blah blah Avatar blah blah destiny to restore the balance blah blah Roku says Gyatso's got a message for me if I just stay on the right path, blahty, blahty, blah!" Toph finished off a good bad-day-at-the-Earth-Rumble style rant with three measured steps and one punch.

One inconvenient inn-garden-blocking boulder, now gravel. Toph grumbled a bit more under her breath, scooping up pebbles with a wave of her hand to crush into sand. Maybe this would sweeten up Katara long enough to pry her away from Hama for a while. Just to talk. Because there was something wrong here.

"Water's all about family," Toph muttered to herself, toes gripping good, honest dirt. "So how come Miss Last Southern Waterbender isn't with hers?"

Funny, how speaking the words out loud made the day seem a little colder.

Why isn't Hama with her family?

Sure, it must have been tough just getting out of the Fire Lord's grip to start with. And travel wasn't cheap. And if you didn't really want to risk a boat ride past the blockade - well, Amaya had gotten along fine in Ba Sing Se, so waterbenders could make it without their tribe.

But Amaya was a waterbender right out in the open, where everybody could see. She fixed people, and guys like Huojin called her Aunt, and maybe that was close enough to family. Hama? She lived in this inn alone. And no one knew she was a bender.

It was such a little thing. Silly. Aang would tell her she was just jumpy from all those ghost stories the other night. Heck, he'd probably be right.

But it bothered her.

Pebbles rattled.

"You don't like it either, huh?" Toph rubbed the air where Boots kind of was-and-wasn't. "Aang likes it better when you're not around much. Me? Makes me worried."

Quiet, measured taps.

"You don't know what's up either." Toph blew out a breath, letting her lips wiggle past each other. "Sokka's not worried, or he wouldn't be poking around for spirits with Aang, but-"

Footsteps, pacing down the road into town. Still around a thick corner of forest, but it was time to stop talking to thin air and brush up on her looking like a Fire Nation kid skills. 'Cause if she was reading those steps right - light, determined, with a balanced shift and root almost as solid as an earthbender-

Firebender, Toph concluded. Then almost - almost - thought better of it, feeling the slight difference between left and right strides. Drag on his left, he's used to it - a firebender carrying swords?

"Hello, the inn," the swordsman called out; voice gruff and no-nonsense, which was cool, but with a smirk of I control the world that made Toph want to stick her tongue out on general principles.

"The inn-lady's out. I'm all alone." Toph made her voice quaver, just like she would for her family's guards. "You sound like a nice man. Could you help me?" Just come a little closer. You'll never know what hit you.

Steady footsteps stopped. For a moment, she only felt his unhurried breathing. Then...

A low, rolling laugh.

Oh no. You do not laugh at me!

"I have it on the authority of my wife, my children, and my father-in-law that I do not sound like a nice man," the swordsman chuckled. "I sound like what I am; a cranky old dragon of a firebender, who sticks his whiskers into anything curious, and gets singed for his trouble." He gave her a formal, silk-whispering bow. "And anyone who has tamed a betobeto into civilized behavior is never alone. I am glad my grandson's gift of trouble to you has turned out so well, Lady Bei Fong."

Uh-oh...

"Forgive my forwardness, but those who might introduce us are oceans away. Or in my granddaughter's service. While those might be pleasant young ladies under other circumstances, their presence here and now would be awkward," the swordsman said dryly. "I am Shidan of Byakko. And it is very good to see you well. My grandson had faith you would have thrashed your enemies soundly, but the Earth Army on that beach might still have done something stupid."

Slow heartbeat. Steady, familiar kind of stance. A firebender carrying swords.

Toph didn't remember crossing the ground between them. Just reaching up with both hands and yanking.

Yep. Whiskers.

"Where's Sparky?"

"Ah." A wince of rueful laughter in that voice. "Stubborn, quick on your feet, and you take advantage of your opponent's openings. Well done. But please, cub, not the whiskers." He rested a warm hand on her head. "Zuko is alive and well, Toph. I would know if he were not. He has stuck his hand into more than one flutter-hornet's nest, but he is well."

"Are you sure?" Toph got out, throat tight. "Really, really sure? Because we met this shaman and he said people who even look like they're bending something they shouldn't can get into all kinds of trouble." Dying. Zuko could be dying. And there's nothing I can do here about it!

"Yāorén are shoved back into life wounded in spirit. Yes. I know." Shidan rumbled a breath. "He was fortunate; he found a spirit-healer. And now that gift is awake in the world once more. Other spirits may have meant him to be used and cast aside, but my grandson is stronger than that." Carefully, he untangled her fingers from his whiskers. "I will send him a letter when I can. He misses you, too."

"You're Shidan." Hand touching his, Toph felt a hard sharpness that wasn't anything like fingernails. "Are you Kuzon's Shidan?"

Long, slow breaths; Toph felt the air around them warm. "That frightens many," the dragon said at last. "Does it frighten you?"

"Me? Scared of Sparky? Not happening," Toph shot back. "I just - I dunno, maybe you don't want to tell Aang what you are. But I kind of think he'd do better if he knew not everybody was gone-" Oh. Oh, stupid. Sure, Shidan had been Kuzon's friend. But he was a lord of a domain now, and outside of guys like Piandao who inherited from a ghost, all the great names were loyal to the Fire Lord-

"Toph. Cub!" Strong hands gripped her shoulders before she could bend him up to his chin in dirt. "I am no danger to you. Not to you, and not to Aang. Kotone holds Byakko, not I. Yes, were your friends to venture into her reach, she would be hard-pressed to avoid Ozai's orders to seize and destroy them. But I am not loyal to Ozai. Should fate so fall in my favor that I may do him a mischief... believe me, I will not hesitate." He crouched, resting his forehead against hers. "I will not harm Aang, and I will not lead him into harm. I am angry with him; his choices have harmed me and mine, though not all of that is his fault. But I have had many years to practice being human. I can be angry, without incinerating an idiot on the spot."

"Puts you one up on a lot of firebenders," Toph quipped. Even the guy's head was warm. Weird. "So if you're not after Aang, what are you doing here? I've been listening to Sokka read the map. Byakko's way away from here."

"It is," Shidan agreed. "But one of Byakko was here, almost a month ago. Hitomi. A merchant."

There'd been just a little hesitation before he said merchant. Which, Toph was guessing, meant she was something else, too.

"Her weekly letters failed to arrive. This is one of the last towns we know for certain that she visited," Shidan went on. "And since I need to touch several ports on business of my clan, I decided it would be best if I searched this town, instead of others. In case the rumors are true."

"Evil spirit-type rumors?" Toph said pointedly. "What kind of business?"

"To the first, yes," Shidan agreed. "To the second - I believe you would be more comfortable not knowing."

"I'm not helping Aang to be comfortable," Toph poked a finger his way. "If you're doing stuff to help the Fire Nation fight, Aang's got to-"

"I am seeking the widows and orphans of the Invasion of the North."

That quick, the solid ground of I've got a deal with Aang went all wobbly. Earth Rumble, Toph told herself. Bluster it out. "Yeah?"

"If the Avatar were to attack the Fire Nation directly, which the Fire Lord has always threatened he will, the children of the dead would be driven to revenge against their parents' slayer," Shidan said clinically. "It would be their duty and their honor... unless their great name, or the ghosts themselves, demand otherwise. And the Fire Lord will not." His voice dropped. "Thousands of them, Toph. Men, women, and children. All of them wishing nothing more than to face Aang, and slit his throat with a naked blade."

Toph couldn't hide a shiver. "You are not a nice guy."

"No," Shidan said quietly. "But I hope, at least, to be a kind dragon." His breath was hot, even when he stood to his full height. "If the ghosts do declare otherwise, some might set their vengeance aside. There is a place of ever-burning fires now, close enough to honor lost souls."

Byakko seeks those who wish to do that honor first, and avenge the dead later." A growling sigh. "It's not much, cub. I do know that. But if we can give passage to those who are grieving, yet still aware enough to think beyond the cry for blood..." Robes rustled as he shook his head. "At least, if your friend must strike to defend himself, he will only kill those willing to die."

Toph rubbed a hand on the back of her neck. No good. All the hairs there were still standing straight up.

Lucky I've got a distraction. "Company's coming."

"Friends, or locals?"

"Friends of mine," Toph said firmly. "Don't know how they feel about you. Sparky and Uncle kind of left a mark." Of the smoking bodies on the beach type. Brrr. She listened to the earth, sure now. "Not as bad as it could be. Katara's still out practicing." With Hama, she didn't say. Maybe Shidan had never been mixed up in the whole capturing-waterbenders mess, but he was still a firebender. Better they didn't run into each other. "Take off now, they probably won't see you."

"Not unless I wished it," Shidan mused. "I believe I would like to see Aang again. I must know how he has..."

Toph felt the footsteps coming toward them slow; heard Shidan suck in a breath. People must be seeing each other.

"Changed," Shidan finished in a near-whisper. "Or not. Agni. No wonder we could never find him. We sought a young man, and then a grown one. This..."

Toph felt his wince, and wondered why. He'd talked to Zuko, right? Sparky knew Aang had been trapped in an iceberg all these years. Didn't he?

But Kuzon didn't know it, Toph realized. He spent his whole life looking for Aang, and he couldn't find him. Because nobody could find him. He was in an ice-cube in the bottom of the ocean.

Which was just way unfair, and she hoped Zuko never found out about it. Sparky already thought the world was out to get him. This would be proof.

"Toph!" Sokka hailed them, footsteps jiggling in the way that meant he was waving an arm and probably had a big dopey grin plastered on his face. "Who's your new friend?"

Toph smirked. She hated manners. But sometimes, they could be fun. "Sokka of the Southern Water Tribe, Aang of the Southern Air Temple-"

"Hey, wait!" Aang protested.

"-This is Shidan of Byakko," Toph finished. Giggling inside; Sokka and Aang made such funny vibrations when they were hyperventilating.

"Good afternoon," Shidan inclined his head. "You suspect evil spirits have a hand in the forest disappearances? I have not found traces of such, yet. But it may be that I have not yet searched in the right place."

"Ah - but - you-" Aang gulped.

"Great name," Sokka reminded Aang with a poke. "He's supposed to handle this kind of thing." His voice shifted, facing toward Shidan. "In your own domain. You're kind of far from home."

"As is one of mine, missing this past month," Shidan replied. "Have you found any signs?"

Aang was up on his tip-toes in a way Toph knew meant he was thinking about airbending. "Um..."

"I see Toph is not the only wary one," Shidan observed. "Good; it will keep you alive longer. In short, then. I did not come here to aid you, but I did not come here to harm you. Nor will I." A shift of his weight; Toph heard the faint, impatient growl creep into his tone. "Unless you do plan to do what the Fire Lords have always sworn you would, and lay waste to our nation with earthquake, tsunami, and hurricane? No? I thought not. Then may we at least share that which we do know, for the hope of those vanished? I know little, save that one of mine was last known to be near here. Yet I have not yet found anything amiss."

"That's nice," Aang said at last.

"Twinkletoes?" Toph exclaimed, incredulous. "Come on! This is-"

"I know who he is, Toph. You trust Zuko. Fine. You trust Iroh, too. But they hurt Katara." Aang's voice shifted, facing Shidan's way. "Sorry. But I know your grandson."

"Do you," Shidan said levelly.

"And maybe you're a great name, and maybe you're trying to help, like Sokka says," Aang allowed. "But all the great names are under the Fire Lord, right? So whatever's upsetting the spirits here, it's something Ozai lets happen."

Toph felt Shidan stiffen. "Young man-"

"So it's my job," Aang cut him off. "I'm the Avatar. You just... stay out of the way, okay? And don't make things any worse."

"Um." Sokka gulped. "Aang?"

Toph felt a brush of heat through her toes, and readied herself. She didn't want to hurt Shidan, but the old dragon said he had a temper...

"You are a young fool, with all Air's pride. And whoever taught you of the spirits should be flogged," Shidan said coldly. "Very well. If you do not wish temporary alliance, then Byakko has its own measures to take. Lady Bei Fong? Do stay alive."

Turning on his heel, Shidan started toward town.

"Sorry... I can't let you!"

Earth shot up and out with Aang's fists, swallowing the dragon to his shoulders.

"Aang, buddy," Sokka muttered, "I don't think this is a good idea."

"I really am sorry," Aang sighed. "But you can't tell Ozai about us. We'll... have a friend let you go after we're gone. Okay?"

"Aang!" Oh, Toph was this far from just stomping all that rock to dust. But she'd try talking first. Aang liked people to talk, right? "He hates Ozai. He's not gonna tell anybody about us-"

"Enough." Shidan's voice was oddly calm, for a firebender trapped in bent stone. "Avatar Aang. Have you truly mastered any element?"

Uh-oh, Toph thought, chilled.

"Because if you had mastered earthbending..."

She knew that tone. That was Zuko's I'm about to break things tone.

But he's buried in rock! What can he - do-

Heat. Flowing through the ground, like walking near a slow fire.

"...You would know your mistake." Shidan inhaled, and breathed.

Stone poured from him like boiling water.

Toph took quick steps back, heat rolling past her face like an open oven, carrying the scent of burned soil. Shidan flowed out of the hole in the path, a graceful sweep of arms catching up molten stone into a dragon of lava between himself and a gaping Aang-

Shidan breathed out, and lava crackled into cooling stone.

"All earth here remembers fire," the dragon growled. "Every boulder. Every tree. Every leaf blown in the wind. Every drop of water on these islands! All, born of the fire mountains and their struggle against sea and sky! This land is Fire!" He lowered his hands, steam hissing from his breath. "And I am a firebending master. Do not cross me, boy. I have no more patience with foolishness."

Aang shuddered. "You- but- Jeong Jeong never-"

"Jeong Jeong was not standing on an active volcano," Shidan said dryly.

"Shiyu said it took an Avatar to bend lava." The shiver went right down Aang's spine to shake the ground under him. "You're not human."

Toph tensed. This was going to go so wrong.

"So the Avatar can recognize the spirit-touched, when they stare him in the face," Shidan mused. "Finally." Sharp nails clicked together. "You think yourself the only one to mediate between mortal lives and the spirits, boy? Then how will you deal with me?"

"I - um - give me a minute..."

"Take your time. But do not take mine." A hmph. "You. Young swordsman. I have heard you know of great names. Know this. One of mine was lost within that forest. If I do not return with her, Byakko will burn it to the ground."

"No!" Aang jumped between Shidan and the nearest path to the woods. "That won't solve anything!"

"No? In a land of fire, and you are so certain we do not need a cleansing blaze?" Shidan cocked his head. "You assume much, airbender."

Toph held her breath. Because Aang wasn't bouncing anymore. His toes were almost still, like grass just before a breeze.

"Yeah," Aang said quietly. "I'm an airbender. And maybe I don't know. But I've got to try another way!"

A relieved breath whooshed out of her, and Toph grinned. No bouncing. No panic. Head and heart and bending all settled and pointing, true as a lodestone. Now that was Twinkletoes at his best.

And with luck, it'd let them avoid Twinkletoes at his crispiest.

"Given the fines Byakko would bear for burning down another domain's forest, so would I," Shidan observed.

Aang thumped back down on his heels. "Why's a spirit care about money? It's - you know. Human stuff."

Sokka shifted on his feet, obviously keeping his mouth shut.

He knows, Toph realized. He knows what Shidan is. How?

"And this is where your teachers have failed," Shidan sighed. "I am not a spirit, young airbender. I am spirit-touched, and as mortal as you. Mostly."

"But... you're not human," Aang protested.

"I am not," Shidan agreed. "Yet I am bound to humans, and have kin among them. We live within human laws. And if we do not, we accept the consequences of breaking them. A forest fire would be very inconvenient." He paused. "But one of my domain is lost. Perhaps dead. Perhaps worse. I mean to search for her. If I fail, and fall victim - then Byakko will bear that fine, and gladly. For any malice that can swallow such as I would be a worse threat to our nation than you can imagine."

"...You're going to give the spirit a chance to grab you, before anybody burns anything down." Aang drew a step back, stunned.

"Has the rushing wind deafened your ears?" Shidan *hmp*hed. "Yes. Of course."

"Of course?"

"I am a great name." Heat brushed the ground again. "I am responsible for my people. I am responsible for nurturing the spirits who choose to dwell in our domain. And for standing against those who would do harm, unjust and uncalled-for. Do you think me so proud as to assume Hitomi faultless, simply because she is one of mine? I will find this spirit, if spirit it is. I will ask its grievance. And if amends can be made, we will make them. Only if the spirit is lost to malice, twisted and corrupt, will Bayakko strike."

Aang flung up his hands in disbelief. "Then why didn't you say that?"

Sokka slapped himself in the forehead, and sighed.

Shidan growled under his breath. "Because anyone who has wandered as much of the Fire Nation as you have should be able to see that most spirits are not wreaking havoc! Which should inform you, if you would root your feet to earth long enough to think, that most of those who hold this land in their trust, are carrying out their duty!"

Silence. Even the cricket-mice nibbling seeds in the bushes went still. Toph swore she could hear Aang blink.

"Agni." The growl faded, weary. "Did that never occur to you? Did you only see war, and death, and think all you had seen was malice and evil?"

Aang set his stance. "Attacking innocent people is evil!"

"But it is not malice," Shidan snapped. "Not as spirits know it. The war was ordered. For a hundred years, the Fire Lords have commanded us to war. And the great names must obey. They care for their domains, so most spirits who dwell within them are at peace. But turn against their duty? Turn against the Fire Lord Avatar Kyoshi set above us? We would have a bloodbath the likes of which this land has never seen, as the spirits themselves turned on us!"

"But... that's not fair," Aang said at last.

"If your teachers in spirits told you they were fair, they have done us all a grave disservice," Shidan stated. "Shirotora cares for Byakko because our domain cares for him. Agni cares for the Fire Nation because we are fire, and creation, and destruction. The Face-Stealer cares for souls drowned in his domain as a miser does his gold; because they will give him what he wants." Shidan sighed. "And the Avatar Spirit cares for the world, because it is the world. It does not seek justice. It does not understand justice. It knows only threats to the world, and that threats must be destroyed."

Toph could feel Aang's heart hammering. "You don't think that," she insisted. Even though that slow, steady dragon's heart said he really, really did.

"I do," Shidan said calmly. "But I also know what the Fire Lords will never admit. The Avatar Spirit was not Kyoshi. It was not Roku. And it is not Aang." He inclined his head to the airbender. "You hold the world's power within you. You must decide, each and every day, if you will seek human justice, or a spirit's revenge. You stand between two worlds, apart from both. And I would not be in your place for all the world; not even if time were turned back, and all Makoto's evil undone, and my clan alive once more." His toes tapped once, like a cat-owl's twitching tail. "You believe you risk much by accepting my aid. Has it never occurred to you I risk Hitomi's life by seeking yours?"

Aang froze. Shook his head, ends of his headband brushing short hair. "That doesn't even make sense."

"Yeah, it does," Sokka said grimly. "Aang. He's saying if there's an angry spirit in those woods, it might be mad 'cause someone's trying to go against the Fire Lord."

Aang gulped. "It's not," he said, voice only a little shaky. "It can't be."

"I pray you are right. For both our sakes." Shidan's hand swept toward town. "Those who dwell here will know more of the hazards of the night, and you have been here longer than I. Where shall we ask?"

Chapter End Notes

There is a difference between an act seen as evil (you're killing my people) and an act defined as malicious. In Anglo-American law, malice "is expressed when there is manifested a deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a human being."

The key word there is "unlawfully". If you're a soldier fighting an enemy country, killing that country's soldiers on the battlefield is, generally, not unlawful.

Spirits are not about justice. They are about rules. Check any fairy tale. There are no extenuating circumstances. You break the rules, you pay the price. You follow the rules - even if you warp the letter of them 'til it bends around backward - and you're generally home free.

Chapter 59

Chapter Notes

No way could I improve on the awesomeness of the Katara/Hama fight. So it happens
- just with a little alteration in who shows up at the end.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"How'd you know?" the earthbender demanded.

At least Toph had waited until they were in town and Aang was distracted, Sokka thought, looking down at the small fist gripping his tunic. "Um." He tried to pry her loose. No good; Toph was in the mood to be sticky as a sandspur. "Know what?"

"What Shidan is!"

Oh. "Hey, we met Temul. Kind of a graphic demonstration of your average, everyday, kill it with fire dragon-child."

Toph cocked her head, listening. "You know about dragon-children?"

"Um... yeah. Temul kind of-" Sokka's brain caught up with his mouth. "Wait a minute. How do you know about them?"

Toph shrugged. "Girl talk. With Teruko."

Okay, that just boggled the mind. Toph and girl talk just did not belong in the same universe.

Then again, neither did Fire Navy marine Teruko. Anybody with a temper and nails like that...

Oh.

Briefly, Sokka harbored a fantasy of zipping back in time and thunking a few people on that beach over the head. Himself included. There had to be some kind of spirit who could pull it off.

So Teruko was a dragon-child. And she'd taken Zuko under her protection when he broke loyalty; no ifs, ands, or buts. Which, given what Sokka knew from Temul, almost guaranteed she saw him as her clan, even though they'd never met before.

So Teruko knew what he was. And she and Toph were talking... "You knew what Zuko was all this time?" And man, Zuko actually made sense now. Nobody human tracked down a guy across the whole world because their dad said so.

"Hey. His business, not yours," Toph shot back. "You heard what Aang said about Shidan. He doesn't even get that dragons are people."

Which Shidan? Sokka almost asked. Because there were two Shidans in this mess, both from Byakko...

Shidan of Byakko.

Zuko's grandfather.

"...Mommy."

Uneasy, Toph let go. "Sokka?"

Sokka swallowed, and glanced at the old swordsman questioning a noodle-seller on the other side of the street. The old dragon. "Tell me nobody's selling barbecue sauce?"

For once, Toph didn't look sure of herself. "Figured it out, huh?"

"Having a hard time believing it, but - yeah." Whoa. "I hope Appa stays out of sight. Just because he's smaller right now... Appa still smells like lunch."

"Sokka!" Toph punched him in the arm. "He knows Appa. Think about it."

Oh. Right. Weird.

"Relax, Snoozles." Toph started walking again. "He said what he's after. And it's not us."

"Um." Sokka made his feet move. Dragon. Walking right in the middle of people who'd kill him if Ozai knew what he was. Gah.

Well. Now he knew where Zuko got his guts.

"So Ozai's got a shoot to kill order on his wife's father, and he doesn't even know it." Sokka shook his head, trying to rattle loose aching thoughts. "That explains so much about Crazy Blue Fire."

"Yeah. At least all my parents want to do is kidnap me."

Right. When had their lives gotten so weird? "Wonder if he knows anything about telling ghosts you don't need to get your butt kicked every night..."

Toph poked him. "You're talking to ghosts?"

"Just one," Sokka stammered, before he could think about it. "Geh. Could you not ask? She says she's fine on the whole revenge on Aang thing. But I don't know if Aang is."

"And you don't want Katara mad at you for sneaking off with another ghost girl behind Yue's back."

"And I definitely don't want Katara mad at me," Sokka started. Blinked. "Eww! Toph! Temul's not a girl!"

...Maybe he should hope something knocked him out. Before he spilled any other big secrets.

"Temul." Toph grinned. "And she's not grinding Aang into the dirt? That's got to bite." She bounced as she walked. "How bad does she flatten you?"

"Can we not talk about this in town?" Sokka asked, keeping his voice low. "It's... kind of complicated." He looked ahead, where Aang had just caught up with a nervous-looking porter. "And I think Aang found something."

Old Man Ding, Sokka sorted out of Aang's chatter and the porter's wary, sunset-eyeing replies. So somebody does know something.

I wonder what kind of spirit we're up against this time?

"I didn't know spirits made prisons."

"They don't."

Toph shivered as she bent another set of chains loose from stone, Shidan's low growl still rumbling through her ears. Way easier to listen to that, with all its promise of teeth and flames, than to the horror her feet were showing her. Starved victims sinking to the floor as she loosened their chains. Groaning, bone-broken men; weeping women; a few kids too frightened to even cry. And the smells, the awful, throat-clogging stink, that told her she did not want to go any farther back in the cavern...

"Hitomi. Get Lady Bei Fong some fresh air."

"Y-yes, Lord Shidan!"

Toph almost growled at the shivering lady, ex-prisoner or not. "I'm not running away!"

"I want to run away." Hitomi's voice quavered a little, as she wove on tender feet toward the cave entrance. "Lord Shidan's been on battlefields before. He - he can do this..."

Aw, heck. Maybe it wasn't Lady Bei Fong Shidan wanted out of this hell-pit. Hitomi was shaking like Twinkletoes after a pot of double-brewed tea.

Give the lady some credit, though. She got out into open air before she curled up in a little ball and started crying. Toph nibbled her lip, and patted Hitomi on one ragged shoulder. "Hey. It's gonna be okay."

"No air, only stone... I couldn't breathe..."

Okay, that was a little weird. "Lots of air out here," Toph pointed out. "Whole sky full of it. See?" She sucked in a noisy breath, blew it back out like Aang making a funny face. "Plenty of..."

Fluttery heartbeat. Quick breaths, that somehow took in more air than anybody should be able to breathe. A light weight on the ground, lighter than even a month of short rations should leave someone that tall; like even Hitomi's bones weren't heavy enough. She'd only ever felt one other person like that.

"...You're a yamabushi."

Hitomi went rigid.

"No, no, it's okay!" Toph said quickly. Grabbed one of Hitomi's hands, and put it on her back so the lady could feel her breathe. "I know Teruko. She's a marine on Captain Jee's ship. Now she's looking after Sparky... I mean, Shidan's grandson. You know. Zuko."

"You know the prince?" Hitomi's heartbeat slowed a little. "I thought... all the reports say you're the Avatar's teacher."

Ooof. They were getting into where things got complicated. "I'm Aang's teacher," Toph agreed. "Earthbending. And I'm gonna help him stop this war. So Ozai's going down." She grinned. "But Sparky and I broke up a Dai Li prison together. He's okay."

"You broke up a..." Reluctantly, Hitomi started to laugh.

"So. We good?" Toph shrugged. "'Cause Aang's going to love talking to another airbender-"

"I'm not an airbender!"

Toph poked herself in the side of her head. Nope; nothing rattling loose. "But you're a yamabushi."

"We're not all - he's a Temple child, you can't tell him-" Hyperventilating, Hitomi cut herself off. Gulped, and deliberately held her breath.

Not an airbender? Toph shook her head. Aang said all the Air Nomads were airbenders.

Hitomi let air rush out, and started breathing again. "Don't tell him. A Temple child, the danger - I'll lie if you tell him!"

Whoa. Toph's toes cringed from that fierce truth. "Okay. I got it. You're just a merchant. But why? Aang wouldn't hurt... somebody he's got stuff in common with."

"So long as Monk Aang lives, the Temple lives," Hitomi stated. "The Elders were talking to Monk Gyatso before... before the war. But his apprentice wasn't old enough to find his Way. We aren't to speak of the morning wind until he is."

"His way?" Toph frowned.

"It's... important," Hitomi said carefully. "When you're old enough to ask questions. And think of your own answers." She shifted her head, probably looking aside. "I'm sorry. I can't explain any farther."

Got that right; she hadn't explained. But at least Hitomi wasn't shaking anymore. "You don't want to walk on those," Toph said bluntly. She'd felt every little wince as the merchant had scrambled out of the cave. It made her feet cringe all the way to her spine. The skin was whole, but the muscles under it... ow. How had Hama done that?

Not asking. I don't want to know. "If we get the kids out, can you look after them?"

"Of course, but-"

"Good." Toph cupped her hands around her mouth. "Tell 'em to hang onto something, Grandpa! I'm bringing everybody out!"

Deep breath. Plant one foot. Reach out - reach into the mountain - like locking onto the wrist and arm of a guy about to go splat. And yank.

Earth roared.

Hitomi meeped.

Toph smirked, feeling all those warm, scared, living people up on the surface again. First she'd bust up Hama's fun spot. Then she'd bust up Hama. "Yeah. I am so cool."

"...You called Lord Shidan Grandpa."

Airbenders. Never impressed by the important stuff.

Worst. Night. Of my life, Sokka thought, blood running cold as Katara cried like her heart was breaking, and Hama just stood there and laughed. Given his nights now included getting his butt almost sliced off by a cranky ghost on a regular basis, that was saying something.

But Temul just tried her damndest to almost kill him. What Hama had made them do, made Katara do-

Right now, all his nerves were in shake-until-I-realize-I'm-still-alive mode. When it wore off...

I hate that woman. I really, really hate her.

It was hard, and it hurt. Hate the sea raiders who'd killed their mother? Easy. They were Fire Nation, and they'd come to kill any waterbender they could find. Hating them was like breathing. You just did it.

Hate someone from his own tribe? It was like tearing his heart out.

Aang was trying to hug Katara, as much as she'd let him. Good. Somebody ought to keep telling her she wasn't a monster. Right now, he... oh, spirits.

She's still laughing.

And it was weird, because Sokka would have thought he'd be getting madder. But he wasn't. He just felt... cold.

Sooner or later, Aang's going to snap back to earth with the rest of us. And then he's going to get mad.

The last time anyone had done anything this horrible to Katara, General Fong had lost big chunks of his fortress. Hama didn't have a fortress, but the moon was still up, and-

Hama doesn't know Aang's a waterbender.

If she did, if she realized her sick little game wasn't done yet-

He had to be quick. And he had to be subtle. If Hama saw him coming it'd be skewering time all over again.

Yeah. He knew what he had to do. Now to get his feet to move and do it.

Dad would do it. He's the chief. Sometimes you can't wait for the tribe to decide. And we know the Fire Nation can't hold her.

Dad would do it. Come on, move...

"Sokka, look out!"

Toph, heading for them at a dead run. A whole bunch of angry ex-prisoners were running or staggering after her, chains and other improvised weapons in hand. But right behind Toph-

Hama snarled, and Sokka knew what she saw. Even under moonlight, gold sea-silk didn't look like anything else.

"Firebender!"

Gray eyes gleaming, Hama raised a withered hand-

"Don't talk in a fight."

Piandao and Temul had hammered it into him, day and night. Fighting in war wasn't Water Tribe fighting. There was no honor in it. No glorious story-songs later, of how you'd taunted your enemy and left him bruised and bleeding on the ice to lick his wounds and feel shamed. There was only you, and the people who were going to be dead.

"Never talk in a fight. Talking means you're thinking. Thinking means you're reacting. You need to act.

"The man behind that blade is going to kill you. He'll kill you, your friends, your dreams.

"Don't talk. Don't think. Kill him first!"

Hama had thought. Hama had reacted. All in the space of one breath.

Shidan had moved.

Hama twisted away from the gleam of moonlight on steel, blood a dark line down one arm. The sweep of hand she'd meant to swat Shidan to the ground with was disrupted, turned into a clenched fist to hold-

Wheeling from a rising slash, Shidan froze.

"Steel? And where's a firebender's pride?" Hama side-stepped away, fist still clenched. "You should have seared me."

"Throw fire, against one who can twist a man's movements awry, in a forest your battle has stripped of water," Shidan gritted out, unmoving. "Oh, yes. Because a crown fire at the hour of ghosts is such a gracious gift to those who've survived your hate."

Which didn't ring right, Sokka thought, desperately trying to inch out of Hama's line of sight. He'd seen Jeong Jeong light fire on water. Shidan could have burned his enemy down without scorching the forest-

Dragons don't kill with fire, Temul's gift whispered to him. Not if they have any other way. They use claws...

And they go for the throat.

Darkness on dark clothing. Not from Hama's arm. Which meant-

Didn't mean anything while she was still trying to kill them, Sokka knew, glancing frantically around the clearing for anything that might tip the odds their way. And coming up empty. Hama kept both swordsmen in view, her open back turned to Aang and Katara like two benders were no threat at all. And damn it, they weren't. Katara was still kneeling, tears slipping down her face, and Aang was holding onto her like a lifeline, pale as a sick fish.

And the worst of it was he couldn't blame them. He couldn't. Katara thought water was the most blessed, noble element, and Aang thought nobody could make you do anything.

The fact that somebody like Hama even existed - meant they were wrong.

Hissing, Hama started to drag her clenched fist down-

It wouldn't move.

Shidan wasn't moving.

"All that lives bends with water," Hama snapped. "Bow, lordling! Know you are beaten at last!"

"By such as you? Never." Sweat beaded the old dragon's face, but his teeth gleamed sharp and bright. "I am Agni's child. The blood in my veins is fire. Bend me to your will? You'll bend a bonfire first!"

"Your blood, perhaps," Hama sneered. "Theirs?" Cackling, she slashed her bloodied hand outward, water flowing off the ground into a flurry of ice-daggers-

"Toph!" Sokka yelled. "Wall!"

Hama's invisible hand clamped on his veins, and he wanted to swear. Or scream.

But earth grated on earth, as Toph trusted him and flung up barriers against the attack she couldn't see.

Ice whined into soil, thudding in a way that shivered his spine. Gleaming like poisoned diamonds, it sawed down.

Toph might not be able to see water in air, but she could feel her defensive shell ripping apart. The earthbender skipped a step sideways, clapped her hands together-

Soil clamped around Hama, mounded to her neck.

Got her. Sokka drew in a breath of relief as his arms and legs worked to his will again. Now, what do we do-

Earth powdered into dust on the wind, and blew away.

Oh, hell no.

Hama stalked out of scattering dust, arms and hands wreathed in thick bands of water. "Water is everywhere, little earthbender. Even in the breath of a flame!"

Ice-needles. Everywhere.

Sokka was moving before he'd figured out what he was moving for; black metal shattering icy edges, leaving his hands and arms stung and slashed, seeping red in the firelight. But only slashes, while trees beside him glittered with needles thick as boarqupine quills...

Firelight.

A shielding globe of flame, like Azula's, sizzling ice to steam before it could impale Toph's hapless bunch of ex-prisoners. But some of the ice cracked instead of melting, Hama's swirl of arms and body whipping shards around to stab unprotected skin.

This time, nothing could explain the screams away.

"You have to stop this!"

Aang. Running up to Hama like she hadn't played him like a puppet minutes before; like he wasn't bleeding from a half-dozen ice-slashes too numb to hurt. "I know you're angry. I know they hurt you! But this is-"

A torrent of ice swatted him away, like Gran-Gran tossing out spoiled squid.

"Wrong?" Hama's smile froze Sokka's blood. "To show my young apprentice just what a bloodbender can do? Watch, Katara! Our enemies give us our weapons!"

Gnarled hands swept wide, pulled inward-

There was a pulling at Sokka's skin, like an unseen leech had bitten down. Blood leapt from his cuts like iron dust to a lodestone, joining the red swirling away from more screams, pulsing into a crimson globe between Hama's cracked palms as she laughed, laughed...

Something rattled, and Hama tripped over air. Staggered, eyes wide-

Crumpled to the ground, crimson splashing over Aang's feet.

Fire flickered; vanished. Shidan drew a hissing breath, looking down on the fallen bloodbender. "Your death's name," he said quietly, hand on one hilt, "is Haegiri."

Fly-Cutter.

The last of the blood-globe fell apart, gurgling into dry earth. Hama stared at them all, gasping for the breath to move, bend, live...

"Hateful, evil woman." Shidan's lip curled; a snarl of disgust. "So bent on taking our blood, you forgot your own."

Matted with blood, gray hair fell. And didn't rise.

"No!" Shuddering, Katara shot to her feet. "No, she can't be - you couldn't have-!"

Aang caught her. "It's... it's over." Gray eyes were wide as saucers. "I just - don't know how..."

Make sure. Nerving himself, Sokka tipped Hama's head to the side, exposing the razor-thin slash that had licked across the pulse of her throat.

Shoulder to waist, Hama's dress was sodden with blood.

"Get the apprentice!"

Sokka didn't know which of the ragged survivors had yelled it, and didn't care. He just put himself and his sword between Katara and the mob, hoping he wouldn't have to kill people they'd tried to save-

Toph slapped palms against air, and clawed her hands, a barrier of spikes sprouting in front of the rush. "You stop that right now! Katara was trying to help you!"

If they got out of this alive, Sokka was never complaining about Toph scamming people again.

One of the more wild-eyed men thrust an accusing finger Katara's way. "That monster called you her apprentice!"

"This child, her sishyah?" Shidan snorted. "Are you blind?"

One who needs to be taught, Sokka thought. Which wasn't apprentice, not by a long shot. Though, in a really weird way, it fit what Hama had been doing so scarily better...

And... damn it. Shidan had dragged in High Court. Which might get him a better listen from scared strangers, but meant Katara and Aang would be totally clueless about what was really being said.

If they decided to jump in - how was he going to argue their way out of this without cracking out his own High Court in front of everybody? Which was not going to go over well, no matter what he said, and the last thing they needed was an angry Avatar or waterbender in this mess-

"Look at her, man!" Shidan snarled on. "Do those tears trace the flesh of one who wishes to follow evil into darkness? Show me a pupil more sunya-susrusha than she!"

Devoid of desire to hear or learn, Sokka knew. Deserted. Desolate.

Damn. He could hug the old dragon. Shidan wasn't just saying she wasn't Hama's apprentice. He was defying the charge. Defending her in the way these people would understand; that Katara saw evil and wanted no part of it.

Sokka let out a shaky breath, and nodded to catch Katara's eye. Winked at her.

For a second, she just stared at him. Then straightened, and moved closer to Aang, arm circling his shoulders.

Yes! Yes, exactly! Sokka almost grinned. He's a kid. You're older, you're responsible for him. You had to do what you had to do, they'll get that...

"There is her brother!" Shidan growled. "There her clan-allies, who did risk themselves to save you! Who of us would not pick up even a poisoned blade, to save our kin from evil? Who of us would not?"

Aang almost made a noise. Sokka stomped his toes.

"This girl was lied to," Shidan went on, voice heated enough to raise steam. "This girl was deceived. This girl thought she dealt with an innocent woman - as we all thought! Who would believe another human capable of such malice? Who would ever?"

Which pretty much turned everything Gran-Gran and the rest of the tribe's elders had said about the Fire Nation on its head. Sokka had to blink, disoriented. If he hadn't been flying around the world with Aang for months, meeting people from crazy-but-okay like Aang and the Kyoshi Islanders to straight out crazy like Azula-

I'd probably be running right at them screaming about the evil Fire Nation, Sokka knew. Ouch.

Aang and Toph weren't going to run screaming at anybody - for entirely different reasons. But Katara...

"She had to stop." Katara's fingers clutched her skirt. "That was... she had to stop. We don't do this."

"Indeed not," Shidan said gravely. "Your ways are hard, but you well know how to deal with evil when you find it." He turned to the crowd; not a mob, not now, with those tired and hurt looks on gaunt faces. "Take the injured back to the village. Rouse the Guard, after dawn, to clear that hellhole's depths. After dawn. We may all need its safety." He glanced at the body, then at Aang. "These young ones know the ways our foe abandoned, and this young gentleman has some of a Sage's training. We shall see to it no water-ghost stalks by moonlight."

Aang gulped. "I'm... not really good with all the shaman stuff yet."

"Which is why you will not act alone," Shidan stated. "We will manage." He granted Aang a nod, then bowed to the crowd. "Journey safely, and see the dawn."

A scattered flurry of bows came in return, and the crowd started filtering away. Sokka closed his eyes, just for a moment, and sagged in relief.

We made it. We're going to live.

And he hadn't had to hurt anybody they'd tried to save. There were no words for that desperate relief.

Toph's knuckles jabbed his ribs. "Don't fall asleep on us now, Snoozles."

"Sleep!" Sokka shuddered. Glanced at the blackness soaking the forest floor, that in daylight would show drying crimson. "I never want to sleep again."

"How could she do this?" Katara shivered. "I don't understand. Even if someone's just evil... how could she?"

"Monk Gyatso told me a story once." Aang wouldn't quite look at the body. "It wasn't something the Elders liked us kids hearing, but... He said that the wind was our friend. But once in a while, in a really long time, there was a dark wind that could blow through people. And if we thought we felt it, we should get away from that person. Until it blew away."

"Your master was a wise man," Shidan nodded. "Hama... she was never a kind woman. But she suffered more than any soul should have to bear." He held out a hand. "Come. Let us bear your dead to the sea. And I will tell you of why."

Chapter End Notes

Anyone else wonder how on earth the Gaang got away unscathed at the end of Puppetmaster in canon? Hama out-and-out said Katara was a bloodbender in front of her victims. You'd think they'd rip the whole crew apart.

I've read some old aikido masters take up iaido for exercise - and they can be blindingly, devastatingly fast. To quote one, "You think I am faster than you? No! I am an old man! You are faster than me! The difference is I move, while you are only thinking of moving."

Chapter 60

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

She could make you do things. Someone can make you do things. Safely back on land after they'd dropped Hama's canvas-wrapped body into the deep, Aang buried his face in Appa's welcome fur.

He didn't want to look at the campfire Shidan had lit with a touch, or whatever the firebender was doing with it that made flames crackle and Hitomi sigh in grateful relief. Hitomi was weird. Washing her face and a new cloak made her a lot less shabby, but Aang still felt twitchy around her.

And he really didn't want to look across the fire, where Sokka and Katara were sitting, like this was any ordinary day. Like the person who'd killed someone - who'd let Hama bleed to death - was just... someone to talk to.

He didn't want to look at anyone. Not when the world was all wrong.

Hama made us almost kill each other. And Katara had to - she had to...

Appa rumbled comfortingly. Aang wished he could hide under thick fur and never, ever come out.

"What happened to her?" Katara's voice wavered. "She said - it was too awful to talk about. But it's never winter here, the sun never goes away, I didn't think anyone could-" She cut herself off.

"Be taken by the Wendigo in summer?" Shidan finished.

Sokka and Katara drew sharp breaths.

"Be easy." There was a crackle, as if Shidan had thrown something into the small fire. "I do know the proper ward-offs, when one must speak of the Cold Ones plainly." He raised his voice a bit. "If you ever must ask of them, Toph, be ready to throw salt in a fire. They hate salt, and will avoid it. And you."

"Um. 'Kay. Salt. Got it." Toph made a tsk sound, like sucking breath past her teeth. "Salt and fire. Huh."

"How do you know that?" Sokka pounced.

"When I was younger, I traveled many places," Shidan said, matter-of-fact. "The Southern Water Tribe had the closest waterbenders to the Southern Air Temple. Kuzon and I thought it a logical place to look for a young boy who had learned he was the Avatar." A sigh. "But Aang never reached your tribe. We searched; the whole of your coasts, I think. But there was no sign; in ice, sea, or sky. Still, while we were there, we learned of the people we hoped Aang had set out to find. And Kuzon had an idea."

Hidden in the rise and fall of Appa's furry breaths, Aang listened.

"Sozin sought the Avatar, and we knew he would never rest until Aang was found," Shidan went on. "We sought reports of unusual bending? So did the Fire Lord. Training a master bender takes time. It is noticeable. The damage, from misaimed blows of a master's strength; never to mention an Avatar's-!" He hmped. "We knew, should we find Aang, we would be racing the very wind to keep him alive. So Kuzon and I thought on how an Avatar is trained. What, above all, he needs to know. And we set out to acquire it." A low chuckle. "Kuzon could no more bend water than he could fly, but he did learn the basics of the style. And others. Had he lived to find you, Toph, he would have been at your feet for weeks. The precision of your steps, how your bending flows with the fractures of the earth rather than cracking it as senseless stone..." He trailed off. "Forgive me. I miss my friend.

"So. Hama." A harsh breath. "As you say, we lack winter as you know it. The sun lessens, but it never vanishes. It was not the Cold Ones' touch that drove Hama. It was her fury at evil of quite another sort. Azulon's evil."

A long pause. Aang counted Appa's breaths.

"Azulon's evil is very difficult for one of Fire to unravel," Shidan said carefully. "In part, because much of it does not look like evil at all. It steals the robes of expediency, and if our path is not well-lit, we believe we walk with one of our dearest friends."

"What's expediency?" Toph asked, suspicious.

Aang rolled his eyes, and lifted his face away from fur. "It's when people do stuff they shouldn't, just because it's easy."

"The Air Nomads have often defined it so," Shidan said dryly. "For all the speed of the wind, the Temples were never ones to act in haste. Fire is, and so we hold to the older meanings. Speed. Fitness for the task. Seeing an opportunity to be efficient - to gain the most flame from the least fuel - and taking it."

"You're good at taking," Katara said darkly.

"You're not very good at gratitude," Hitomi muttered.

"Gratitude?" Katara shot back. "One of my people had to die! What am I supposed to be grateful for?"

"Your lives?"

"Hitomi," Shidan reproved her. "If Katara feels she and those she travels with were not in danger, they likely were not. The young lady is a waterbender. If she chose to pull hearts to battle each other, rather than only feel the terror and self-loathing Hama inflicted, then we would have been the ones in danger of our lives." He hmped. "'Your pardon, Lord Sabe. I had to kill several of your missing citizens in self-defense.' Oh yes. That conversation would have gone so well."

"You're cruel," Katara whispered.

"Would you had met Azulon," Shidan mused. "Then you might compare us." Flames crackled. "Ah, but you almost did. And that was no mere mischance, young lady. Azulon had a plan, gathering the waterbenders of your tribe. And that is where expediency cloaks evil."

"He didn't gather my mother-!"

Thuds; footsteps brought to a sudden halt. "Katara." Sokka's voice was level. Warning. "Shidan. They didn't come to take prisoners. Not that time."

"So I now know," Shidan said thoughtfully. "And that, I still find troubling. Azulon had a plan to find and capture the Avatar. Why should he abandon it, with over half the Earth Kingdom still to fall?"

Sokka made an impatient noise. "How could taking waterbenders be a plan to catch- oh." The Water Tribe boy muttered something under his breath that didn't sound at all friendly. "He wasn't after us, was he? We were just in the way."

"Somebody want to translate for those of us whose brains aren't hung up on sharp edges?" Toph put in.

"The worst evil can come not from hate, but from indifference," Shidan stated. "Azulon's plan, first as a general and then as Fire Lord, was to arrange the world to his liking. Rather than hunt the Avatar - which he had done, as Sozin before him and Iroh and Ozai after - he would make the Avatar find him. Think! If Aang were dead, and as years passed it seemed he must be, a new Avatar must learn Air. With the Temples gone, Azulon knew of only one place Air's teachings could surely be found, and the onmitsu were under his control. Why should he not seek to hold Water in his grasp as well?" A rumbling sigh. "The North Sozin had ventured, and found too strong. But the South... your villages were free, yet divided. So Azulon began there."

Aang winced.

"That's sick," Katara got out.

"Worked, though." Toph sounded queasy herself. "Like dropping a boulder on an anthill. Ugh."

"Remind me not to tell you the tale of Shuten Douji until you are older," Shidan noted. "Let it be enough to know that while we love our clans and our nation, we do not trust those outside a great name's authority. And if an outsider threatens what is ours - well. There is little we will not do, if we must resort to Low War."

"Shuten Douji?" Sokka's voice squeaked. "Isn't that the one where Raikou convinced the mountain ogres he was harmless by - ooough." He gulped. "You know, back home, Raikou would've gotten pushed off an iceberg."

"And there, you would be justified," Shidan agreed. "Here, famine is not our constant shadow. Swords, fire, treachery; those prey on our minds. But the Cold Ones' hunger rarely brushes us. A hero can even step into such darkness - briefly - and return to the sunlight. With scars, yes. But not forever tainted by evil. That is why your sister's grief was believed." His voice darkened, almost a growl. "That is why Hama sought my life rather than surrender. She knew I had the rank to seek the truth; to tell you she lied. Yes, she was tortured. Yes, it was beyond what any soul should have to bear; caged away from sun and moon and sea, denied even the touch of a kinsman's hand. But she was not of the Southern Water Tribe. She was not of any tribe. Not from the night she slew her guards, and escaped - and left her tribesmen behind."

A hiccupping, shuddering breath. Katara's. "She said... she said she was the last."

"Likely she did." Shidan sighed, as if setting down a heavy weight. "You should know that after Hama's escape, the waterbenders' prison was no longer considered secure. The surviving prisoners were bound and placed aboard ship, to be more fully interrogated under onmitsu care." He paused. "Oddly enough, that ship was lightning-struck at sea, and foundered. It's fortunate one of our vessels was able to rescue the crew."

Katara almost hissed. "The crew-!"

"Sis." Sokka's voice sounded weird. Like he was almost grinning. "He can't tell us he rescued waterbenders."

Startled, Aang poked his head out of fur.

Sokka was grinning. Katara looked mad. Shidan and Toph were listening...

And Hitomi was sitting primly by the fire, brewing tea. "My lord most certainly could not say so." Every word was precise as a tea-master setting out cups. "Stealing the Fire Lord's prisoners would be illegal. Even treason." She flicked a glance at Aang. "And some of those who travel on Byakko's business might be questioned. And some of us don't lie well."

Ow. Why did that sting?

"But you know who we are," Katara protested.

"You have a sky bison. You can leave and be gone in an instant." Hitomi watched the water, as if she wanted to catch the very moment it began to rise as steam. "Anyone my lord might have helped - would not."

Katara looked her over, cool as ice. "Don't worry about your lord. He didn't help anyone." An angry glance flicked at Sokka. "They would have come home."

"Wounded?" Shidan countered. "Shamed by contact with one-not-named? And even if there were no difficulties in acquiring a ship and running the blockade - I assure you, those would not be small - there is the unshakable fact that they knew the Fire Nation attacked to steal waterbenders. With Hama, the last, taken - your tribe was safe. Why, by all the spirits, would they have wished to bring harm back to your people?"

"The Fire Nation wouldn't have come back!" Katara sat straight, adamant. "They wouldn't have known!"

Shidan's eyes narrowed. "Really? Azulon's spies learned of you, young waterbender. Have you ever thought on how?"

Ooough. Aang felt like he had a stomach full of catfish-eels. Because... well, the Fire Nation showing up when he did, that was a flare's fault. But if the Fire Nation had been leaving Katara's tribe alone because they didn't have any waterbenders left... How did they know?

The way Katara's face went white, she already had an idea. "You think everybody's just like you, don't you?" she bit out. "Ready to betray even their own family!"

"If you do not see Hama's acts as betrayal," Shidan said heavily, "then I fear for us all."

Katara shuddered. "She was a monster." Blue eyes narrowed at Shidan. "But she was Water Tribe. She was our responsibility. You had no right!"

Shidan stared at her. Still. Utterly still, poised as a scorpion-viper.

Hitomi paled.

Toph stomped to her feet, and deliberately cracked her knuckles. "Man. I can see why trading with Water Tribes is tricky. Their debt books don't exactly balance, huh?"

Debt books? Aang almost said. That was silly, the Water Tribes didn't have...

Only they did. Kind of. Sideways-sort of. "Push and pull," Aang said shakily. "In and out.

Somebody inside - gets everything. Somebody outside - only gets the eddies. What doesn't matter." He looked at Toph. "Sit and wait. Earth... leans on each other. Balances the weight. Balances the debt." His eyes slid to Shidan, and that horrible predator stillness. "Attack. Hit back first. But a big fire... it pulls all the little fires toward it. So if you don't make sure they get something to burn, all you get is ashes..." Scary. It was scary, trying to see his friends like this. And people who weren't his friends. "Maybe Hama was Water Tribe, and you were responsible. But - she was here." I don't want to do this. Killing's wrong, it's all wrong... but... I have to be fair. The Avatar's supposed to be fair. "And Shidan's a great name, and he's here, and people were getting hurt. So... he was responsible, too." He gulped, and glanced at the firebender. "But it's still wrong! Killing's not the answer! It never is!"

Now Katara looked like he'd dumped the catfish-eels in her stomach. "But... that's the point!" She jabbed a finger toward gold-edged red. "He killed her, Aang. He didn't see us fight! She could have been anybody! And he just killed her!"

Huh? Aang tried not to scratch his head in confusion. Hama had been alive, and now she was dead. And Shidan had killed her. Why did it matter who she was?

Shidan was looking at both of them like they'd been hitting the cactus juice. "I have walked the aftermath of more bending battles than you have seasons, waterbender. Likely more than all of you together. Your brother and friend's tracks scrawled through dust and mud; they were the controlled, not the controllers. You had not been present in this town long enough - you had not lived long enough - to have been responsible for the corpses I found in that cave. And you are Water Tribe, and no true woman of the Water Tribes would have let such evil slip away undealt-with. Who else could she have been?"

"But you didn't know!" Katara raised a hand, slowly dragged it back down. "She could have been any old lady! She could have been someone's grandmother! You didn't know she was the monster!"

Which still didn't make sense, Aang thought, bewildered. Why were people worried about who Shidan had killed? It didn't matter who! Hama was a person, not a monster!

"Katara," Toph started.

Shidan tapped toes on the ground. "No. She is correct. I did not know. In battle, one does not always know. There is no time. But the odds, Katara... Your battle was scourged across the forest. Your foe, we knew, could grasp any of Fire with but a movement. You were free, and your friends - but none of you are Fire, are you? I had one instant to strike. One chance, to slay the monster who would not only kill me, but my grandchildren, my deshi! How could I risk it? How could I hesitate, and kill us all?" His breath caught. "I love my family, young one. Perhaps you cannot believe it of Fire; and knowing what Fire has stolen from you, I understand. But I do love them. And I will kill for them."

Deshi, Aang thought, as Katara looked away. Gyatso had used that word before. Kuzon had. It meant- "You have students? Real students?"

Now Sokka looked like someone had hit him over the head. Why?

Shidan cocked his head; a movement that poked at Aang's brain. He'd seen somebody look at him that way before. Somewhere. "I have those who follow me in the way of the blade, yes. Daisho are not a common choice for swordsmen here, but Byakko does favor them, and the way they demand." Another tilt of that pale gaze. "But who in the world told you deshi meant student?"

"Master Gyatso," Aang shrugged. "When I was little, he said that was the best way to explain. If I ever got lost here. Just find one of the Home Guard and tell them I was Master Gyatso's deshi, and everything would be okay." But it hadn't worked, had it? He had to swallow a lump in his throat. "How... how can you teach someone how to live with a sword? That just seems... wrong." He hadn't wanted to say anything while Sokka was learning from Piandao. Sokka couldn't bend; he needed something to help him if they got in a fight. And besides, if parents were like teachers, then Sokka already had Chief Hakoda. He might learn how to use a sword from Piandao, but he wouldn't learn how to live a way his dad wouldn't approve of. Right?

Shidan regarded Aang a moment. Hmphed. "The best swords stay in their sheaths."

Aang blinked at him. "That's a riddle, right?"

"You are a riddle," Shidan said dryly. "But part of it begins to become clear. You use student to mean deshi. But deshi does not mean student. It means disciple. Apprentice. One who hunts to your guidance."

Gyatso had told him to say that? Aang felt a rush of horror. "Air Nomads don't hunt anything!"

"Then say it is one who follows in your path, and for whom you are responsible, as if you were the head of his clan." Shidan spread empty hands. "It is no less true. Naming you his deshi gave you protection among us, far more than your year-mates would have had. A deshi implies a sensei; one who will be responsible for him, and held to account for his mistakes. With that word Gyatso dulled our teeth, so you never felt the full bite of a great name's anger. Clever man." He drew in a breath as if to say more. Glanced at Aang again, and shook his head.

Why did he get the feeling Shidan thought Gyatso had been too clever?

That doesn't make sense. How can it be wrong to keep people from getting hurt?

And how could it be right for Katara to say Hama had to die? The dark wind came; Gyatso had told them that. But winds went away. "Why didn't... why didn't we just heal her?" Aang blurted out. "She wasn't just angry. She was alone. She was sick. We should have-"

"Aang." Katara's voice was strained and painful. "Stop it."

Warm fur behind him, Aang stared at her.

"I couldn't have helped her." Katara's fingers were knotted together, knuckles white. "Maybe, maybe Yugoda could have. But what she did, what she was doing... Gran-Gran told us the legends. If someone - if they feel the Cold Ones pushing them, making them want to do things... maybe you can still save them. But even if they make it - it's better for the tribe if they just go north. Where the sun never goes away again." Fingers flexed. Clenched again, firelight casting shadows across the knot of her hands. "If they've already killed, if they're that far gone... all you can do is end it."

"You mean-" Aang shook his head. How could they say that? How could they even think it?

"Killing people is wrong! Killing sick people, it's-" He flung up his hands in frustration. "It's worse than wrong! It's horrible!"

"Well, sometimes I'm horrible!"

Ears still ringing from her shout, Aang couldn't take his eyes off her. She couldn't have said that. She couldn't believe it. Not Katara.

"You're not horrible," Sokka said firmly. "Protecting the tribe isn't horrible. Sometimes you have to do something awful. That's not horrible. That's just - sometimes life sucks."

Sokka too? Aang turned to Toph. Earth was all straightforward, level; she had to have a better answer-

"Don't look at me, Twinkletoes," Toph shrugged. "Mansion, remember? I dunno what we do with crazy people. Bad guys get put in jail, sure. But Hama already got out of one of those. What else were we gonna do? Tie her up and never let her near water again, like the Fire Nation? Load her up on Appa and drop her in the Earth Kingdom? No thanks! We've got enough crazy guys over there already, with the Fire Army running around setting stuff on fire." She paused. "Um. No offense, Grandpa."

"None taken." Teeth glinted in Shidan's smile. "I have read reports of your group's travels. I know much of what you have encountered. And who."

"But death isn't the answer!" Aang insisted. "Death is never the answer."

"Your actions at the Northern Air Temple," Shidan said dryly, sharp nails catching flecks of gold as he stirred the flames, "say otherwise."

"That's not fair!" He could still remember masses of metal falling into icy clouds. "You said you were Kuzon's friend!"

"Ah. And my friendship with Kuzon is supposed to change the reality of your actions?" Shidan blinked at him, cold as a cat-gator staring up from swampy water. "My apologies. I had thought Monk Gyatso taught as did Fire Sage Gentaku of old; that good done in the name of evil is still good, and evil acts, even if done for the holiest sage, are still evil." Another slow, chilling blink. "You killed to protect the folk of the Northern Air Temple. I killed to protect those I hold dear. How is that different?"

Finally, something he could answer. "We weren't being selfish," Aang shot back.

Hitomi bristled; Aang could have sworn he saw hair rising on the back of her neck. "Not selfish? That you could even think-!"

Shidan held up a hand. "The Elders' teachings, Hitomi. Attachments to things of this world are forbidden. So by his ways, he speaks the truth. To strike in defense of a stranger? Forgivable. To strike in defense of those you care for - is attachment. And so it is evil."

Urk. "I didn't say that," Aang protested, seeking Katara's blue, hurt gaze. "I didn't! You fight for people you care about. That's okay! You fight for people you don't care about too, all the time..." And why didn't that sound as good as it had in his head?

Well. He knew whose fault that was. Aang glared at Shidan. "How can you twist everything like this?"

Shidan arched one white brow. "I believe humans call the technique logic."

Aang turned green. Oh no. Not that. "That's for old people!"

"Logic," Shidan stated, "is for anyone who hopes to live long enough to grow old. One cannot live by instinct and emotion alone. That way leads to decapitating annoying people, and ruining stray rugs."

Okay. This was officially worse than trying to talk to Guru Pathik, or even Bumi in a cryptic mood.

"What are you?"

"A dutiful son of the Father of Fire," Shidan replied. Paused a moment, as if thinking. "Well, not wholly dutiful. Which is just as well. Agni has been very upset with the last two Avatars, and one who followed his will more rigidly might give you far less rope. Though I suspect less, in the long run, might be less cruel than more. Do you believe a Fire Sage would know the rules and punishments which bind a criminal of Fire?"

Aang rolled his eyes. "What has that got to do with-"

"Do you believe it?" Shidan challenged him.

"A Fire Sage like Shiyu? Sure," Aang answered. "The other guys were working for the Fire Lord. I wouldn't trust anything they say."

"Discerning," Shidan nodded. "Would you, then, believe the Elders would know how to deal with a prank gone awry among the boys of your Temple?"

"Of course they would!" Aang shot back, frustrated. "Why won't you just answer my question?"

"Because the questions you ask shape the answer you seek," Shidan said bluntly. "You trust those of good heart who know Fire to deal with Fire, and so you trust Air to deal with Air. Why do you not trust Water to judge Water?"

Darn it, now he was getting mad. "Why are you making this about me?" Aang demanded. "Hama was sick-"

"Yes, she was ill," Shidan cut him off. "She was also evil. And evil must be dealt with, before it can destroy all we hold dear. You, Avatar Aang, Air Monk Aang, have three choices. You may learn to deal with evil. You may stand aside, and allow others to slay it. Or you may stand between true evil and those of us who would fight to stop it, and watch the world burn."

Aang tried not to shiver. "That's not the only answer! It can't be!" He had to breathe. Just - breathe. "Gyatso said you could talk to anybody!"

Shidan eyed him, kind of like a saber-moose lion deciding whether to bite first or just stomp the annoyance into icky goo. Muttered something under his breath that sounded kind of like, "Bring a rabbiroo back to the nest, can't expect a cub to kill it the first time..."

Which made no sense whatsoever. What did Shidan think he was?

"Aang." Sokka's voice didn't waver. But blue eyes narrowed with a determination that made Aang just a little uneasy. "I wish you were right, that talking fixed everything. I really, really wish you were. But we tried talking to Hama. We were with her a whole day. She knew two of us were Water Tribe; she knew we had a way to get into the Fire Nation. Which means she knew we had a way to get out. If she wanted to get away from the war, if all she wanted was to go home - all she had to do was ask us."

"Maybe she was too scared to ask," Aang shot back. "Maybe she knew you'd figure out she ran away. And she was scared, and she just couldn't!"

"This isn't about you."

Aang almost jumped into a defensive stance. Sokka... Sokka sounded angry. Not just mad, in a who-ate-the-blubber-jerky way. Angry.

"Hama was killing people." Sokka was breathing slow, like it hurt to; looking aside, past the flames. "We tried to talk to her. You tried to talk to her. She knew it was wrong. She was killing people because she could. Because she liked it. Because nobody knew how to stop her!" A low, hissed exhalation. "We stopped her. Maybe you don't like how we did it. Maybe none of us liked killing her, Aang, did you think about that? Because whatever she did, she used to be a person. And now she's dead, and she can't ever make up for what she did. That's one of the most horrible things I can think of. But there's something I can think of that's worse."

Now he looked at Aang, and the airbender had to brace himself not to flinch. He didn't know what was in that look, but something about it made him just want to pull the covers over his head. It hurt.

"There is something worse," Sokka said, voice low. "If we hadn't stopped her, she would have kept right on killing." He stopped. Shook his head. "Aang. We didn't want to kill her. I bet even Shidan didn't. He's a swordsman, like Master Piandao. And real swordsmen don't want to kill."

What?

"To take a life is the gravest burden a soul can bear," Shidan said quietly. "A doused flame can be lit once more. A seared tapestry can be rewoven. But a lost life?" He sighed. "Even if a soul passes through the realm of death to be reborn, that life is over. That person is gone. The greatest of swordsmen pray they never draw their blades."

The best swords stay in their sheaths. It was a riddle. Like Gyatso's, about how the best bender didn't need to bend the wind; he was already where it was blowing...

"We didn't want to kill her," Sokka repeated. "But she didn't give us a choice."

He heard what Sokka was saying. Every word. But even if you knew it was a riddle... it didn't make sense. Master Gyatso had always said that no one could make you do what you didn't want to do.

But he could still see the tears streaking Katara's face in the moonlight, as she made Hama stop bending them. Pale, and gleaming white, like the skulls around Master Gyatso...

Gyatso wouldn't want to hurt anybody. Ever.

But he had. Which meant...

Gyatso was wrong.

It was like saying the sun was going to start rising in the west. That fire was going to be cold, and the Water Tribe was going to take up mining. It just didn't happen.

"Gyatso said no one could make you do what you didn't want to," Aang mumbled into fur. "He was wrong. How could he be wrong?"

"Aang?" Katara's voice was still a little rough from crying. "Are you okay?"

"No!" Didn't they understand? Didn't they feel the world falling apart? "Monk Gyatso was a master. He stood up to the Elders! They never would have let him if he was wrong!"

Silence from his friends. He really, really hated those silences. What did they think he'd said now?

"That accords with the tales Byakko tells of the Air Temples," Hitomi said, fiddling with the teapot. "Dissent was... discouraged. Strongly."

"Say it plainly, young lady," Shidan said gruffly. "Or I will. I have little to fear from Avatars, beyond stupidity. The Temples taught one Way. Xiangchen's Way. All else was suspect at best, and eliminated at worst."

Oh, no way was he going to sit still for that. Aang shot away from Appa's side, glaring at the not-a-spirit. "Air Nomads were peaceful! We never hurt anybody!"

"Pacifistic, yes. You were that." Shidan sipped the tea Hitomi had served him. "But as I have difficulty grasping the words human take for granted, I make a practice of studying them all. And there are layers and layers of harm, young monk." He eyed his cup ruefully. "One does not suppose you could have made it stronger?"

Feet tucked under her, the merchant gave Shidan a sidelong glance. "Lord Shidan. Everyone knows you like it strong enough to strip paint. I'm not going to inflict that on innocent youngsters."

"No?" Shidan's whiskers drooped, woeful.

Hitomi lifted her chin, unflinching. "Lady Kotone warns us about you, my lord."

"Ah. I suppose someone must." Shidan regarded his tea. "There is harm, Aang, and there is harm. Your people were peaceful, in body." He nodded toward Katara. "But what harm did Hama do her, last night?"

Around the fire, Katara and Sokka both looked at Shidan as if he'd lost his mind. Toph cracked her knuckles and leaned back against a rock that hadn't been there three seconds ago. "Oh, I gotta hear this one," the earthbender muttered.

"Are you serious?" Aang got out. "You were there! You saw what happened!"

"So I was; and so I did see what I would call harm, and hurt," Shidan said dryly, setting his tea down. "Four hurts of humans I know; to the body, the heart, the mind, and the spirit. But I have been other places beyond the Fire Nation. Including your Temple, long ago. And there were those among your Elders who would. Not. Consider. Katara. Hurt."

No. No no no, that didn't make sense, his people weren't anything like Hama-!

Shidan snarled as wind rushed and fire flared, hands clapping together in one swift crack-

The fire blew out.

Pale gold glared at Aang, hot as the embers. "Did Jeong Jeong teach you nothing?"

Aang squinted at him, heart still racing. "He wanted me to learn how to breathe. I already know how to breathe!"

Shidan snorted. "Obviously, he should have started with something more basic."

Aang blew out a breath. "What's more basic than breathing?"

"Putting fires out."

Aang realized his tongue was getting dry. Closed his mouth, still stunned. Every firebender he'd seen started fires. Put them out? That was waterbending, or maybe earthbending. Even airbending, if you timed the wind right to steal air from the fire.

Firebenders learn to put fires out?

"Jeong Jeong kind of skipped that," Sokka put in. "Maybe you could-?"

"Part of me wishes I could," Shidan mused. "But I cannot. What I am... cannot teach an Avatar firebending. The Avatar Spirit chose to take human form to learn from humans. He who bears it must learn bending from humans, as well."

"That's not true," Aang protested, patting fur. "I learned all kinds of things from Appa!"

"Be that as it may. I am not one you would wish for your teacher," Shidan stated. "I doubt I would be able to forget the many, many times you have tried to kill my grandchildren." A fluid shrug. "Of course, my granddaughter was indeed trying to kill you. I harbor you no ill will, not for that. But I am fond of her, and that would not do your training any good at all."

Erk?

"You like Azula?" Sokka squeaked, eyes wide in disbelief.

"She is my granddaughter," Shidan observed.

"Um." Toph screwed up her face. "You know she tried to kill Sparky, right?"

"Several times," Shidan agreed. "I did not say I approved of her." He paused. "But she is clan, and she has done many things worthy of admiration. Not least of which is surviving her father in the first place. He wanted another son."

Now his brain really hurt. "You feel sorry for Azula?" Aang exclaimed. "She's crazy!" He pointed at the firebender, determined. "And I never tried to kill her! Or Zuko! No matter what they did!"

The red-and-blue haori stirred; a slight shrug. "My grandson says otherwise."

"And you believe him?" Aang shot back. "The first time we met him, he lied!"

A white brow went up. "Did he?"

"Of course he did!" Aang glared back. Why did Shidan believe Zuko instead of the good guys? "He was threatening Katara's whole village, and he didn't want to-"

Oh. Monkeyfeathers.

It was like falling forever, and the wind wouldn't catch you. Like one of the trick picture-scrolls Gyatso laughed at; where if you looked one way it was a vase, but another, it was faces...

"He didn't want to hurt anyone," Aang managed. "But... he would have."

"To find you? To end his exile? To finally earn his father's love, and prevent Azula from taking the throne? Oh yes." Shidan nodded, matter-of-fact. "My grandson is born of Sozin's line as well as mine. Violence is bred in us all, blood and bone. He was raised on tales of death and bloody victory, and the gentlest soul he clung to, the man who stood as his father for three long years - is the Dragon of the West. Sear a village to the ground? Zuko would have hated it, and himself. He would have done it." Still seated, Shidan gave Aang a slight bow. "I am grateful you spared him that."

"People can do things they hate." Aang hugged himself, colder than the doused fire. "Then... how does anybody know what's true?"

"We do a lot of guessing," Sokka said wryly.

"You guess?" Aang felt queasy, like he'd tried to ride a log in the middle of a hurricane. "You guess when people are telling the truth?" He felt like pulling one of Toph's tricks, and banging his head against a rock. "No wonder everybody's fighting!" Wait. Wait, wait, wait, if that was true, then- "If everybody has to guess what's true, and all people know is what the Fire Lord says you can teach in school - then - even if we explain what's really been happening, they're not going to believe we came to help?"

Hitomi held her head in her hands.

"We're going to show up with an invasion," Sokka said dryly, "with the Avatar they're all scared to death of, on the worst day of their lives. No. They are not going to think we came to help, Aang. They're going to think the way Zuko thought, the way he did for years, until he chased us across the world and got a chance to see we weren't like what everyone taught him. To see the Fire Lord was wrong. They're going to think we're the bad guys, we came to kill them all, and we did it on-" He stopped. Groaned. Smacked himself in the forehead, and glared down at embers as if he could flare them up by pure will. "They know we're coming, don't they."

"If you mean the eclipse," Shidan mused, "then, yes. They do."

Aang froze. Say what?

Chapter End Notes

Shuten Douji, or the tale of the drunken demon, is a Japanese folktale; I found a rather gruesome translation (at least PG-13, and probably R!) in the Journal of Asian Studies. That specific translation can be found at:

.jp\(/publications/afs/pdf/\)

Warning, that's a large file, over 9 MB. This and a bunch of other neat articles can be found at:

.jp\(/\)

In my experience, 12-year-olds have a love-hate relationship with logic. They love it when they can use it to rules-lawyer themselves into being technically in the right by way of loopholes in whatever you told them not to do. They hate it when you use it to prove they have to do something they don't want to. Then, it's cheating.

The concepts Aang is trying to grasp here are really, really hard. Necessary violence is a matter of serious debate among adults; a sheltered kid is not going to figure it out in a day. Or even a few weeks. Add to that "what is evil", "what is truth", and "what is the duty of someone who sees evil occurring" - oh yeah. Aang is trying. But he wasn't raised with predators, a hunting culture, or even semi-regular contact with armed forces. Everyone else sitting around that fire was. (Yes, even Toph. That mansion had guards, which implies they did have weapons training, and Toph would have been acquainted with the idea they might use it.) This is cultural conflict at about the most basic level. The idea that sometimes, something needs to die, is a fact of life... to everyone but Aang. Aang is running into the problem he tangled with in canon right before Sozin's Comet. Only at this point, it's a much more immediate problem... and he doesn't have Fire to help him with confronting problems.

Aang believes - truly believes - that violence is never the right solution. His problem is the same one a lot of young teenagers have: he hasn't sat down to wrestle with the consequences of his beliefs. And they exist. (Boy, do they ever.) What he needs - really needs - is time to think, and an adult of his own culture to help him figure out why he thinks that way, and what he's willing to sacrifice to hold true to his beliefs.

...I'm working on it. (Wry Grin.)

Chapter 61

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"What do you mean, the Fire Nation knows they're coming?"

What she said, Teo thought, too stunned to speak as he watched Healer Amaya try to glare down the prince. He didn't look much like a prince; robes brown as Auntie Changchang's best garden soil, traveling sandals, blue and red cords tying back part of his hair while the rest drifted over his scar.

Then again, Amaya's courtyard didn't look like any of his storybooks of royal courts, either. Even if the engineer in him was more impressed by its existence than he would have been by any walls covered with gold and silk.

They just carved it right out of the valley wall.

Weeks ago, there'd been a scree slope here steep enough to make a cricket-mouse cry. Now it was terraced and growing green, bushes and herbs soaking up summer sun. Amaya's clinic stood behind it, shaped half in and half out of solid stone, wide windows welcoming enough light to the front rooms to make you feel like you were barely inside at all. Only one of those windows had any glass, a kind of crazy-quilt of stone and wavy pieces that made it look like you were underwater. But as a promise for the future, it was awesome.

And they hadn't stopped with stone and gardens. The little stream that had helped make this slope unstable was now running through Amaya's garden, and others; he could see the bright blue of oogami-nut flowers sprouting up everywhere.

Auntie says they're already getting first crops of greens and - whatever they call all those weird tuber-things. I didn't know anyone could grow stuff that fast.

Which, Changchang had told him before, was why he flew and built things, instead of trying to coax food out of the ground. This time, he didn't even mind when she'd rolled her eyes at wind-happy youngsters. She'd looked down the slopes at growing hedgerows and gardens, traded some of their mountain pluots for a thick spicy stew of - well, he wasn't going to ask, it was warm, red, and chewy, and had something like beans and clams and tomato-carrots in it-

She'd just looked so relieved. Even as they both grabbed for buttered bread to damp the fire in their mouths.

So maybe it was good that they were here, even if he hadn't wanted to come down to Dragons' Wings in the first place. But after that last crash, when a thermal had just gone wrong-

Auntie Changchang's a worrywart. I'm going to be fine. Not like a broken leg makes a difference.

Hurt; sure, it hurt. And it was going to hurt, no matter how well it was splinted. What was the big deal?

But she was worried. And he wanted to know what these crazy people were doing to the winds.

It's something they're doing to the volcano. How can doing something to the earth change the wind?

He wanted to know. If they were going to be neighbors, and so far Zuko's people seemed just as stubborn as the mountains, he wanted to know what kind of people they were flying over. If letting Auntie drag him to the healers gave him a chance to hear what people were really thinking - hey, two chicken-pigs, one stone.

So they'd showed up for healing. And apparently rolled right into the middle of the worst argument he'd seen since the rest of the Temple found out what his dad had been hiding behind airbender locks.

If he keeps this up, she's going to throw boiling water right in his face.

Well... maybe that pool some odd earthbender had shaped into Amaya's courtyard, away from the stream, wasn't actually boiling. But it was steaming, and no matter how many times Amaya had told both of them it was for healing, he knew Auntie was just as dubious as he was about going anywhere near it. Or that ominous, thin-stone charcoal brazier. The older woman would much rather have been inside, where there was a cool-water well, and stone walls strong as the bones of the earth.

No thanks. If I can't be up the mountain, I at least want to be out where I can see the sky. Even if the brazier is kind of freaky. Teo gripped a wheel, watching Changchang as much as the pile of unlit charcoal and the two benders. If she thought it was dangerous, he was wheeling out of here.

Perched on a stone bench, Changchang worked needles through the rows of her knitting.

"What do I mean?" Zuko looked honestly confused. "I mean we can talk about it now. They're almost there. Any spies who might be here-"

"Spies?"

"-won't have time to deliver a report... what?" Zuko backed off a step, remaining eyebrow scrunched down in what looked like bewilderment. "What'd I say?"

Stern and slender in blue, Amaya planted hands on her hips and shook her head. "Spies? Zuko. You know these people."

"I knew everyone on the Wani, too," Zuko shrugged. "Never stopped Azula from giving me a mutiny for my birthday."

Teo blinked.

Amaya stopped for a breath. Let it out slowly. "Why you wanted her alive, I have no idea... Your crew attacked you? With the Dragon of the West on board?"

"Not Captain Jee's crew," Zuko said quickly. "But the two years before that... I was supposed to be in command of the ship. If I couldn't handle them... Uncle would have made sure I got out alive." He waved it off. "Master Amaya. Just because we know people, doesn't mean we know everyone they know. Or everyone who can be used against them. Everybody has left someone they cared about. Either in the Earth Kingdom or the Fire Nation. We've got spies. I just don't know who all of them are yet."

"You..." Amaya looked up, imploring the skies. "What do I do with you?"

"Help me fix the nice gliders so they can poke around here and make sure we're not planning to blow them up?" Zuko suggested. He gave Teo a wry smile. "Don't worry. Your dad's with Chief Hakoda. He's survived two years raiding Fire Nation territories. He knows what he's doing."

Teo poked himself in the chest, hard enough to feel it. Nope, not dreaming. Too bad. If this was a nightmare, he'd really like to wake up now. "The Fire Nation knows my dad's - wait a minute! How do you know where my dad went?"

"A guy who designs war machines shuts himself up with Chief Hakoda, carves up a whole captured ship, and won't let anybody see what he's doing with the pieces?" Duh, said Zuko's tone. "Next time you talk to him, tell him he needs to at least think about using a cover story. Like... I don't know, building a big metal cistern to catch snowmelt for when you need it. Or something."

The worst thing about it, Teo decided, was how Zuko talked like it all made sense. "How does the Fire Nation know my dad's coming?"

Zuko was giving him a Look. "Azula was in the Earth King's palace."

Oh. Oh, Teo knew that look. He'd seen it on Dad. Usually just before someone poked at something that was about to blow up. "I hate to say this," Teo managed, trying not to strangle the words, "but pretend I don't know anything, and start from the beginning."

"The beginning?" Zuko said warily. "Um. Well, Azula's always been good at manipulating people, ever since the time she got the servants away to try smothering me when she was six..."

They're insane, Teo thought, mouth hanging open. They're all nuts.

"Not that far back, young man." Changchang finished a row, looped yarn to start another. "How did the Fire Princess get into the Earth King's palace?"

"Oh." Zuko nodded, a little less glum. "That was easy. She caught some Kyoshi Warriors, stole their gear, and then she, Mai, and Ty Lee just showed up at the Outer Wall and said they were the Avatar's allies. According to Mai and the Dai Li," Zuko shook his head, "Sokka didn't even go down to check who they were. Just ordered them to be let in." The firebender snorted. "For a guy who's used disguises to get people in and out of places all over the Earth Kingdom, that was stupid."

"Still not explaining," Teo got out.

Zuko frowned, then nodded. "Chief Hakoda didn't mention where Sokka made his big plan?"

Huh?

"In the palace, I assume," Changchang sighed. Worked her shoulders a bit under her shawl, and gave Teo a fond, rueful smile. "I have distant cousins who've worked for great lords. Servants know everything."

"Servants?" Amaya said, startled. "But they were making-"

"Secret plans," Teo chimed in.

"Sure they were." Zuko's scarred smirk made the hair stand up on Teo's neck. "Which takes time. All day, all night, all week... And these were Earth Kingdom generals. Nobles. I know Uncle Iroh doesn't act like it, but nobles aren't supposed to raid the pantry when they get hungry. They send somebody else to do it. Someone who has to walk in, politely present everything, pour the tea, and be grandly dismissed. Which takes time. A lot of time." A wry shrug. "Plenty of time to look at a map. Or a timeline. Or the exact date of an eclipse."

Teo felt like he had when a wind had gone out from under him, and everything ahead was ice and razor-edged rock. Oh, this is going to hurt.

"So Azula could have gotten everything she needed from the servants," Zuko went on. "Only she didn't have to, because the Earth King and his generals were so thrilled with sharing the details of the great plan with their allies, the Kyoshi Warriors. After all, they were the Avatar's allies. And if the Avatar liked what he heard - well. Maybe he'd be a little less attached to this silly idea of leaving any of the Fire Nation alive." He growled under his breath. "Damn it, Gyatso. You taught him bending. Couldn't you have given him one book on politics?"

Teo swallowed, and tried to hang onto the important details. "You know about the eclipse."

And Zuko was giving him another Look. "Your father has a miniature orrery in his office."

"Well, I guess," Teo said, taken aback. "But that's just a... toy..." Oh no.

"Orrery?" Amaya asked.

Zuko sketched swirling orbits in air. "It's a kind of planetarium. It shows how the earth and moon move around the sun. And other planets, too."

"Put a candle in for the sun, you can watch the shadows," Teo said numbly. "It's not a toy."

"A little one is," Zuko admitted. "You need a bigger one. And a lot of abacuses."

Teo winced, the mention of calculating devices making the next step obvious. "You can predict eclipses."

"Down to when and where, pretty close," Zuko said dryly. "Eclipses means no firebending. Sozin's Comet means lots of fires. We've always watched the sky."

Gaah. "My dad's going into a trap?" Teo demanded, heart racing. "And you didn't say anything?"

"It's not a trap if you know it's coming-"

"How could they possibly know it's coming?" Amaya loomed like a thundercloud, one hand waving a slow circle that churned steaming water. "Of all the dishonorable, underhanded... when your uncle finds out about this-!"

Zuko stood unmoving as stone, good eye narrowed. "What do you mean, finds out about it?" he bit out. "Uncle knows Azula was in the palace. He questioned Mai. You don't think she'd tell me what my sister was up to, do you? I'm competition for the heir. Uncle's already passed over, so he's not."

Amaya seemed to draw in on herself. "Iroh knows Chief Hakoda is sailing into a trap?"

Zuko spread bewildered, empty hands. "Because it's obvious?"

Steaming water crackled into ice.

Silent, Zuko watched her, pale gold never wavering.

Turning on her heel, Amaya stalked inside.

Teo started at the sound of doors slamming, one after the other. First one had to be the back door; the next - the street? "I think you'd better warn your uncle."

"Warn him?" Zuko flung up his hands, indignant. "What did I say?"

I don't believe this. "You said you set my dad up to get killed!" Teo rocked his chair forward; never mind a little broken leg. He knew all kinds of things his wheels could do.

"What?"

It was the shock that stopped Teo, before he ran over Zuko's toes. That wasn't a how dare you, much less how dare you see through my lies. It was... honest surprise. Hurt.

"I would never-!" Knuckles clenched white, Zuko slowly breathed out, loosening a finger at a time. "Teo. If I ever wanted to kill your father, I'd do it myself."

Oh shit. Angry firebender, wood and bamboo wheels-

But Auntie wasn't moving. Why?

"You don't believe the Fire Nation can be good people," Zuko bit out. "Fine. I can live with that. So I won't tell you I would never do that because we're good people, we're neighbors, and good neighbors don't kill each other. But even if we're not good people, even if we're all the horrible, evil things the Earth Kingdom says we are, killing your father would be stupid." A snarling breath. "I hate stupid."

That sounded sincere. In a really weird way.

But you can lie without ever saying something that's not true. "So you just sent him off to get killed," Teo challenged the firebender.

"I did not!" Zuko gave him a glare that trickled sweat down the glider's neck. "I told you. Chief Hakoda's good. And Sokka's not dumb... most of the time. If they're going to sail into Fire Lord Ozai's trap on purpose, they've got a plan." He smirked. "And an ambushed ambush? Trust me. That's a very bad day."

"But- you-" Teo sputtered, trying to find words to express the sheer wrongness of this conversation.

Changchang dropped a stitch, and clucked to herself as she bent to unsnarl the mess. "My hearing isn't what it used to be, young man... are you saying you didn't warn the Water Tribe chief because you thought he already knew?"

"Right." Zuko let out a breath, relieved. "As long as Azula's spies didn't hear anyone discussing the eclipse, she wouldn't know that we knew that she knew."

"...Is that even a sentence?" Teo said weakly.

"To a noble?" Changchang chuckled. "Ho-ho, it's barely a start."

"But it's too late for good intel to get there now, so we can talk about it," Zuko went on. "Your dad didn't tell you about the plan? Ouch. I mean," he added hastily, "you don't want plans getting out, so you don't tell anyone you don't have to, but... I know that hurts."

Teo rubbed his forehead, trying to think. Zuko felt sorry for him, after he'd-

Wait a minute. What did Auntie say - oh. Oh, wow.

"Let me see if I've got this," Teo said, amazed how calm he sounded. It was kind of like trying to follow Dad on one of his sideways new ideas. A little. "There's going to be an eclipse, and the Fire Nation knows about it. They've known about it for a while."

"I knew about it before I got exiled," Zuko nodded. "Uncle and I planned to make sure we were north or south of it. Or maybe west. It's probably not going to start too much farther east than Omashu..." For the first time, Zuko looked hesitant. "Um. You do know an eclipse doesn't hit the whole world, right?"

"No," Teo admitted, dazed. "No, I didn't know that... it's not going to happen here?"

"We'll probably get part of the shadow. It won't be fun," Zuko admitted. "But the sun won't be blocked all the way. Not this far north."

"Got it." Okay; scratch some of the wilder guys' ideas to maybe use the eclipse if people here turned nasty. Ouch. "So you know about the eclipse. And... Sokka found out about it."

"How he found out, I have no idea," Zuko said darkly. "The great names have to know. But that someone would let word get out of the Fire Nation-"

"He said it was a spirit," Teo got out in a rush. Which, okay, everyone said the Avatar was supposed to deal with the spirit world. It just seemed... surreal. Wind and gears and equal and opposite reactions, those he understood. Spirits felt like the world was cheating, somehow.

"A spirit." Zuko's voice went very quiet. "Of. Course. Let me guess. Did any of them think, just for one minute, the spirits might have been lying?"

Teo's jaw dropped. "But - you say there is an eclipse-"

"You can lie and lie, and never say anything that isn't true."

Which was just what he'd been thinking. Creepy.

Zuko's hands fisted, sparks flickering at the knuckles. "Azula's an expert at it. And damn it, she's been chasing them for months. I warned them. Uncle warned them. They know that!" He held a breath; blew out steam and took another. "Which spirit?"

"They said it was - Wan Shi Tong?" Teo stammered. "Chief Hakoda laughed about how he'd have to change his name, he knew Ten Thousand and One Things now..."

Zuko went gray.

Changchang stopped knitting. "That bad, is it?"

"He's allied with-" Zuko waved a hand toward the harbor. "With the spirit who sent the drowned."

Auntie winced. "That bad, indeed."

"Seaman Saburo," Zuko was muttering. "Captain Jee - hawks - Agni, no time..." Cradling his head in his hands, he breathed in. Held it. Breathed out. "Jee first. He'll have ideas. They have to come by water - well, unless Toph makes a really big, really deep tunnel - no. Too much magma. Toph's not that stupid. She won't let Aang be. Spirits, why even bother, Hakoda won't listen when I'm standing right in front of him, all a letter's going to do is get him and Katara madder. and if they're mad at me they're not going to think about the firebenders in front of them, the Home Guard, the kill zones..."

"What's a kill zone?" Teo asked, dreading the answer.

Gold blinked at him, as if remembering he was there. "It's - control your enemy, make them move-" Words seemed to get tangled up; Zuko shook his head in frustration. Held up one finger. Deliberately turned his hand, and jabbed it toward innocent ground. Turned on his heel, and stalked into the clinic.

"Hmm. And what do you think that meant?" Changchang raised gray brows at him.

How am I supposed to know? But sometimes, up in the thin air, you didn't have the voice to yell. "Stay here. I think. So why are we staying, he could start burning stuff any minute-"

Changchang *hmp*ed. "I seem to remember one young man breaking a few things, the last time one of his glider designs went wrong."

Um. Yeah. But he'd been a lot younger. He hadn't done anything like that in a year. And... damn, sometimes he forgot how fast people with two good legs could move. Zuko was back with a sand tray and a scoop for water, setting the tray on Auntie's bench so they could get a good look as he molded damp sand.

Flat part's the water, Teo thought, there's the bay, the volcano, the Temple... "What is that?" He pointed toward a thin rim of sand on the "water", completing the arc of the valley.

"Caldera edge. Shallow. First water zone." Zuko's voice was rough, tumbling words together like a rubble wall. "Ship has to get over it. That's where you mine." He barely touched the sand shaping the harbor entrance. "Second zone. Ships have to get through. Projectile weapons dug in here, here. Mines, nets down here - keep people from landing." A wave of fingers toward sketched docks. "Third zone. Tactics vary. Might have traps in the water. Might wait, until they land; shake the dock apart. Or torch it. Tar burns."

Teo shivered at the thought. But-

"It's... like what we did at the Temple." Teo glanced at Auntie. "First we tried to knock them off the trail. Then we tried to keep them from coming up the cliffs. Then..." He swallowed. "Sokka blew up the gas in the ravine."

Zuko blinked. Took a deep breath. "Good job."

"I didn't like it," Teo admitted, shifting in his chair. "When we beat you everybody was happy, but-"

"Good."

"What?" Teo threw up a hand. "I don't get you guys! You're angry about us killing you, you're happy that we did - what is wrong with you?" Oh; oh, that wasn't good at all...

"People die in war." Zuko's voice was quiet; cool and matter-of-fact as Changchang's after - after herbs and rest just weren't enough. "You killed Fire Nation soldiers. I don't like it. I don't have to like it. You killed them to protect yourselves, your people. That, I understand. Being glad you're alive... Teo. That's not wrong. If you don't start a fight, but you finish it - I don't like what you did. The ghosts don't like it, and we have to deal with them. But that's the way life is." He waved at the sand model. "What we'd do is like what you did. Figure out the weak points; the easy ways the enemy can get in. Make sure it's not easy." Eyes on Teo, Zuko waited.

Teo glared back. "What has that got to do with my dad-"

Oh. Argh. "They're going to have defenses like this. At the capital." Damn it, he'd just given that part of the plan away... Distract him. "That's not fair! The Fire Nation attacks people. Everybody knows that. You can't defend things, too!"

Zuko gave him a sidelong glance that couldn't be anything but amused. "You should read some of our histories. The Yu Yan can tell you about the time somebody had to shoot at Lord Heian's men so they could attack to the rear." Humor passed, like sunlight fleeing clouds. "Teo. This is going to be bad. But Chief Hakoda, Sokka - they're good at improvising. If anyone can get people out of this alive, they will."

Teo's eyes stung; he bit his lip. He was thirteen, damn it. He was not going to bawl in front of a firebender. "You could have stopped them!"

"How?" Zuko didn't sound angry anymore. Just upset, and tired. "How could I have stopped them? If I knew you didn't know - I can't believe they didn't know! - I just-" He stopped. Took a breath to untangle his thoughts. "We would have tried to warn them. But Chief Hakoda won't listen to me."

The weird, final way Zuko said that sent shivers down Teo's spine. "You make it sound like it's too late." He thumped a fist on his chair arm. "It's not too late! It's not the eclipse yet!"

"We don't have a sky bison." Zuko set out his words like a roofer would his tiles, fact clicking against fact. "There's not a ship in the world that could get there fast enough, even if they could get through the blockade. A messenger hawk might - might - get there in time. If the Fire Lord doesn't have falconers with phoenix-eagles hunting for them; he knows we have some. And if the hawk got through, they'd still have to read the letter. And believe it. And they won't believe it from me."

"Not even Toph?" Teo challenged. He was pretty sure he'd heard Chief Hakoda say good things about the earthbender, even if sometimes they were followed by, she trusts the Fire Nation too much.

"She'd believe it." Zuko glanced at the yard's grass and herbs, some of it just starting to thicken up again after earthbenders had shifted slope and stone. "But she'd have to get someone to read it to her. And if the Water Tribe saw the hawk first... I don't like losing birds."

"The Avatar's earthbending teacher can't read?" Teo squinted in disbelief. "What kind of backwoods badger-mole hole did he pull her out of?"

Zuko leveled a look that should have set something on fire. "I understand Lady Bei Fong comes from a prestigious merchant family, and has had the benefit of tutors in the classics. Much of which she has memorized. Which is a notable feat, for one who can never see the light of scholarly illumination, but can only listen for the rustle of its robes as it passes in the night."

Wow. Somebody had their oh-so-noble back up. "And that's supposed to mean?" Teo shot back.

"She's blind, you jerk."

Teo rocked back in his chair, stunned. "I didn't... how?" he stammered. "She's a bender!"

"Since when does bending need eyes?" Zuko eyed the chair. "Or legs? Katara can turn me inside-out just using her arms. I've heard rumors King Bumi can bend with his face." He waved it off. "I trust Toph. So does Sokka. But Sokka's fifteen. You think a whole invading army is going to listen to him?"

"How old are you?" Teo challenged.

"Not the same." Zuko stalked the courtyard, one hand drifting out to touch the cool brazier as he passed it. "You think my people would listen to me if I said we had to break our promise to Asagitatsu on Chief Arnook's say-so? Wouldn't work-" He stopped dead, frowning.

Changchang lifted her brows, but stayed quiet. Teo bit his tongue and waited. He knew that look, too.

I think I've got something. Maybe.

"We don't need a message to Hakoda." Zuko's voice was quiet, tentative; as if he were feeling the idea out, eyes closed. "We need a message to Mai."

"What?" Teo choked out. "But - you said she was one of the girls who pretended to be a Kyoshi Warrior so the Fire Nation could get into Ba Sing Se-"

"With my sister, and Ty Lee. Right," Zuko nodded. "That Mai."

"That Mai?" Teo echoed in disbelief. "You want to send a letter to a girl who works with the Fire Princess - your sister, who tried to kill you - to help my dad?"

"Exactly." Zuko was smirking again, eyes alight with the kind of reckless glee Teo had only seen on Jing and Ke and Sima; the guys (and one stubborn girl) who would jump their gliders off cliffs into any weather. Because they knew the wind like he did, and they knew their gliders... and they had what Aang said he had. Spirit.

"Young man, I haven't heard anything that insane since - spirits, since Ji led us all up here!" Changchang started.

"Auntie." Teo shook his head. "He thinks he can do this." He swallowed. "Why do you think you can do this? She tried to kill you!"

"She had reasons." With an effort, Zuko focused on him. "Teo. Don't... don't judge the Fire Nation by my family. We're crazy."

Teo rolled his eyes. "You can say that again-"

"You're not listening."

Changchang was studying the prince, very carefully. "So the rumors are true. The Fire Lords are mad."

Well, sure, Teo thought, exasperated. Everyone knew the Fire Lord was... crazy... His mouth went dry. "You're serious."

"Not crazy the way you're used to," Zuko shrugged. "We know what we're doing, and we know why we're doing it. We just don't always do things for the same reasons everybody else does." He looked straight at Teo. "I don't know what you know about logistics. I don't know what Sokka's plan is. But if he's gotten people close enough to attack the Caldera, there is no way in the world we can get them a message to turn around in time. Which means we've got to attack the problem from the other end."

"The other..." Think, Teo. Think! "You want to help after - after everything's gone wrong."

"We don't know everything will go wrong," Zuko said bluntly. "It's going to be the eclipse. Hakoda and Sokka are good." He held up three fingers. "They could win." One finger down. "They could lose, and still be able to retreat." Another finger. "Or - worst case - they could lose, and they can't get away." Fingers clenched in a fist, dropped to his side. "That's where your father could get killed. That's where we need to do something. If we can do anything."

"And you trust this girl Mai." Changchang had her head cocked, making sure her better ear caught every word.

"Yes." Zuko looked a little sheepish. "But she listens to Uncle more than me. I should ask him."

"I'll go rescue him from your aunt," Changchang said dryly. "In the meantime... those two youngsters you sent up to us say you're a healer." She pointed at Teo. "Heal."

Zuko's attention snapped to him. "What's wrong with you?"

"Um." Teo glanced at Auntie. Who looked ready to drag him toward Zuko by main force. Winced as his leg throbbed again. "It's broken?"

Zuko glared at the bit of wood sticking out from under his blanket, and muttered something that made Teo's ears cringe. "Broken. Bad as my marines, I swear..."

"Heh." Knitting tucked up her sleeve and a smile on her face, Changchang strode briskly out of the courtyard.

Don't leave me here alone!

"Don't look like that," Zuko said grumpily, lighting charcoal with a punch of one fist. "I'm not going to eat you."

"Says the guy who just started a fire," Teo shot back.

"Waterbenders heal with water. What did you expect me to use?" Zuko rolled his hands around the flames, like Changchang rolling together a huge sphere of dough. "What hurts, where, and how bad?"

"Uh..." Fire had just shifted in Zuko's hands, yellow to green, gold, and purple that braided around each other like the Northern Lights. "The leg?"

"That's what I thought." Sighing, Zuko brought flame-wreathed hands over toward him-

Oh spirits this is going to hurt-!

"Fire doesn't kill people."

"What?" Teo croaked. Still watching flickering flames.

"In regular fires," Zuko elaborated. "It's not the fire that kills people. Usually. We can pull people out of fires. We do. And it's not the burn that kills them. Most of the time." Gold eyes caught his gaze; held it. "It's the air."

"...Huh?"

"Relax. This isn't even going to touch you. Exactly." Flames swept up and down over Teo's splinted leg, warm as a sunburn. "Good. They set it right. Right as they could, anyway. What a mess..." A quiet breath. "Fire doesn't kill people who get caught in it. It's the air."

"The air?" Teo tried not to shiver at warm prickles. "You mean, the fire uses up everything we breathe?"

"That's one way." Zuko spoke in the pause between passes, as if half his mind were somewhere else. "But if you drag someone out of a fire, before they can burn... Fires can make their own winds, did you know that? If a place has missed burning for too long - in the Fire Nation, things have to burn - the fire can be so hot it makes flame whirls. That's... it's scary, and it's incredible. I've never seen a bender make one. Jeong Jeong could, that's why the Earth Army's still hunting him..." Zuko dipped back into the brazier for more flames. "If you get caught in a fire, don't breathe. If the smoke doesn't kill you... the air's so hot, it cooks your lungs from the inside. You strangle to death." A soft ha. "Kind of funny. Fire and water. Doesn't matter which. You still drown."

Pale, Teo wriggled his toes. Ow.

"Quit that." Gold-and-green went back to work. Swept up and down, to the old ruin of his knees and hips. "Huh. Your nerves all look fine... oh. Damn." Zuko's hands seeped warmth into his hip. "You're lucky to be alive, you know that?"

"That's what Auntie says the healers said." Teo bit his lip, before any more of the old bitterness could slosh out. He had the wind. But sometimes... well. Done was done.

"They weren't kidding. You know how many blood vessels go through here?" Fire-wrapped fingers hovered over where Teo knew there was a scar. "Bone came right out here when you were little... just a little that way, and you wouldn't be here."

"You're serious." Teo had heard it for as long as he could remember. But - the Temple was family. Of course they wanted him to feel better about not walking. "I would have died?"

"Fast," Zuko nodded, grim. "You cut someone deep there, Teo, they're out in seconds. Dead in minutes. You got lucky." Fingers worked their way back to the break. "Now you need to work with that luck. You didn't hit your leg that hard; not hard enough to break bones like this. Your leg bones aren't thick enough."

"What?" Teo had never heard that one before. "Why? I hit things with my arms that hard, they don't..." He groped for words. Why hadn't he paid more attention the last time a healer poked him?

Fire fading, Zuko tapped the thicker muscles from pulling his wheels around. "Your arms get plenty of work. Amaya says bones need that just as much as muscles do. You don't put weight on your legs; you haven't walked in years. The bones got thinner. How much can you move?"

"I can wiggle my toes," Teo admitted. His leg still hurt. But it was just a nagging ache, and not a deep throb. "Shift my feet a little. Any time I move my knees, or hips - it hurts."

"I bet. All the tendons in there..." Zuko grimaced. Breathed out slow and easy, charcoal flickering down to warm coals. "I need to talk to Master Amaya. Research it. Until then - wiggle your toes more. And come back tomorrow."

It was like being drenched with cold water. "My dad could die because you didn't warn him. And you want me to come back tomorrow?" Teo demanded. "What is wrong with you? Don't you feel anything?"

The look he got back...

"Teo." Zuko's voice was very, very quiet. "Who is your father helping Aang kill?"

Something inside Teo seemed to cringe and get blistering mad, all at once. "That's not fair!"

"You don't want to talk to me about fair, Teo." Zuko didn't look away. "I grew up in the Caldera."

Those are my people. I know the way the waves sound against the docks. The patrols the Home Guard runs every night; when no one wants to be up, but someone's got to be. The shops and the silk-weavers and-

Coals flared.

Zuko glanced aside; slowing his breathing, slowing the flames. " Fair. Aang can bend air and water and earth. And he'll be attacking my father during the eight minutes we can't bend anything. If he even gets to my father. I know my father. He'll throw everything he can between him and the Avatar. Which means Aang's not going after my father. He's going after my little sister."

Teo swallowed, desperately grasping at something in this conversation that made sense. "Your sister. Who tried to kill you."

"My sister," Zuko agreed, grim. "Who loves our father. Who'd do anything for him. Including face off with the Avatar when all she has is a knife."

The flames went out.

"I'm going to do what I can," the prince said levelly. "If everything goes wrong, your father's going to need another way out. And I'll try to open one. Because I'm your neighbor. And good neighbors help each other." He didn't move, but the air was suddenly shimmering, choking hot. "But don't you ever ask me to care more about your father than I care about mine."

"Why not?" Teo snapped back. He's going to kill me. Hot air - I'm going to die! "My father isn't evil!"

Zuko didn't blink. Didn't breathe.

Then moved, swift as a downdraft, turning on his heel to stalk toward steaming water. "Want to know something interesting?"

The air around Teo was cool again. He gulped it, gripping his wheels and pushing to get out of here.

"If it's hot enough, a wave-style firebender can move anything."

A firebender can-

Steaming water erupted, surged around his wheels. Plucked his chair up like a dandelion, roaring; lifting him up and over stone and away-

Let me go!

Flailing hands caught something in the wind, like the click inside when he had just the right gust under his wings. Teo reached for it, turned like turning a wheel...

Wind whipped through water, sluicing cold as ice. Wood and bamboo crashed.

Ow.

"You okay?"

Teo blinked away water, focused on a white-painted face. Her red lips scrunched in a wince. "Ouch. That's going to sting."

Dazed, Teo let Saoluan dab a cloth at his bitten lip. "He tried to kill me."

The Kyoshi Warrior looked at him. Looked at the garden wall. Looked back at him. Arched a painted brow.

"Are you serious?" Teo pulled his wheels to back away from her, looking past her to her little brother and one very annoyed looking woman in firebender's armor. "He healed me, and then he tried to - to-"

The firebender heaved a sigh, and stalked toward the wall. "Can't leave the prince alone for one minute, I swear..."

Teo watched her swarm up and over shaped stone, gaping. "But- she-"

"Lieutenant Teruko? She'll be fine. Zuko's got a temper, but he'd never hurt one of his marines." Langxue looked Teo up and down, gaze lingering on the water dripping off his wheels. "I guess that's one way to find out you can bend."

"What?" Teo gulped. "I'm not- I can't-!"

Wind, catching on his fingers like silk. He'd felt it.

"Try," Saoluan urged, eyes shining. "We saw you. Just try."

Heart in his throat, Teo reached out to the wind. Aang made the airball - like this...

A shred of a breeze wrapped around his fingers like a spider-web ribbon, tickling all the hairs on the backs of his hands. It blew around, and around, and-

Slipped loose as he gasped, tugging on Saoluan's hair-tie before whispering away. Teo closed his mouth. Swallowed. "I'm..."

"Yeah." Langxue smirked. "Worth getting tossed around a little, huh?"

He wasn't going to gape. He wasn't. But - he was sitting in his chair. Sitting. Damp, a little frazzled, but definitely not splattered. And flying over the drowned swarm, he'd seen what water could do. "You mean - Zuko-?"

"Benders bend when they're upset." Langxue crossed his arms; eyed the damp wall again. "I was expecting something a little less messy."

"Zuko," Saoluan shrugged.

"Heh. Point." Langxue shrugged. "So what happened?"

Teo felt his ears burn. "The Fire Lord is evil!"

Saoluan winced. "Oh boy."

Teo hunched his shoulders, guilty and a little mad and so thrilled he almost didn't want to be mad. The wind's mine. Wow. "He is."

"Hey, I agree with you," the warrior said practically. "But come on. That's his dad you're yelling about. How would you like it if somebody called your dad the Fire Lord's lackey?"

"My dad's not-!" Teo cut himself off. Stared at the ground, flushed and guilty.

"No. He's not. Anymore," Langxue said firmly. "But there was a while when he was. And you still loved him. Because no matter what he did wrong, at the end of the day, he's still your dad."

"...I guess." Teo glanced at the wall, where not a shade of Teruko could be seen. "But how can anybody love the Fire Lord?"

"People are complicated." Langxue nodded down the street. "Come on. I want to tell you about some scrolls we've got." He grinned. "Though we should probably dry you off, first."

Quiet footsteps, and a sense of fire. "Sir?"

Teruko. Arms wrapped around his knees, Zuko huddled on the stone by the hot spring, trying desperately not to lash fire over Amaya's fragile new garden. "Are they gone?"

"They're going." The lieutenant crouched beside him. "Should I get someone, sir?"

"No." Breathe in. Hold. Out. "Just - don't go." Don't leave me alone...

"Right here, sir."

Right here. Maybe not the strongest firebender in the valley, but she was damn good. If his temper flared, Teruko could put the flames out.

But he wasn't really angry anymore. It just... hurt.

They want my family to die. People want my family to die.

Because the Fire Lord was evil, and cruel, and leading a war that had killed more people than he could probably imagine. They had every right to want Fire Lord Ozai dead. And Azula - Agni, he could only imagine what Azula had done these past years.

But I don't want to. It's not fair. She's my sister!

Breathe. Keep the rhythm slow. The world wasn't fair. It never had been.

"Is there anything I can do, sir?"

"Help me find a polite way to tell Teo I'm going to try and save his father even after he tries to kill mine?" Zuko said sourly.

"...Not sure there's a polite way to say that, sir."

Breathe. "Probably not."

"Might help if you could tell them why, sir?"

Why. Spirits. "Because I have to," Zuko said simply. "I made a mistake. I thought - frost it, Lieutenant. I thought anybody who'd ever dealt with Azula would know when they're heading right into one of her traps!"

Armor creaked a little; someone getting comfortable for the long haul. "I hear the princess is pretty good at what she does, sir."

"Yes. She is." Zuko closed his eyes. Tried to push the hurt away...

Azula.

His eyes snapped open. His breath quickened, picturing Azula's smirk, even if all she had to throw at her enemy was a knife and a bluff. Because no one knew when Azula was bluffing. "Yes," Zuko breathed, scrambling to his feet. "Yes, she is!"

"Sir?" Teruko sat up, alarmed.

"Need to think," Zuko tossed over his shoulder, grabbing for the sand tray. What he was about to write, he did not want lying around where anyone could read it. Even as ashes.

"Sir?"

"I've got an idea!"

Chapter End Notes

In WWII, people building the parts for armored cavalry didn't know what they were making, for security reasons. So they did a lot of guessing about what all these metal sheets would be used for... and this is how we got the name "tanks".

As for predicting eclipses... check out the orrery. And use a search to check this out: Antikythera mechanism

Best scientific evidence - they could, possibly, predict eclipses, even in 100 BC. Historically, Columbus wowed natives by predicting a lunar eclipse based on his ephemeris.

Chapter 62

"What do you mean, you're not going to help us?"

Grass and shrubs for Appa, fresh water, koala-sheep herds up here mean we should only have to watch out for shepherds, and they really don't like to see people anyway... Dragged away from tallying up the valley's defensive assets, Sokka sighed. Yeah. He'd been expecting this. Pretty much ever since Shidan had sent Hitomi to go send a message to his ship.

Doesn't need a ship if he's coming with us and Appa, Sokka thought. But he's not.

"Precisely what I said." Shidan stood unperturbed in the face of an exasperated airbender. "I have escorted lost children to a place they choose to part ways from me. It is enough."

"But you know the Fire Lord set up a trap!"

"And it is your choice to walk into it," Shidan said dryly, claws tapping near his hilts. "I will not drag Byakko into the pit of spirit-vengeance your predecessors have dug for us. Aid your invasion? Rebel against the Fire Lord? Piandao may choose to aid you, for Temul stands as sword and flame against the spirits who would destroy all Shu Jing's heirs. If she did not, that domain would be ravaged to the ground."

And Shidan had definitely looked at him, Sokka realized. Swallowed hard. He knows.

He was Piandao's heir. Which made him a great name rebelling against the Fire Lord. Oh, joy.

Hope Temul's good. We don't need any more spirits at our throats.

"If Shu Jing falls, many will be hurt, and many will die," Shidan went on. "If Byakko falls, Mount Shirotona will rage. The Fire Nation would be destroyed. And - oh yes - my wife and children would die. I will not." He eyed Katara, who looked like she was determined not to say anything, even if it killed her.

Can't figure out which way she wants to jump, Sokka thought ruefully. On the one hand, Shidan's telling Aang no, and she hates that. On the other-

"And as your waterbending teacher would be right to remind you, your invasion will be facing my granddaughter."

Yeah. That, Sokka thought. Sure, Azula was crazy. Even downright evil. But... gah. Even with those you never named, no one asked family to push them off the ice. How could Aang even ask?

"Do you truly expect me to strike at my own blood?" White whiskers bristled. "Your allies are Earth and Water; they would never trust me to do such a thing. And if I did, they would never trust Byakko afterward."

Aaand he hadn't even thought it through that far, Sokka realized, feeling a little sick to his stomach. Take out the Fire Lord, sure; capture or kill, they'd have to do one of those. But if the Earth Kingdoms and Water Tribes couldn't trust the great names to behave afterward...

"-Until all you bend are crimson and copper nightmares."

Zuko had seen it coming. Months ago.

Back then, he'd thought the firebender was paranoid. Now-

If somebody like Iroh was trying to pull this off, somebody everybody would listen to, it might work out okay. It's what the great names used to do, before the Fire Lord. You have a neighbor who won't keep his word? Who's cracking the ice everyone has to walk on? Kill him. And keep killing, until somebody in the other clan wises up enough to be honorable.

Or until the other clan was wiped out. That happened sometimes.

But we're not Fire Nation. Assassinate the clan head, then wait to see if somebody will act like a sane person - we don't do that. Earth won't stop while it's winning, and Water doesn't stop if the tribe's enemies are right there...

And they were going to be leading a whole army into the Caldera. Which was a city. Where people lived.

Oh man. This could get ugly.

"I trust you," Aang started.

"And am I to trust lives to the strength of your word?" Shidan narrowed gold eyes at Aang. "You ask me to throw my people under your allies' feet, and trust them not to trample us. Gyatso did not raise a fool, boy! Do not pretend you are one!"

Oh boy. Dragon about to go critical-

"He's not that dumb. He just doesn't want to think good guys can be awful, too." Toph stepped into Aang's line of sight. "Aang, he can't help us if we don't trust him. All of us. Or it's gonna be Zuko on the beach all over again."

Katara wrung her hands, stricken. "I wouldn't!"

"I believe that you would not." Shidan inclined his head to her. "But to ask all of your allies to trust me? They would be fools. And Chief Hakoda, and those who follow him, are no fools."

Aang waved his hands, thoroughly frustrated. "But we're going to stop the Fire Lord!"

As if that somehow solved everything, Sokka thought wryly. And maybe, in Aang's head, it did. Because stopping the Fire Lord was a good thing, so anyone who wanted him stopped had to be a good person, and good people always got along.

Never mind Temul. Or the Painted Lady. Or Zuko, for goodness' sake.

Ack. Did I just think Zuko was an okay guy?

Then again, compared to some of the Earth Kingdom "allies" they'd had-

"And I am under orders from my wife never to approach the Fire Lord," Shidan snapped back. "Because I would try to kill him. And I would fail. Byakko will not lose me to my own hate!"

That shut Aang up. Sokka breathed a sigh of relief-

"...Isn't he your family too?" Aang tried.

Augh.

Augh, augh, and what the heck was Aang thinking?

You know better. He's not thinking, he's feeling, Sokka told himself. Aang knows we think family's a good thing. And Shidan wants to stop Ozai, and that's a good thing. And good people want good things. Good people don't-

"He was my daughter's husband," Shidan said darkly. "The price of Byakko's safety. The man who has maimed my grandchildren, exiled my grandson, and nearly drove my daughter to insanity. I want his head, Avatar Aang. I want his blood staining Haegiri's blade! You do not want me there."

Right, Sokka thought, almost numb. That.

"But... you can't..."

"You do not understand." Shidan closed his eyes, sighing as if the weight of the world had settled on his shoulders. "You are of Air. You were raised in quiet. Peace. You do not hate."

Aang swallowed. Looked away. "...I hate your granddaughter."

"And you have known her such a short time," Shidan said dryly. "No. You do not."

Aang stiffened. "You can't tell me how I feel!"

"I would not presume to tell the Avatar how to feel." Shidan's voice bit, like acid. "But I have spent rather more decades in this life than you, young monk, and I know what you feel. And what you do not. You do not hate. You do not hate anyone." He blew out a steaming breath. "Hate gnaws at you, airbender. It coils about you with every breath, biting your heart with its fangs. It whispers in the dark; it clouds the brightest day. For every beat of your heart reminds you that another heart still beats, bringing life to one you cannot forgive."

Aang gulped, finally pale. Took a few steps back, before he braced himself. "But... you have to forgive. Or - it's just a poison inside."

"Yes; so it is." Shidan inclined his head. "And I have lived with that poison longer than you could ever imagine. It walks beside me in every battle; it sleeps in my every bed. It is cruel, and it cares for nothing but the one I hate. But it is mine, Avatar Aang." His voice dropped, low and oddly calm. "I hate, and I know I hate. I will live hating Fire Lord Ozai, and if the spirits are not kind, I may die hating him. But it is my hate. I feel it. None will take it from me. None will soften it. I will live and die myself." He shook himself, like a tiger-dillo shedding water. "So. I will not join you."

Which, honestly? Made Sokka breathe a lot easier. He'd never heard hate described like that, ever. And given that Shidan seemed like he'd not just come to terms with it, but invited it in for a nice bowl of sea prune stew...

No. He had heard something like that before.

Zuko. What he said, about Katara; how she hates everyone, but most of all she hates herself-

When this was all over, he was going to find a nice, deep hole to hide in. Maybe ask Toph to dig him one. 'Cause if it took two firebenders who weren't even human to explain what his sister was going through...

Something's wrong with our village. Or the world.

Not sure which is scarier.

"No. I will leave, and spare us both." Shidan took another slow breath, and shook his head. "But I have something that may aid you. If you wish it."

Okay, time to put his foot down. "If it's a present like Temul's?" Sokka stepped between them. "I think we'll pass."

"It is most certainly not a gift," Shidan said levelly, apparently choosing to let a youngster's possible threat slide. "It is an old burden, asked of me by... one long gone." A quiet breath. "It is not a pleasant thing to bear. But it may aid you."

"What is it?" Aang asked, cautious.

"A memory."

Damn it, I let him get too close-

A warm hand touched him, and they were elsewhere. A place of thin mountain air, the tug of a breeze on whiskers, the blazing contrast of orange robes against blue sky. The warmth of an old hand on...

Scales.

Oh boy.

"Aang. You were not wrong to run away. Knowing what you knew, and what the Elders might demand - it was an impulsive choice. But it was not unwise." A quiet, laughing voice; old, familiar wrinkles creased in a smile. "I only wish you had taken me with you!"

"I am leaving this message with one we both trust. You know him well, even if you did not know how many of your pranks he watched over. Oh, the tales I have seen..."

"Forgive me. There is so little time.

"I know you will be lost when Kuzon finds you. Confused, and angry, and hurt at what will - what has happened, for you. The world has gone horribly wrong. It has been wrong for centuries; I suspect even I do not know the worst of it. But I fear it will become worse, very much worse, before it can become better.

"But you must not give up hope.

"Believe me, Aang. And believe in yourself. You must not give up! There is hope. Even as some are pulled into the darkness, there are others who struggle toward what is right. They are few, and scattered, but you must find them.

"If you hear this, some of them have already found you.

"Aang. What is going to happen - what will have happened - it is not your fault. Sozin knows the Avatar was born somewhere among us. It is the only reason he needed to act. His evil is his. You are not to blame for it.

"And you are not to blame for not being here! The Elders might think so. The other monks might. But I am your teacher. If you were here, I would tie you up and tell Kuzon to flee with you! You cannot hope to face Sozin's warriors. Not yet! Not on the day of the Comet itself, when all you know is Air. The Fire Lord's power is beyond anything you have seen a firebender wield, and on that day...

"Aang. I am so sorry. By the time you hear these words, you will already know the Temple has burned.

"We will lose much. You, most of all. But even from the ashes, new life will rise. If our destruction means Xiangchen's bending, the way of harmonious accord, dies with us... then even in the midst of evil, Sozin's acts will loose one small blessing on the world.

"Never believe all is lost. There are those you do not know of, whom I found only after long searching. They will fear you; they fear all the Temples, and with good cause. But if your acts show who you are, Aang... they will know you are not the Elders. And they will show you more of Air than I would have believed, when I was young.

"Shidan knows them. But ask him carefully, Aang. A dragon takes the safety of those under his wing very seriously. And if his answer seems a riddle to you - recall that it may not be his riddle, but theirs. They are afraid, and like us, they prefer their own customs. Hiding is as much their way as wandering is ours. I know you will respect that.

"Sages say the Avatar is born where he is, who he is, for a reason." The old master chuckled. "I am an old man, and I think it may be that they are making that up. But if they have not... then it is not only the Avatar the world needs, my student. It is you.

"I will always be your teacher, Aang. And I will always be proud of you."

Parting. Worn fingers lifting away from scales.

"May the spirits grant you find him quickly." Gyatso's voice carried only flickers of emotion now, not the engulfing torrent of before. The rustle of his robes echoed off a Temple balcony, cloth colorless as the stars, pale with near-dawn. "He should not grieve alone."

:Negation. Demand! Gyatso flying free, not trapped in falling-stone and fire-:

"No, friend dragon. I will not go."

:Frustration. Pain. Pleading.:

"I must stay." The old airbender straightened his robes, looking away. "I know something of how your kind hunt. If Sozin's forces meet no resistance, none at all - he will be convinced there is nothing here to defend. He will know Aang lives." Gyatso let out a long, slow breath, that skirled into a wing-tugging breeze. "And I find... I cannot refuse my student that last protection. I will not."

:Mane-bristled, startled! Winds rising, red armor falling-:

"Yes." A slight, determined nod. "Yes, young one. I will fight."

:Sorrow.:

"From you?" Gyatso glanced back, surprise in gray eyes. "It would never occur to you not to fight for your life. Far less, for that of your clan."

:Agreement. Sorrow. Vows carved in a glory of ice catching sunlight. Shattered by a careless push.:

"I have wronged you," Gyatso murmured. "All these years - I thought you never understood."

:Bittersweet amusement. Claw touching Kuzon's hand. Kuzon's hand, reached out to the wind.:

"Ah. So I am wrong and right, is that it?" Gyatso smiled a little. "You do not understand peace. But you know you do not understand it... and that even so, it is precious to us."

:Agreement. Shared grief. Wishing-the-world-otherwise.:

"We cannot linger with what was. We must deal with what is." Gray eyes were intent. "Save them, young one. Save all you can."

:Temul on the ship's deck; ancient dragon-child whose nod was still sharp. Kuzon in the nursery, gathering the youngest. Maps, supplies; winds judged and hoped-for. Promised.:

"Good luck to you both." Gyatso took two long steps back. "Fly."

Bundles lashed. Sleepy complaints of children. Kuzon on his neck, trying not to weep, half-asleep despite every effort to fight night's pull-

He leaped, and caught the wind.

A reel of endless hours; dawn rising into day. A glimpse of black smoke far below. Fire Navy ships.

"Fly." Kuzon's voice was ragged; his grief burned like molten lead. "All we can do is fly."

(Hidden in a report to Mai on domain conditions, in fire-writing and in cipher.)

Sister,

Yes, of course it's your cipher. Mom taught both of us, remember? And I found a couple samples after each birthday present. "Learn by being cut." I did.

Grandfather says you're healing. That maybe I still can't trust you, but I can at least rely on you to be who you are. To act on the Fire Nation's best interests - even if they're not Father's.

I'm going to trust you.

Consider this, Sister. Who else is as skilled as you are? Who else would have the presence of mind - the power - to strike Aang down in the Avatar State?

Exactly.

If he dies at any other time - any other time, and you know what happens on battlefields - a dozen or so years from now, we're going to be up against a Water Tribe Avatar.

There are a conglomeration of reasons why that would be an extremely bad idea. I dealt with one of them in Ba Sing Se; ask your Dai Li about the haima-jiao. We're dealing with another reason here in the North - the drowned are at Koh's command, and the Face-Stealer knows how to whisper in an Avatar's ear.

But there's another reason. One that scares me.

I've found... some information, about when the Avatar cycle seems to have gone wrong. When the Avatar started commanding us to stay separate peoples, instead of advising us on how to overcome our differences.

It went wrong with Kesuk, Sister. The Avatar is a human as well as a spirit - and the human went mad. And when those trusted with the Avatar did what they must, to save humanity...

The Face-Stealer saw humans inflict the ultimate indignity on his parent. Humans, killing the World Spirit's bearer.

(Yes, the Face-Stealer thinks the Avatar Spirit is his... whatever. No, I don't want to think about how that works, either. How something with that many legs comes from something that keeps cycling through human lives... Eww. Just trust me on this one, okay?)

He's been plotting ever since. I don't know what he's been plotting, but I've got enough of the pieces that I want to hide everyone I've ever cared about in the most desolate places in the world. Even you.

He's been plotting, and he's had almost a full double-cycle of the elements to do it. The next Avatar will be Water Tribe, again. A woman, again. From the North Pole, again.

Only this time, instead of just being raised a spoiled noble brat, she'll be raised to believe women aren't supposed to fight. Aren't supposed to go to war. Aren't supposed to choose their own lovers. With the Face-Stealer right there - right in the heart of the city! - whispering about how the Avatar is powerful, the Avatar is noble, the Avatar should have everything she wants...

Uncle doesn't get this. Amaya doesn't. But you, Sister-

I think you understand more than anyone.

This is the last chance we're going to get to throw off the Face-Stealer's plan. The last chance.

(...Give me a minute to go find rocks to break. Aang is our last chance. Agni, the universe hates me.)

You know what's going to happen when the sky goes dark. You know what you're going to do. And if I know you, you know all Father's plans, too.

Which means you're going to have to be clever. The most clever you've ever been. This is a spirit-tangle like you wouldn't believe... or maybe you would, now. If you know Father's intent, you can't tell the spirits you didn't.

I tend to believe the Avatar's companions can and will get him out of anything. (I feel very, very sorry for anyone who ends up on the wrong end of Sokka improvising. That smarts.) The people he's going to drag with him... I doubt they're going to be that lucky.

I have other options. I have other resources. But you, Sister - you are the best at what you do. So I'm going to do something terrifying.

I'm asking you to use your best judgment.

You know how to break people. How to hurt them. How to destroy them, without ever touching them.

Is it in the Fire Nation's best interest to destroy Aang?

...Tell Circus Girl I got better, she's not going to get another free shot like that, and I hope she stays clear of Aang. The Temple had something called harmonious accord, and I don't know if he could affect another airbender that way.

Stay lucky,

Your brother.

(Who is really pretty glad there's a whole ocean between us for my birthday. Again. So what are you going to throw at me this time? And is it flammable? I've got a volcano this time, I bet it is...)

Chapter 63

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Watching Azula giggle, Mai reflected as the three of them perched in the shadows of a roof ridge, was not for the faint of heart.

Flutterby or not, Ty Lee was as tough as they came. The acrobat flipped up out of a handstand, not a tile stirring out of place. "Ooo, that sounds like a good one! Your aura's all bright! Still blue," she added, thoughtful, "but your flames are blue, so - maybe that's all right for you? Is it good?"

"It's interesting," Azula rolled up the gauze-fine paper, gold eyes dancing. "Tell me, Mai. What would you say if I told you my brother decided to trust me?"

Mai almost blinked, automatically feeling for the weight of her knives. "I'd say he'd lost his mind."

"Uncle would certainly think so." A long nail tapped paper; the slightest scratch over the breeze. "Which makes this even more interesting. I don't think General Iroh saw this."

Sing-song and gleeful, the way Azula always was before her most vicious plans. The day was warm, but Mai felt a chill down her spine.

"He asked you to help?" Ty Lee frowned, collapsing into a contortionist's ball. "But he's an exile. And he knows you'd never let Aang hurt the Fire Lord."

"He certainly does." Azula was looking out over the Caldera, oddly pensive. The city was quiet now, Mai knew. But soon, all too soon...

"I think," the princess said abruptly, "there may be a slight miscalculation in Father's plan."

Stunned, Mai raised an eyebrow.

"Yes, yes; letting them land, letting them waste their efforts and get hopelessly entangled with the Home Guard just before the eclipse should work. And it would be very dramatic," Azula admitted. "But who do we mean to impress? The barbarians? Please; we want to kill them, not leave them alive long enough to be envious of our power. Our own people? The point of our military and our blockade is to keep the war out. Particularly, to keep the Avatar out. If a sky bison flies here, on the Day of Black Sun, just as Kyoshi did..."

"People would be terrified." Ty Lee's voice was very small. "It'd be awful."

"Awful," Azula agreed. "And deadly. Our people are disciplined but that..." She shook her head. "The panic alone would cost lives. I've taken measures to move a significant fraction of the civilians out of the Caldara before that day, but even so... no. No, it is not an acceptable risk." Gold eyes stared at Mai, cold and fierce. "Fear is a useful tool, but only in moderation. We want our people to fear our enemies. But our advantage on the battlefield isn't technology. It isn't even fire. It's our ability to plan, to strategize, when all our enemies are charging at us screaming. Terror is wrong. Terror makes you stop thinking."

You should know, Mai reflected. You've used it often enough. "So what do we do?"

"First, we need to determine our resources." Azula cast a flickering glance at Ty Lee. "We found some interesting information in our... palace explorations. I never knew how hard a duty your family trusted you with. Protecting the great-granddaughter of the Great Betrayer."

"But that wasn't your fault!" Ty Lee's hands gripped each other, but her face was open as ever. "It'd be like... like saying you burned the Air Temples. You didn't."

Azula nodded, just once. "Kuzon didn't betray you, either."

Ty Lee went a little pale. "W-what do you mean?"

"Fire Lord Azulon took years to put the pieces together," Azula mused. "It wasn't as easy as it should have been. Fire Lord Sozin kept files on every lord, and their heirs, and their heirs. But Kuzon was so very far down the line of succession, there wasn't much information on him at all. Not until after he and Temul of Shu Jing conspired to spirit away Temple children."

Ty Lee shivered a little. "You know about that?"

"It was quick, clever, and daring." Azula's lips curved in a smirk. "One stroke, and he would have held resources no other lord could match. If the Fire Lord didn't already have onmitsu." She sighed. "But apparently, that wasn't his goal. He actually meant to save those children. No strings attached. Air is freedom, and he wanted them to be Air. Free." Gold sought gray. "Even of the Fire Lord."

Ty Lee dropped her gaze. "But... it's right for us to serve the lord of the Caldera. It's what we do. We feed the fires, so you can burn strong enough to protect all of us. If we didn't - we'd just blow, without an anchor. We might hurt people!"

It took every ounce of court-trained self-control for Mai to keep a straight face. "You're onmitsu." Hurting people was what they did. Admittedly, sometimes they did it in ways that meant their target never realized whose hand had ultimately killed them, but... even Ty Lee couldn't be that oblivious.

"Well... sometimes people have to get hurt," Ty Lee admitted, shoulders scrunched with misery. "But we don't... we're really bad at knowing who, by ourselves. If you just blow on the wind, you could hurt anyone. Just because that's where the wind went. I joined the circus to be different. But - not just that. I thought it would be better for everyone. So I wouldn't hurt any more boys when I smiled at them. That's what the circus is. It's just fun. Everybody knows the girls are just smiling at you because that's what they do. They don't really mean it." Ty Lee made herself even smaller. "I do really mean it, sometimes. But we can't just have fun and walk away. The Temples would do that, sometimes, when it wasn't a festival... and that was wrong. Not because of us. Because it hurts you."

Mai refused to blink. "Because it hurts us?"

"Well, yes. It's fun. But, it's not just fun for you. It means something for you. Something it doesn't mean to us." A sad shrug. "You know who you are. You always have to know."

Mai found her mouth hanging open. Closed it. "Are you saying-" She couldn't say it. She couldn't. It was too cruel. "Ty Lee. Your people marry. Your parents are married. I've met them."

"You met my mother." The acrobat smiled. "Everybody has a mother. Even if - well, even if she doesn't raise you, you still know who she is. Look at the compass to read the storm, right?" A tiny shrug. "But Kazenobu isn't my father. Or - well - not like you have a father. He might be my father. But that's not important. What's important is that he's my mother's partner." She swallowed, a little pale. "Is that okay?"

No, was Mai's first, instinctive reaction. Marriage was about clans. About lineage. About knowing, when everything else fell apart, who would watch your back.

But this is Ty Lee. When it comes to what matters, when you know her limits... when hasn't she been someone we could count on?

Mai swallowed her words, and focused on what mattered. "If you needed help, would he be there?"

Gray widened, utterly surprised. "Of course he would! When I needed to get away, he helped me get into the circus. He's Mom's partner."

"Then that's enough for me," Mai said firmly. Quashing all the little voices yelping otherwise. If Ty Lee was happy, if she got what other people would get from their clan - it was enough.

But oh, what a mess.

"When you call Lord Kuzon a betrayer," Mai said carefully, "you aren't talking about betraying the Fire Lord."

"No!" Ty Lee uncurled a little, startled. "He took children from the Air Temple, Mai! And that was okay, he really really should have - but then he kept them away from us! Children! Our children! We had to protect them. We had to, and he kept them from us!"

"You had to protect them from themselves," Azula said, almost gently. "And Kuzon wouldn't let you."

"Yes! Exactly!"

Mai almost objected. Azula wasn't sympathizing with Ty Lee over an old wrong; Azula didn't sympathize, ever. She was after something.

But what?

"So if you had to protect them," Azula went on, "why did it take your people over eighty years to do it?"

"...Huh?" Ty Lee blinked at her, hands limp as if she'd lost her grip on the world.

"Eighteen years," Azula reminded her. "That's how long Kuzon has been dead." At the acrobat's continued silence, Azula stifled a sigh. "Dates, Ty Lee. I know you were never good at them in the Academy. But they matter."

"I don't know why," Ty Lee said in a small voice. "The past is over. You can't change it. The future hasn't gotten here yet. Now is what matters."

"Except that what happens in now is often determined by then," Azula said dryly. "Eighty years, Ty Lee. That's a lot of now to not find those children. If that was ever what your Elders intended in the first place."

"Of course it was!" Ty Lee said defensively. "They told us all that."

Azula arched a dark brow. "Always check your sources. Even the best witness can be mistaken."

Ty Lee gulped. "But I would have known if they were lying! I would!"

"Are you certain you would know?" Azula's words were precise as flame-daggers. "Could you, if they didn't know they were lying?"

Mai started, fitting facts together and - yes. There. "You don't speak of sensitive missions. Ever. You make reports. Written reports, for the Fire Lord. And for the clan elders."

"Well, yes," Ty Lee admitted. "If you keep scrolls locked up, you know who's been in them. And no one can listen through paper walls if you're reading what your clan did..." She went pale as ice. "You think someone wrote a false report?"

Expressionless, Azula handed over a scroll. "This was in the Dragonbone Catacombs."

Handling rolled paper like a sulky snake, Ty Lee started reading. Flinched. Unrolled more. Read farther.

Sat down, gingerly as if she thought she might fly apart. "This... this is an order for..."

"Assassination," Azula finished. "Apparently Fire Lord Azulon finally realized Kuzon would never lead him to the other airbenders."

"Other...?"

"He wanted those children to be free. To be Air." Azula's gaze was focused as a welding torch. "But no matter what he wanted - they were children, Ty Lee. How could they have hidden what they were, unless they were among people who knew how to hide airbending?"

Surreptitiously, Mai touched fingers to the inside of her own wrist. Still a pulse. No matter how frozen she felt.

"Other airbenders," Ty Lee whispered. "Oh."

"Not part of the Temples," Azula observed. "But not part of the onmitsu either. Which would make them different. Which would lead to questions." She smirked. "I've noticed your Elders don't like questions."

"No," Ty Lee admitted. "Others... but none of the trained onmitsu could go find them. Chi-blockers can't leave the islands..."

"Without very powerful permission," Mai concluded for her. Dropped into a crouch, to squeeze Ty Lee's shoulder gently. She wasn't into touchy-feely, but - this had to be bad. "I'm sorry."

"It's not right," Ty Lee said thickly. "It's just not."

"It's not," Azula agreed, eyes narrowed. "You're our people. You should have been safe in our lands, under our laws. Kuzon should never have had to hide any of you." Blue flame flickered on her fingertips. "We can't make that right. Not now. Not with the Avatar out there. We have to stop him. And if Avatar Aang does know the Temple techniques, and has any way to influence those whose blood was once bound to those Temples - we have to keep him out of the Caldera."

"How?" Mai asked practically. "The Fire Lord's plan has a major tactical advantage. We know they have to attack the Caldera. We know where they'll be. When." Within a few hours, at least; eclipse prediction probably wasn't as precise as whatever the spirits had handed Aang.

"All true," Azula agreed, not smiling at all. "This will be risky. We'll be stripping some of the Caldera's defenses at the worst possible time. But." Gold eyes gleamed, intent. "We have this advantage. Chief Hakoda is not a fool. He can't simply drag whatever forces the Avatar's scraped together through our blockade and throw them at us. He'll want to rest them first. Organize them. Make sure everyone knows the plan. And he'll have to do that close to the Caldera."

Mai thought about that, drawing off what she'd learned when her family occupied Omashu. "Somewhere big enough for them to find, but hidden enough the Home Guard won't find them first."

Azula's smile could have cut glass. "I wonder how many places like that there are?"

Almost against her will, Mai smiled back. Invade my city, will you?

Min would probably say that wasn't fair. And he'd be right. Home wasn't fair. Home was where you didn't fight fair, because if an enemy had gotten that far, then if he got past you-

Not my city. Not my home!

"I can take command of a few Home Guard groups." Azula dropped down by Ty Lee, expression open as Mai had ever seen it. "But we'll have to be fast. And lucky. And we probably won't outnumber them. We'll need surprise." She reached out her hand. "Is there anyone - anyone you can think of - who could avoid answering to your Elders? Even for just a few days?"

Still staring at the scroll as if a thousand lost futures lay written in its characters, Ty Lee let out a shuddering sigh. Looked up. Silently, offered the scroll back.

Frowning, Azula took it.

A chill prickled Mai's shoulders. She'd never seen that expression on Ty Lee's face. Not worry. Not fear. Not even the concentration Ty Lee put into a tricky performance. It was...

Resolve.

"The Way of the Onmitsu," Ty Lee said, voice achingly clear, "is based on a lie."

She crumpled to the tiles, still.

She's not breathing!

Stronger than Temul, Sokka thought, fighting his way back to regular, human thoughts after that flood of other. Or... maybe just different.

It wasn't like Temul's memories. She used words, thought in words, even if the straight lines of language were slashed and scattered with the motion-shapes of steel and fire. Shidan - Shidan was all images. Shapes and motions and remembered-sounds-that-have-meaning. He didn't listen. He saw.

Man. If the inside of dragon-children's heads is like this...

Air was motion, and motion meant target, and target meant food. Or threat. Instinct, gut reaction; he could call it whatever he wanted, but Shidan was born to hunt and kill. Even if his mind said humans were off limits...

"You're really cute, but you're made out of meat," Sokka muttered to himself. "I'm going to be paying for that for the rest of my life. I just know it."

"I didn't want him to do that!"

Ow. Aang, could you keep it down a little?

But he didn't say it. Because Aang was shaking in Katara's arms, just like...

Like I would be, Sokka thought, a little guilty. If I saw Mom again, and then she was gone.

"I didn't," Aang hiccupped, "he shouldn't have..."

"It is not for the student, to decide what the master is willing to give," Shidan said gravely.

Katara bristled. Sokka felt like bristling himself, man that was cold-

Aang gulped, and scrubbed his eyes with his hand. "That's what - what Gyatso would say." He swallowed, a breath from breaking down all over again. "But he shouldn't have done it! Not for me!"

"If not for you, then for no one," Shidan stated. Still crouched, to meet gray eyes squarely. "You are his student. His hope for the world to heal, and the best of his teachings to be carried into the future. He loved you like a father; and like elder kin, he chose to die so you might live." Shidan's voice dropped, softer. "Gyatso told me once, Air is freedom. That you lived your lives so that every child would be wanted; so that every teacher could choose to have students, and teach them to wander as the wind. At their best, he said, the Temples were places of light and laughter, peaceful as the air at dawn." A quiet breath. "He chose to shatter his own peace, so that you might live. So that Kuzon might, and all those spirited from the Temples. He knew us, Aang. He knew what would draw Sozin's eye, long enough for Kuzon and Temul to cover their tracks. He knew us, and he chose." Softer yet. "Would you take that freedom from him?"

Aang looked away. Slowly, shook his head. "But it hurts."

"I know." Shidan looked away, pale gold squinted in pain. "I know."

Katara glanced at him, eyes dark. Hugged Aang a little tighter. "You lost Kuzon."

"To some of those he saved." Shidan drew in breath, a sharp ha. "Never rely on gratitude, young ones. It turns bitter too easily."

Katara shook her head, as if trying to shake the world back into place. "You're a dragon." She let out a long breath. "But... if Zuko's spirit-born... if Azula is... why are they Aang's enemies?"

White brows lifted, sardonic. "You have dealt with the Painted Lady," Shidan observed. "Why do you think?"

"What does she have to do with- oh." Blue eyes went painfully wide. "Oh. Ow."

"Um." Toph waved a hand Sokka's direction. "Clue, for anybody who didn't grow up on ice? What's spirit-born?"

"People you hear about in stories," Sokka filled her in, trying to figure out why Katara had brought that up. Dragons weren't spirits. Exactly. "Sometimes they end up with the girl, but they always end up in trouble. Usually because someone tricks them into saying they'll do something, and then they have to... keep their word..."

Promised.

Not just words. Not to Shidan. Elemental. Wind blew. Fire burned. I promised.

Hand, meet forehead. Ow.

"You know," Sokka said through his fingers. "I bet somebody thought that was a good idea."

"Oh, the spirits often think it an excellent idea," Shidan said dryly. "They don't have to live in this world. Or with humans, who may discover something new - who may uncover the fact that they were wrong - and then change their minds."

Aang was looking between the two of them like they'd started juggling penguins. "I don't get it. You can change your mind and still keep a promise. You just have to be... well, careful about it."

Say what? Sokka tried to get out. Tried. His tongue seemed to tangle itself, because if there was one thing spirit-tales made clear...

"Enlighten me," Shidan said dryly. "Ozai's decree was clear, and absolute. You are exiled, never to return to the Fire Nation unless you find and capture the Avatar." He stroked a long whisker, gaze steady. "Exactly how does one be careful with that?"

"Well, he did catch me!" Aang grinned. "Just, not for long."

One brow raised, Katara gave her brother a look.

Yeah, yeah; I'll be the bad guy. You owe me, Sis. "Wouldn't work," Sokka said, matter of fact. "Ozai's the guy who set the terms. He gets to say if it's done or not. Only way Zuko could get out of it is if a whole bunch of spirits - stronger than the Fire Lord - could say Zuko did it. And be telling the truth."

"Not even Agni could do that," Shidan agreed. "Not for long, is not captured at all. Azula has engaged you in combat longer than that."

"But there has to be a way. There's always a way." Aang's stance was set. "You just haven't looked hard enough."

A waft of steam rose from Shidan's breath.

Great. Tell him he didn't try hard enough to help his grandson. Sokka sighed. "Aang. Tao said spirits live by different rules, right? They're not like people. That's why we need the Avatar. Somebody who can be honest to both sides. And the spirits need that even more than people do. Gran-Gran said they're kind of..." He groped for the right words. "Well, kind of what's really true. About everything. Katara, what'd she always say?"

"Spirits are the heart of everything that exists," Katara said confidently. "Remember the Ocean spirit? He was terrifying. But that's what he's supposed to be. The sea's not friendly, and it's not safe. It is. If you honor him, you get good catches, and you always come home. If you don't, storms pull you under." She waved toward the east. "Or the Painted Lady. She wanted to be kind. To help her people. And I was trying to help, but - I didn't respect her. You can't use a real spirit's name for yourself, not like that! It hurts them. They have to be true to what they are. Or..." She swallowed. "Gran-Gran didn't like to talk about it. But the spirit-born stories - they make it pretty clear."

Toph's toes curled a little, away from whatever her feet were telling her. "Bad endings?"

Sokka grimaced. "Really bad. Turning into cursed monsters bad." He whistled. "When Hei Bai showed up? I was sure that was what he was."

"Hei Bai wasn't a monster," Aang objected. "He was just upset. His statue was right in the middle of all those burned trees... Katara?"

"Oh. That's why." Katara hugged herself, as if she were cold despite the Fire Nation's incredible summer heat. "I asked the villagers why Hei Bai was taking people. They wouldn't talk about it. They had a shrine out there. No wonder!"

"Um..." Aang scratched his head. "I know Tao said you need to respect shrines, but - it was the Fire Nation that burned it down."

"It was humans," Shidan shrugged. "Humans promised to protect the shrine. Humans failed. Humans burned it down." He sighed. "Hei Bai may not have even known they were different humans, until you told him. Had a dragon been there, we likely would have been attacked as well."

"But you're not a dragon," Aang said confidently. "I mean, you've got the same name, and - I guess you saw what he saw, but - you're not."

"You never would see us for what we are." Pale gold was watchful. Waiting. "Airbender. We are large. We are dangerous. And we are hunters. Predators, who can easily kill a human, should we choose to do so. Who can and do decimate herds, unless our elders teach us otherwise. Why should men let us live, if we were not kin?"

Sokka tried not to giggle. Really. He'd never, ever seen Aang's jaw drop like that.

"You're serious." Katara let go of Aang. "I know spirits have a hard time telling us apart, but - dragons have to be different!"

"The spirits," Shidan slashed a clawed hand through hapless air, "think otherwise. The Face-Stealer wants all of us dead, Katara of the Southern Water Tribe. Human, dragon - that some of us bear swords, and others wings, does not matter. All the elements, all who live and breathe and think, are pinned in his trap." He hmphed. "My clan has worked for centuries to prize its jaws apart. Whether we will succeed, whether we will survive - that, I do not know. But we are Agni's children, and we will die before we surrender."

"Yeah. That's kind of the problem," Sokka pointed out. Because he knew you didn't - they didn't surrender. Not when the enemy was going to kill you anyway. And the Fire Nation didn't trust the Avatar. Couldn't. What a mess.

"True." The dragon's grin had the sharp, unnerving edge of the guy who knew he was going to be stuck cleaning the mess up. And that he was going to get even for that. Somehow. "Fire Navy marines have a saying. The difficult we do immediately. The impossible takes a little longer." His grin deepened. "One might suggest... one thing at a time."

Man. If that wasn't Zuko in a nutshell...

And you know what? He's right.

Sokka pushed away the impulse to panic, and tried to think. Difficult. What's difficult... getting to the Fire Lord.

And we can do that.

We can do this. We've got a plan. Yeah, maybe they know we're coming - but that can't change what's going to happen. There's going to be an eclipse. They won't be able to bend. We can do this.

Stop Ozai, maybe we don't stop the Fire Nation. But we do stop the guy who can make them fight.

Good place to start.

"And then Ozai won't be the Fire Lord anymore, and nobody will have to catch me to go home." Aang shot Sokka a triumphant grin. "See? I told you there was another way." Lacing his fingers behind his head, the airbender stretched with a sigh of relief. "Well, if you can't come, and I guess you really can't, why don't you tell Zuko the good news? No, no, wait! We should tell him. After it's over. All that time he spent trying to catch us - I can't wait to see his face!"

Shidan's face, Sokka decided, could best be described as horrified. "I would suggest you avoid my grandson," the dragon lord managed. "It would be kinder."

"Why?" Aang stopped bouncing. Frowned. "If the Fire Lord's gone - then there's no problem. We could even be friends."

For a moment, Shidan stared at him.

Quiet as snapped fingers, the dragon clapped a hand to his forehead.

"What? What'd I say?"

"I wish Gyatso were here," Shidan muttered. Shook his head, and lowered his hand. "I would roar at him. For a very long time. He was your teacher. The one supposed to encourage you to use reason, and logic. To follow a train of thought without getting derailed by a butterfly."

"What butterfly?" Aang glanced around the clearing. Fixed his frown back on Shidan. "What'd I say?"

"Zuko, son of Ursa and Fire Lord Ozai, grandson of Lady Kotone of Byakko and Shidan, will never be your friend." Shidan sighed. "Until you have found for yourself why - be kind. Leave my grandson in peace. He has quite enough to worry about already." He bowed, restrained and civil. "May fortune favor you. You will need it." A second, gentler bow. "Stay well, Toph. And if you cannot - kick them where it hurts."

"You too, Grandpa." Toph jabbed a finger his way. "Or I'm gonna come looking for you."

"I will count the days." With a faint smile, Shidan set off.

Aang bounced up onto his toes-

"Let him go. He needs to get clear of here, remember?" Sokka reminded him. "Even after we stop Ozai, we'll still have to get the word out through the whole Fire Nation. Shidan needs to keep his people safe until we can."

"Oh." Aang bit his lip. "Yeah. That could be bad." He frowned after the departing dragon. "But why does he think we can't be friends with Zuko, if he's not going to chase us anymore?"

"Aang..." In through the nose. Out through the mouth. I know there's a working brain in there. I've seen Aang come up with ideas.

...Usually after trying everything else, first.

Another breath. Like Master Piandao had taught him. Losing your temper was supposed to be the last resort, not the first. "Aang. He told you. You just have to put it together. Dragons keep their promises. Anything else is lying."

"You mean back at your village? That was months ago. He can't still be mad about that."

"Oh, you have no idea, Twinkletoes," Toph muttered.

"Well... I guess maybe Zuko can." Aang grinned a little. "But that wasn't lying. That was just... being creative."

"You wouldn't be creative with Hei Bai," Katara said firmly.

"Okay. Okay!" Aang flung up his hands. "I broke my promise. I said I was sorry."

"But you're not." Katara nodded, understanding. "Not the way a spirit hears sorry. When you hurt a spirit, when you break a promise to them - if you want them to believe you're sorry, you have to promise you won't do it again. You have to mean it. And you can't do that, because you would do it again. Because it would be the right thing. You can't let the Fire Nation catch you. It would be the end for everybody."

"Thing is, that's probably what makes Shidan so cranky," Sokka put in. "It was the right thing to do. Just like taking on the Fire Lord's the right thing to do. And Shidan can't do it. He promised." He had to look away, remembering one too many shivery tales in the winter dark. "Nobody wants to be spirit-born. It's a mess."

"But I'm a spirit," Aang objected.

"Uh-uh." Sokka shook his head. "The Avatar Spirit's a spirit. You're Aang. You can break a promise. Just like any other regular guy." Only, Aang wasn't quite, was he? Aang could break a promise, and when the Avatar Spirit showed up it usually wasn't talking, so maybe it couldn't promise anything...

But what if it could?

Bad thought. Bad thought. Not going there.

"Zuko probably knows you did the right thing too," Sokka sighed. "He broke his promise back in Ba Sing Se. And that was the right thing to do, Azula's crazy - but it didn't matter." He pinned Aang with his gaze, just like Dad would when things got serious. "Aang. You broke your promise, and you got to fly away and laugh at him. He broke his... and it almost killed him."

"That's not my fault."

Stunned, Sokka scrambled to put his thoughts back together. Where had that come from?

"Nobody told me about spirits. Nobody told me about dragons. The dragons didn't tell me about dragons! Shidan could've talked to me any time, but no. He'd rather spy on everything me and Kuzon were doing, and tell Gyatso. Do you know how many times I got in trouble for that? And I thought it was Kuzon telling on us., and he never said he wasn't - how could he do that?" Pacing around the clearing, Aang jammed hands in his uniform pockets, adamant. "I'm a kid, Sokka. I don't know why you and Katara think you're not. You're not elders! So I don't know about spirits, and dragons, and - weird stuff, like dragons turning into people. I'm not supposed to. That's grownup stuff. Elder stuff, even! And if Zuko and Shidan and the whole Fire Nation is mad at me 'cause I'm not an elder - whose fault is that? They're the ones who burned the Temples! Who killed - who killed-" His face scrunched up, utterly miserable.

"Oh, Aang." Katara hugged him. "It's going to be alright. Somehow."

Sokka backed off from the motherliness, rubbing the start of a headache. I am not a kid. I'm a warrior of the tribe. I've been ice-dodging - well, rock-dodging, but Bato said it was just as tricky. And he should know. He recognized us as adults. We're not kids anymore. We have to be responsible...

But Aang had backed off. Denied the mark. Because he was supposed to be trustworthy, and he'd lied.

First time I ever really got mad at him. How could he do that?

And the first time Sokka had ever had the creepy thought that maybe Aang didn't want to be a grownup. Which was just crazy. Sure, it was okay being a kid, people looked after you. Really little kids needed looking after; they didn't know any better than to crawl onto thin ice. But you wanted to get past that. To learn everything, and take care of yourself, so your parents could spend less time on you and more taking care of the whole tribe.

And that sorted with what Temul had stuck in his head, too. The Fire Nation liked kids to be a little older before they made them lords, it was a lot of responsibility - but Kuzon had been lord of Byakko. At fifteen.

Sure, he'd had help. Including one really sneaky dragon. But that didn't count. Every great name was supposed to get help, if they ran into something they weren't sure about. That was part of what being a grownup was all about; knowing what you didn't know.

Aang didn't know what he didn't know. And he didn't want to.

"We're screwed."

Toph, almost under his elbow. Sokka tried not to trip over his own feet in a startled jump. "Don't do that!"

"Sorry. But we are, aren't we." Toph cocked an ear toward the mumbled litany of woe and soothing going on. "I kind of see where he's coming from. I'm a kid, too. And I didn't get told I had to save the world. I came with you guys because I wanted to. Big difference."

"I never said it was his fault," Sokka protested. "It just - well, it just is. The Fire Nation's got some of the same problems spirits do. We've got to deal with that. Heck, we're going to take advantage of it. Stop Ozai, and we should stop everybody who has to be loyal to him." Sokka grabbed his wolf-tail. "That's not anybody's fault. That's being responsible! That's-"

"Being a grownup?" Toph put in.

"Well, yeah," Sokka admitted. "What's wrong with that?"

"Sounds like everything."

Not going to smack my forehead. Enough bruises there already. Sokka sighed instead, letting go of abused hair. "Shidan said Zuko's got enough problems..."

"Yeah?" Toph tilted her head his way, suspicious.

"Whatever he's got? I'd trade."

"Let me get this straight." Teo's voice was a little higher pitched than usual as he waited upslope from them, Changchang and Lieutenant Teruko each keeping a hand on his chair even though Teo had the brakes on. "You're going to be bringing up white damp gas? And you call this safer?"

Zuko crouched by a warm yellow flame of gas dancing over a rock crevice, hand on the rough crystals to feel for fire down below. Shirong's hand was bare inches away, the Dai Li's green eyes half-closed in concentration as he reached for stone and heat. Langxue was back a few feet with Saoluan, trying to feel any shift in the air that might warn of poisonous gases.

The glider's knuckles, Zuko noted, were white.

Can't blame him. I don't like this either. "Safer than letting it just build up pressure in the magma," Zuko stated. "And safer here than some other places. White damp kills people."

"I know that!" Teo swallowed. Shivered a little. "My village worked mines before the flood. I've heard the stories."

"But if you can burn it again, in open air," Zuko pressed on, "it's harmless. Not good to breathe; it's like blackdamp, you have to mix it with good air to be safe. But it won't kill you. Not like white damp does."

"...Okay," Teo said after a moment's blank silence. "Say that again?"

"I wouldn't mind a few more details myself," Shirong admitted. "You seal caverns to lock white damp in. You generally don't let it out. One spark from a pick..."

"It blows. I know," Zuko nodded. "That's why you want to burn it. Above ground, not in stone where things can blow to pieces."

"If you seal it, there's no risk of blowing to pieces," Shirong said dryly.

"The Fire Nation doesn't have earthbenders, remember?" Zuko eyed him, smile a little wry. "We can't seal the ground. So we have to get it out, instead. It's not just in mines. Volcanoes make white damp. And a whole lot of other things. If you don't get it out of the soil, you lose everything. Crops, animals, trees - spirits. Everything."

"White damp can kill trees?" Changchang looked skeptical, but waved a hand in a calm, go on.

"Yes, ma'am," Teruko nodded. "It's one of the things you keep an eye out for. Trees are dying, and there's no good reason for it? Especially if they're down in the hollows? You call for a Fire Sage, fast. It might be all the warning you get before a peak gets cranky enough to spew the really nasty stuff."

"In the hollows..." Teo sat up, intent. "And it goes down in the mines. In the low spots. It sinks?"

"The scrolls say it's actually lighter than most of air." Langxue spread fingers in the wind, frowning. "But - they also say it can be mixed with other stuff, and that sinks."

"I don't know how light it is," Zuko shrugged. "When it's from a volcano, it's coming up out of the ground. Trees die first because their roots are deeper."

"Huh." Teo chewed his lip, thinking.

"If the scrolls are right, we can figure out how to feel it, even in the rest of the air," Langxue told him. "If we keep working at it."

"Feeling gas." Teo's knuckles gained a little color back. "If we could bend the natural gas, move it out of the tunnels Dad broke into, and then you could help us seal the leaks up... wow. That'd make the whole Temple safer."

A number of snarling replies to that leapt to mind. Zuko pushed them back. Not the time. "If we don't vent the pressure out of Asagitatsu, there won't be much of your Temple left." He peered upward. "Based on the size of the caldera already... coin toss, if the buildings up there would survive or not. If they did, if you made it through the poison gases and the clouds hot enough to vaporize you - the explosion would kill everything on the lowlands, and wipe out crops all the way south. Maybe even to Ba Sing Se. Even if you lived, you wouldn't be able to stay here." He eyed Changchang. "I wish there was another way. But we don't have enough trained, strong firebenders to cool the magma down."

"Your grandfather," Shirong started.

Zuko winced. "He won't be coming. Don't look at me like that," he muttered, cross, as everyone in earshot seemed to stare at him at once. "I know my luck. I know how spirits get ideas stuck in their heads. He wants to come. Byakko wants to help. But this is too perfect a setup. The Face-Stealer wants humans dead. The Fire Lord wants all rebellions crushed. And the World-Spirit thinks I owe it, just for being alive." Don't mention what yāorén are supposed to be. Not to Teo. Not yet. "We're not going to count on somebody rescuing us. We have to do it on our own." He looked at the dancing flame again, trying to think only of fire, and not the gnawing terror of what if this goes wrong? "Besides. They'd be doing the same thing. By moving heat around, not rocks, but... We can't stop the eruption. What we have to do is slow it down."

"By letting white damp-" Teo stopped, finger still lifted in midair. Lowered it, dark brows scrunched in calculation. "It's like having a pot on to boil, isn't it? Leave the lid on, the whole thing can blow off. But if you crack it a little..."

"Right," Zuko breathed, relieved. "Problem is, we're not just going to get steam. Volcanic gases are nasty." He shrugged. "But most of them, if you can burn them? They're a lot safer."

Teo frowned. Lifted his own fingers into the wind, and craned his head up at the wisps of fog streaming off the mountainside. "I've seen my dad try to work with natural gas before. Not all of it's going to burn where you want it. Some of this stuff is going to get into the air."

"I know," Zuko nodded.

"And if you're getting the volcano to push some of its steam out another way - the currents we use at the Temple could change," Teo added.

"I know," Zuko repeated. "This isn't going to be pretty. We can try to keep it to pinpricks, so there's never too much poison near where people are. But it's still poison. Accidents can happen." Don't flinch. Don't. "But if we don't do anything, people are going to die. My people. Your people. And a lot more." He made his fingers relax, before nails could bite too deeply into his palms. "I wish I had another idea. This... it's the best one we've got."

Teo scratched his head, thoughtful. Glanced at the lady still gripping his chair. "Auntie?"

"The Earth King gave Prince Zuko these lands by treaty," the elderly woman observed. "I may be just an old woman, but as I understand our laws... he doesn't need to ask us for anything."

Zuko tried not to smirk. The Earth Kingdom probably wouldn't think it was funny. "I'm not asking. We're neighbors. In the Fire Nation, if you're going to do something that changes the water downstream, you talk to your neighbors, first." He waved up at the cone. "It's not water, but air flows, too. So we're talking. In case you have any better ideas."

"Any better ideas," Teruko muttered. "I wish we could wait for help, sir. Shirotona's used to being managed. Asagitsatsu?" She shook her head.

"She said we could try," Zuko reminded her. Eyed Teo again. "You're the wind expert here. If we open a vent, a small one - what do you think?"

Teo licked a finger. Stuck it back in the wind. Scanned the valley walls, the shape of the cone, the way waves lapped against the harbor shores. "I think it'd be okay," he said at last. "But if we really end up shifting the currents, that could change."

"One thing at a time." Zuko made his breath light and even, touching the faint sense of deep fire so far below. "Ready?"

"We want a channel to here, but we need to seal it from the natural gas until it's ready to burn," Shirong said, half to himself. "I think I have the right spot." He took a rooted stance; brought his hands slowly together, palm to flattened palm. Gingerly - carefully - pulled knuckles away from each other, fingertips and heels of his hands still touching. Again. And again.

Under his feet, Zuko felt a whisper of movement.

He stood back; eyes on the flame, not the rock. Watching an expert bend was always fascinating, but he'd have to skip it this time. You couldn't see white damp. You couldn't smell it. The only way you even knew it was there was-

In the heart of burning yellow, there was a sudden thin thread of blue.

"Stop!"

Shifting a foot back to break his stance, Shirong parted his hands. Only then did he glance at the gas flame, where bits of blue still danced. "I didn't realize it would be that close to the surface."

Teo gulped. "Neither did I."

"Teo?" Changchang gave him a worried look.

The glider looked pale. "Whatever's doing... that? With the fire? It's down there. Kind of... all down there." The wave of his hand encompassed the entire caldera. "It's... big. Really big. I remember what it felt like when Sokka and Dad blew up the gas with the balloon furnace. This..." He shuddered. "This is a lot bigger."

"Well, it looks like it's all burning. If it weren't, there'd be a lot more blue." Zuko breathed in, then out, testing the flame's response. "Doesn't feel like it's really changed. Is the rock holding?"

Shirong rested a hand on the nearest outcrop. "It's stable. For now."

"That could change," Teo muttered, still a little white. "Really quick." He reached toward the flame; apparently thought better of it. "If I just knew what I was doing... wait. Black damp is like candle smoke. Maybe if I practice with that... and no one's tossing me around in hot water at the same time..."

Zuko winced. "About that-"

"I'm sorry."

"I wish I'd been able to think of - what?" Zuko stopped, utterly bewildered.

"I said, I'm sorry." Teo gave him an odd look. "Langxue told us; we're trying to figure out airbending with scrolls and a lot of guessing. If that's what you thought it took to find an airbender... we'll just have to figure out a better way later."

"That would be good," Zuko stalled, trying to get his thoughts in order. He said he's sorry?

"You're old enough to handle a little scare. I'd hate to do that to a kid. Even some of your younger gliders."

Hand still out to feel the air, Teo glanced at him, eyes wide. "You think we might have more benders?"

"We haven't had an earthbender born at the Temple for nearly three years, now," Changchang observed. "Near, but not there. We don't have that many youngsters, true - but I'd have expected a few more." The elderly woman rubbed her chin, thoughtful. "Best to find a different way to test for it, yes. Don't your scrolls mention anything?"

Zuko winced.

"That looks like there is a way." Teo eyed him warily.

"There is?" Langxue frowned at both of them. "You didn't show me that scroll."

Zuko sighed. Not getting out of this one. "How does a cat-owl in a hurry move her litter?"

"Well, she..." Langxue ground to a halt. "Seriously?"

"Yes."

"You're kidding." Saoluan rubbed at the back of her neck. One hand mimed plucking up a kitten-owllet at the nape, and tossing.

"Yes," Zuko bit out.

"Then again, maybe your way's not that bad," Teo muttered. Shaking his head, he eyed the blue-streaked flame. "It feels like a lot. But do you have any idea how much we're dealing with?"

"I've got some rough calculations-"

A shadow sailed overhead.

"That's Sima." Teo sat up, evidently reading glider colors and shape the way Zuko read insignia. "She hates walking back uphill. This has to be important."

Another pass, and a child maybe a bit older than Toph, it was hard to tell through the bundled clothes, touched down running-

"Not that way!"

Zuko yanked the flames back before they could lick at vulnerable wings. Langxue and Saoluan both grabbed for her; one with hands, the other with a tangling rope of water. And Teo-

The whirling dust wasn't strong; the girl's goggles probably blocked most of it. But it caught glider wings, lifting and shoving back.

Stumbling, Sima sat down hard. "Fire? Oh, fire - oh no - why's fire here when the army's up there, that doesn't make sense-"

"Army?" Zuko pounced.

"Eeep." Behind glass, hazel eyes were very wide.

"It's all right, Sima." Teo rolled toward her. Away from the gas jet. "What army? Where? The Fire Nation?"

Oh, hell, Zuko thought numbly. If they came overland - but that doesn't make sense! We hold parts of the coast here, but the mountains? One earthbender in the right place, and they're a deathtrap. I was sure they'd come by sea-

"No!" The girl gasped. "Green! They're Earth Kingdom!"

...And that's not much better. He traded a glance with Shirong, who had the intent look of someone rifling through a mental filing cabinet for just what units could be out this way. "Who?" Zuko demanded. "How many? What's their standard? Who's leading them?"

The goggles made her blink so much like a cat-owl's. "Um. Lots?"

Totally taken aback, Zuko shook his head. Lots? When he'd been twelve, he could estimate a unit's numbers with a quick glance, and their combat readiness with just a little longer to look through a spyglass at signs of polish and wear-

He held out a hand, palm up.

Teruko looked at him. Looked at the girl. Sighed, and put a spyglass in his hands. "Sir. You shouldn't."

"I'm lighter than you."

"Fighting dirty, sir."

"Uncle can't do it. Even if we pried him out of the vault, unless they've got another balloon here we don't know about..." Zuko fixed Teo with a look. "Do you?"

Startled, Teo looked back. Then at the spyglass, the mountains, Sima's glider... "You can't be serious."

"I don't care if it's a balloon, a glider, or a dozen phoenix-eagles," Zuko said grimly. "Get the settlement warned. Get anyone at the vault warned. And get me up there."

Well. It wasn't phoenix-eagles.

Sokka's design, Zuko thought, as Teo escorted their balloon up into thinner air. Should have known it was him. Anything this crazy...

But he hadn't known. Because the first he'd heard of war balloons was a report Uncle had snagged from War Minister Qin's dispatches, and if that didn't promise all kinds of mayhem in the future...

"Breathe, sir." Teruko had to be as nonplussed about being mountain-high as he was. But she hid it better. "Air's thin up here... oh."

Oh. Yeah. Green and dun, snaking through one of the higher passes like a coiling cinni-vanilla vine. With that standard, carried proudly at the front...

General Fong.

Head in his hands, Zuko took a deep breath. Another.

"Sir?"

Determined, Zuko straightened. She's counting on you. They all are.

Spyglass in hand, he started tallying numbers and equipment. But he paused, just long enough to give his lieutenant a wry smirk. "Looks like my birthday present got here early."

Chapter End Notes

Firedamp is an old mining term for flammable gases including methane. Afterdamp is a mix of gases including carbon monoxide and carbon dioxide after an explosion.

White damp is carbon monoxide. Blackdamp, stythe, or chokedamp are carbon dioxide. Stink damp is hydrogen sulfide. These terms were in use by 1480 in real life; I think we can say the Avatar world has plenty of their own experience with mining to define these as well.

Chapter 64

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Boo!"

His most beloved student stared back at him, a bit glassy-eyed. "Appa's got Kyoshi Island swords. The Guru has six arms. And now you're here." Aang buried his face in his hands. "It's not fair."

He looks so different with hair. Gyatso sighed, settling down cross-legged on grass, never stirring a blade of it. The walls between the spirit world and the living world were always thin around the Avatar, but - well. He was no dragon-kin, to step between worlds as a ghost. Aang had to weaken his own hold on the living world for Gyatso to have even a hope of speaking to him. No matter how much he'd wanted to. "No. It most certainly is not fair. Fair would have been for the Elders to have kept silent until your sixteenth birthday. Every Avatar was meant to have that gift; to be raised without the world's weight upon them. At least for sixteen years."

"Yeah," came muffled through Aang's fingers. "Lucky me. You're not real."

"Whether I am real or not, young airbender," Gyatso said gently, "would it do you any harm to tell me what has upset you so?" He laughed, just a little. "Though knowing what I have seen, it might be a shorter list to say, what has not?"

Slowly, fingers parted. Aang blinked through them. "You... really sound like Gyatso."

The old master smiled. Reached out to ruffle black hair, even if all Aang would feel was the tug of a breeze. "Shidan gave you my message at last. I hoped that he would have the chance. But I could not be certain of it. Even the canniest dragons often fell to Sozin and Azulon." He sighed. "And Makoto." Spirits, but he wished he knew where that treacherous she-beast was. She was a master of concealment, like the onmitsu; few spirits could sense her, much less track her movements.

"You never told me about dragons!" Aang flung up his hands. "All this time I thought Kuzon - and - Shidan spied on us!"

"Spied?" Gyatso chided his student. "Did you miss a red dragon breathing steam on your shoulder? He never tried to hide what he was."

"But-!" Aang gaped for a second. Swallowed, and forged on. "You never told me he was like a person!"

"And why should I have told you that?" Gyatso asked. "He is not like a person. He is a person. Only, one very different from you or I." He clucked his tongue. "Does the wind tell you where it is blowing? No. You must observe it. As you must observe any person. For they, too, may be driven by forces we do not see, toward goals we may never expect. Did I tell you what would happen if you sledded down Omashu's delivery chutes? Or rode wild hog-monkeys? Of course not! What would be the fun in that?"

"Shidan's not fun," Aang shot back. "And Zuko is - well, whatever the opposite of fun is? He's it!"

Gyatso sighed. "No one is fun when they are sad, Aang. Growing up can be very painful."

"No kidding," Aang grumbled. "So why does everyone keep acting like I'm supposed to be a grownup? I'm not! I'm a kid!"

"We do not choose when to grow up, my student," Gyatso said plainly. "Just as we do not choose when the wind blows. All we can choose is to have the courage to trust the wind, and see where it will guide us."

"I can choose when the wind blows!"

Still so young. "Aang?" He waved a hand. "Do you see that tree?"

Aang eyed it almost as dubiously as he had Gyatso. "It's not trying to sing at me, so... yeah."

Heh. Aang never had had the chance for the week of meditation older masters tested themselves with. It had been far too onerous a task for a child... and yet, had he harmed Aang by avoiding it? An Elder would know when he was hallucinating. "Could you knock it down with airbending?"

"Sure!" Aang jumped up into a ready stance-

So young, and so slow to think. "Ah. But should you?"

Aang lowered his hands, confused. "What do you mean? You told me to!"

"No," Gyatso shook his head. "I asked if you could." He smiled. "Now, I am asking if you should. You would not want to disturb that nest, would you?"

Aang stood very still a moment. "A nest of what?"

Gyatso raised his brow. "Why don't you find out?"

Aang gave him a dubious look. Crouched, and leapt up into the branches.

Amused, Gyatso waited.

"Aackkk!"

Aang scampered back down, as a pair of blue-and-gray mocking-jays stooped and scolded at him. High above, Gyatso could hear hungry chicks peeping.

Ducking one last dive, Aang brushed bits of bark off his clothes. "Man! Sokka was right about enemy birds."

"And who poked his nose into their children's quarters, hmm?" Gyatso pressed his palms together, drawing on a moment of meditation for patience. "It is possible to observe from a distance, young airbender. Often, it is even wise."

"But if you don't get up close," Aang argued, "you might not see everything."

Ha. And well argued. "Very true," Gyatso agreed. "It is a delicate balance, knowing when to draw near, and when to pull away. But if those who live with peril tell you a wise man does not draw nearer, or," he held up a hand before Aang could interrupt, "that a wise man takes precautions before he nears a danger - it would be prudent to listen." Gyatso settled back with a sigh. "I nearly drowned by not listening, once."

"You did?" Aang said in disbelief. "But you listen to everybody!"

"Ah. As an Elder, yes. When I was younger? I was not so wise." He gestured toward the coast, not too far from here. "As a young man, I went with my bison to what seemed a lovely black-sand shore, with the most enticing surf breaking over the rocks. I had left my robes above the tide and waded in to my knees before an old seaweed-gatherer saw me, and yelled at a damned young fool of an airbender to stop." He pierced Aang with a look. "The rocks there channeled a riptide when the currents were right. I could not see it. I could not feel it in the wind. But the villagers knew it was there... and even so? A week before, it had claimed two lives." He held thumb and forefinger an inch apart. "That close, I came to venturing deep enough for it to seize me. And I would have never known you, or you me."

"They warned you." Aang looked down, sad. "The Fire Nation was different then."

"Customs were different," Gyatso corrected him. "People remain much the same. They love, and hate. They try to do good, and fail, and yield to fear rather than do what is right."

"People used to be better than that!"

"Did they?" Gyatso asked. "Or did they only have easier choices? Aang. It is easy to say, I will not eat meat, when you and those you love are fed and well. But if you are running for your life, and the children with you are hungry, and there is nothing you recognize as safe to eat... what do you do then?"

"It's not the same." Aang stood his ground, determined. "The Fire Nation didn't have to start this war."

"No, they did not," Gyatso agreed. "But who starts a war is not nearly as important as who finishes it."

"Not important?" Aang stared at him like he'd stood on his head. "I'm the Avatar. I have to be fair!"

"That is not possible," Gyatso said regretfully. "Sozin is dead. As is Azulon. Of all those who saw this war begin, mere handfuls still walk the earth. Shidan among them," he allowed. "The dead are the concern of the spirit world. You are the Avatar, the bridge between the world of the living and the spirits who affect this world. You must care for the living." He sighed. "And no, it is not fair. It merely is."

"But..." Aang blinked, eyes wet. "If I can't care about people who are - gone..."

"Tch. Listen." Gyatso flicked the tip of Aang's nose. "You must care for the living, yes. That is the Avatar's duty. But you are also Aang, and human. No one can tell you that you cannot love those who move beyond the living world. We are all part of those we love, even if they seem so very far away." He smiled. "Think of it as training, young one. After all, if you can bring the Fire Nation to peace, surely you have the wit and courage to face the next task."

"The next one?" Aang pulled back, wide-eyed. "Beating the Fire Lord isn't enough?"

"Ah. But after he is beaten, you will need to heal damage that was done before Sozin's war." Gyatso beamed. "After all, you cannot rebuild airbending, or our nation, by yourself! You will need our long-lost cousins. Those Kuzon saved... and those whose sanctuaries Shidan protects, even now."

Aang blinked at him.

Oh dear. "Shidan did tell you of those Kuzon spirited away," Gyatso stated, trying to ferret out exactly what had disturbed his student. "And I know Temul left you clues of the girls she snatched from under Sozin's very nose. The Fire Nation treasures their clans. Force children to abandon their kin and bending? They would never be so cruel."

"...You knew there were other airbenders."

"Yes," Gyatso acknowledged. "And no, I did not tell you."

"Why?"

Ah. This would be painful. But now, there was no way to avoid the truth. "Aang. When was the last time you kept a secret?"

"Well, I... um..."

Gyatso nodded. "Precisely."

"But that's not fair!" Aang protested. "You could have trusted me!"

"And burdened you with so many lives?" Gyatso said seriously. "That is a pain only grownups should have to bear."

Aang gulped. "Then why did you make Kuzon do it?"

"I did not make Kuzon do anything," Gyatso said firmly. "He saw that we needed help. He chose to act." The old master chuckled. "And perhaps he thought Ran would be impressed. Never underestimate that, young one! Girls may follow heroes with their eyes, and handsome young men with their sighs. But the way to win her heart is by faithfulness. Promise her the moon, and you may win her for the day. Promise her the humblest flower, and keep that promise - and she may be with you forever."

"Um." The tips of Aang's ears turned red. "We're not - I mean, Katara's not - I'm supposed to be a monk, and... I think Water Tribe guys are supposed to be around. All the time."

"Monks and nuns, yes. And so the Temples would not recognize an airbender marriage," Gyatso informed him. "But there were many of us who had... understandings. And if we only lived together a few days of the year, there are many sailors in the Earth Kingdom and the Fire Nation who do the same. And you should ask young Sokka about Water Tribe hunting trips." Gyatso elbowed his student, light as the brush of a flutter-hornet's wing. "Why, they may step out one autumn night, and not come back until spring the next morning!"

Ah, yes. Now he had his young student thoroughly flustered. Heh!

If only I'd been able to do this a hundred years ago.

Eventually Aang ran out of sputters, and just looked at him. And swallowed. "Were... understandings... secrets? Is that why I never heard about them?"

"Yes," Gyatso said plainly. "The Elders would not have approved. Attachment was forbidden; and perhaps for old graybeards who no longer wished to wander, that was well. But for children? For those who would raise those children? A child needs first warmth, and safety, and the certainty that no matter the terrors of the night, his teacher will be there in the morning. Think of your young friend, Toph. She is brave, and strong, and a master among earthbending masters. But when she was a tiny blind baby, who had no more knowledge of how to bend than how to speak? How would she have fared then, without her parents' love?"

"So... you're saying it's not that attachment is wrong," Aang said slowly, frowning as he worked his way through it. "It's just... not right for elders." He thought that over a minute, then flung up his hands. "Then why didn't Guru Pathik tell me that? He kept saying, if I loved Katara, I had to let her go!"

Gyatso rolled his eyes toward the heavens. Old friend, I respect that you meant to help. But I think, when you pass into my world, there will be a cake waiting for your face! "Pathik is a hundred and fifty years old. He has outlived nieces, nephews, grand-nephews, great-grand-nephews, and too many great-great relations to count. He has no attachments to living humans. And he has never raised children." He *hmp*hed. "And it is likely he forgot, as so many do; the Avatar Spirit is eternal, but the Avatar is a living, breathing, caring soul. Just like the rest of us." Gyatso smiled, just a little wry. "As it happens, I was watching. And I believe I know what he should have explained."

Young eyes widened. "You do? Because it didn't make any sense!"

"It can," Gyatso assured him. "But to understand it, requires a demonstration." He held out a hand, palm up to catch the sunlight. "Love is like a flutter-hornet, perched in your hand."

"Um." Aang tugged at the neck of his uniform. "Isn't that kind of dangerous?"

Gyatso closed his hand, casting his palm into shadow. "Only if you try to make it stay."

"Oh." Aang's eyes were round. He jumped into the air, grin belying the dark shadows under his eyes. "Oh, I get it! I get it, I... think?"

"Tell me what you understand," Gyatso requested.

"Well, Katara's a waterbender! She can do all kinds of whoosh and crackle guys in ice and... um." Aang reined himself in with a sheepish grin. "Pakku tried to make her just be a healer, and she showed him. So... if I want to love her, I can't make her do stuff. Right?"

"That is part of it," Gyatso nodded. "You can always ask. But love must never be forced. It must be free. Part of its joy, what makes it worth being a grownup instead of a child, is knowing there is someone who chooses to be by your side. That choice is precious, Aang. Respect it, and you will be truly loved."

Aang bit his lip. "But the Elders didn't respect it, did they? They didn't want anyone to choose." He swallowed. "Master Gyatso. Was - was there something wrong in the Temples? I mean, really wrong?"

"Yes," Gyatso said simply. "Our teachings were twisted awry centuries ago, in the wake of Avatar Yangchen's death. She wished for us to live in peace, which was just. But Xiangchen's followers set out to make that wish a reality, without allowing other airbenders the choice."

"That's..." Aang looked down, a little pale. "That's wrong. Isn't it."

"It is," Gyatso nodded. "You wish to stop Fire Lord Ozai, so the Fire Nation ceases its bloodshed, and makes peace with its neighbors. That is not wrong. But you must not force them to be peaceful. That would destroy them, surely as a flutter-hornet in your fist."

"...I'm going to have to hurt a lot of them. To make them stop."

"That is the price of choice, and freedom," Gyatso said gently. "Aang. I, too, had many friends in the Fire Nation. Believe me when I say they would rather die free in war, than live as slaves to the Temple's peace. You must fight them, and you must win. But if you are to truly be the Avatar, you must see that the Fire Nation is one of the Four Nations. Painful as it may be to think, the urge to war is as human as the urge to peace."

Aang's fingers almost reached to tear his hair out. "Then how can I fix this?"

"Wanting," Gyatso said sternly, "is not a problem to be fixed." He stared down his pupil. "When I told you the Elders could not make you do what you did not want, I did not mean you must do everything you wish to!"

Aang gaped. "But-"

"The Fire Nation may want to go to war all they wish," Gyatso went on. "What matters is that they do not do it! And they will not. Once it is clear that if they attempt to do so, there will be consequences."

"...Consequences?"

Oh dear. "Consequences," Gyatso affirmed. "When you ignored Jeong Jeong's instructions, you burned Katara and damaged Sokka's faith in you. Those are consequences."

"He didn't tell me I could hurt her!"

"You demanded to learn to shoot fire from your fingertips," Gyatso reminded him. "What did you think that would do, if not great harm to any who had the misfortune to be near?"

"...I thought it'd look really cool?" Aang shrugged. "You know. Like fireworks!"

"Fireworks are indeed cool," Gyatso agreed. "They are also incredibly dangerous. To use them unwisely is to risk a finger, a hand, a life! To firebend, you must be responsible. You must control yourself, so you may control your fire."

"Oh, sure." Aang rolled his eyes. "Because Zhao was so responsible."

"And is Zhao the sort of firebender you wish to be?" Gyatso asked shrewdly. "I think not."

"I'm not going to be a firebender at all," Aang said, adamant. "I'm the Avatar. I'm master of three elements. That's going to be more than enough to beat Ozai on the eclipse."

Impasse. Gyatso could feel it. As he could feel Aang's determination beating back the haze of exhaustion, hardening the walls between the living and the dead. "I hope that you are right, Aang. Yet even if you are wrong - I love you. I always have." One mortal heartbeat, Aang's own power chasing him from the world. "But remember, Aang! Remember the last Avatar who struck on the eclipse!"

"What?"

"Aang!" Sokka, bright to a spirit's eyes with his own quiet power as he gripped Aang's shoulder. "Are you okay? You've been mumbling for a while, and the ground around you got all mushy when you pulled some water up into it - what's going on? Can you hear me?"

"Of course I can hear you, I was just..." Aang glanced around the clearing, face crumpling in exhaustion and grief. "I thought I saw Gyatso."

Surrounded by spirit mists, Gyatso sighed.

"Yeah?" Sokka sounded surprisingly serious. "Maybe you did. Dad always told us, sometimes your ancestors come to visit before a big battle. It's supposed to be good luck." He smiled at Aang, all confidence. "They remind you it's good to be alive. So you make sure you fight, and fight hard... but, you make sure you don't join them too fast. Got it?"

Aang's mouth dropped open. "You - you think he was really here? But - why did he go..."

"Ghosts can't stay," Sokka shrugged. "Even Temul couldn't hang around all the time. And she's a dragon-child." He squeezed Aang's shoulder.

Anchoring him to the living. Gyatso smiled. You are far more than you appear.

"The important thing is, he came," Sokka said firmly. "If he showed up out of the spirit world, even for a minute - he cares, Aang. Even now, he still cares."

"...Yeah." Aang wiped something wet away from dark-ringed eyes. "Thanks." He swallowed. "He wanted me to remember what happened when Avatar Kyoshi hit the Fire Nation capital on the eclipse."

"Huh." Sokka grimaced. "Damn it. If whoever got there before us hadn't burned the Fire Nation's part of Wan Shi Tong's library..." He flung up his hands in exasperation. Dropped them again, with a heartfelt sigh. "Come on, Aang. Get some sleep. It's going to be fine. Nothing happened to Kyoshi on the eclipse."

"No," Gyatso whispered, as the living world faded away. "Not to Kyoshi."

Chapter End Notes

Thank goodness for Gyatso. He loves the kid, even when Aang's being a brat. Frankly, I think any 12-going-on-13 kid heading into a battle should get to be a brat. But historically, it's only fairly recently that youngsters have been out of the line of fire in the West. Powder monkeys, cabin boys, drummers and messengers; often they were younger even than Aang. The difference is that they knew they could be going into battles. Aang wasn't raised that way. It's got to be like being a Quaker drafted for Viet Nam. Which some were. A lot of them volunteered for unarmed duties, including the very dangerous job of getting the wounded off the battlefield. I don't believe in pacifism, but anybody who deliberately goes into a war zone unarmed, knowing people will be trying to kill him, at least has the courage of his convictions. I respect that.

So on the one hand - yes, Aang's got every reason in the world to throw a tantrum, stick his fingers in his ears, and insist this whole mess is Somebody Else's Fault.

Which, in fact, it is. Several Somebody Elses.

Problem is, just because something is not your fault, doesn't mean it's not your responsibility.

Chapter 65

Chapter Notes

Azula warning. Not a lot of gore, but mindgames ahead!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Nothing happened to Kyoshi on the eclipse, Sokka told himself firmly, staring at the ships as Hakoda took over and rallied their friends the way a real leader did. The way he couldn't, yet.

Or maybe ever. He didn't know what his dad would do if he found out about Shu Jing and grabby ghosts, but at a guess, it'd probably start with a disappointed look and end with Hakoda, Master Piandao, and Temul in a three-way stare-down he had no idea who might win.

He'd like to bet on his dad. He really would. But up against Temul... Sokka had a bad feeling Hakoda would need help. And if he accepted help from Piandao, a Fire Nation swordmaster would treat that as a temporary alliance while a Water Tribe chief would see it as take the stronger enemy down first, and that just led all kinds of bad places.

If this was even a piece of what the Avatar was supposed to do, understand all nations so he could keep peace between all nations-

I never want to be Aang. Ever.

Good thing he didn't have to be. Because nothing was going to happen to Aang. They weren't going to let it. The world would be firebending-free for eight precious minutes, Agni's eyes blinded without a dragon there to see. Ozai could ambush the invasion all he wanted. For those eight minutes, the Fire Nation would be as helpless as any earthbender caught by Ty Lee.

Dragons don't do helpless. And they know it's coming.

Still. There wasn't anything the Fire Nation could do about it. The sun moved. Might as well think you were going to hold back the tide... well, if you weren't a waterbender. During the eclipse, no firebending. After, would be way too late.

So what could they do before the eclipse?

Not that much, Sokka reflected, skipping a fragment of glassy rock over the waves. Beef up the Gates of Azulon and other roadblocks on the way, sure. But he already had a plan for that-

"So what's your backup plan, hatchling?"

Sokka jumped, looking over his shoulder for a cranky ghost swordswoman. Though Temul hadn't shown up to thump him since Aang had started his little sleepless gig. He'd kind of expected her to start sneaking up on him again after they'd finally gotten Aang to sleep, but so far, no. It was just his imagination. And a bunch of bad memories. Sozin had been so thorough, searching for Air Nomad survivors. He'd marched men over mountains, combed every island, sent pearl-divers into neck-snapping waves to investigate rumors of odd noises in sea-caves. You name it, he and Azulon had searched it. And Iroh and Ozai after them, and Zuko and Azula after them. You could say a lot of things about the line of Sozin; most of them not good to even whisper around Gran-Gran, who had a pretty low opinion of that kind of language. But one thing they were, was thorough.

Okay. So I'm an evil firehappy maniac, who knows there's an invasion coming on the one day that's really gonna suck. What do I do?

Um. Yeah. Huh...

"It's just another fight, youngster. Only a lot bigger."

Yeah, Temul probably would say something like that. So. Imagine it was a fight. Like sparring with Piandao. He was the invasion, and Ozai was the swordmaster-

Wait. That's not right.

The Day of Black Sun. No firebending. Ozai wouldn't be Piandao in this fight. Aang was.

Aang had the bending. He had the skills. He could probably take the Caldera apart by himself. But all he had to do was stop Ozai. One way or another.

It's the Fire Nation that's going to be weak. And they know it.

So if Ozai knew that, and knew how his people remembered Kyoshi shaming them, slapping the Fire Nation in the face with the fact that their lords had failed in their foremost duty, protecting their domain and their people-

Ozai couldn't fail that way. The Fire Lord could not fail that way. His people's loyalty would never survive it. And it was loyalty that made the war so awful. That held Fire Nation soldiers in the field, when a sane person would pack up and go home. Ozai didn't dare let that loyalty be threatened.

And if Aang shows up... even if the Avatar loses, which he won't, he was there. In the Fire Nation capital. Like Kyoshi.

Kyoshi, who'd set off a slow-burning rage that drove people like Zuko even today...

They get mad. But they don't believe in revenge. They go for lawful vendetta.

Okay. So what would be lawful for the Fire Lord and great name of the Caldera to do-

The great name of the Caldera. Oh no.

They'd thought about beating Fire Lord Ozai. They'd planned on beating the Fire Lord. But Sozin's line was also the lords of the Caldera. They had a responsibility to their people.

He can't let Aang attack his people. Not if he's got any way to stop it.

Grimacing, Sokka poked around for another flat rock. And yipped, yanking his fingers back just before he would have slashed them on something blue, shiny, and very very sharp. Great. Somebody lost a glass net float and didn't bother sending a diver after...

Divers. The Fire Nation had divers.

Water's warm here. Anybody can swim.

They were camped in this cove because it was safe. You either had to come through the water, or down sheer cliffs. Warships couldn't get near them without a betraying plume of black smoke.

But what if there isn't any smoke?

Near one of the seaward ships, something splashed.

Gray, Sokka registered. And pale, and dark, and... that's not a fish! "Katara! Get the swampbenders, we need-"

The world exploded.

"Early," Azula commented, crouched low near the edge of the bluffs as she and a tall, gray-eyed onmitsu watched the unfolding chaos. By eye, not spyglass; the chance of the barbarians below spying a lens-flash was just too great. Even though the warning she and Agent Bolin were truly worried about wouldn't have come from one particular bender seeing them.

"You ordered Deai's divers to use their discretion if they found anything unusual about the Water Tribe vessels," Anshin reminded her. "I would say they found something."

Azula caught her lip between her teeth; forced herself to release it before the next round of explosions battered stone and sea. I wish Ty Lee was here.

But she wasn't, still convalescing after those terrible minutes when her heart would beat, but her lungs simply would not move on their own...

"You breathed for one of ours," Anshin had said, when he'd presented himself and his partners to join her desperate scheme. "Your Way deserves our consideration."

Mai is with Ty Lee, Azula told herself now. Mai will keep her safe.

Azula planned to rejoin them both soon, assuming she survived this. And then, perhaps, Anshin and the others who'd been won over by Ty Lee's survival would help her turn her burning fury on the onmitsu Elders who deserved it.

Until then, the invasion would simply have to do.

"The blasts should have deafened the earthbenders' feet," Anshin observed. "Lieutenant Chian's force is prepared, and Kotori's squad should be moving on the waterbenders... now."

Hands clapped over her aching ears, Toph tried to make sense of the shaking mess that was the beach. Ji the Mechanist had brought blasting jelly; right now, that seemed like a really, really bad idea-

Someone's on the cliffs.

It was like trying to pick out a scatter of ants in the middle of dancing komodo-rhinos. But she was sure. "Guys! Something's coming down the cliffs!"

"The Boulder believes the cliffs are the least of our problems-" The Rumble runner-up took a dramatic stance, hand raised to shade his eyes. "The Boulder doesn't remember inviting pretty ladies to this party."

"Pretty-?" Toph's voice died in her throat. There was something. Something prickly in the air. Something she'd felt before, twice-

"Sokka! Azula!"

Dad!

If he'd had more time to think, they probably both would have been dead. As it was, Sokka saw Azula swooping her arms, charge gathering-

Iroh took out General Gang, lords go for the leader-!

Sokka hurled his sword.

Lightning smashed it from the air.

Thrown from his feet by the blast, Haokda rolled over sand to fetch up by him. "That can't be Iroh!"

Poking his head up enough to see if his sword had stopped smoking - nope, not yet - Sokka gave his father a pained smile. "Dad? Meet Zuko's little sister."

Lighting cracked again, exploding the mast of a ship that had apparently been unscathed. The remnants of wood crackled into fire, and Appa's panicked bellow rumbled across the cove.

Hakoda looked at the wreck that had been an organized invasion, and swore. "That explains so much."

They can't be here. Katara pulled a frothing wave out of the explosion-tossed sea, sent it surging to sweep flaming bits away from one ship still intact. They just can't!

But they were, and she couldn't stop wondering when Shidan had betrayed them. The night they'd met? Or had he waited until he was sure where Aang would be, first?

So much for Toph's lie-detecting feet. Never trust a firebender!

But Aang had. Poor Aang; he was darting around Appa, trying to calm the bison down as flames crackled higher. And she could understand that, really. Appa was his best friend. But they could use a little help here-

Dainty fists came out of nowhere. Katara barely slapped them away with a water whip in time. Ty Lee!

No. The girl in wet dark reds and grays looked a lot like Ty Lee. Moved like Ty Lee. But there was a seriousness to her round face the acrobat had never had. She seemed older.

And she wasn't alone. There were other bodies surging out of the surf, heading for the swampbenders in a flurry of flung knives and cartwheels.

In the water! Katara scythed her hands up, waves freezing with bodies locked inside. There a head, there a hand, there only a darkness of wet hair in ice-

Face pale, the wet girl charged.

Azula saw ice spread, and cursed it. They're going to die. I'm going to lose them-

Set it aside. Focus on the plan. Or they really would all die.

She glanced at the one mini-trebuchet they'd been able to assemble, and nodded. "Fire."

"Calm down, buddy," Aang tried to soothe his best friend as explosions shook air and sand. "It's just a little fire. You can take it."

The burning, tar-slathered stone landed almost under Appa's nose. With a pained roar, the bison launched skyward.

How can this be happening?

Glider snapped open, Aang soared up into the sky; maybe if he was up there with Appa, his friend would calm down. And maybe he could see what the heck was going on. Besides ships blowing up. How had the whole Fire Army just appeared out of nowhere-

It's not the whole army. Aang dropped at least ten feet in shock. It's... not a lot of people at all.

There were maybe a couple dozen men and women in the light armor of the Home Guard; half sailing down ropes just far enough to toss fireballs into the camp, the other half hitting the beach with swords drawn, charging the green-and-leather of the Foggy Swamp. The swampbenders turned to the ocean to strike back, melting the ice Katara had locked over the edge of the sea-

Maybe a dozen more people in wet gray and red surged out of melting ice; two dragging limp companions who'd been locked under water, the rest heading for the swampbenders in familiar, bouncing jumps and cartwheels. One of them was already striking at Katara, dodging water-tentacles with blinding speed.

From the top of the cliffs, Azula and a tall, thin man in gray watched the chaos.

She's just watching? Why isn't she fighting?

Gold eyes met his. Narrowed.

Deliberately, Azula turned back toward the battlefield. As if he weren't even there.

Hey! I'm the Avatar!

Aang dove to snatch Appa's reins, landing on the bison's neck. He had to bend to stop Azula, and that was just a little tricky if he had to hang onto a glider.

She wasn't even looking at him.

Well, that's going to change! Determined, Aang whirled his glider-staff like a wheel to gather the wind, then slashed it across. That gust of wind would smash Zuko against a wall, so Azula would-

The pair below simply - stepped apart. Wind tugged at Azula's pinned hair, and at the strange man's loose clothes. That was all.

She's not even looking at me! How did she do that?

It didn't really matter. She was the leader. Stop her, and he'd stop all the fighting. All the dying; he could see blood flowing, even so far below. It made his heart hurt.

I am so sick of everybody wanting to kill each other. This is going to stop. Now!

Aang leapt off Appa's neck, knifing down through the air; staff guiding all the wind following him into one massive swat.

Azula didn't move. She just took it, wind blasting her along the cliff edge, scraping her over stone and earth until elegant black and gold armor was a wreck of tattered uniform and earth.

Aang dropped to the rocky edge, landing light as a feather. She was smiling...

Knuckles impacted his side and back, fast as a woodpecker's drumming beak. The staff fell from limp fingers.

What-

His knees wouldn't hold him up.

-just-

The ground came up, hard.

-happened?

He couldn't move. He could breathe, and blink. But he couldn't move.

"Princess!"

The stranger who'd hit him. Who was just stepping past Aang like he didn't have to worry anymore. Like Azula was the most important thing in the world.

"Anshin." Azula was coughing, breathing a bit raspy. "Good work."

"You should have allowed one of my agents to take the blow-"

"No." Confidence seeped back into Azula's rough voice. "He had to see what he wanted to see. For an innocent monk, he really does hate me." She chuckled, leaning against Anshin to walk into Aang's view. "Of course, I've actually tried to kill him. I suppose it's only fair."

"You..." Aang swallowed, tried again. "You're not going to win. We're going to stop you!"

"Really?" Azula's smile was a white slash in the mask of dust. "How? You can't even move, much less bend."

Aang gulped air. "Appa-"

Without looking, Azula whirled, punching out a ball of fire. The bison bellowed, swerving frantically back up into the air.

"He's afraid of fire." Azula turned back to him with a smirk. "I made sure of that."

"You... monster..."

"Oh, you and my mother should sit down to tea." Teeth gleamed in her smile. "Why, that's such a hurtful thing to say. I didn't know you had it in you." She chuckled. "Maybe this war's doing some good after all."

"How can you say things like that?" Aang burst out. "You - you're not even human!"

Azula looked down at him, gold gaze utterly still.

Anshin was just as cold, eyeing him the way Momo would a particularly tasty bug. "He would be easily disposed of, your highness."

"What? Kill him for telling the truth? Where do you think we are, court?" Azula's smile was wry. "No. I appreciate the offer, but I planned exactly what I want from this moment. And I intend to get it." One lazy blink of gold eyes, and her smile widened into a croon. "Do you have any idea what I'm going to do to you, little Avatar?"

Sokka, Aang prayed, staring up at her like a rabbiroo caught by a scorpion-viper. He couldn't move. You've got to get up here, buddy. Katara... Toph... anybody!

"I'm going to do..." Azula's smile made the air seem to tremble, afraid. "Nothing."

What?

"Here you are. Perfectly safe, while your allies fight and die, hoping the Avatar will come save them." Azula never looked away. "Only he won't, will he? Because right now, you're not the Avatar. Not a master bender. Not even the last airbender. You're none of the things that matter so much to you. And to everyone else. You're just a broken, sad little boy, crying for someone to come save you. Only no one's going to save you. The world doesn't care about hurt little boys who can't even bend." Her voice dropped to a whisper, as if imparting a wonderful secret. "Believe me. I know!"

She's crazy. She's just... crazy...

"Of course, the chi-block will wear off. Eventually. But there's only so much time before the eclipse, isn't there? Do you really think you can take my father in a fair fight? I don't." Her voice was light, almost playful. "After all, you've never fought fair. And why should you? You're the Avatar. Fair is for everyone else."

Aang tried to shudder. She was wrong. Just - wrong. "That's not true!"

"Isn't it?" Something dark moved behind her eyes. "You were going to turn your pet barbarians loose in a city of innocent people. My city. You were going to make us fight and die when Agni himself would have no way to see our fear, or our courage. You were going to let pirate raiders - oh, just ask Chief Hakoda what he does to seaside colonies! - loose on the streets of my city." A trace of steam wafted from her breath. "You call the Fire Nation monsters and murderers for attacking other nations, and then you come here. So what does that make you?" Her voice was teasing, but her gaze cut like razors. "Have you even thought about it?"

"You started this war!" Aang burst out. "And I'm going to stop it!"

"Ooo. I'm so scared." Azula stepped back. "You should enjoy this time. It should make you feel so much closer to Sokka." She cocked her head. "Do you think you'll tell him that? Or will you tell him the truth? That you hate not being able to bend. That it makes you feel ruined. Useless. Worthless." She smiled again. "Oh, I hope you do. Because if that's how you feel about yourself, when you know you'll get your bending back... then what do you feel about him?"

"You're lying," Aang got out. But he didn't know, he couldn't tell - but she had to be! "That's not true!"

"Isn't it? You didn't stay in Ba Sing Se, when the whole world needed the Avatar, looking for Sokka." Azula tsked. "Of course, I understand. Appa's a stupid, brute beast - but at least he's an airbender. He matters."

"It wasn't like that!" It wasn't true! Appa was - was- "You're horrible! How can you live like this? You're lying all the time!"

"My, my. That's just what my brother used to say." Azula smiled over her shoulder. "And look what the world did to him."

Smiling, she walked away.

"You can't do this! You can't!" Aang tried to struggled upright; couldn't even get his fingers to twitch. "Azula! Azula!"

Her laughter danced in the wind.

She's good. Katara held her sore left arm a little closer to her side, as her opponent ducked yet another razor slash of water. Really good.

But chi-blocking only worked if you could get close enough to use it. Maybe a few of the swampbenders had made that mistake, but the rest were busily gathering a wave to pummel their odd attackers-

Her own buzzing little gnat glanced up at the cliffs, and suddenly back-flipped away. "I knew it!" Katara yelled. "You never stand up to a real fight!"

Gray eyes cut toward her, then went back to the whips she was dodging. "The princess was right. You barbarians can't even read a map."

Barbarians? Who's she calling - what, does she think we're lost? Katara fumed, shattering her whips to fill the air with needles of ice. "Tell Azula I'm onto her sick little family. When we get done with her, her lying grandfather's next!"

"Her grandfather-" Ice studded the acrobat's clothes; but she crumpled into a flexible ball, rolled under a razor-disk of ice, and smiled despite the blood. "Thank you. We've never had proof Shidan was a traitor."

What? Wait - why is she heading toward the water-?

A bloodied hand fisted as the acrobat flipped, opening to toss something round and black and familiar-

Smoke bombs!

Black clouds erupted across the beach; Katara covered her mouth and nose against a peppery bite that made her eyes water. Darn it, where was Toph, she wouldn't be bothered...

An odd, mechanical buzzing. Katara knew that sound. Water-riders!

Fire Nation metal, but just as fragile as any ship in ice. If she could only see it.

I don't have to see it, if I know where it is. She grabbed for the waves nearest the splashing, and pulled.

More blasts rocked the water, shattering her ice even as it formed. There was a yelp or two from the depths of the smoke, but Katara could hear the riders still moving; one loud, and getting louder-

Got you!

Water closed like her fist, pulling the noise down in a sucking gurgle. Katara dragged it deeper, jouncing over the seabed, over and over like washboard surf. Attack my tribe, will you?

A minute. Long enough. She pulled a metal-tangled wave up onto the beach in front of her, out of the thinning smoke...

It's empty?

Score one thing for sand, Toph thought, snapping bits of lightning-melted beach off Sokka's sword with a flick of her fingers. It makes really cool glass. "Sokka! Where's Aang?"

"You can't feel him?"

"No!" And that was wrong, just wrong. Aang bounced around like a freaked-out cricket-mouse. Even when he was meditating, his heart and breathing fluttered like a running brook. "I heard Azula throwing lightning from the top of the cliff, and Appa went that way, and everything's blowing up!" And her ears hurt. If Sokka's sword had been regular steel instead of space rock, she wasn't even sure she would have found him-

Be rock, Toph told herself. You gotta be strong. Everybody needs you.

Chief Hakoda's hand brushed her shoulder; solid and reassuring, yeah, but she could take care of herself. She could. "We'll find him." His voice turned rueful. "Though now I wish we'd brought a little less blasting jelly."

"Blasting-" Sokka stopped short, boots biting into the sand. "Where's the Mechanist?"

"I've got him!" Katara moved out of the fuzzy rumble of sand, unfamiliar feet stumbling behind her.

"Yes, thank you, I'm all right," Ji agreed. "And so are you! Using metal to intercept lightning - amazing! It would seem the princess missed what she came for."

"No." Chief Hakoda sounded grim. "She missed me. She didn't miss what she came for."

Sand twitched around Katara's feet, bits scattering as they suddenly dried. "Dad. We're all fine."

"Our family is fine," Hakoda corrected her. "Our invasion is a wreck. Just look."

Toph puffed salt-sticky bangs out of her face, and sidled over to Sokka. "Want to tell me what I'm looking at?"

"Azula had divers in the water," Sokka bit out. "They paid for it, but... most of the ships are burning. Looks like some of the subs are blown, too." He shuddered. "And most of the Home Guard who came after us didn't make it back up the cliffs. I think the Earth Army's chasing the ones that did."

"She got all these people killed for nothing," Katara said angrily. "We know chi-blocking wears off!"

Azula brought onmitsu? Toph felt chilled. Not good.

"Oh no," Sokka muttered. "Toph! We have to get up those cliffs."

"They could still be up there," Hakoda objected.

"I know," Sokka said grimly. "So what's the worst place Aang could possibly be?"

Chapter End Notes

Before anybody jumps me about Aang, remember two things. 1) Azula always lies. 2) The most damaging lies are those with a high amount of truth.

Since a lot of you have asked... I've only seen a few minutes of one episode of "Legend of Korra", and I don't anticipate seeing more any time soon. So if you think you see something from LoK reflected in Embers, it's more likely convergent evolution than anything else. (Though, Zhao's Seal of Approval... snrk.)

Some may recognize inspiration from "Pennsic War IV" in this chapter. "And an ambushed ambush isn't very nice..."

Chapter 66

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Well." Bato kept his voice low as he glanced toward the youngsters gathered around Aang. "At least he's stopped babbling."

"At least he's alive," Hakoda reminded his friend. Yes, the boy was a chatterbox at the best of times, and this had been one of the worst days Hakoda could remember in the past five years. But talking things to death was apparently how the boy had been raised. What else did everyone expect? "If I'd been left paralyzed while my friends were fighting and dying around me, I'd be a wreck, too."

"The men aren't going to see it that way," Bato warned him. "There's already talk that this is the second time Azula's left him alive. That he'd rather let her shame him than fight; Air Nomads are supposed to be peaceful, after all. That if he can't even handle the Fire Princess..."

How can he defeat the Fire Lord? Hakoda finished silently. "He barely survived her the first time. She did this on purpose, Bato! The Fire Nation doesn't have to fight us if we fall apart now."

"Earth Kingdom soldiers are supposed to believe the princess did all this?" Bato said skeptically. "Hakoda, we wouldn't die following a fourteen-year-old girl. Why would anyone else?"

"The Fire Nation-"

"Is different. I know," Bato nodded. "It took a while, but you and Sokka finally got that through my head. But most people... Hakoda, you can step outside the Water Tribe when you look at things. Sokka, too. It's useful, but it worries people. They don't understand it. I don't either," he admitted, glancing down over the cliff edge as yet another barrel of blasting jelly cooked off on one of the ruined ships. "But I know you. No matter how you look at things, you're still one of our tribe. Most of these people... they don't know you. They won't believe what you see. They came for a straight smash at the Fire Lord, and now it's gone to pieces. And the Avatar's gone to pieces right with it. They'll want someone to blame, and the Fire Nation knows where we are. We need a new plan, and we need it fast. Before more of those mountain-climbing lunatic Home Guards show up. If we can't get off this island, they won't have to bring the Army. They can just eat away at us like the tide."

True enough. Damn. "This is still our best chance," Hakoda said firmly. "Azula's counting on us to lose heart. To turn on each other-"

"Well, it's working."

"We're stronger than that." Hakoda swept his gaze over everyone in earshot. "We're all stronger than that, or we wouldn't have come this far. We want our nations back. We want to finish this war." He gave them a fierce smile. "We're on the Fire Lord's own doorstep. It'd be a shame if we didn't knock."

"And I'm going to do the knocking."

All eyes went to Aang. Who was standing, even if Sokka and Katara were pressed suspiciously close to him.

"Avatar Aang." Hakoda kept every trace of doubt off his face. "We're going to have to adjust the plan."

Behind them all, Toph looked like she wanted to wince.

"Chi-blocking wears off. I'll be fine by the time we get there." Face pale, Aang swallowed, and forged on. "Azula finds what you care about, so she can try to destroy it. Well, I'm not going to let her destroy us! This isn't Fire Lord Ozai's world. It's our world, and we're going to take it back!"

"We broke into the Earth King's palace," Sokka said, confidence in every inch of that straight stance. "We can break into this one."

But the Earth King didn't want you hurt. And you know it. A thousand other objections sprang to Hakoda's mind. Deliberately, he squashed them all. This is still our best chance. "We're right behind you," Hakoda said, as confident as his son. "You heard them, everyone. Let's make this happen."

"Of all the blockheaded, foolhardy, idealistic-" Azula cut herself off as the bison soared into the air, keeping the rest of her curses behind her teeth. Manners. A great name had to have manners, even in the face of idiocy that would make a slugworm blush for shame.

I did what you asked, brother dear, Azula thought dryly. I considered whether the Avatar's survival would be good for our nation. I created a plan that should have insured the little brat did make it. And now he's going to throw that chance away in a feckless assault on the Caldera. "I guess we're going to have to live with a Water Tribe Avatar after all."

Behind her, Agent Bolin cleared his throat. "I'm sorry, your highness."

"Why?" Azula let her lip curl in wry amusement. "It's not your fault a hundred and twelve-year-old Avatar has the common sense the spirits gave cave shrimp."

"No, your highness," the Dai Li agreed, keeping watchful earth-shod feet firmly on the ground to track the roving onmitsu as they gathered up any surviving Home Guard stragglers. Especially to track onmitsu leader Anshin. "But it's always annoying when the guest of honor doesn't even admit you threw him a party."

"I suppose it's just as well," Azula shrugged. "The Fire Lord would have been so put out if the Avatar missed the eclipse." She gazed toward the sea, calculating numbers and equipment. "Now they have wounded, and they've lost all but two of their ships. Not to mention half of those odd metal submersibles Deai's people found. They have to decide; do they take the wounded with them, or evacuate? Either way, they lose some of their manpower. Assuming they can fit everyone on the boats in the first place; though with the numbers of rock-headed Earth soldiers still chasing us, they just might fit. They could use the submersibles to bring anyone who can't fit - but then their waterbenders will come to the fight exhausted.

"But there's something even more important than that." Azula met her agent's eyes squarely. "Honor."

"No one's suggested you were lacking in honor, your highness."

"I wasn't talking about my honor." She glanced toward her regrouping force. Battered and bloody, and they'd lost so many... but their eyes were bright, and fierce. "Look at them, Agent. These are the veterans too old and wounded for the front lines. The reserve, who spend their days watching for pirates, searching for lost fishermen, and diving after what the storms leave behind. Not the Army. Not the Navy. The Home Guard. And they fought the Avatar, and won." Azula smiled, shoving any doubts to the back of her mind. "Now, no matter what happens in the Caldera, we warned them. The Avatar knows we'll fight to the death." Her smile twisted. "Let's see if he still has the stomach for it."

"Not hungry?"

Kneeling on the tent's ground-cloth, Xiu pushed her half-eaten bowl of jook aside without looking at Sergeant Bo. The tent walls around them were only green cloth, but they weighed on her mind like a curtain of lead. Almost as heavy as the knowledge of the growing collection of messages in General Fong's custody. Not that Xiu had had the chance to read them, but soldiers did talk. Especially when the messages were left tied to trees, came wafting down out of the sky, or - at least once - were shot into the general's camp flagpole.

Esteemed General Fong,

You are approaching the domain of Dragons' Wings (see attached) and territory under the wings of the Northern Air Temple. There is no one here you need to fight. Most of us are noncombatants. It would be best for all concerned if you halt your march and send a messenger to parley.

If you choose not to negotiate, I will be forced to consider you hostile.

-Zuko, son of Ursa and Fire Lord Ozai, Lord of Dragons' Wings.

Xiu had a hard enough time thinking of Lee as the Fire Lord's son, much less anybody who would call generals hostile. But apparently the first message had also come with a map, a copy of the Earth King's treaty, stamped and sealed, and a request for parley in a scarily formal style of calligraphy that still seemed to make the younger lieutenants shiver.

And Sergeant Bo had told her the tales of what had happened to General Gang.

But Fong's not listening.

No. She wasn't hungry at all. "I guess after a couple of weeks as a general's guest, it starts getting old."

Finishing off his own bowl, the sergeant shrugged. "Eh, you get used to it." A quick grin. "The army food, anyway. Don't know about being a guest. Never stuck around in the stockade that long." He looked at shadows dancing through the fabric. "Heads up. Incoming general."

Xiu dusted off her dress, not bothering to rise. If Fong wasn't going to respect her enough to give her a straight answer, instead of mealy-mouthed platitudes of 'it's for the greater good' and 'the worst burns are those you don't feel', then she'd be damned if she'd-

Is that buzzing?

It was. Definitely. Xiu shot to her feet, hands out by her sides and ready to move. Nothing buzzed like an angry scorpion-bee. Unless it was a hive of them, and the buzzing coming nearer sounded like a lot of them.

"Duck," Sergeant Bo advised.

The tent-flap was flung back, and a furious, honey-smeared, scorpion-bee-stung general and his aides stalked in.

Don't laugh, Xiu told herself, keeping her face frozen with an act of will as a stray scorpion-bee buzzed over to her abandoned bowl. Don't laugh, oh spirits...

Sergeant Bo snickered.

The glare General Fong leveled his way froze Xiu to the bone.

Maybe you were safer with Chief Hakoda... no, don't kid yourself. You were safer with the Water Tribe. Even when they wanted to chain Lee up and hand him over.

Silk-weavers had to deal with all kinds of people, especially nobles. Generally, they came in two varieties. The ones that accepted power as a fact of life, so they didn't have to worry about a laugh or two. And the ones that... didn't.

"I don't understand why the pair of you haven't been more cooperative." Even stung and furious, Fong still sounded reasonable. "We have a Fire Nation canker infesting Earth Kingdom land. The only cure is to cut it out."

"Huh." Sergeant Bo looked oddly unsubdued. "Maybe I'm just an old campaigner, but I could've sworn the people back forty, fifty years ago didn't call this Earth Kingdom land at all. Sir."

"The dead claim no kingdoms." General Fong's gaze never left Xiu. "Who do you think you're protecting by your silence?"

Maybe my own sanity? Because if I have to listen to one more of your bungled mash-ups of Kyoshi's "we will fight them on the beaches" speech, I'm going to tear my own hair out. "I've told you everything I know," Xiu said, leaning on her grandmother's habit of frozen civility. "The Fire Nation Ship worked out a truce with the Water Tribe-"

"Impossible!" one of Fong's aides declared. Ro, she thought his name was. "There can be no peace while the boots of the Fire Nation stride our land."

"Call it whatever you want, then. They weren't shooting each other," Xiu stated. "I don't know why, I don't know how long it lasted, and I don't know anything about any forged land grants. If it's forged. It looks like the Earth King's seal to me."

"The Fire Nation has taken Ba Sing Se," Fong declared. "Any decree of the Earth King's must be considered suspect until he takes his rightful throne once more." He drew himself up to his full height, proud hair brushing the top of the tent, not at all daunted by the fact she could look him straight in the eye. "And you expect me to believe your father sent you alone and unchaperoned to investigate silk opportunities?"

"I was traveling with Sergeant Bo," Xiu said, for what felt like the hundredth time. "My father was in the same unit as he was years ago. It's perfectly appropriate. And why not? The war disrupts all the usual trade routes, and it's damn hard to raise moths when lords and generals fine us for cutting tree branches, and fine us again if we don't grow rice for the Army. My family owns hills! Places that aren't meant to grow rice! Cut down the trees, and the whole slope would wash downstream. We're not nobles. We have to pay the tax somehow. A new source of silk threads, where the trees aren't getting trampled over? New designs? Trade? This is a chance to make deals, General." And a chance to get as far from Huizhong as reasonably possible until she could stop crying herself to sleep at night. Her father had approved.

Say that much for Fong. Since she'd been picked up as his guest, she hadn't cried about her ex-fiancé anymore.

Dark eyes narrowed, and Fong leaned in. "What you call trade, I call conspiring with the enemy."

"Lee wasn't anybody's enemy." Xiu wanted to be defiant, but she couldn't help shaking. She'd seen the general stomp a field into quicksand to suck down farmers who didn't want to cooperate with his quartermasters. Yes, he'd let them back out again. Yes, they'd been given credit slips with the backing of the Earth Kingdom for every last bag of grain. Yes, most farmers didn't take that kind of prodding to contribute to the Army; they wanted to win the war, after all.

But if Ba Sing Se's fallen - you can't eat paper in winter.

"I'd heard the Fire nobles can be unnaturally persuasive. I hadn't believed..." The general crossed armored arms, regarding her like a puzzle that refused to be solved. "Don't you realize what those scum will do to you? You know what they are. Their so-called honor rules everything they do, and you saw their prince as a lowly peasant. You'll be lucky if they just execute you. Do you want to be a chained slave? Think of your parents! How could you return to them if you'd been disgraced?"

Xiu couldn't help but shudder. That wasn't something she wanted to think about, ever. But her father had told her two things. Fight. And survive.

"Now, General, sometimes you've got to give even a demon his due," Sergeant Bo spoke up. "The Dragon of the West was one damn ruthless killer when we were on the battlefield, but he didn't let things off the field slide. Long as a woman didn't wave a dagger at him, he wouldn't touch her. None of his men would, either."

"You know it's not General Iroh who's in command over there, Sergeant," Ro snapped, prodding one of his many stings. "Would any honorable general have done this?"

Xiu blinked. Let her gaze slide to an indignant scorpion-bee who'd sampled her jook and decided no decent bug would have anything to do with the stuff. "You mean, they're not just swarming?" Don't laugh. Don't laugh...

"This is not a prank," Fong's eyes blazed. "We've lost men. Most casualties, but some of them were stung fatally. We've lost equipment. Supplies, when the hive went after the pack beasts and they ran. No honorable commander does this! And you're a tradesman, you have to know the hidden passes-"

"General!" A muddy, wide-eyed messenger skidded to a halt in the opening, dripping gobbets of gray muck. "Lieutenant Han's compliments, sir, and there's a problem up the trail!"

The general gathered his aides with a look, and stomped out.

Xiu's nose twitched. She wrinkled it, and got another acrid waft of scent. "Brimstone?"

Frowning, Sergeant Bo picked up a stray glob of clay. Rolled it between his fingers, and took his own sniff. "Well, damn."

That sounded like real worry. "What is it?" Xiu asked, shoulders knotted with tension as she dipped her head for a better look.

"You better not know until we tell the general," the old veteran said gravely. "You gotta be surprised." Bushy white brows scrunched down, grim. "Brace yourself, little lady. Looks like Prince Zuko's decided Fong's not gonna back down."

She had a queasy feeling in the pit of her stomach. "So... what does that mean?"

Sergeant Bo's eyes were dark. "Means he's through playing nice. Come on."

"Come on?" Xiu echoed in disbelief, following despite herself. "You mean, go past the-" On the threshold, she stopped with a squeak, eyes crossing at the gleam off one of the guards' swords.

"Yeah, yeah, you're following orders, all neat and proper," Sergeant Bo said testily. "Wake up, Private. Your commander's about to jump straight into the soup, and we need to go yank him out."

"What's so scary about some smelly mud?" Xiu demanded, fed up with the whole ridiculous mess.

"Heh." Bo grinned at her; more bared teeth than anything happy. "Weaver, right? Not a potter." He eyed the guards again. "We got shrink-swell clays up ahead."

"Yes, sir," the nearest said staunchly. "The general's aware of that."

"Yeah, but does he know they've got-"

Xiu felt it more than heard it. An agonizing rumble that went straight to her bones, capped with distant crunching cracks that were decades-old trees snapping like matchsticks.

"...Waterbenders," the sergeant groaned. "Ah, damn it." Without looking, he pointed at Xiu. "Stay."

"But I can," Xiu started.

"No."

"But I'm not-"

"No." The sergeant's eyes were bleak. "You don't want to see this. And you need to get ready to pull out any maps you got." He heaved a sigh. "The general's going to want an alternate route."

"Oma and Shu." Shirong crouched by Zuko's side, the pair of them just another muddy brown shadow among standing trees on the crest of an untouched hill. "I never would have believed it could go so fast."

"Volcanic clays." I don't want to look. Zuko could still feel the underground water that had answered his call, flooding upward against earth's pull to soak hill-slopes deeper than rain could ever manage. Still not enough to dislodge clay from the grip of deep oakpine roots, but add a little judicious prying from a Dai Li and the weight of marching feet from Fong's forward division, not to mention the tricky work he and some other earthbenders had pulled off under the trail... "They use clay like that on Ember Island for beauty treatments. Slip on some somebody's dropped in the hall - believe me, you don't forget it."

I don't want to look. But I have to.

Chaos. Organized chaos; and the part of him that stayed cold and calculating even when things were blowing up in his face recognized that Fong was much, much better than Gang at this. Fong's commanders already had earthbenders up here to shove the top engulfing layer of clay aside, and give anybody whose throat wasn't already clogged with muck a fighting chance.

There weren't that many who did.

"And I wouldn't have believed clay could seal well enough to keep the trail from collapsing into your water-pits." Shirong's voice had the same clinical edge Uncle Iroh used to discuss melting steel in critical locations. Sabotage was an ugly way to fight, meaning a good commander had to know about it, in case it was used against him.

Or just in case. Zuko swallowed. "I was almost hoping it wouldn't. If he'd decided to just go around this valley, he would have lost time. That would have been enough."

"When you're fighting spirits, you don't fight fair. Because they won't," Shirong said quietly. "I've never seen that applied to humans before." He grimaced. "I don't like it."

"Good. Keep reminding me of that."

Under the mud, Shirong gave him a sharp look.

Zuko's lips curled in a bitter smirk. "I spent three years crossing the world and getting nowhere. Now - I'm getting somewhere." He looked down at the distant bodies sprawled in clay, almost indistinguishable from the mud-smeared logs that had crushed them. "I need to remember this isn't how I want to do it." He stared over the wrecked pass, thinking of the divisions as yet untouched. "We should have killed more of them. Enveloped with the Yu Yan, and hit them with everything we had. We're not going to get another free shot."

Shirong sputtered. "You - of all the - make sense, would you?"

"Try asking the Mechanist's people to make sense," Zuko grumbled. "We keep telling them, Fong's not backing down. What do they say? Give him more time. When one determined earthbender can destroy every crop we have-" He cut himself off, trying not to snarl. "Well, Fong's had enough time. He didn't leave when we asked nicely. He didn't leave when we set the scorpion-bees on him. If he doesn't leave now..."

"And if Teo and the rest ask for more time?" Shirong asked, very carefully.

Zuko smirked, cold and determined. "Then we point out that the next place Fong is likely to move through are their relatives' farms. How badly do they want to eat this year?"

"...You did that on purpose." Shirong drew back, startled. "That's-"

"The Air Nomads died," Zuko said deliberately, "because they thought everything that happened on the lowlands wasn't their problem." He let out a hissing breath. "They can be Air Nomads, and rot up there on that mountain. Or they can be good neighbors who just happen to be airbenders, and help. They're not the Temple, we're not paying tribute, and we are not their damn shield-wall. They're in this fight, or they're out. I've had enough."

Quiet movement shivered the brush near them; Sergeant Kyo faded out of the bushes, brown mottling his armor. "Sir. Some of their scouts are getting a little close."

I don't want to be here, either. But this was his responsibility. "Did they find the note?"

"Sir." The sergeant gave him a look.

"Right. Coming."

Fong would find the latest letter, or he wouldn't. Either way, the trap below ought to give the message loud and clear.

I tried asking nicely.

Even with this blow, Fong had more soldiers than Dragons' Wings had people. He had to whittle that army down. Any way he could.

Which means Low War. I don't care if Uncle doesn't like it.

...And the time to worry about that was after they were clear of Fong's scouts. Now was time to fall back, watch which way Fong decided to go, and put the finishing touches on what they'd set up for Fong's most likely routes.

And hope Huojin doesn't kill me. Even if Luli volunteered.

A few more marines fell in as they retreated, Rikiya humming under his breath. Zuko stifled a snort of laughter. Caught Shirong's questioning glance, and mouthed, Explain later.

Hopefully, later would be where Shirong could break a few rocks and burn things without drawing a whole army down on their heads. The Dai Li was upset enough with the reality of Low War. Knowing the Fire Nation wrote songs about it...

I don't get people, but even I know that's not going to go over well.

He really hoped Fong paid attention, this time.

Next time, I'm bringing the rattle-vipers.

Chapter End Notes

The song Rikiya is humming is "Snare and Deadfall," by Mercedes Lackey.

Shrink-swell clays are not uncommon in soils of volcanic origin. They do Exactly What It Says On The Tin: shrink when dry, swell enormously when wet. They also become very slippery and heavy. Farming them isn't the best idea if you have other options, which is one reason Fong had a clear line of march that way.

In this day and age it can be easy to forget how much geology affects war. If you want some interesting history and espionage reading, look up the preparations for D-Day, which included extensive efforts to get soil samples from Normandy beaches to determine if landing troops would be feasible. If you want to see an intersection of geology, war, and politics - well, keep reading, because apparently some French generals tried to divvy up invasion duties not by which forces should attack the appropriate targets, but by different grades of wine-growing country. Seriously. Their intent was that the British and American forces would move through low-grade wine areas, while French troops took the high-quality wine growing grounds. Roosevelt, Churchill, and Eisenhower were Not Amused. (Patton's thoughts on the subject were probably unprintable.)

If you're looking for some interesting books on soil, culture, farming, education, and war, check out Victor Davis Hanson. An Autumn of War is not to be missed.

Chapter 67

"I can't believe you did that!"

Zuko stared down at the disbelieving airbender in his wheelchair, then lifted his gaze to Changchang and the rest of the Air Temple elders gathered in the windy courtyard. They were silent, apparently willing to let Teo do the talking. Or in this case, the yelling.

So he can say what they're all thinking, and then they can deny everything and act polite later. Please. Azula did this better when she was seven.

Behind him Zuko caught a glimpse of Lieutenant Teruko subtly shifting her stance, from simple parade rest to something that just hinted of looming.

Great. This is going downhill fast. I should have sent Uncle.

But Uncle Iroh had thrown himself into getting their domain set for Fong's arrival, and the Dragon of the West had far more experience than anyone organizing defenses against earthbenders. Not to mention the troubling fact that he didn't seem to want Master Amaya too far out of sight. It was weird.

Then again, if Fong somehow did manage to get hold of her and her engagement necklace - well. It wouldn't be good.

I should have brought Langxue and Saoluan.

From the perspective of Dragons' Wings - yes, he should have. But the yāorén were supposed to be mediators between humans and spirits. Guardians against spiritual malevolence. Dragging them into an argument between Dragons' Wings and the Northern Temple... no. Bad idea. The Great Spirits wanted airbending back in the world. Zuko had a sick feeling that threatening to interfere with that would land his little domain in even hotter water.

So what about what Fong's doing, oh supposedly wise spirits? Why does she get a pass?

Then again, given some of those same spirits had apparently turned themselves into fish, Zuko suspected spiritual wisdom wasn't all it was cracked up to be.

Seriously. Koi fish. What did you think you'd do, barbel a bad guy to death?

"We were helping you, we were spying on them for you, and you just killed them-" Teo cut himself off. "You're not even listening to me!"

"Lieutenant?" Zuko said neutrally. "Did he say anything he didn't say the first ten times?"

Teruko's face was suspiciously blank. "No, sir."

"Right." And Zuko was not going to think about the very long drop past the courtyard edge, and how easy it would be for an angry airbender to blast him over it. "Teo. I'm trying to understand what the problem is. I really am. But the last time I checked, your people here needed our help to trade with someone for grain, among other things. You can trade with us, or with your relatives in the valley farms; either way, you still need our help to make sure food gets up here. And if Fong gets to Dragons' Wings-"

"After you killed his people!" Teo cut across his words. "You - you didn't even warn them, you just crushed them in the mud-"

"He's coming to kill us."

...Huh. Maybe watching Teruko's example of command voice was paying off. Teo looked like he'd been slapped with an octopus.

"I've sent him messages," Zuko went on, eyes narrowed. "I've asked him to stop. I've asked him to negotiate. We dumped scorpion-bees in his camp; tell me that's not a big enough clue that we don't want him here. And he. Isn't. Stopping." Quick breath. Don't let him regroup. "A general brings his army into foreign territory full of civilians for only one reason. Let me clue you in: it's not to have a picnic."

Zuko gestured toward the clouds below, thick enough to block any view of the sea. "My people are down there. They can't fly away. There's nowhere for us to go. And if Fong gets earthbenders into range of our terraces, we are going to starve." Not as fast as the Air Temple; seaweed and fish could go a long way. But it wasn't the best diet to keep fighting strength on, and that really would get them killed.

Teo was shaking his head. "Earthbenders don't tear up farms-"

"To kill the Fire Nation? Believe me. They do," Zuko bit out. "You know how much room you need for a takeoff. Would you just think about the possibility that maybe, just maybe, we know how much room we need to stop an army?"

"Don't say stop." Teo gripped a wheel, not backing down. "Don't you dare say stop. You're going to kill them."

"If I have to," Zuko stated, voice flat. "Yes. I will kill them, if they keep coming. But they don't have to keep coming. All they have to do is turn around, and leave." Keep calm. Maybe he missed the obvious. "Anybody in Fong's army who can read knows they've got no right to be here." He looked at the crowd of so-called adults watching them. "You didn't have a problem with warning people when you threw War Minister Qin off the mountain."

"That was different!" Teo protested.

Got you. "Why?" Zuko pounced. Because if the answer was because they're Fire Nation or even because this is our land-

"The Avatar was with us!"

For a long moment, all Zuko could hear was the mountain wind.

"...I give up." He nodded at the lieutenant. "Let's go."

"Sir?" Teruko asked, startled.

"You can't argue with someone who just believes," Zuko said flatly. "We're wasting time. Let's go."

Changchang finally moved, hands on her hips. "Now, young man, don't be hasty. Fong aside, those are good Earth Kingdom men. You can't expect us to-"

"Yes, I can!"

Zuko let a steaming breath escape, fixing them all in his glare. "That's how you decide when it's right to fight for your lives? When the Avatar says so? What is wrong with you? Where's your honor? Where are your guts? Where is our deal?"

"We can't kill innocent people!" Teo shot back. "That would betray everything my father wanted." He shook his head, not backing down. "And we can't help you kill them."

Zuko didn't twitch. "We're going to remember that."

Teo flinched. "First you say we're friends. Now you're threatening-"

"Neighbors," Zuko clipped out. "I said we were neighbors. That has nothing to do with being friends. And it's no threat. It's a promise. We have long memories, Teo. Longer than you've ever imagined. We're your neighbors, and we helped you when you needed it. Now we're asking for your help. And you're not just saying no. You're saying we're evil just for asking."

"We did not!"

"They're coming to kill my people, and you call them innocent," Zuko said dryly. "What is killing innocent people supposed to be? An accident?" He shrugged. "Give my regards to your relatives. You're going to want to remember the look on their faces, when they realize you're abandoning them."

That drew an angry murmur from the crowd, and more than a few clenched fists.

Good. Maybe there's fight in them after all. "That's what you're doing," Zuko went on. "We've taken some of the pressure out of Asagitatsus. But if we can't keep it up - and we will have a very hard time doing that if we're dead - then she'll still erupt. It might take a decade. It might take ten. But she will go up." He swept a hand across, dismissing them all with a flick of his wrist. "But maybe you don't care what happens a few years from now. Not when fixing it would mean fighting without the Avatar's permission."

Teo winced at that. But he rolled forward, eyes grave. "You're right. We don't know what will happen in a few years. All we know is what we're going to do about what's happening here, now. Whatever General Fong decides to do, these are good people. Our people. How can we fight them, when they're trying to do what's right?" He looked at Changchang. "Asagitatsus scares me. She scares anybody who thinks about it." He glared at Zuko. "But Aang's beaten volcanoes before."

"...Utterly. Wrong. Kind of volcano," Zuko managed. Agni? If this is a nightmare, I'd like to wake up now.

No such luck. Figured.

"Avatar Roku died fighting a volcano," Zuko stated, sweeping the crowd with his gaze. "And he was a fully trained Avatar, who could bend lava." Facts. Arguing won't work. Give them facts, and let them choke on it. "The Face-Stealer's plan was to have this volcano kill Aang. We've bought some time. It won't last forever." He looked Teo in the eye. "If the harbor fires go out, we've lost. Don't land. The drowned will be there."

Teo swallowed. He might not believe in walking corpses, but all the gliders had to admit they'd seen something. "Aang can-"

"Avatar Aang created the drowned," Teruko bit out. "I wouldn't hold my breath waiting for him to get rid of them."

"Lieutenant," Zuko warned. Civil. We are going to be civil. Especially if we want to burn the place down. "She's right, though. It's the Face-Stealer's power that makes the drowned walk. But if Aang and the Ocean hadn't drowned an entire fleet - with a spirit's wave, not waterbending, the moon was out! - the Face Stealer wouldn't have gotten to trap their spirits in the first place." He let his voice drop. "If I were you, Teo, I'd get all the supplies up here I could. Because if we lose..." He shrugged. "The drowned are already dead. What are you going to do? Kill them again?"

Only then did he turn and head for the elevator, ignoring the angry voices raised behind them. Let them yell. And demand. And cry for things to be fair.

I've had enough.

"You mean they're not going to help at all?" Jinhai held three smoking leaves, all of which threatened to flare in his hands. "That's not right!"

Going over her new knives for any hint of rust, Suyin listened intently from her corner of the family garden. Lim and Daiyu were wonderful little girls, but honestly, they were driving her nuts. At least if she was watching Jinhai she could get a little peace and quiet.

"It's not that simple." Zuko held his own trio of charred leaves, wisps of smoke curling into the wind. "General Fong's soldiers are Earth Kingdom. The Mechanist's people don't want to hurt men who might be family. Men who haven't done anything to them, yet. They feel... well. Like you'd feel, if someone told your family the City Guard was going to try and hurt you."

Jinhai's leaves flickered. One went out.

"No one here would do that," Zuko said firmly. "But Fong's people aren't from here. I don't think Teo understands how much of a difference that makes. This is not a friendly visit. It's not a misguided march. Even if Dragons' Wings wasn't here, Fong still would be. And he'd still besiege the Temple. He'd just be a little more polite about it."

"The Temple?" Suyin exclaimed, startled out of her intention to stay quiet. "He's coming after us!"

"Because we're here. Look." Zuko smoothed the top of the sand bucket standing by for emergencies, and sketched a swift triangle, sloping down on the left to the bay of Dragons' Wings. "The farms are over here." Zuko tapped the right base of the peak. "The Temple's up here," a tap near the top, "and this is us." The bay. "Fong's coming across here." He dragged a finger in the sand, bisecting the triangle two-thirds down. "We bounced him off the route he wanted to take," the finger went back on the line, dragged another trail down and across, "but that only worked as well as it did because he really wanted to go that way to start with. We just gave him an excuse."

Suyin blinked, trying to sort that out. From her brother's frown, Jinhai was completely lost. "Are you saying he wanted to take an army of earthbenders through farm fields? That's - that's-" She shook her head, unable to find words to describe how horribly wrong that was. Her father did archaeology in fields, sure; but only if the crop was already in, and only after bending a test plot to check what kind of soil he was dealing with. Plant roots were alive, too; they needed air. Squishing soil together suffocated them. Tingzhe Wen drummed it into every student: if you can't put it back the way it was, don't bend it.

Zuko was studying them both thoughtfully. "Douse them," he told Jinhai. "We'll start again. I think you need to understand what Fong's doing, first."

"Coming to hurt us." Jinhai shivered a little, and looked up at the Mountain. "And they're not helping! That's mean."

"It looks mean. But it might be better if they don't help us, not yet," Zuko said frankly. "General Fong is going to try to come after us. We're going to stop him, but that's what he wants to do. The thing is... well, if your mother tells you after supper you can play hide 'n slide, but you have to brush your teeth, which one do you want to do first?"

Jinhai cocked his head like that was the dumbest question ever. "You have to brush your teeth first."

"Your mother can be scary," Zuko agreed. "Right. So... this is kind of hard, and messy... General Fong can't just do what he wants to, either. He's got responsibilities to the Earth Kingdom. And the most important one right now is, he has to make sure the Mechanist never works for the Fire Nation again." Zuko frowned. "So he's coming after us because he thinks we're the Fire Nation. That we're controlling the Air Temple. That we'll give the Mechanist's devices to the Earth Kingdom's enemies. We're not, and we won't - but he doesn't believe it."

"That's stupid!" Jinhai declared. "Teo's Dad isn't making weapons for anybody ever. Teo says that all the time!"

"And that's why the Mechanist's people are really in trouble." Zuko grimaced. "The first thing Fong has to do is make sure the Fire Nation doesn't get more weapons. The second thing he has to do... is make sure the Earth Kingdom does."

Suyin felt chill, as if a shadow were already passing over the face of the sun. "Teo won't do that," she got out. "The Temple won't."

"No," Zuko agreed, very quiet. "Not if they have a choice. That's why Fong is going to attack us." He winced. "And that's why he's going to take over the farms."

"The farms?" Jinhai echoed, confused. "The farmers didn't do anything!"

"No, they didn't," Zuko agreed. "But Fong wants to control what the Temple does. If they can't trade for food, they're in trouble." He sighed. "You say that them not helping us isn't fair. And it's not. And that does make me mad at them. But more than that... I'm sad. I told them Fong's not their friend. They don't believe me. They're going to find out. And when they do, and know that someone they think is going to save them just wants to use them all over again..." He shook his head. "That's worse than anything I could do to them."

Jinhai hugged his knees to his chest. "Are they going to get hurt?"

"Some of them, probably," Zuko admitted. "We're going to try to do something to stop that. It's going to be dangerous." He growled under his breath. "Which is why I'm stuck here. Not expendable. Frost it."

"There is something we can do?" Suyin pounced. "What?"

Zuko gauged the angle of the sun, and smirked. "We start by letting him think he knows more than we do."

"But how do we do..." Suyin's gaze flicked to the bright summer sun. She sucked in a breath. "It's today. The eclipse is today."

"For the Fire Nation," Zuko agreed. "For Omashu. Maybe even for places south of Fong's home fort. But not here." His smirk deepened. "But Fong doesn't know that. Especially since Sergeant Kyo's squad volunteered to... heh. We'll have to see how that works."

Not sure I want to know, Suyin decided. The last time her distant cousin had smirked like that, she'd heard horror stories of scorpion-bees and suffocating mud. "If it's the eclipse..." She swallowed. "Do you think Teo's dad will be okay?" Do you think the Avatar will win?

"I hope so." Zuko looked away, hair falling over his scar. "I want the war to be over. I tried to get them some help. I hope Sokka's as smart as he thinks he is." He glanced at the sky again. "But one way or another... we won't know until it's too late."

Everything is going wrong today.

Sokka sidestepped the spearhead, using the momentum to bring his sword down through the shaft. The Fire Nation Guard was well-trained, he barely wavered as losing the weight of his spear threw him off stance-

Barely. But it was enough for Sokka to grab armor and shove, hurling the man into what was left of his own spear.

"Our fight is not with the Caldera! We challenge your lord to a meeting with Agni!"

...Which wasn't exactly what Aang was planning, and if Dad or Bato asked what the heck he was yelling in the middle of the battle, things might get complicated. But damn it, these weren't Fire Nation soldiers. Not like the bastards who'd killed Mom, or attacked the Earth Kingdom, or tried to wipe out the Northern Water Tribe. These were the Home Guard; and yes, they were the enemy, but they were also doing exactly what he'd done when Zuko crashed into his village. Fighting back, with everything they had, because everything they loved was about to go up in flames.

He had to fight them. Sometimes he had to kill them. But if even one of them listened, and backed off...

Maybe today wouldn't hurt so much.

We have to buy Aang more time.

They didn't have enough blasting jelly to blow the gates, and too many Temul-visions of burning oil poured into tight spaces meant he really didn't want Toph tunneling here. So even with Katara shooting ice daggers down from Appa, they were pretty much stuck fighting on the beach and in the harbor. Which wasn't as bad a situation as he'd first thought. Sure, if they'd meant to invade the Caldera, being bottled up like this would be nasty. But as a distraction, this worked. And it kept them close to the three remaining subs. Meaning if things went even more wrong, Ji and the others could get out fast. Hopefully.

And it was just about time, he could hear yelling about putting on your eclipse glasses. Which he would have, really. But he wasn't dumb enough to stare up at the sun, and the last spearman had had lady buddies who might be firebenders, but looked angry enough to go after him bare-handed whether or not they had flames, so he was a little busy right now.

Aang? Get Ozai. Stop him.

But... please be okay.

Palaces weren't supposed to be empty.

Not that Aang had been in one besides Earth King Kuei's. Bumi's place was big, but it wasn't exactly a palace. Toph's parents' place had felt fancier, even if Bumi's was a lot bigger...

Fire Lord Ozai's palace was big. And fancy. And empty, tapestries of the past Fire Lords fluttering in the breeze from his flight. It was weird.

"Fire Lord Ozai!" Aang thumped his new airstaff on the floor in front of the empty throne. "Where are you?"

Nothing but echoes.

They know you're coming, Shidan had said. They know about the eclipse.

And okay, that had been scary - but knowing couldn't change what was going to happen. There was going to be an eclipse. There were going to be eight minutes with no firebending. And that meant he and Ozai were going to fight, and the Fire Lord was going to lose. Nothing Ozai could do would let him win.

...Except not being there to fight in the first place.

Which was not fair. Just not. Fire was supposed to attack. All the time. Ozai not even being here - that was how Air was supposed to fight. Fire couldn't be Air. This was just... all wrong...

In the shadows behind the throne, something hissed.

Aang felt his shaved head prickle in goosebumps. That... that almost sounded like something laughing...

Blue shadows uncoiled, arching high. Translucent blue spread and boomed against air, like sails catching the wind. Indigo flexed, extending ivory daggers that gripped polished wood, leaving deep dents. Summer-blue scales dipped, azure whiskers reaching out to touch, as lambent gold eyes stared deep into his own.

Hello, dinner...

Chapter 68

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

One good thing about all that yellow and orange, Katara thought, gripping Appa's saddle as she peered across the sky toward a flicker of movement. You can see it. What happened? The eclipse just started. Did he beat the Fire Lord that fast?

It could happen. Most firebenders just didn't do weapons. If Aang had bending and Ozai didn't, their plan could have worked...

In a clear summer sky, it would have been invisible. But the world was in an odd half-twilight, made even darker by her eclipse glasses. And in that dark sky something moved, blue and sinuous as a river of ice, fangs and claws spread to pounce-

Repulse Lemur!

Why Master Pakku called it that when the North Pole didn't have any lemurs, Katara had no idea. But she'd practiced this form until she could do it in her sleep. Raised palms gathered the water from a barrel, the step and turn let her lash out with a razor blade of water that sliced the air between them and would have taken the dragon between the eyes if it hadn't dipped a wing and shrugged a twist lower in the sky, quick as a stooping bat-falcon.

Water sailed past the furled wing, barely clipping a strand of azure mane.

But Aang had gained yards of separation, which was what mattered. He leveled out and soared toward her, evidently bent on landing so he could bring all his bending to bear-

The blue dragon streaked skyward, climbing only to fall in a stoop between them. The wing from its wings stung Katara's eyes with blinding dust; twisted even Aang's airbending awry, so he had to grip his airstaff and arc away to get the wind back under him.

It knows what bending is, Katara thought, ice running down her spine as Aang struggled to swing back toward her and the dragon climbed for the clouds again. It's not letting him land. It's like Shidan. It thinks.

A hiss filled the sky, and blue stooped like a scaled thunderbolt.

The fists Katara brought arcing forward raised a shield of water-turned ice over Appa's back. Ivory talons screeched across the slick surface, cracking off a fall of glittering shards.

Katara flicked her fingers open, collapsing ice into water that a push of her hands sent up as tentacles to yank down-

Wind gusted from a downbeat of wings, tossing the dragon up and away from grasping water.

I wish Toph were here.

Not that the earthbender could do much in midair, except toss a few rocks where her ears told her the dragon might be. But even a pebble might be enough distraction to keep the dragon still long enough to kill it.

The dragons are almost gone. Aang wouldn't want me to hurt it.

Given the green fabric of Aang's glider had just barely missed getting sheared in half by a swipe of that vicious tail, Aang didn't get a say here-

Katara's stomach lurched, hair flying up to blind her as the saddle almost dove out from under her. Appa's legs beat the air, heading for Aang no matter what her hasty grab at the reins said.

Sokka. I wish I had Sokka up here!

She'd swear that dragon was laughing at her. Benders needed free hands, free something to move, and between the dragon and Appa the two benders up here might as well have their own eclipse happening.

We made Appa armor to protect him from fireballs. Right now, it's slowing him down.

And the dragon was fast. Fast as Azula.

Fast and high, which hurt her brain. Almost all the bending she'd done had been on the ground. Or at least on a boat. You didn't have to worry about things coming at you from beyond the height of the tallest tree. Especially not clawed, fanged, hungry things. Like the one arcing down toward Aang.

Mistake, Katara thought grimly, gathering up her water into a bundle of razor spikes as Appa leveled out. Left your belly open. She stepped back, and whipped forward.

Blue scales coiled in a spiral, the few shards that struck true shattering.

Katara seized more water from her barrels with a sweep of one hand, the other trying to pull Appa's reins up and away from where Aang was twisting himself through air to slip past reaching claws. "Appa, listen! We have to lead it away. If Aang can land, he can bend and help us!"

Appa tossed his head, horns almost tearing the reins from her grip. She winced, but held on, ready to throw more ice. The dragon's luck couldn't hold forever.

It doesn't have to, she realized, chilled by another gust of wind as Aang zipped and swirled through air, trying to get past the dragon to them. The eclipse will be over in minutes. Then every firebender will have fire again. Even dragons. All it has to do is dodge, and let you throw away your water...

The eclipse is a trap.

She couldn't wrap her mind around it, even as Appa's panicked flight took them away from the greenery and palaces, back over the Caldera wall toward the sea. How can it be a trap? You can't pretend to be weak in front of your enemies! Warriors won't do that. They'd look like cowards, their villages would drive them out-

But the Fire Nation were cowards, weren't they? She'd known that from the day her mother had died. They never fought one on one like the tribe's warriors. Always in groups banded together, throwing fire at everything in sight. So if they were already cowards, and the whole nation knew it...

They don't care how they win. Just as long as we lose.

Like Azula. Like a leopard-shark. Like the dragon, snapping at Appa and then Aang like a heron would a school of baitfish, knowing the instinct to school together would keep meals in reach.

It planned this. It's kept him in the air, running, since the sun went dark! Aang can't land if it's going to be right on top of him, and Appa won't fly away from Aang. That thing's not scared, even of the Avatar! It has us right where it wants us. All it has to do is keep us split up, and wait-

Eight minutes. The Mechanist said the eclipse was only eight minutes.

It wouldn't have to wait much longer.

Her world pitched sideways, water soaking her in a blinding splash as Katara dropped to her knees to try and hold on...

No.

She could win this. She could. Despite the dragon's plans. Because of the dragon's plans. But only if...

Too terrified to shake, she let Appa's roll pitch her out into sea air.

"Katara!"

She breathed in even as wind tore the air away, spreading her arms as she fell toward the harbor. The Fire Nation were cowards. Dragons were predators. Neither could resist helpless prey.

Blue streaked toward her, ivory fangs glinting brighter than the hidden sun.

Wait. Wait...

Gold eyes fixed on hers, hungry and hating.

Now!

Feet brought together to pull her chi and the ocean up, palms lowered and circled to mold one towering, smashing curl of a wave-

The bay crashed down on blue scales, crushing her foe beneath an angry sea.

So close, those waves. This is going to hurt...

A gale caught her like a punch to the gut, tossing her up and away from the water. Shadows swooped low-

Katara crashed against Appa's armor hard enough to bruise, left wrist gripped by Aang's determined hand. "Hi," she wheezed.

"Don't do that!" Aang helped her scramble back into the saddle, pale as she'd ever seen him. "I thought she killed you. I thought I wasn't going to get there in time-"

"She?" Katara interrupted. It was nice to know Aang worried about her, it really was, but the eclipse was almost over. "Aang, what happened with the Fire Lord?"

"I don't know! He wasn't there! Makoto was!"

What?

Makoto? Sozin's dragon? Why would she protect the Fire Lords who'd wiped out her people?

Even if she had - it made no sense. Fire Nation nobles were all about honor; they'd heard Zuko go on about it often enough. How could it be honorable to hide from the Avatar?

If the Fire Lord's willing to hide... Swallowing hard, Katara reached for the waves below. The dragon had hit like a thunderbolt, but she had to be sure.

The water was empty, except for laughter.

There was an ant gnawing on Rikiya's ankle, and he was not happy about it.

Shoo. He wrinkled his nose; bad enough they'd had to crawl through a field of barleycorn, he just knew he'd be itching for weeks. Now they had to deal with man-eating bugs, too? Go away. Move it, bozo, before I squish you.

An empty threat at the moment, and the wily little chomper knew it. Even an ant could feel the focused will that was Sergeant Kyo glaring at his men to not move, damn it.

A hopeless order, when it came to Fushi. Which was why she and Moriaki were back at the rendezvous to cover their retreat-

Rikiya gripped his lip with his teeth, forcing himself not to swear. Oh. Joy. The ant had brought friends.

Look at it this way, the firebender told himself, as he had for over a decade. Which would you rather deal with? Ants, or court?

Heh. No contest. Ants didn't slander your reputation, arrange for you to get caught chatting up the wrong noble's daughters, or slip poison into your tea. Life as a marine was much safer.

Most of the time. Sneaking close enough to General Fong's army to hear him pontificate on the eclipse as a gift of the spirits to the world and the Earth Kingdom in specific wasn't exactly safe.

Nice podium he's bent out of the ground there. I wonder if Sarge can get close enough to set it on fire?

He wouldn't be surprised if Sergeant Kyo could. But the Sarge probably wouldn't go that far. Setting surface fires that burned grass and brush was one thing. Even a crown fire, taking down whole forests, didn't doom a land to destruction. Ground fire, that burned out roots and the health of the soil itself? Bad. Very bad.

Besides. Getting that close wasn't in the plan.

Lucky for us Fong's a fortress commander. He just doesn't get entrenching every time you stop.

And Fong really didn't get fireworks.

Okay. Given there's no noisy avalanches landing on your head, pretty sure they haven't seen any of us. Pick your angle, stick the mount wires in the ground, unspool the fuse...

The tricky thing to figure out hadn't been planning how to pull off what the general and the prince wanted to go boom. The real trick had been figuring out how his squad could pull it off and live.

"Come back alive," their prince had ordered. "If it comes to a siege, we're going to need all of you. So either you come back, or I'm going to have very pointed discussions with your ghosts."

Which would have been a scary enough threat from an ordinary great name. From a dragon-child who'd already kicked serious spirit butt? Even Sergeant Kyo looked impressed.

Just about out of fuse, Rikiya reflected, a tense quarter-hour later. Sneaking back through the grainfield wasn't fun, but it was doable, especially with the odd passing breezes waving still-green barleycorn.

Good thing it's still green. We won't start a fire. Probably. Rikiya gauged the angle of the sun again, and listened. Noon. That's when Fong thinks the eclipse is happening. Should be right about...

What sounded like a jacana warbler chattered, three times.

Rikiya huffed a breath, fire blooming from his knuckles to race hissing down the fuse. Time to go.

He kept his head down below nodding heads of grain, but otherwise wasted no time running. Fong was going to have more than enough on his plate any minute now-

Rockets screamed.

A rattle like clashing feathers wrapped around Toph's knees, tugging her away from the harbor.

"Boots." She dropped one hand long enough to pet something that wasn't exactly there; turned it into a scooping motion that crumbled a chunk of rock and sent the resulting sand flying into Guards' faces to blind them. "Where've you been? We could have used you freaking out some of Azula's buddies."

The shuddering stomp near her toes was ample evidence Boots considered getting near Azula one of the stupidest things any human or spirit could do. Again, the spirit tugged.

"Something in the water?" Toph felt at the black hole where the beach ran under the waves. One of the good things about the bad guys throwing fire around was ashes. She could feel them dancing through the air like dust in the wind, settling over everything in hearing range. Even on something that rocked and swayed, like the Mechanist's metal fish had under the sea.

The water. Got to be. I don't see anything... but that doesn't mean nothing's there.

Especially after that tremendous splash. She'd never expected to hear that, not after people had started screaming about a blue dragon attacking Aang.

One of these days, I have to ask Luli if you can feel blue.

But now she could hear Appa bellowing, the determined kind of bellow, and people cheering the Avatar; yelling that the eclipse was over, and the Fire Lord must be defeated. So things had to be okay up there. Right?

Down here by the water... maybe not. "Another tentacle-thing?"

Boots made a shuffling sound, like sandals scuffing grass.

Probably not, then, Toph judged. Boots wanted her away from the water, but wasn't nearly as frantic as when something had been trying to eat her.

Time to find somebody with working eyes. Feels like Sokka's headed this way, and that's Chief Hakoda over there-

Toph dug her toes into the sand as the wind from Appa tumbled surviving Home Guards off their feet. A push of her hands rippled the sand under them like a wave, surging up to lock them in to their shoulders. That should hold 'em.

And if everybody was lucky, they'd stay held. Brawl, sure; she could do that all day. But she hated blood. She hated dying. No matter whose side it was on.

"Avatar Aang!" Chief Hakoda; and he wasn't cheering, no matter what the rest of their allies sounded like. "What happened? Where's the Fire Lord?"

"I don't know!"

Already heading that way, Toph had to pick up her jaw before she tripped over it. The last time she'd heard that much frustration and confusion in Aang's voice, the Painted Lady had just tsunami'd a bunch of soldiers-

"Look!"

At least she was close enough. Toph grabbed Sokka's sleeve, feeling the terror trembling through everyone's feet. "Want to tell me what I'm looking at?"

From his shaky breath, Sokka wanted to run himself. "If Momo was one of the Mechanist's war balloons? These would be Appas."

Huge massive war-balloony things up in the air, where she couldn't target them without help? Not fair.

"Where did they... how did they?" Katara stammered. "The Mechanist is with us!"

"Doesn't matter, if they got one of his blueprints," Sokka said grimly. "It's not like picking the right tree out of a forest for a ship, Sis. It's steel and cloth and following a plan. The Fire Nation's good at plans. They build ships. It's what they do."

Toph cocked an ear to the wind. There were distant roars of fire which had to be heating the war balloons, a growing clamor as their friends realized the Fire Nation had come up with some new trick, an odd faint whistling...

Whistling?

Katara was shaking her head. "The Mechanist never showed us anything like those-"

"Get down!"

Toph wasn't sure if it was Sokka or Hakoda who'd yelled it. All she knew was that suddenly the world came apart, in loud and hot and screaming.

The perishable things of this world might be illusions, Hue reflected, but the Fire Lord's giant flying sausage-ships were one darn convincing illusion.

"Get us below the surface!" Chief Hakoda called to the waterbenders swooping water past their metal fish to pull them down. "They can't hit us if they can't see us-"

The metal cavern rocked again, water slapping against steel and bending as more explosions tore apart the surface. Most of Hue's friends and allies were probably wondering if it was safer down here, or if they should have taken their chances in the clear air of the beach.

Safety is just as much an illusion as death.

From the purely spiritual perspective of putting the world back in balance, though, it was better for them under the surface. Avatar Aang needed more than bending to defeat the Fire Lord and end the war. He needed faith in himself. And Avatar or not, no very young man was going to pull that off if he thought he'd gotten his friends and family killed.

Too many spirits have fled this illusion already, Hue sighed.

Being spiritual didn't mean he didn't mourn. Flesh was fragile, yes, only spirit endured - but that flesh was how spirits touched each other in this life. When it died, all a spirit's chance to touch those still embodied died with it. Death was a shutting of doors, a crushing loss of opportunities for all those left behind.

And Aang's already lost enough. Poor youngster.

Hue hoped the boy's friends were well. That they were telling him there would be other chances; other paths to take. Because there were-

Something moved through the water, and a chill sluiced down Hue's spine. What is that?

Shaken earthbenders and Southern tribesmen gathered near glass portholes, trying to peer through the dim waters as the Swampers kept them swimming away from the Fire Nation. Whispered guesses ran from really big fish to trick of the light, to...

"There was a dragon fighting the Avatar."

Whatever it was, was long and sinuous and never quite close enough to make out. And stayed that way, effortlessly, even as the air grew hot and stale from so many benders working so long.

"It's pacing us," Chief Hakoda muttered. "What is it?"

"Whatever it may be, we need to surface." Still near the exit ladder, Ji the Mechanist wiped sweat from his bare brow, mustache already dripping. "I hadn't considered the full implications of bending on our air supply. We can't stay down too much longer."

"I'd like nothing better," Hakoda said grimly. "But where? We have wounded. We need to get to land, not just air. And our rendezvous point is blown. The Fire Nation will be watching."

Hue smiled. "The universe might be illusions, but some of those illusions can be trusted." He never missed a stroke, as the chief's eyes snapped to him. "They're not watching everywhere."

"If you have an idea, shaman," Hakoda suggested, "I'm sure we'll all be glad to hear it."

"I'm no shaman. Just a man who listens to the web of life." Hue moved through three more strokes, reflecting on kindness, and secrets. "Trust the currents. They'll take you where you need to be."

Though as a young Avatar had discovered, where you needed to be wasn't always where you wanted to be.

And that sinuous shadow still swam at the edge of vision, chilling Hue's spirit.

Old hate. Old evil. Hue drew a stale breath. But better chasing us, than the Avatar.

Katara lashed out with another razor-edged whip of water, opening a long rent in red fabric. The giant war balloon listed to the side, spilling hot air, screams, and what looked like glass jars of blasting jelly. "Sokka, we can't just leave!"

"There's too many, Sis. Everybody who's going to get out, is out."

Sokka winced as Aang shot him a look, reins wrapped around the airbender's pale hands. "Are you sure?"

"I wish I wasn't," Sokka said honestly. Which was almost true. The only thing he would have hated more than knowing how badly they'd been screwed, was not knowing. At least this way he could make sure some of them got out. "Everybody who could got to the subs. We have to go."

"...Right." Aang faced forward, toward the sea. "Yip yip, buddy."

"They're flying," the Duke muttered. He and Haru were clinging together, Momo curled on top of them like a clingy scarf. "How can the Fire Nation be flying?"

"Dragons fly." Toph was gripping the saddle rim so hard her knuckles were white. "What do we do now?"

"What can we do?" Aang's voice was as lost as Sokka had ever heard it. Even losing Appa hadn't been that bleak. "We lost. It's over."

He held it together this long, Sokka reminded himself. I wasn't sure I could keep it together this long. "It's not over," Sokka said bluntly. "We're not dead. You're not dead. We'll get another chance. Today just wasn't our day." Understatement, he thought, keeping an eye on the massive craft falling behind them. Good, they're not as fast as Appa. We can make it.

Then again, war balloons were machines. Azula had already proved her tank could outlast Appa in the long run. Sooner or later, the sky bison had to sleep.

But this time, Appa's not shedding. If we get out of sight, they won't be able to track us.

Which was not the same as saying the Fire Nation wouldn't know where to look for them. If Azula, Zuko, or Zhao had reported anything about their Avatar-hunts, the Fire Nation had a fair estimate of how far and fast Appa could fly. They'd know what radius they had to search.

And there's only so many islands out there. Still, they have to get messages to the local Home Guards. That takes time, even with messenger hawks. We can stay ahead of them. If we're careful. At least long enough to figure out what to do next.

Which would be a good thing, because right now he had no clue. The eclipse was supposed to work. Trap or no trap.

I was wondering what they'd do about that, Sokka thought sourly. No firebending for eight minutes. Aang can bend three other elements. Winner? The Avatar. End of discussion.

Or it would have been. If Ozai had actually shown up to the fight.

How do you win a fight you can't win? Sokka rolled his eyes at the sky. Easy. Don't let there be a fight in the first place.

So simple. He could have kicked himself. What had Master Piandao taught him? The best block, is not to be there.

Negative jin. Avoid the attack. Only Aang had been taught about jin for bending, not combat. Firebending was supposed to be positive jin. Attacking. Aang probably hadn't even considered that Ozai would want to avoid a fight.

But I should have, Sokka growled at himself. People aren't their bending. I know that. Toph attacks things all the time. Azula and Iroh dodge. Heck, if I'd thought we were heading after Azula...

Well. They'd already seen Azula pick her best option. Attack their people, attack Aang - but not during the eclipse.

Azula knows what Kyoshi did. She probably found a hole and pulled it in after her until it was over. She's smart.

Why didn't we think Ozai could be smart?

"My father..." Haru's wince was audible. "What do we do now, Avatar Aang?"

"Why does everybody keep asking me?"

"Because we believe in you," Katara started.

"That's not true. You believe in the Avatar, not me!"

Sokka counted to ten. Twice. He was not going to dunk Aang's head in icy water until the kid saw sense. Not now. "Aang? You're going to say you're sorry. And you're going to mean it. Later. Right now, this was our plan. We screwed up. So now we need to find a way out of it. Any suggestions? I'm thinking we need to get out of sight first, think up a better plan later." He heaved a deep sigh. "And Aang? I believe in you. If Ozai had been there, you would have kicked his butt." He shrugged, and glanced back. "So where can we go while we figure out how we're going to try again?"

Aang swallowed. Looked away, shivering a little. Stared at the ocean below. "I'm... thinking."

Toph freed up one hand enough to wave. "Not real good with maps, but isn't Byakko around here somewhere?"

"Byakko?" the Duke asked.

"Island domain," Sokka filled him in. Huh. It was, actually-

Damn. Now he remembered the map. "They're way west of the Caldera," Sokka told Toph. "We could get there, but we'd have to circle the whole big island. And Appa's kind of obvious..." He trailed off, watching his sister get paler and paler. "Katara?"

She picked at her waterskin. "...They won't be able to help us."

"Huh? Why not?" Toph slid her hand back along the edge, trying to get in range to give Katara her best listen. "Maybe Grandpa doesn't like you guys a lot, but he's not gonna throw us to Ozai..." Her words died off at Katara's silence. "What did you do?"

"What makes you think Katara did anything?" Aang said defensively.

"Because she's not talking about it," Toph shot back. "What happened?"

Katara looked away. "Those people who came with Azula, the chi-blockers... they know he's a traitor now."

Sokka slapped himself in the forehead. Zuko is going to kill us.

Assuming Shidan didn't get to do it first.

"You..." Toph paled. "Why?"

"He's Azula's grandfather, too! I thought - well, how else did they find us?"

"The same way they caught us at the Caldera," Sokka said grimly. "They knew we were coming. All they had to do was look. We were moving an army, Katara. There aren't that many places you can hide a bunch of ships!" Damn it. It's the Wens all over again. Subtle. Why can't we ever do subtle?

"Wait, wait - Azula's grandfather?" Haru put in, wide-eyed. "You called one of the Fire Princess' family Grandpa?"

"Azula's nuts. Shidan's not," Toph snapped at him. "He's a good guy. And he tried to help us. And now, Ozai's gonna..." She curled up on herself, biting her lip.

"Ozai's going to be busy looking for us," Sokka said firmly. "He's got to find us, and I kind of doubt they built those balloons just for us, so... he's planning to do something nasty to the Earth Kingdom. That doesn't leave him too much of the Army and Navy to spread around. Yeah, that's still more people than Shidan's got, but Byakko's on the Western Ocean. Let me tell you about the Western Ocean. Outside of crazy traders and ice-mountain tourists, nobody wants to go there. The water goes straight down for miles, and there are things out there. Big, nobody-quite-sees-'em, man-eating things. And even if you get past those, Byakko's a tough nut to crack." Exposed to storms off the Western Ocean, very few good harbors deep enough to shelter Navy ships, every landing site known and generally watched... and that didn't even begin to cover the fact that Byakko trained a fair amount of firebenders, Yu Yan, and just general cut-you-up badasses. Add in Mount Shirotona and the yamabushi - yeah. Ozai wasn't wiping them out in a day. "He'll be okay, Toph. For a while."

But he's not going to be helping us, either. Damn.

"I've never even heard of the Western Ocean," Haru said thoughtfully. "I saw it on your map, but... how do you know what's out there?"

"Somebody we met had a library," Sokka quipped. Which was perfectly true. He hadn't learned about Byakko from Master Piandao's library, but he knew the information was there.

Used to be Temul's library, after all.

One of these days, he wasn't going to be able to use that excuse.

But not today. I'll come clean, I swear - but not now. Everybody's upset enough already.

Aang took a deep breath, and nodded. "I know where we can go."

"Remember, waterbenders are skilled in emotional manipulation and psychological warfare," Azula directed her onmitsu as her ship headed for the smoke rising over the Caldera's main harbor. "Anything they might say will be calculated to cause dissent and damage to morale. They know they can't face us in open battle. But they think they don't have to. That if they buy enough time for the Avatar to master firebending and attack the Fire Lord once more, they'll win. But they will not have that time."

Aang knows what I did to him. And everyone always blames Zuzu when my plans unfold. This time, they're even right. The Avatar won't go near my brother's band of renegades.

As for Jeong Jeong - she already had cabbage merchants looking for him.

"They can't win that way," Azula stated, eyes flicking over Anshin, Kotori, all the rest of the shadows on Kartati's deck. "But they can do a great deal of damage to some of our more... traditional domains. Especially those my house has decreed are necessary, to serve as anchors against the winds of fate. Too much change, too fast, can be as deadly as too little. New weapons, new devices, may make war easier. But the only way to make war decisive is to never forget the core of who we are."

Fire Nation, Dai Li, and onmitsu. I won you because those who claimed to lead you forgot that loyalty is not water, to meekly flow forever. It is fire. It must be taken, and then you must lead!

And if you're afraid to be burned... you never should have played the game.

"In particular," Azula went on, "our sources say Shidan of Byakko executed a murderous waterbender who'd been hiding under our noses for decades. Not the act of a man who would betray our people to the Avatar. No matter what lies that puffed-up brat of a Southern waterbender might spout."

Anshin inclined his head; the slightest of nods, from the tall, quiet onmitsu leader. Kotori...

Her nod looked the same. But it felt different.

Anshin believes in me. She doesn't. Kuzon was the Great Betrayer - and Shidan is tarred with that brush as well.

Annoying, but hopefully temporary. She knew how Air worked now; Ty Lee's near-fatal brush with her own teachings was proof of that. Air didn't follow lords. It followed a Way, and was bound to those who taught it. Which explained a great deal about Aang that otherwise made no sense whatsoever.

She almost felt sorry for her brother. Zuko had been hunting an airbender based on the idea that the Avatar was at least as sane as anyone else in this war-torn world, and would take steps accordingly. Such as realizing that most of the Fire Nation wanted him captured or dead, and actually trying to, oh, say, not draw attention to himself until he had more training under his belt?

But no. Aang had been following the Way of his teacher, and apparently whoever that monk had been had never passed up a chance for a prank, an adventure, or an opportunity to reason with people.

...Well, sort of reason, anyway. She'd read reports of the low-scale civil war that had broken out between the allied Zhang and Gan Jin, and the inhabitants of a hapless village called Liuqiu whose written records alleged that Wei Jin had stolen the so-called sacred orb, but only after Jin Wei had ridden him down in the street.

The reports claimed the two refugee tribes were unshakable allies, joined by their faith in the Avatar. But the nearby Fire Army garrison commander had seen the potential in the ongoing battle, and won a fair swath of mostly-pacified territory by stepping in on the side of the Liuqiu. Who knew how long it'd last, but so long as such petty insults of history divided the Earth Kingdom, the Fire Nation would win in the end.

As I'll win Kotori. I will show her a Way - my Way - that will lead us all to glorious victory...

Why are we slowing down?

And why were the dirigibles still hovering about the harbor, in plain view, rather than returning to the airfield for maintenance after their first battle? "Spyglass," Azula demanded from one of the nearby crew. "What's going on over there..."

Not just hovering dirigibles. Something was affecting the way smoke blew over the wrecked harbor. But not from the beach, where any of the Avatar's allies might have lingered. From the city.

I'm going to need more knives.

Mai loosed a swirl of deadly steel as she ran. Four Home Guard firebenders between her and the new landing field, her blades pinned three of them-

Ty Lee landed on the fourth's shoulders in a perfect acrobat's vault, bending to give the poor young soldier an upside-down grin before she jabbed knuckles into the sides of his neck.

He crumpled, Ty Lee already a fluttery handspring away.

This is such a bad plan. We're not firebenders!

Mai dashed forward and leaped into the war balloon's basket anyway, half-gloved hands turning up the furnace flame to roast the air already in the silken shroud. The only reason this stood a chance of working was because it was a bad plan. Ozai had already covered all the exits for a good one.

This is going to break Azula.

On the one hand, she couldn't help but smirk in triumph, even with the palace guards hot on their heels. This was exactly what she'd hoped for when Shidan had suggested she rejoin the Fire Princess in the first place. A chance for not just revenge, but true vengeance; to show Azula what it meant when someone you believed in betrayed you. On the other...

This is going to break her. Just when she was figuring out how to care about our people.

"If you seek vengeance, it is your duty to be there to drive the dagger home," Shidan had stated, fire a gold-green blaze about his hands as he mended a lightning-torn heart. "For if you succeed - then, she will truly need you."

It hadn't made sense. Not then.

Ty Lee caught one of the basket ropes, twirled around it, and snatched an anchor line. Momentum landed her in the basket, yanking the last anchor free.

Mai gripped a rope as they bounced upward, trying to slow down frantic gulps of air. It'd been a heck of a run. Up we go-

Red fabric fluttered. Billowed, like a luffing sail, as hot air whooshed down and past her face, stealing their lift.

Stunned, Mai followed the breeze to a distant rooftop, where a shadow of gray lurked on the tiles, whirling hands about each other. Onmitsu. Airbender. Ty Lee's not the only one. How do I knife someone who controls the air?

"No you don't!"

Ty Lee bounced like a rabbiroo, landing in a bent-kneed stance that wasn't anything Mai had seen her use before. Yet it was familiar.

Katara. That's a waterbending stance!

Ty Lee circled her palms and stepped left in the basket as far as she could, with a toss of her head to bounce hair and chi in a whole-body smile that was pure circus.

Mai caught her balance as their basket skimmed the grassy field, catching on spiderwort leaves before Ty Lee's stolen gale blasted their balloon full and up.

Mai threw.

Damn.

Darkened steel caught the onmitsu in the arm, not the neck. That wouldn't slow down a determined bender. And there were more red uniforms tearing their way, lances of fire lashing out toward basket and fragile cloth.

Giggling, Ty Lee swirled around their basket like a fighting flutter-hornet, fluttering and circling and never in the same place if you blinked-

The rim of the basket smacked Mai in the chest, as their craft leapt skyward.

Ow. Ow, ow, kill it lots, ow...

Trying not to rub her abused bosom, Mai held on and gasped for breath. Why was the air so thin, like trying to climb Shirotoro at a dead run-

"Sorry!"

Air flooded back into Mai's lungs like syrup, as their balloon suddenly stopped rising.

"Sorry, I'm sorry; I should know better, you can't make breath come to you!"

Gripping ropes and metal, Mai filled her chest with air. Wonderful air...

She blinked down at a miniature world. Even the lashes of fire reaching for them only looked like flying sparks. "How...?"

"Just a couple thousand feet," Ty Lee said cheerfully. "We should be fine. Even Yu Yan can't shoot this high."

"Not how high," Mai got out. "How-?" She lifted her hand from a woven edge, flicking up.

"Oh!" Ty Lee leaned back against a rope, relieved. "Did you know air weighs a ton?"

Mai stared.

"No really, it does," Ty Lee insisted, gray eyes earnest. "You just don't feel it, because it pushes down all the time. But it's heavy. And hot air makes us lighter. So all I had to do was move the air on top of us, and - vroom!" Her hands sailed upward.

"Oh," Mai deadpanned. "That's all."

"Wasn't it neat? We should do that again!" Ty Lee almost raised her hands. Hesitated. "But you can't bend, and that means you can't grab air to breathe. That would be bad."

"Just a little," Mai agreed. Took another breath, just to be sure she could. Blinked, and focussed. Red fabric. Steel. Too close.

Why couldn't you have stayed near the harbor with the rest of the dirigibles?

They were smaller than Ozai's fleet. They should be faster; no weight of men or weapons, and not much at all of fuel. And if Ty Lee was right, and air had weight - then the dirigibles had to shove a lot more aside than they did. They should be faster.

But we're not firebenders.

This was going to be interesting.

Dodging bottles of blasting jelly was generally not the sign of a good day.

"Bring them in! Get those fires out!" Azula slapped a bottle from the air with a whip of fire, exploding it harmlessly over the sea below them. "More speed!"

She knew these weapons. She'd helped design these weapons. That was the only thing keeping them alive.

Well, that, the Dai Li's aim with their shrinking pile of rocks, and the fact that the captain was properly terrified enough of her to put the ship into the wind and run for open sea. Dirigibles might not have water currents to fight, but they had to fight air.

"They're falling behind." Anshin crouched beside her, senbons tucked between his fingers. "Kotori's gone."

Azula stiffened. "She's dead? No one said there were casualties-"

"No, Princess. She's gone. With at least four of her cohort."

I've been betrayed. For a moment, the world flared red. Then black, full of howling emptiness...

No. Mai is here. Ty Lee is. They came for me. Azula drew herself up straight, pushing aside limp and scorched red fabric. "What happened?"

"Azula! You're all right!" Ty Lee bounced out of the basket, wrapping her in a hug.

Erk. "You're supposed to be in bed," Azula accused her.

"But I'm fine now. Everything's fine." Ty Lee hesitated. "Almost everything."

"We need to get out of sight." Mai stepped onto the deck as if she rode flaming balloons down every day. "The invasion didn't have enough forces to get overconfident. They weren't trapped away from their vessels. Many of them died," Mai met Azula's gaze levelly, "but Chief Hakoda survived."

None of which should have taken more than a messenger hawk dispatched to warn her of her father's displeasure. As she'd expected he would be displeased; Fire Lord Ozai was the only member of the royal line who had never gone to war personally, and this had been meant to be his masterstroke against the Avatar's rebels. But if Mai and Ty Lee had stolen a war balloon, and been pursued with deadly intent-

Mai's hands folded in the graceful gestures of a governor's daughter, and her voice took on the formal cadence of High Court. "He mentioned respect."

The world seemed to gray.

But... but we couldn't let all those barbarians into the Caldera! There were still civilians in the harbor, they'd never have been able to stay clear of the fighting - it would have been a disaster! We never would have been able to hold occupied territory peacefully after that; all our soldiers would have wanted revenge. I did what I had to for our people...

But it didn't matter. It never mattered.

I ruined Father's plan.

Ty Lee was holding her, warm and alive and whispering not your fault, you did what was right...

It doesn't matter.

"Find me the captain." Mai's voice was grim and wavery, as if Azula were hearing her through water. "Get us out of here."

Chapter End Notes

It honestly didn't occur to me to mention this until after I'd read some reviews... an eclipse doesn't occur over an entire planet. Not even over most of it. In RL, there's at least a partial solar eclipse for Earth every year; there may be several in any one year. They just aren't over parts of the world where most people reading this can step outside and see it. On top of that, a total solar eclipse actually occurs on a fairly narrow part of the world - a track only about 150 miles wide. Looking at Wikipedia's page on eclipses, and estimating that the Avatar world that we see is only one hemisphere of a planet (given ship travel times in the series, that seems plausible), then the distance between the Fire Nation capital city and Omashu is just about the extent of one total eclipse. Long story short - if the eclipse can even be seen in Ba Sing Se, which is unlikely, it wouldn't be a total eclipse. And it definitely wouldn't get as far north as the Northern Air Temple.

Chapter 69

So the balcony is real.

Lemur shifting on his shoulder, Aang trailed his fingers through white-spotted green leaves, seeing a hundred years of neglect in the way starberry vines swarmed over every stone, shading the whole balcony in green. Shih and Gyate had been whispering to each other there, which would put Temul about here...

Nothing. No spirits, no visions, no angry ghosts threatening to call down lightning. Just stone and green and silence, broken only by badger-frog croaks.

But she was here. Temul was standing right here.

It felt weird to know that. A strange mix of acid in his throat and finally finding a solid place to stand. Temul had been alive when Master Gyatso had still been looking after him. She'd known Air Nomads he might have met. She was wrong about them, utterly wrong-

But she'd known his people. His world. His friend.

Kuzon trusted her. And... Sozin killed her.

It hurt.

But that was kind of what he'd come here for, after he was sure they were safe. His friends could poke around the Western Air Temple, and ooh and ah while they tried to get over the eclipse. Aang was looking for something else.

He rubbed behind cream-furred ears, thinking hard. "Gyatso said once, if you don't know the face in the mirror, think back to where you were when you did."

Well, here he was. Kind of. At least it was an Air Temple. A hundred years ago.

Back when I was just a kid. Just another Air monk. At least that's what I thought.

"I never wanted to be the Avatar," Aang told empty stones. "I don't want to invade places, or hurt people. Even if I have to, to stop the Fire Lord." He winced, one hand gripping his airstaff hard. "I don't want to. So why am I doing it? There's got to be a better way!"

Silence. The leaves cloaking stone soaked up even the echoes.

Crick. Crick, crick, crick...

Sounded kind of like a cricket-mouse. Momo perked up on his shoulder, dashing off after something in the thicket of vines.

"At least somebody's still got an appetite," Aang muttered. When he thought about what had happened yesterday, all the pain and fighting and dying, and it'd all been for nothing-

He didn't even bother brushing leaves off a stone bench. Just flopped down onto it, sick at heart. He couldn't even be glad Sokka had listened to him when he'd said he needed to meditate alone, and kept the rest of his friends away. He just felt...

Awful.

Aang curled his arms around his knees, feeling hot tears splat on the backs of his hands. He was going to meditate. He was.

...Later.

I tried. Everybody tried so hard...

He wasn't going to let Katara hear him cry. Not now; maybe not ever.

Someone put an arm around his shoulders.

Aang gulped for breath. "Sokka, just - just let me think..."

"Sokka is quite busy, keeping your little friend the Duke from falling down yet another drop-off," an amused voice said gently. "One wonders when he'll realize every structure in this Temple is meant for those who call the wind for their wings."

Aang froze. He'd heard that voice before.

Except he hadn't. Temul had heard that voice before. A hundred years ago.

"I have frightened you." The arm didn't move; warm as sunlight, and not quite solid. "I did not intend to. It has been some time since souls passed within these walls needing comfort." A soft chuckle. "Though not so long as you might think. Many who have fled the Fire Lords' wrath have taken refuge here for a time."

Warily, Aang glanced right and up.

Not very high up, which surprised him. Temul had seemed ten feet tall with the force of her rage, even though that ghost wasn't any taller than Zuko...

Seated, the gold-eyed swordsman wasn't much bigger than Aang.

Dark hair. Only a few wrinkles, like people got from staring into the sun. He looked younger than Chief Hakoda.

Aang swallowed. "You're not..." Words failed him.

"Alive?" Shih grinned at him. "Not quite. Though, neither is one dead. Exactly." He shrugged, like shadows moving through sunlight. "So much grief here, so many seeking refuge from terror and pain... this Temple needed a guardian. And I wished a place of peace and healing. So I stayed." Gold eyes glinted with amusement. "Why are you here?"

A ghost. Was asking him why he was here. A Fire Nation ghost. "I'm an Air Nomad!" Aang got out. "Where else would I be?"

"An Air monk." Shih leaned back, chuckling quietly. "A little young for spring festivals, are you not?"

"Gurk." Oh, monkeyfeathers. His face was red, he just knew it.

But if Shih thought he was here to see nuns, then... "Are they alive?" Aang grabbed for a not-quite-there red sleeve. "Please, just tell me somebody's alive, Temul showed us you and Gyate were going to take some girls, but she's a ghost, she doesn't breathe, I can't tell if she's lying-"

"Peace. Breathe, young one. Take a moment to think." Laughter fled the spirit's face, leaving understanding in its wake. "Temul did not lie. Dragon-children rarely do. Gyate and I did rescue many from here, and spirit them away. And yes, some of the children still live. They are older, and cautious of strangers. But they live." Shih looked him over again. "Met Temul, have you? And yet you live. Something must have softened her rage."

Soften it? Aang wondered. What was she like before? "Where are they? Why did they go with you? Temul called you the Demon of Taku, but Gyate was trying to protect you..."

"Love can lead one to do many things that are not wise," Shih mused. "But Gyate did not protect the Demon." He touched a hand over his heart. "She protected Shih, who had seen too much death, and never wished to deal it again. To be asked to save lives, not take them; how could I abandon innocents to Sozin's evil?"

"But..." Aang swallowed. "You're Fire Nation. Saving people almost killed Kuzon."

"Young Lord Kuzon." Shih inclined his head. "He has always been brave, and faithful beyond death. Firebenders are bound by loyalty. Acting against the Fire Lord's will can be fatal." A flicker of a smile. "But most onmitsu are not bound so tightly. Fortunately." A soft hah. "And I had broken from the Fire Lord many years before. It did nearly kill me. But perhaps Agni judged my cause just; or perhaps it was only a favor of a kindly wind. For when the sickness froze my soul, I was cared for by a young maiden who had strayed too far from her cohort." Gold eyes glinted with laughter. "She pinned me between herself and her bison, and demanded I live." A finger tapped the tip of Aang's nose, light as a landing flutter-hornet. "You are very, very stubborn people."

"Gyate." Aang drew back a little, startled and wondering. "It was Gyate, wasn't it. She kept you alive. But... why?" He gulped. "I mean, it was the right thing to do, but-"

"For the Demon of Taku? Ah, I do know what you mean," Shih nodded. "Why did you not leave Prince Zuko to the snows of the North?"

He knows about that? "Because it would have been wrong!"

The spirit inclined his head. "So you believe. But why do you believe so?" He spread empty hands when Aang flinched. "I never said you were wrong, young one. But if you wish to see in a mirror clearly, you must shed light on its reflection."

And that was like what Gyatso had said once. If you've lost something, don't just look where there is sunlight. Bring light into the dark. Then, you will see.

But right now, Aang figured, he was what was lost.

"It would have been wrong because... because he could have died out there," Aang said haltingly. "And that would have been our fault. Katara already stopped him. He couldn't hurt us anymore. We didn't have to kill him. And if we weren't going to kill him, then... then it would have been wrong to let him get killed. When we knew it could happen, and we weren't going to stop it. We couldn't do that." Aang swallowed, throat dry. "I couldn't do that. Not after Zuko-" He closed his mouth, and shook his head.

"Yes?" Shih arched a dark brow.

"He didn't save them!"

"I never said that he did." Shih tilted his head, curious. "Save who?"

"Sokka and Katara were sick," Aang said reluctantly. "And... Zhao caught me. If Zuko hadn't..."

He hunched his shoulders. It hadn't happened. Zuko had broken him out, and he'd found more frogs, and Sokka and Katara were fine.

"It is possible to do the wrong thing for the right reasons," Shih reflected. "Or the right thing, for the wrong ones. Intentions matter. But so do one's actions, and their consequences." He nodded, as if to himself. "Among the Fire Nation it is said, do not drown yourself to save a dying man. But if you know that by failing to act, someone may die... then you must answer to your own conscience for your actions. As Gyate did to hers, warming one who had once been an assassin with her hope."

"I don't want to kill the Fire Lord," Aang got out in a rush. "But I have to stop him. How do I do that?" He smacked himself in the head. "Sorry. I'm sorry. I shouldn't have asked you that."

Shih blinked at him, head tilted in curiosity.

"The Painted Lady," Aang sighed. "Piandao. Even Shidan. They can't help. Sokka explained what Kyoshi did. You can't go against the Fire Lord, or you'll make all the spirits angry."

Silence. Aang looked up-

Into a slow, quiet smile. "That is true for many," Shih allowed. "But I broke from Kyoshi's decree many years ago."

"So did Temul, right?" Aang said, trying to think it through. "Is that why there's so many Fire Nation ghosts?" He shivered. "That's scary. If the only way you can fight the Fire Lord means you can't get into the spirit world..."

"That is not what keeps Temul here," Shih said firmly. "She is driven by vengeance. I... am bound by quite another purpose." A slight shrug. "Defying the Avatar can make entering the spirit world difficult, but it is not impossible. Death knows no nation." He paused. "Though it is true, some ghosts can make themselves known to men more easily than others. It may come as a surprise to a young man taught to think well of the spirits, but Fire ghosts are... pushy."

Aang couldn't help but snicker.

"Heh. You have noticed, then." Shih laughed himself. "But we have to be. Especially if we wish to speak to you. You carry within you the power of the world itself, Aang. If you do not deliberately calm it - for a human spirit, it is as if one cries into a hurricane. Your voice, even the sight of you, are lost in whirling winds."

But the Fire Nation isn't all human. "You mean there could be ghosts all around me, and I wouldn't know?" Aang demanded.

"At one time or another, there are ghosts about all of us," Shih stated. "But no, young man. There are many who still wish you well, even if they can no longer walk among the living." He looked Aang up and down, with the sort of worry and I'm going to fix this Aang was used to seeing on Sokka. "Time passes oddly for spirits... you look as though the world has ended. Yet I feel Sozin's Comet has not yet come."

"Doesn't matter when it comes," Aang got out. "We've already lost."

Everything spilled out. The eclipse. The invasion. The throne room, empty except for a raging dragon. The war balloons.

"It's all my fault," Aang said numbly, hugging his knees to his chest. "All those people dying, all the things the Fire Lord's going to do because we couldn't stop him..."

"Ah." There was almost a chuckle in Shih's voice. "So you determined how long the eclipse would be. I am surprised; I knew the Avatar commanded the spirits of this world, yet I did not believe he had the power to fix the sun in the sky, and command the moon to set."

"What?" Aang sputtered, taken aback. "I don't control the sun! Or the moon; I know Yue, I can't tell her what to do... are you laughing at me?"

"No." Shih shook his head, still smiling. "At myself. I remember being twelve. One can be very convinced of things that simply cannot be."

Aang caught his jaw hanging open, and closed it. "You don't think it's my fault." That felt weird.

"I think it is your responsibility," Shih said firmly. "But when one match starts a blaze, it may take an entire village to stamp it out. Even the most diligent fire-watch may miss a spark carried on the wind, that sets new blazes behind them. Is that their fault? No. But to know wind may carry sparks, and to seek out help to watch and smother them - that is their responsibility." He spread an empty hand. "Do you see the difference?"

"Kind of?" Aang mumbled. "But this was supposed to work."

"Sozin's plan to destroy the Air Nomads was supposed to work," Shih said dryly. "We are lucky that those who make plans, also make mistakes."

Augh. Why didn't anyone in the Fire Nation make sense? "But Sozin was evil!" Aang had to look away. "Even if Roku thought he was his friend."

"He was Roku's friend, once," Shih said quietly. "That is what makes his betrayal of your people so cruel."

"But if he was Roku's friend, how could he-?" Aang shuddered. "He let Roku die."

Shih let out a soundless breath. "So that is what happened. There were rumors, but..." The spirit looked down. "I wish I had an answer for you. But it lies within each of us to choose good or evil. To abandon a friend in his hour of need - that is evil. And too often, lesser evils lead one into ever greater darkness." He waved a hand at rock and ruins. "As you see."

Aang shifted on the bench, uneasy. "You're not just talking about Sozin, are you."

"No."

There was something really, really scary about how gently Shih said that.

Aang looked away. He'd think about it. Just... not right now. "You said people hid here? Who? Where are they?"

"To even speak the names might take us weeks," Shih said plainly.

"That many?" Aang objected. "This is an Air Temple! You can't get here without flying!"

"You can, if you can climb sheer cliffs," Shih noted.

"Yeah, right-"

"Which many in the Fire Nation are capable of," Shih went on dryly. "Ropes and pitons make many things possible. And dragon-children rarely need even that." He shrugged. "And those who took refuge here did not stay. They only rested, as you are resting, and healed, until they could face the world once more." He chuckled, looking into the distance. "You would be amazed what determination this place has woken in others, to set the world right once more."

Aang bit his lip. "Is that a good thing?"

"Overall, it has been," Shih nodded. "Though I am glad the Elder nuns have mostly moved on. Some visitors here, I have had great difficulty keeping alive." He shook his head ruefully. "It is difficult enough to stay alive in this maze with two good eyes and all your wits about you. Lost in despair, with no depth perception, and unquiet spirits more than willing to make the living stumble for something they never did - those were frantic days."

Aang felt goosebumps prickle down his spine. "Zuko was here? Why?"

"Healing," Shih said simply. "He was gravely injured, and exiled, and did not know what to do." He looked into the distance. "Those who know the Fire Lord's court say the Caldera eats the hearts of those who would change it. I know; it almost ate mine."

Brr. But that kind of was what he felt like. As if someone had just reached inside, and torn up everything. "You kept Zuko alive?"

"And is your first question why, or why did I have to?" Shih's gaze fixed on his, deadly as fire. "The answer to the second should be obvious to one who has met ghosts before. Especially Temul."

"Air nuns wouldn't kill!" Aang protested.

"Who said kill?" Shih's voice was desert-dry. "As I said. It is difficult enough to stay alive in this temple when all your wits are about you. One moment of distraction, and ghosts can be very distracting... well." The spirit shrugged. "He had been exiled less than a week, and able to walk scarcely longer than that. Iroh was with him most of the time, and ghosts do not trifle with the Dragon of the West... but sometimes, Zuko avoided his company. He was young, and hurt, and he had just seen all the plans he had laid go up in smoke." The gold gaze cut to Aang. "Much like someone else I might mention."

Aang scowled, folding his knees up to his chest again. "He wasn't trying to save the whole world."

Shih looked at him, unimpressed. Reached out, and flicked him right on the tip of the arrow.

"Ow! What was that for?"

"If you would think, and listen, you would realize what you have said is less than true," Shih stated. "Or how well do you believe the world would fare, if Azula became Fire Lord?"

Aang froze. Azula, leading all the Fire Lord's soldiers? After she'd hurt the invasion so bad with just a few people? Oh, that was... so not good.

"It is true, Zuko was not thinking of the whole world," Shih observed. "Young men his age rarely do. But he was thinking of the Fire Nation. And the disaster he saw looming before him threatened to crush his spirit." Gold eyes bent to his. "But he would not give up. If the only way to lift his exile, to save his people, was to find the Avatar lost for a hundred years - then he would find you." Shih waved a hand, encompassing vines and sun and stone. "He found the strength to swear that here. One hopes you will find strength here, as well."

Aang frowned at him. "I'm the Avatar. There isn't anybody else stronger."

"Is that so?" Shih crossed his arms, almost amused. "Sozin was strong, yet in the end he did nothing with that strength but destroy. Is that the strength you think of? Or would you seek for strength like your friend Sokka; the strength not only to know when not to fight, but when one must fight, even when all the odds are against you?"

"Sokka's not..." Aang bit his lip, thinking it over.

Sokka wasn't a bender. But neither was Master Piandao. When Azula's onmitsu had taken his bending - he'd never felt so helpless. Even after the paralysis had worn off.

Sokka, Master Piandao - they must feel like that all the time. But even so, Master Piandao had stood up to a raging ghost to keep people from getting hurt.

Like Sokka did with Hei Bai. And Wan Shi Tong. Aang swallowed. "Somebody said, the best swords stay in their sheaths. What does that mean?"

"The simple explanation, or the thoughtful one?" Shih raised his head, as if tasting the wind. "The simple - good swords are expensive. No one wishes to damage them lightly. Better to use a cheaper blade, if killing must be done."

Ugh. "And the thoughtful one?" Aang tried. "It's about not fighting if you don't have to, right?"

"More than that," Shih stated. "The wise warrior does not simply avoid battle. He studies his surroundings, his enemies, and his allies. Know those, and you may learn how to end a fight before it is ever begun." He let his arms slip back into an easy stance. "Tales say the Avatar can speak to his predecessors. If you have spoken to Roku - and I know you have spoken to Temul - what do you think would have stopped the Fire Nation, before the war ever began?"

Aang winced. "Roku... he shouldn't have let the Fire Lord get away the first time he invaded the Earth Kingdom. He should have..." I don't want to say it. "The Avatar has to think about the whole world. Even if they were friends... if Roku had just killed him..."

"It would have been one solution." Shih's gaze was unyielding. "There are many reasons Roku did not choose it."

Aang shrugged. "They were friends-"

"Sozin was the Fire Lord. The one man who held all the Fire Nation's loyalty in his grasp. And he had no heir." Shih shook his head. "If Roku had slain him, the Earth Kingdom would have been safe - but the Fire Nation would have turned on itself, in a bloodbath no one had seen in over two hundred years. Roku feared that bloodshed. Any sane man would. So he stayed his hand." Shih sighed. "It was not, in the end, a kindness."

"But he didn't know!" Aang protested. "He couldn't have known."

"Yet he did know what drove Sozin to madness; what killed his father and grandfather before him, as they were forced to chain the spirit of Fire itself." Shih was implacable as flames. "He knew. And if he had lifted Kyoshi's decree - yes, many of us would have died. But Sozin would have had no united army to invade." His gaze softened, sad. "No army, and no navy, that could besiege four Temples across the world."

Master Gyatso. Aang swallowed. "But it wasn't Roku's fault."

"His fault, no. His responsibility - yes." Shih looked him in the eye, face grave. "Be wiser than your forebears, young one. Lift the decree from us, when you can. Think! Of all the nations that walk this world, only Fire is chained to a bloodline of the Avatar's choosing. Would you choose Water's chiefs, or Earth's kings? The onmitsu's okashira, or the yamabushi's sohei? Set us free. Let us go." His voice sank. "You are right, you know. Violence, death - they are not the answer. When you fight the Fire Nation, you fight a people who in their hearts know they are lost in the darkness. Who know there is no future for their people, beyond ever more blood and death. Weapons cannot fight despair, Aang. The strongest bending cannot turn it aside. There is only one sword that can pierce it to the heart." He held out an empty hand. "Lift Kyoshi's chains. Give us hope."

"Hope?" Aang tried not to shudder. "It doesn't matter if I say nobody has to follow the Fire Lord anymore. People are already loyal to him. If you break that..." He swallowed. "It won't work."

Shih sighed. "Did Master Gyatso ever tell you the story of Ger-e Abaqai?"

Where had that come from? "The princess who stuck her finger on a needle and fell asleep for a hundred years?" Aang squinched his eyes at the spirit, trying to figure out the joke. "I always thought that was a silly kid's story. Nobody can fall asleep for a hundred years... eheh."

Shih smirked a little, but shook his head. "You have forgotten part of the tale. She was not cursed to sleep. The dark spirit who came to the name ceremony meant her to die."

"Right," Aang agreed, trying to dredge up the memory. "But there was one little spirit everybody had forgotten. A well-spirit, right? When the queen was a little girl, she'd cleaned up its shrine, so..."

"That child of hidden waters twisted the curse," Shih nodded. "Not death, but sleep." He waited, silent and sad.

No. Please, no. "She couldn't break the curse," Aang got out. "She didn't have enough power... it's not fair."

"Life is not fair," Shih stated. "We can only deal with the world as it is, not as we wish it to be." He turned a hand palm up, as if offering a broken cup. "If those of the Fire Nation break loyalty - yes, they may die. But if they must also face the wrath of the whole world for defying the Fire Lord, they will die. Zuko has only survived so long because most spirits cannot see who he is, until it is too late." A soft sigh. "The Fire Nation has brought death and despair to the world, and the world itself demands we balance the scale with our own blood. You cannot save us from that. I know you wish to. I am proud that you wish to; that even in the midst of war, you hope for life. The world needs that hope." He touched Aang's shoulder, a sunbeam-brush of warmth. "But it also needs your strength. The strength to face the truth. To see what you can do, and what you cannot. You cannot break this curse, Aang. You can only soften it. And that is not your fault. Let it go."

Aang scrubbed at his eyes. It was dusty in here. Yeah. "But I'm the Avatar. I'm supposed to fix things."

"You carry the spirit of the world, yes," Shih acknowledged. "You are also a very young man; younger than even Kuzon was, when he tried to save what he could. No one with a heart could expect you to set the whole world right once more." His gaze flicked to the side, just for a moment.

Like there's someone else there. Someone I can't see.

His heart hurt. All he wanted was to go bury himself in Appa's fur and never, ever come out. But he had to know.

If the Avatar's like a hurricane...

It was tricky, using the meditations Master Gyatso had taught him when everything hurt so much. But Aang held his breath, and made himself still.

Vine-shadows shifted, blurring into orange robes, long black hair, and a trembling smile.

No tattoos. She's not a master? "I know you," Aang said thoughtfully. "I saw you-"

Twice. He'd seen her beyond Temul's vision. Though it'd been just a glimpse with Roku, of a sweating, tear-streaked face. "You were there when I was born!"

"It would have been difficult for her not to be," Shih said dryly.

"Huh?" Aang frowned at the spirit. "You're not making any sense-"

The ghost-woman scooped him up into a hug, moonlight tears trickling down her cheeks. "You're all right," she choked out. "When Shih told me Makoto chased you, I was so worried. I thought you were going to die..."

"Um. Ma'am?" Aang tried to squirm loose, without making it too obvious. "Gyate, right? I'm okay. Really. Could you maybe let go? Please?"

She stiffened, sleeves brushing him like a cool fall wind. Closed her eyes, tears still streaming, and started to fade.

"Beloved." Shih had a hand on her shoulder, color flooding outward from that touch. "It is the Temple training. Even with almost a year in the world, he does not think of many things." His gaze went over her shoulder, smoldering when it touched Aang's. "Young man. I know Gyatso raised you to think. Do so. Who is the one woman who must be present at a birth?"

"Um..."

"If you say the midwife, I will show you one of my old master's lessons." Shih gave him an unimpressed up-and-down look. "That generally leaves one unconscious half the day. And you would deserve every moment of the headache."

He meant it, too, Aang realized. Toph got that look, when she was about to show a chunk of metal who was really boss. "But... Air Nomads don't have parents," Aang protested, wondering if he could press himself through a stone wall. Or if it would do any good, with spirits involved.

"Don't have-" Tears slowing, Gyate clapped a hand to her forehead in disbelief. "Ooo, Master Gyatso, if I get my hands on you-!"

"Some boys take their elders too literally," Shih murmured. Raised his voice a little, still kneading Gyate's shoulder. "Aang. I know you are old enough not to believe the stories of being found under a cabbage leaf. The sons and daughters of the Temples were not raised by parents, that is true. But that does not mean you do not have them."

It was like saying rain was supposed to fall up. Or sky bison hatched out of eggs. Or somebody like Hama was what waterbenders were supposed to be. Airbenders didn't have parents. Just teachers. "How would you even know you're my mother?" Aang argued. "Master Gyatso had me when I was two!"

"I know." Gyate's eyes were wet again. "I was there when the Elders gave you to him."

Aang blinked, taken aback. That was... well, everybody knew what teachers did. They went to the East and West Temples and came back with little kids. Nobody ever said anything about... about other people being involved.

"The Elders let us know that much," Gyate went on, gaze distant. "So no one runs into a... bad situation at the festivals. We know our children's names, and who their teachers are." She looked at him again, face an odd mix of sad and happy at the same time. "But I guess it was different for boys. They never had to know they even had children. So the Elders didn't have to... convince them to give them up."

"Convince them?" Aang echoed, uneasy. This had something to do with why talking about parents upset Katara, he just knew it. "You're supposed to. Why do the Elders have to talk you into anything?"

Gyate made a hurt noise, eyes wide and so, so gray. Shih touched her hand, and shook his head. "Beloved. He is a boy. Let me try."

"And why do you keep calling her that?" Aang muttered, half to himself. "She's a nun. That's creepy."

Shih closed his eyes, just for a moment. "One begins to wonder how one ever survived one's apprenticeship." Shaking his head, he opened his eyes. "Aang. You have seen bison calves with their mother. How she cares for them, looks after them; teaches them to soar, until they are ready to live on their own."

"But that's sky bison, not people," Aang pointed out. "We're supposed to be different."

Shih's gaze was a bottomless pool of gold. "Why?"

"Well, because..."

Shih waited.

Why did he get the feeling because the Elders say so wasn't going to work?

Maybe because you know Master Gyatso didn't agree with them?

Well, yeah; Master Gyatso disagreed with the Elders all the time. About training, about seeing other parts of the world; even about having fun at all. The Elders didn't want anything in his life but training, that was why they were going to take him away from Master Gyatso-

And that didn't happen to other kids. Any other kids. You didn't take a student away from his teacher. It wasn't right.

"Katara and Sokka say parents are like teachers," Aang said at last. "If they're right, then - why did we do that? Why would we take kids away from their first teachers?"

"Ah." Shih's smile warmed his eyes. "Now, that is a good question. One I am not unfamiliar with."

"You would be." Gyate sniffled a little, and poked Shih in the shoulder. "I still say your master's nuts."

"He trained me, did he not?" Shih inclined his head to Aang. "I do know how those of Air feel about your teachers. I feel much the same for mine."

Huh?

"I was orphaned young," Shih stated, "and not a firebender. But a master born of Air took me in, and raised me, and I love him even as you love Master Gyatso."

Aang's jaw dropped. "You were raised by an airbender?" Whoa. "You must be... really confused."

"I was raised by one born to Air," Shih corrected. "He was not a bender."

"But that's not possible," Aang protested. "We're all benders. We're the most spiritual nation in the world!"

Gyate winced. "All the children you knew were benders."

"Well... yeah," Aang admitted. "Isn't that what I said?" Oh, he really didn't feel good about this. "Why are you so sad?"

Gyate's hand crept into Shih's. "Aang... even in the Temples, not everybody was born a bender."

His stomach seemed to be tying itself into knots. "But - every Air Nomad's a bender!"

"Everyone claimed by the Temples was," Shih stated. "When it comes to Air... by two years of age, one can tell who is a bender, and who is not." A subtle shrug. "After all, the Elders claimed the Temples were only for those blessed by the spirits. And if some mothers must lose their unblessed children, then all must. Or it wouldn't be fair."

Aang had never heard the word said that way. Like it wanted to crawl down his throat and gouge out his heart, and that was just to start with.

"Our Temples weren't always like that," Gyate said firmly. "Before Yangchen died, they were places to teach and learn. People went there to seek the Autumn Lord. To find teachers to perfect their bending. To heal." She waved a hand at Aang; he almost felt a brush of air. "And teachers adopted students. With their family's permission."

"How do you know that?" Aang asked, still dazed. "Master Gyatso didn't know that!" Or he didn't tell me. Aang wasn't sure which option was scarier.

Pale fingers gripped sword-callused ones. "We know, because Shih was onmitsu," Gyate answered. "They still have some of the stories. And... there are other people who have more."

Other people. Gyatso's message had said there were airbenders left, who'd been hiding from the Temple... "It's not just onmitsu," Aang blurted out. "Temul showed us, I didn't get it - the onmitsu went after Kuzon when he wasn't in Byakko! They can't get in! Which means..." Oh. Oh, spirits. "Yuan-ti's letter. Renegades on Mount Shiroto. Gyatso even told me! Shidan's hiding airbenders. He's hiding them in Byakko!" Oh... oh, he was going to be sick. "That's why Shidan wouldn't help us. The onmitsu can't get in without him knowing, but if the Fire Lord orders Kotone to let them in... and now Ozai knows Shidan was helping us-!"

"Head down. Breathe slowly." Somehow, Shih had moved between blinks, rubbing the back of Aang's neck with slow, careful pressure. "Byakko has weathered the Fire Lord's wrath before. True, they are in danger. But the yamabushi are not helpless. And running off to save them will only kill you all. I know it is hard. I do know! But you must stop. And think."

Think. Sure. When all he could see was a frightened face hiding behind Shidan, scared out of her wits even after they'd rescued her from Hama. "Hitomi," Aang blurted out. "Shidan was hiding a yamabushi right there. He gave me Gyatso's message about other airbenders, but he never said anything."

"Byakko has hidden them since Yangchen's death," Shih stated. "The habits of a thousand years are not easily broken."

"No," Aang managed, trying not to look too closely at the ruins. "I guess they wouldn't be. And Gyatso wanted me to figure stuff out on my own." Which hurt. But at the same time - spirits, this mess was so big. If Gyatso had tried to tell him about it, all at once...

Maybe I never would have been able to do it at all.

"I need to think about this," Aang muttered. "I need to meditate."

"We will give you peace to do so, then," Shih nodded. "Though I will not be far. The Temple is mostly quiet - but there are still spirits that might trouble you, when you need peace most." He smiled. "One will be careful with the betobeto. Toph seems a very feisty young lady, and one would not wish to harm any of her friends."

Gyate caught his shoulder before he could fade. "Wait. Just a little longer." She drew nearer, gray eyes searching Aang's face. "There's something you don't understand about the Fire Nation. Something I didn't understand for a long time." She spread open hands. "They're afraid of you, because they think you have to have revenge."

"What?" Aang yelped. "But - I'm an Air Nomad!"

"And who of them knows what that means, in these days of war?" Shih observed. "General Iroh, Prince Zuko; your own friends Sokka and Toph. People who can look out from their own nations' view of the world, and try to grasp another, are rare. If you were Fire Nation, you would be forced to take revenge for your father's death. So that is what many of them expect."

Aang tried to pick his jaw up off the balcony. "But - I didn't even know my father!"

"And Monk Gyatso, who was father to you in all but blood, would never ask for revenge," Shih nodded. "I know. But Gyate is right. If you can tell those of the Fire Nation that your father was not slain by their hands - which is the truth - they may believe that you might spare them. At the least, that you are not forced to kill them." He shrugged. "You have seen the Fire Nation's tenacity when they believe it is fight or die. But if you can offer them another way, a chance for honorable surrender..."

"You think some of them might take it," Aang finished. "That would... it'd really help. Thanks." He frowned. "But how do you know what happened to my father?"

"Er..."

"He lived in Byakko," Gyate stepped in. "He was a teacher. And a healer."

Aang frowned, seeing something just a little off about her stance. Is she standing on his foot?

"You were a better one," Shih murmured.

"I wouldn't have had the chance, if you hadn't-" Gyate bit her lip. "Aang? This is very important. I hope Gyatso told you, but nobody told me, and if Shih hadn't been there... The Fire Nation knows all about fire. That means they deal with smoke, and that means most of them know what to do if someone stops breathing. You need a friend who can do that. If you're the Avatar, and you have to... go against Gyatso's teachings to stop the war... you need someone who can breathe for you." She squeezed Shih's hand. "I had to, to save Shih. And then he had to save me."

"You went against the Elders?" Stunned, Aang waved toward her unmarked forehead. "Is that why you're not a master? What'd you do?"

"What we're not ever supposed to do." She took one step forward-

And drew Shih's sword.

Her moves weren't like Master Piandao's; whipcord-strong, quick and hard like bamboo snapping back in your face. Instead, the blade floated in her hands, smooth arcs that whispered through air like blowing snow.

Deadly snow. Aang had seen enough warriors to know that. It chilled him. "Why?"

A final salute, and she returned the sword to its sheath. "Because there are movements of air a staff won't show you," Gyate said briskly. "We lost them when Xiangchen took away our swords. Without them, we can't heal."

Water could heal. Earth could; Toph had proved it, even if it wiped her out. Even fire could heal - and that still made his head hurt. But air? "Air is air," Aang said firmly. "If you can move it with a sword, you can do it with a staff."

"I hope you can," Gyate said fervently. "But whatever happens? There's one thing you need to know."

"Yeah?" Aang said cautiously.

Orange sleeves wrapped around him. "I love you," Gyate whispered in his ear. "And I know you don't know what to do about that. But you don't have to." Reluctantly, she let go. "Mothers love their children. That's just the way it is." Her voice caught. "And I'm so glad Gyatso was your master. He was a good man."

Aang swallowed, throat scratchy. "I miss him."

"I know." Gyate smiled, proud and sad. "Whatever you decide, I know he's proud of you. I am."

Sunlight shimmered, and they were gone.

Aang scrubbed at his face, and rested his chin on his fist. Think. Yeah. He had to do that. Byakko was in trouble because of them, the whole world was, and he wasn't sure what to do next.

Lift Kyoshi's decree. Maybe it would help... but a lot of people would die. Aang winced. But if the Fire Lord isn't stopped, a lot of people are going to die anyway. What should I do? I'm supposed to fix this-

No. Wait. That was what Shih had been trying to tell him.

I'm not supposed to fix things. I'm responsible for fixing them. There's a difference.

And just because somebody was responsible for making things right, didn't mean they always could.

Responsible means you have to try. And - if you think you can't do it on your own, you have to ask for help.

He already knew he couldn't beat the Fire Lord by himself. So... what could he do about Kyoshi's decree? Could one Avatar even try to change what another Avatar had done?

One way to find out.

Closing his eyes, Aang reached for the spirit world.

Chapter 70

Chapter Notes

Warning, there's stuff in this chapter that's not going to be pretty. As Sherman said, "war is hell." And he meant it. In the cartoon, you never see real war, a serious battlefield, or even any armies. In this chapter... Fong has an army. Zuko has Uncle Iroh, a Dai Li, a ship's worth of sailors and marines, some Yu Yan, and a bunch of grimly determined amateurs. There are only two good points about this situation. First, Zuko's people know the terrain better. Second, historically besiegers need to outnumber defenders by at least 5 to 1; though 10 to 1 gives the besieging side much more room to make mistakes.

Which means when it comes to survival, Dragons' Wings has one grim necessity: cut those numbers.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I can't do this, Xiu thought frozenly, knees knocking together in terror as the soldier behind her shoved her down the trail, toward a distant, innocuous pile of logs. The mountain air was warm with summer sun, wafting a scent of crushed yellow-bonnets and a surprising taste of salt. The trail leading toward the logs was half dry, half patches of muck every foot had tried to step around. The Fire Nation had hidden enough caltrops in wet holes that nobody with sense put any part of their body where they couldn't see it.

And all of it was a blur, angry murmurs of men drowned out by the pounding of her heart. She'd seen the results of Zuko's war of attrition since that awful day of the mud-avalanche. Seen them, heard them, smelled them. The wounded, the maimed crying out for an end to pain, the wet red shreds that were all that had been left after careless scouts had charged a fragile barricade of brush and dirt.

The barricade had been fragile. The spring-loaded slivers of steel hidden in it... not so much.

Spring-loaded blades. Scorpion-bees in hidden clay pots. Weevil-rats lobbed into the supply train. Tunnels hollowed under green patches of grass and herbs, filled with rattle-vipers all too willing to bite what stepped on them. Every rock, every tree, every patch of weeds might hide another booby trap. General Fong had been forced to use his scouts to comb every last inch of ground before his main army set foot on it, and the general was not happy. After all, scouts were highly trained soldiers, usually earthbenders. They were valuable. They were finite.

And Zuko's killing them.

Lucky for Fong, there were plenty of less valuable people available. Lots of farmers. No few refugees, who'd apparently been trying to find places with the farmers. And one stray silk-weaver.

I can't do this, Xiu thought. I'm going to die - this isn't even my war!

"Deep breath." A warm hand pressed against her shoulder, the shorter woman supporting Xiu when she almost stumbled. "It's okay. We're going to be all right."

"No, we're not," Xiu croaked. Some of her vision seemed to clear, and she glared hate at the slabs of stone sheltering a general. "You can't do this! This is crazy!"

"Days ago, the Avatar invaded the Fire Nation to battle the Fire Lord," General Fong said sternly. "A twelve-year-old boy, the last airbender, the only survivor of that peaceful people the Fire Nation murdered, has taken up arms to face the most evil creature this world has ever known! In the face of that boy's courage, how can even the most frail citizen of our kingdom turn away from battling such monsters? Firebenders, who have the temerity to lay claim to Earth Kingdom territory, and the black treachery to lie in the Earth King's name!" His tone softened; now only proud as steel. "It's barely a few more miles to whatever firebenders might be able to build as defenses. Be proud; with your aid, we will crush them under the stone fist of the Earth Kingdom!"

Spirits, she hated him. And she hated Sergeant Bo more.

He just let them take me. He just let them-!

Another shove, and she almost bit her tongue.

"Keep your head together," the refugee woman murmured. "If this one's the same as the others, there should be a riddle."

The sheer incongruity of it seemed to crack the ice in Xiu's brain. "A riddle?" Ice was turning into white-hot shards, a blazing fury that threatened to choke off thinking almost as much as the fear. "Are you telling me these things are a game?"

"More like a prayer." The woman's green eyes fixed on a scrap of white pinned to the ground a few yards ahead of the barricade. "General Fong has a reputation."

"A reputation for doing this?" Xiu hissed. The soldier had fallen yards behind them, but she put the thought of running out of her mind. She had to. Fong had shown he could and would sink men into the ground, then shove them wherever he wanted. At least if she had her feet free, she had the illusion of a chance. "Then why hasn't one of the nobles done something? King Bumi's half crazy, but if anybody tried to use Omashu's people like this-!"

Her companion almost laughed. "I guess I didn't say where he has a reputation."

Huh?

"Read it," she nodded toward the paper. "Let's see if we both have the same solution." She took a deep breath, and sighed it out. "I want to see my family again in this world." Her voice turned rueful. "You know, my husband's going to tell me, I told you so, and I'm going to nod and say, yes, dear. This is... a lot more adventure than I was looking for."

You're telling me. Xiu looked her up and down, trying to piece together accent and clothes and the odd calluses on her hands that suddenly didn't seem to fit. Those aren't farmers' hands. "Who are you?"

"My name's Luli." The older woman smiled. "I wonder if you're the Xiu I heard about." She waved at black characters on paper. "So what do you make of that?"

Respect to the lord of the land is never unwise.

Xiu shook her head, fury and despair churning in her gut. "If bowing down to the Earth King did any good, I wouldn't be here!"

Luli started to speak; then obviously changed her mind, and gave the weaver a look askance. "On the farms, we heard that Prince Zuko's men shot copies of the treaty right into the general's camp. Didn't anyone get to read them?"

"Maybe," Xiu said warily, shifting uncomfortably. "What does that have to do with-"

Under her foot, something clicked.

"Down!"

Luli dragged her to the earth with a mother's ferocious strength, their knees and hands thumping onto disturbed soil heartbeats before steel keened overhead.

Screams behind them. Xiu froze. We're dead, we're-

Thumps, as if the air itself wanted to rattle her bones. Smoke billowed around them, stinging midnight clouds.

"Run!"

Xiu let Luli drag her; head reeling, hands skinned and throbbing. Luli was charging right at the barrier, and that didn't make sense-!

One of the bigger logs - a stump? - didn't look right.

She's going headfirst into that-

Bark-brown tore like paper. Xiu felt her jaw drop as she was dragged through. And regretted it; whatever was in that smoke burned like cinni-chilis down her throat.

She ran anyway. Smoke and screaming were behind them. General Fong was behind them, and her feet wouldn't take her anywhere closer to him no matter what disasters might lie in wait. Fear and pain and craziness, and she couldn't go back, her father would tell her not to go back, Fong was as crazy as any Chin villager and nobody, nobody thought there was anything wrong with that, when had some of the army gone crazy-?

She never saw the rope.

She did see sky and ground flip places, as something yanked her up; blood rushing to her head, robes falling into her eyes, oh spirits what now?

"Sergeant!" Luli's voice. Upset.

Upset, not scared. Xiu tried to think; mouth full of her own loose hair, the world spinning around her. I'm trapped, I'm going to die, and she can't even scream?

"Orders, ma'am." A rough, matter-of-fact man's voice, moving closer to her. "Miss? Fong's going to need time to clear that area. But earthbenders can move pretty damn fast. Now, if you're a good Earth Kingdom citizen... well, you did your duty, and you obviously got caught by some sneaky, dishonorable Fire Nation types who - lucky for you - just couldn't stick around to do all the evil things everybody knows firebenders do. Right?"

Xiu tried to blink silk away from her eyes. This made no sense whatsoever. "Um..."

"But if you're not - well, you're probably good, but maybe not good the way Fong thinks, he's kind of a few coals short of a bonfire-"

And that was a woman's voice. Which really didn't make sense, given it bounced up to her with a metal-armor jingle.

"-So if you're kind of a sane person, and you figured out Fong's the kind of guy who throws bamboo knots into a fire just to watch them go boom - and you know nobody does that, because hello, splinters, could take your eye out-"

"Fushi." The man's voice was stern, but Xiu could have sworn there was a laugh in it.

"Right! Wasting time, got it boss." Pale hands lifted cloth away from Xiu's face, and gold eyes grinned down into blue. "There you are! Want to come with us?"

"They're going to get away!" Sima called over the wind.

Teo let his glance flick to her glider, swallowed hard, and casually banked about ninety degrees from the direction red armor was scampering through the greenery. "Then let's go this way."

He couldn't see Sima frown behind her own goggles, but he could read it in the hunch of her shoulders. Still, she followed as he turned away; so if Fong did happen to look up at the little flecks of color in the sky, they wouldn't be showing him where Zuko's people were getting the woman to safety.

Thanks, Sima. And he'd drop back to tell her that, but losing any speed or altitude here just seemed like a bad idea-

Freeing one hand for a moment, Sima waved it through the tricky little wriggle that wafted up an extra breeze, so she could catch up to easy listening distance. "Something you wanted to say?"

She was grinning, Teo noticed, catching the flash of teeth in the shadow of her wings. He couldn't blame her, even if Changchang did lecture them about eating bugs raw. Riding the wind was awesome. Being able to call your own wind, when you needed it? There weren't words for the way that felt. "Yeah!" he called back. "Thanks!"

Glancing back behind them, Sima lost the grin. "So... this is a good thing?"

"I don't know," Teo admitted. "I don't think I've ever seen that woman before-"

"No way," Sima said firmly. "I saw her shadow. She's tall."

Despite the mess behind them, Teo grinned. So far he was ahead of all the gliders in airbending, but Sima was one of the best at judging distances on the ground from high in the air. "So if we don't know her, she shouldn't be part of this mess. I'm glad she's still alive."

"Yeah. She is." Sima's voice was small. "But what happens when the general goes after them?"

"They'll hit more traps," Teo said honestly. "I know." Even from these heights, they'd all seen too many of the dead and wounded after one of Dragons' Wings' riddles hit home.

"Why won't he just stop?" Sima burst out.

Teo snorted.

"It's not funny!"

"No. It's not," Teo said ruefully, shifting his weight to take more advantage of the wind. "It's just..."

I've been thinking about that. And I think I finally figured it out." He winced. "Why did War Minister Qin keep coming? He knew we had the Avatar on our side."

"But... General Fong's Earth Kingdom," Sima protested.

"I know. But that doesn't mean they're different. Not when it comes to fighting." Teo grimaced. "Or more like... why they fight. Fong wants the world to work his way. And he's not listening to anyone who tells him it doesn't."

Not even his own people. You couldn't really see expressions from a thousand feet up, but you could see motion. The jerky way that strange lady had moved, walking up to almost certain death because any other option would be worse-

"She was so scared." Sima shuddered. "I hate this! I hate all of it! The prince is killing people, and - and-"

"And you don't think he's wrong," Teo said bluntly. Gathered his courage, and told the truth. "Neither do I."

The edge of her wing dipped, before she got herself back under control. "But... it's horrible."

"Yeah. It is. I wish I could hate him," Teo said fervently. "I wish I could hate all the firebenders. But if I did that... I'd have to hate our people, too."

"But why?"

Seeing better doesn't always mean you know more of what's going on, Teo thought. "Because even if Zuko's setting up those traps to kill people - he's not the one making people walk into them. People who aren't even soldiers."

And that was yet another twisting anger in his gut, even with a cool breeze to waft calm through his hair. He'd fought the Fire Nation, sure, even though he wasn't a soldier. Everyone in the Temple had. But nobody had made them fight.

Everyone in Dragons' Wings was fighting. It wasn't pretty. It wasn't fair. But at least it was their choice.

"They're giving Fong the same chance we gave Qin," Teo called over the wind. "Go away, and no one gets hurt. Just go away, and leave us alone."

Or else.

For a long moment, they just rode in the wind, turning toward the greenery that cloaked Asagitatsu's rim. And cloaked other, more vicious things, Teo guessed; though from up here, he wouldn't know a trap until it bit him.

"You know what's weird?" Sima said at last. "It kind of reminds me of some of those arm-swirls Langxue was showing us."

"Does, doesn't it?" Teo said thoughtfully. "Deflect your opponent's force away. Never take a blow if you can dodge it." He cut a glance toward her. "Give the other guy a chance to stop himself."

"But they're Fire, not Air." Her shoulders shifted, sliding her through the wind. "They can't keep dodging. It's... it's not what they do."

"No. It's not." Teo caught the updraft curling off the caldera wall, and used it to turn with Sima, circling up like a gyr-eagle. Inside the bowl of earth and sea terraces spread out below them; waves shimmering with white foam near the docks, fish and seaweed drying in the sun and hung over burning fires. "Look at that, Sima. One crazy earthbender in there, and they could lose everything."

And oh, the irony burned. Zuko had told him that, and he hadn't believed it. Not then. Because firebenders might burn crops and forests to the ground, but earthbenders didn't attack farms. Everybody knew that.

Everybody but Fong. You could see his army's track gouged this way from the air; everything that should be summer-green and gold, now seared brown and dying.

Teo glanced down at flickers of flame, where Zuko's people were carefully prying the pressure out of Asagitatsu, one bubble of firedamp at a time. If Fong tears up the caldera the same way he tore up the farms-

"What about the caldera?" Sima called to him.

Had he said that out loud? Or maybe the worry was just too obvious on his face. "I was thinking about the gas in the earth!"

From Sima's grimace, so had she. "I think it feels better than it did last week. I just wish they could pull the plug on all of it, instead of just poking little holes-" She went pale.

Teo nodded, grim. "We should land. And talk."

A few more minutes, and they'd snagged thermals up to one of the Temple's highest towers, touching down on sun-warmed stone. Teo used the grab-stick his father had made to snatch one of the tie-downs, locking his glider against buffeting winds before he rolled free. "Sima? You okay?"

Collapsing her glider, she shivered. "It's like a cork in a wine-bottle. Dragons' Wings keeps punching little holes, so the pressure can bleed off. But if Fong rips the cork out..."

Teo shared her wince. "I don't think even Aang could stop it." And even if Zuko was wrong, and Asagitatsu wasn't strong enough to wreck half the world-

The people down there don't have a whole mountain between them and the blast. They'd be torn apart.

If Fong didn't beat the volcano to it.

And he's going to try. He's making his own people walk into deathtraps just to clear the way. If he's willing to do that just to get to firebenders...

Zuko was right. General Fong didn't want Dragons' Wings gone. He wanted them dead.

Zuko was right. Teo hunched against a chill breeze, memory a sour taste in his mouth. He'd brushed off the firebender's warnings, convinced they couldn't be in real danger if they just told Fong what he wanted to hear. If they just talked to him...

The Temple's lowland relatives had tried talking. The track of ruin scrawled over the earth showed how well that had worked.

"What can we do?" Sima was chafing her arms, chilled; Teo had to take a second look to be sure, because lately none of the gliders seemed to get cold, no matter how brisk the wind was. "It's not like fighting Qin, Teo. They're earthbenders."

"Earthbenders who think they've got the right to throw out anybody who isn't," Teo grumbled, "even when it's their land..." He stared into the distance, suddenly shaken.

"Teo?"

Teo had to swallow, twice. "We're not earthbenders."

"No, but..." She dashed to the parapet, looking in the direction of Fong's army, though you couldn't quite make it out from this angle. "You don't think...?"

"I don't know what to think," Teo admitted. "Except that Zuko was trying to warn us. And I didn't listen."

Sima glanced back at him, eyes wide behind her goggles. "So what do we do?"

"I'm not sure yet," Teo breathed. "But we'd better start thinking. Fast."

"Whoof. You look like the wrong end of a hurricane night."

Sitting down by the small fountain, Xiu pulled the warm green blanket a bit tighter around herself, trying to muster a glare for the grinning firebender tucked into a corner of Amaya's house of healing. It wasn't easy. He wasn't wearing armor, he was almost leaning into a brazier to get closer to the heat, his black hair was sticking out at all kinds of awkward angles, and that wicked grin had just the least rueful tilt to it. Like her father's, when something had gone spectacularly, but not fatally, wrong.

And he had a cast on one ankle. How could he be a properly scary monster of a firebender with blue-painted white plaster from foot to knee?

"Charming, as always, Rikiya," Corporal Shoni said dryly. "For all the time you spent in the capital, one would think even a man with your thick skull would know better than to compare a lady to a storm-drowned idiot."

"Hey! Ix-nay on the capital thing." Rikiya waved shushing hands; winced as his weight shifted. "I'm an honest man these days. Ask anybody."

"I do not have to ask." Shoni smirked. "They tell me. In great detail." He slid a glance Xiu's way. "Mistress Xiu. Lieutenant Sadao or one of the other healers should be here to check you shortly. If you find Private Rikiya bothersome, please, hit him over the head. I am certain he will enjoy the attention."

A red shadow of armor and knives, he swept out of the room.

"I'm not that bad," Rikiya muttered. "Am I that bad?"

Xiu drew in a breath to tell him exactly what she thought about the past few weeks of insanity. Of being sacrificed by an Earth general, and rescued by a crazy refugee from Ba Sing Se and firebenders, and abandoned by the refugee when her family showed up... which okay, husband and children, Xiu could mostly understand that - but Luli had left her with more firebenders, in the middle of a crazy town full of people in green, blue, brown, and crimson, and now she was with a firebender in a waterbender's house of healing, and when had the world gone crazy-

She sobbed.

"Oh. Not good. Um. I think Moriaki left some tea over there, I can warm it up... I'm not supposed to be walking on this..."

"Move, and I let Jia use you for earth-healing practice." The blue-clad healer bustled in with a basket full of herbs and fresh bread, rich with a scent of spicy oil that made Xiu's mouth water. "The scrolls say earth and bones are tightly linked. But maybe you'd like her to get a little more practice before she tackles your ankle?"

"Yes ma'am. Sitting still. Honest." Rikiya slid a pleading glance Xiu's way.

Help, Mom on patrol! Xiu translated that look. He's asking me for help? "What is this place?" she managed. "Who are you? I didn't see you with Chief Hakoda's fleet - and they wouldn't send one of their benders to help the Fire Nation..."

"They didn't." The matronly woman looked her up and down, checking for visible injuries. "I am Amaya, originally of the Northern Water Tribe and now of Dragons' Wings. Though I spent the past few decades in Ba Sing Se, up until a few months ago."

"Ba Sing Se?" Xiu repeated, flummoxed. "You mean Luli's not the only one here?" It sort of made sense. A little. Maybe.

"Almost everybody here is from Ba Sing Se," Rikiya filled her in. "Except for those of us from Suzuran, and some Yu Yan, and the folks the prince picked up in Gaipan - interesting people, just a little twitchy if you mention the word flood... and you want me to stop talking. I can do that."

"I doubt it," Amaya said wryly. "Though if you could slow down, it would be appreciated. You marines may eat rattle-vipers for breakfast, but she's had a rough day."

"For breakfast? Who've you been talking to? Sukekuni, right?" Rikiya wagged his brows at Xiu. "Poor newbie still hasn't gotten the hang of marine cooking. Never have them for breakfast. You spit-roast them, then dice them up with eggs and garlic on a strand of noodle. Much more classy."

Xiu blinked at him.

"They take some getting used to," Amaya advised, dipping her hands in water to run glowing fingers over Xiu's head and shoulders. "But Sergeant Kyo's squad are very good people. Even if a few of them are thick-headed."

"Hey! I resemble that remark."

...Oh, she hadn't even noticed now much her head was hurting until it stopped. Xiu cleared her throat. "What's going on? You said the prince, so Lee - I mean, Prince Zuko - really is here? With people from Ba Sing Se? Why?"

"Hmm. Luli was right, then," Amaya said thoughtfully. "No one in the Earth Army believed the Earth King signed a treaty with Prince Zuko?"

"Would we believe it if Fong fired stuff at us about the Fire Lord signing off with King Bumi?" Rikiya shrugged. "Though from what the boss says about Bumi, he's crazy enough to invite airbenders to move right into Omashu. Guess we're just lucky Earth King Kuei wants us between the Earth Kingdom and the Temple."

"Between?" Xiu got out. It felt like she had the edges of a tattered scroll, trying to unroll it and still keep the pieces together. "The treaty's really real? But why would the Earth King give up land to... um."

"Firebenders, Earth refugees, and other scattered misfits my apprentice has picked up along the way?" Amaya smiled. "According to King Kuei, historically earth and air can have problems trying to live together. He wants airbending back in the world, but he wants it to have a fresh start, without stirring up the old quarrels. Putting Fire and its allies as a buffer between his people and the gliders sounded like a good idea."

"Airbending?" Xiu's head felt healed, but now it was reeling again.

"Working out a treaty with Prince Zuko got several hundred problems out of Ba Sing Se, gave Kuei a precedent for future treaties if the Avatar succeeds - Earth loves precedents - and was supposed to give us all somewhere we could live without bothering anyone." Amaya's smile turned wry. "But I don't think Kuei ever predicted General Fong sticking his nose into the middle of everything."

Now that was an understatement. "Airbending?" Xiu repeated, numbly accepting the spiced roll Amaya handed her. She looked at Rikiya, who'd at least acted like he was making sense. "And... you're a firebender, and you're helping them? I'm sorry, this is just - so weird..."

"You should see how weird it is from this side of the fire," Rikiya said thoughtfully. "We're the boss' squad. We go where he goes. Which... probably makes more sense if you know about my boss. Sergeant Kyo. The rumor you need silver arrows to kill him? Completely false. It's never worked."

Amaya clapped a hand to her forehead in disbelief. "Private Rikiya..."

"Right, start from the beginning," the firebender nodded. "I first met the boss when - oh. Let me make something perfectly clear. The artworks? I won't lie. They were mine. Very classy. But I was totally innocent of the loaded dice..."

"Your tea is growing cold," Uncle Iroh observed.

"Tastes the same either way." Zuko sipped cooling leaf juice, comparing the note Teo's gliders had dropped with the array of Earth Army markers ranged on their map of the area. Some of Teo's observations matched what they already knew from scouts, spyglasses, and judicious use of the war-balloon the gliders had let them borrow in the scramble of Fong's arrival... and somehow neglected to take back. The others - huh. Hard to tell what was lack of experience, what would have been hidden by tree cover, and what was really something his scouts had missed... and Teo's, with years of experience gliding over the valleys, hadn't.

He can figure out where we're venting by checking out the air currents. Air that's been hanging out with clouds bends different from air that's taken a detour through stone. That's... interesting.

It wasn't just vents Teo had found, either. Professor Wen would want to know about the shreds of a ruin on the rim of the caldera; just a few crazily-piled boulders on the outside, but some of Teo's gliders had turned up bits of the same odd blue-and-silver glazed cups that rested in the White Lotus cache. And the fishy sea-salt draft through it meant it had to go much deeper than the shrink-swell clays cloaking the outer edge of the caldera wall. Deep enough to carve through mountain stone.

If this were another White Lotus site, who knew what might be in there. Even if it wasn't - the fact that there was anything left from before Asagitatsu had blown her top the last time hinted at even more bending techniques they might be able to recreate. Stone didn't stand up to volcanic blasts by accident.

Still. That was for after they didn't have Fong breathing down their neck. For now - Teo was a trained glider, not a trained scout. And even Fong wasn't dumb enough to miss gliders overhead, or the advantages eyes in the sky could give. He had to be taking countermeasures.

But at least Teo's figured out that Fong's not their friend, Zuko thought. That might keep the Temple alive. If he's not just trying to play one of us off against the other...

Zuko rubbed his forehead, trying to drive off reflexive paranoia. Teo was like Aang. He believed in people. Some of the elders in the Temple might have considered playing cow-chicken with two armies, but anything that underhanded probably hadn't even crossed Teo's mind. Probably.

Warmth moved next to him, as a former general swept his own gaze over their predicament. "Staring at the map will not change reality, nephew," Iroh said quietly.

"I know that. I just..." Zuko winced, looking at the figures that were their best estimate of Fong's forces, poised to spill over into the channel of hills that led to the most passable low point in the caldera wall; a steep, thin gap, like a chip out of a bowl. The Chip was where Fong would hit the first line of solid defenses; bent stone walls sheathed with mucky logs and laced with sharp steel from ruined tanks. Effective, strong... but with all too few defenders manning them. "There should have been more we could do."

"I have known units of the Fire Army who would have done less with the time and materials we had." Iroh rested a hand on his shoulder. "If the worst should happen... I have sent word to contacts in the North. They may yet come. Even should they not, Fong has no ships, and is unlikely to seize any soon. We will retreat to Suzuran, and let those of Earth among us teach us how to wait. We will win this, Zuko. So long as we do not lose heart."

So long as Asagitatsu's fires keep burning, and the drowned don't come back to throttle us all. Though Zuko kept that morbid thought to himself. Uncle saw spirits, but apparently that wasn't the same as getting drafted into sorting out their disputes with humans. The closer Fong got, the more the caldera felt... off. As if even the wind that fanned Asagitatsu's flames was fragile, unreal as the paper streamers actors used to play bending. "I should check on the sentries."

"To be sure the battle-line is where you left it this morning?" Iroh chuckled. "Nephew. Your people know their duties. They will not fail."

"Knowing your duty doesn't keep a boulder from landing on your head." One last scowl at the map, and Zuko tucked Teo's letter up his sleeve and headed outside. Nodded at the guards that fell in behind both of them; damn it, that was annoying, he'd looked after his own hide for years...

But the people Lieutenant Teruko trusted to be subtle and still keep his skin intact all had more important things to do right now, and nobody was willing to risk him wandering around alone. One of Fong's men just might get lucky.

I hate being important.

Even this high above the harbor, the afternoon sun was fierce. Their gardens were growing green with summer's long days; oogami-nuts needed more time to ripen, but if his people had read the soil right, root crops should give them their first harvests soon. Everybody had a place under a roof, everybody had clean water even if they'd had to re-channel a few springs to get it, they'd hammered out a basic set of laws people were willing to live under, there was even talk of a flag...

And now Fong's here. Damn it. We must have wounded at least one in ten of his men. Why won't he stop?

Fanatics. Zuko hated every last one of them.

There's got to be more I can do. There's got to be something I'm missing.

And it was going to be a long slog up to the Chip; damn it, should they rig up more pulleys to get supplies up there faster? Or was the risk not worth it, since it might give Fong's non-bending soldiers their own advantage if Fong managed to take the defenses? As it stood the Chip was half its own defense; rock, yes, but volcanic rock, not the sandstone and earth most Earth Army benders trained with. It didn't break the same, and according to Shirong it took a lot more effort to bend it if you had no ties to Fire. Which still wouldn't keep Fong's people from bringing chunks down on their heads-

A waft of fishy smoke wrinkled his nose, and Zuko held his breath a moment as they walked on. Fish made good glue. And he was glad for that, kind of, no matter the stink, because good ink needed glue and even with his people's loyalties, keeping stressed-out people from each other's throats took so much ink-

Wait a minute.

"Zuko?"

Unfolding Teo's letter, Zuko moved just out of the range of the smoke. Fishy breeze... salty... something about a smoke taste...

Licking a finger, he checked the breeze. I think - that way. "We need an earthbender." He met Uncle's gaze, grim. "I think I just found a crack in our wall."

Climbing up out of the slanted pile of boulders that must have once been a cellar wall, Iroh gazed down the slope leading to the Chip, relief mingled with satisfaction as he brushed stone dust from his beard. "I believe this is far more than a crack."

"Absolutely amazing," Tingzhe Wen murmured, studying the sketch he'd made of the contorted tunnels leading through volcano-twisted stone. His socks squished against his sandals; apparently cracks in the tunnels let rain seep in through the earth and stone above, and some of the passages had been knee-deep in water. "How did they build it? When did they build it? Did they know they were on top of a time bomb?"

"Don't believe this," Zuko was muttering; black hair gray with daubs of clay slip, wafting away into dust as he paced. "How will we ever seal this up in time... even if we seal it up, Fong's scouts are looking for disturbed earth, they'll find it..."

"Sealing this gift would be premature," Iroh declared.

"Gift?" Zuko sputtered.

"A magnificent gift," Iroh declared, pointing below, toward the shadows along the slope curving away from them, where the Chip opened. "From here, we should have a most excellent view of Fong's army, as it attacks the first wall."

"A view of-" Zuko's good eye narrowed, as he eyed the slope below; obviously gauging distance, elevation, and how hard it would be for even an earthbender to make his way up fragile clay slopes. "...Huh. That might work."

"The timing will be crucial," Iroh noted. "Too soon, and not enough of Fong's forces will be within our trap." He smiled, stroking his beard. "But if we are wise, and hold our hands until the time is right... I have told you before, nephew. The spirits look after those who keep faith with them."

Zuko shot him an aggravated look... that turned to disbelief, and a heartfelt groan, and his face buried in his hands.

"Nephew?" Iroh frowned.

Mute, Zuko lifted a hand to point up and past him.

Puzzled, Iroh turned. What in the worlds-

A white-and-brown shadow, skimming through the sky toward the Northern Air Temple. A very familiar shadow.

"Oh dear," Tingzhe murmured. "Surely, that isn't-?"

"Tell me something else it could be. Anything else." Zuko still had one hand over his face, as if to blot out painful reality. "Uncle. You asked the spirits for help again. Didn't you."

Iroh grinned, amused despite himself at what Aang would soon find. "Ah. Well-

"Stop doing that!"

Chapter End Notes

First, a confession: I had to do a lot more research to get this chapter done than I anticipated, and it took a lot more time and yanking of hair than I ever imagined to write it, because when I set out to write this arc of the story it never occurred to me that I was setting up a siege for the characters.

...Go ahead and laugh. It is funny.

Some interesting books for further background include:

Fire & Stone by Christopher Duffy, on siege warfare.

The Mongol Invasions of Japan, 1274 and 1281, by Stephen Turnbull.

The Mongol Art of War, by Timothy May.

The Culture of Civil War in Kyoto, by Mary Elizabeth Berry.

1493 by Charles C. Mann; the whole "silver and silk" trade has some stark observations on what people are willing to do to each other when they feel threatened by other groups - physically or monetarily.

I've probably also borrowed a few ideas from Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade.
Heh.

Yes, the Avatar's exempt from consequences from breaking with his element. Gyate has no way to know that, though; she's not part of the White Lotus.

About Shih expounding on Zuko at the Western Temple... check canon. Zuko was there. That is where he made his decision to find the Avatar. Anyone in earshot, much less a spirit, would have overheard it. It's a pretty short jump from there to deciding, hey, if I want to get an idea across to the Avatar, I know he's met this guy...

When it comes to taking this long to get things through Aang's head... he's a twelve year old boy who was raised in a very safe and fairly loving environment. People who are raised like that tend to freeze when confronted with evil, or with difficult choices. And they tend to deny a horrible reality as long as possible. That's just human nature. Zuko was raised in a much more vicious environment, where actions had painful and often deadly consequences. And he's older. So after much painful falling on his face, he's learned to take reality as it comes, no matter how much he doesn't want to. That is also human nature.

People with different life experiences, temperaments, and information make different decisions. That is life. And the guy who was raised in peace, tossed into the middle of a war, is not going to have a very easy time figuring out what's going on or what he should do without a lot of mistakes.

On top of that, nobody listens well when they're being told off. It's psychological self-defense. Just like Katara is never going to listen to a 'Not So Different' speech from the person she sees as the villain!

Chapter 71

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Toph held out her hands to feel the fading sunlight, toes scrunching up at the courtyard's chill stone. At least all the rock meant she could feel where the courtyard was. And wasn't. The rest of the world was one big black hole of empty air, nudging and shoving at every little crack in the mountain. And there were lots of cracks.

How can air that's so thin push so hard?

She'd flown on Appa lots of times, but they'd never gone this high. Breathing didn't feel right. She breathed in and breathed out, but there just didn't seem to be enough air. It made her head hurt.

On top of all that, they were up here, surrounded by gliders and pushy wind, instead of down on a nice big lump of rock with Zuko. Even relying on what everybody else was telling her rather than her own two feet, it was obvious Sparky was in trouble up to his eyebrows. Again.

"At least they didn't land to help the other guys," Toph muttered, straining her ears to figure out where Boots might have gotten to this time. Haru and even the Duke had been all for landing on the Earth Army side, getting Aang to flatten whoever they wanted flattened, and sorting out who was right later. After all, Earth had to be the good guys, right?

Toph had to smirk, remembering the yelling that had followed that little remark. The bad words tossed around as Katara and Sokka practically fell over each other to say General Fong was not one of the good guys had almost scared Momo straight off of Appa.

Aang not saying much either way, though - that wasn't funny. She could feel a little vibration through the wood of Appa's saddle when Aang sat with them, but it wasn't anything like what she read through earth. All she knew for sure was that Aang did not want to talk about Fong, or what Fong wanted with the Avatar State, or what he'd done to Katara to try and get it. He wasn't stopping Sokka and Katara from bad-mouthing the guy up one side and down the other, but he wasn't agreeing with them either.

Which meant... well, she wasn't sure what it meant, but Toph had a bad feeling it might mean he thought Fong had had a point.

You don't know that, Toph reminded herself, trying to root herself in the mountain when the whole temple felt frayed by wind and gas. All you know, is that he said he went spirit-walking to talk to Avatar Yangchen. To ask her what her Air Nomads used to be like.

And man, if she could only have been a spider-fly to listen in on that conversation. What had Air Nomads really been like, a thousand years ago? Like Gyatso? Like Ty Lee? Like somebody else entirely?

Given that Aang wasn't talking about it, she was guessing... not like Gyatso.

"I need to find a firebending teacher."

That was one of the few things Aang had admitted Yangchen had said. It hadn't made Katara happy. But given how the eclipse had panned out - yeah. They were kind of low on options.

So when Sokka had asked Toph if she had any idea where Iroh might be... okay, sure. She did.

So why aren't we down there with him? We're not going to find any firebenders up here!

Teo had been pretty clear on that; after the Temple had told Zuko thanks, but this wasn't their fight, none of the firebenders had come back up the mountain. They were kind of busy.

Funny thing was, up until a few days ago, one of Zuko's waterbenders - and ooo, the way Katara had sputtered when that came up - had still been visiting. To teach the gliders airbending.

Katara had made a funny gurk sound when Teo said that. Sokka had dropped his boomerang; lucky for him, missing everyone's toes. And Aang...

Aang had been very quiet.

Normally, Sokka and Katara wouldn't have missed that. But Haru and the Duke had made enough stammering, surprised noises to keep Teo and everyone else distracted. Who could blame them? After a hundred years, airbending was loose in the world again. Aang wasn't alone anymore. And of course it was a waterbender who'd helped Teo's people out, Katara was telling everyone in earshot how much water and air had in common...

Pacing near the edge of the wall, Toph stuck her tongue out at the abyss of air, toes tugging at courtyard stone when the wind gusted again. If water and air have that much in common, how come Langxue's down there fighting instead of up here thinking about it?

Aang didn't seem surprised that Langxue wasn't here. But he wasn't talking. He wasn't talking about much of anything since Yangchen had paid him a visit. And that was just not right. Which was why she was out here getting chilly instead of inside tossing rocks around. Not that she thought tossing rocks around was a good idea up here, that natural gas Sokka had told her about was the kind of thing that made all the hairs on the back of your neck go eep, but... she really, really needed to think. Because something was wrong. And it moved like a too-quiet airbender.

Like it or hate it, Aang was supposed to be a skinny, bouncy ball of optimism talking a mile a minute about the way things were going to go right. Yet ever since Azula had thumped him-

"Uh-uh," Toph muttered to herself, slowing down as she thought it over. "He was still pretty upbeat even after that. Wasn't 'til we got to the Western Temple that he got all... broody."

So, after the invasion. But before Yangchen. Maybe.

Toph crossed her arms, and stomped her feet to warm up. "But here he is with more airbenders, and he's still broody. Doesn't make sense. The Mechanist got away, so it's not like Aang feels all guilty about Teo's Dad..."

Except maybe he did. Kind of. The airbenders Aang knew didn't have Dads. Teo did. That had to be confusing. No wonder Aang had been too stunned to react when Teo and Sima and the others had talked about Langxue airbending-

Wait a minute.

"You mean, showing you the moves," Katara had said, in the middle of that first rush of excited glider-babble.

"Yeah, I guess." Teo had scratched the back of his head; Toph could feel the vibration shiver down to his chair wheels. "He's working off the scrolls like the rest of us. But he knows how scrolls break down water forms, and that helps."

It was hard to read Teo's feelings, trembling to her from wheels on stone instead of feet. But the other gliders were easy to read, even if they were almost as light on their feet as Hitomi. They shifted the same way she did, when she was telling the truth...

Just, not all of it.

And Aang had - huh. She'd thought he hadn't reacted, because Twinkletoes had a pretty easy to read surprised flinch that often ended up with him flying into the air with a yelp. And he hadn't.

"He just kind of... leaned, back and forward," Toph muttered to herself, matching the movement in her own stance. It felt weird; like taking a blow you couldn't block-

Toph sucked in a breath, and scowled at how thin it was. "That's it. He got hit with something he didn't like, but he knew it was coming."

But what? The fact that Teo and a few others were airbenders? The hint that Langxue might bend water and air?

"Nah," Toph decided. Shidan had said something about Zuko being a yāorén, whatever that meant, which meant there might be more, but... "Tao told Aang nobody could do it. And he believed the guy. I felt Sparky do it, and I still have trouble believing it-"

Thumping leather slammed into her shins, driving her back.

Boots? What the-

Her hand slapped cobblestones as one foot slipped, and Toph blanched. Oh man, the edge was right there-!

"Back up," Toph muttered to herself, Boots a not-quite-solid pair of pressures holding her away from the edge as she felt her way back to solid mountain stone. "Back up, stay on the rocks, back up..."

"There you are!"

Changchang stomped across the courtyard, breathing just a little fast. "I asked your friends where you were," the matronly aunt said briskly. "They said you'd be fine, but I've had a few near-misses when I've been distracted. Ji's done his best to remodel, but this place just wasn't built for people who can't fly... are you all right?"

"I'm fī-"

Which would have sounded better if the wind hadn't tickled her dry throat, half-choking her with a cough.

"Fine," Toph insisted, dusting off her hands as she got to her feet. "No wonder Twinkletoes can't think about anything for three minutes straight, can't think when you can't breathe... I can look after myself..."

Changchang rocked back on her heels, obviously not convinced. "You're having trouble with the air? How often have you been up this high?"

"Try never?" Toph grumped. "I don't like it up here! Even the earth doesn't feel right- what?"

"Come with me, young lady," Changchang directed, holding out a hand. "I need to give your young friend a piece of my mind. There's a reason we still have relatives in the lowlands."

"We call it mountain sickness," Changchang said, matter-of-fact as Gran-Gran diagnosing frostbite.

"But you can fix it, right?" Aang was almost bouncing in place in Changchang's sickroom doorway, which Katara knew wasn't good... but on the other hand, he was actually moving. And worried about somebody here and now, instead of how badly the invasion had gone wrong. It was kind of a relief.

Hands gloved in healing water, she ignored Sokka leaning against the wall, the creak of wheels on the floor, and the rustle as Haru turned pages, and tried to push at the sense of not right in Toph's lungs and blood. "It's like shoring up a sand castle," Katara admitted, frustrated. "I can make it better for a while, but I can't stop it." She shook her head. I'm supposed to be a healer. If I just had more training!

"All that really helps is getting back down to the lowlands." Teo rocked his wheels back and forth, obviously upset. "I'm sorry, Toph. I should have remembered... you're a really strong earthbender. But you came here with Aang, and we all know he flies."

"So earthbenders can't stay up here?" Leafing through Changchang's extensive herb-healing notes, Haru glanced up, alarmed.

"Earthbending has nothing to do with it," Changchang said firmly. "True, most of our earthbenders didn't stay in the Temple. But mountain sickness isn't that choosy. Earthbender, glider, not a bender at all - I've seen all of them struck down." She drew a breath, and scowled. "Most people who got ill from thin air didn't stay up here; even a little bit of dizziness is a risk at these heights. If Toph is this dizzy, this fast... you need to take her down. Before she gets any worse."

"Hello, sitting right here," Toph grumped, huddled in an extra blanket on a bench. "What do you mean, worse?"

Changchang winced. "Young lady..."

"Give it to her right between the eyes," Sokka cut in. "Trust me. She likes it better that way."

Toph pumped a fist. "You better believe it."

Changchang and Teo exchanged a look. Teo grimaced. "If Auntie thinks it's bad - you need to get down. Or in a few days," he hesitated. "It'd be bad."

"Down or things get nasty. Got it."

"I'm sorry," Aang started, looking sicker than Toph did. "You didn't have any problems at the Western Temple-"

"There might be a good reason for that." Teo was a little pink. "Didn't the scrolls say something about... um, women's stuff..."

"The nuns' temples were built lower, for the safety of women with child," Changchang said bluntly. "We found that out the hard way up here. If the air's too thin, both mother and child suffer."

Katara let water run off her hands into a bowl. "Even airbenders?" That was scary.

"Yangchen... said not everybody was born an airbender," Aang admitted.

Her jaw dropped; Katara tried to glance away before Aang noticed. Sure, she and Sokka had tossed around the idea that not everybody in the Air Nomads might have been a bender. In any bunch of people, somebody had to be a little less spiritual. But she'd never thought Aang would believe it. "She said that?" Katara managed. "What else did she say?"

Aang swallowed, and looked at the floor. "That I couldn't stop the war if I didn't understand why people were fighting."

"Good luck with that." Teo leaned back in his chair, shaking his head. "We know why General Fong's going after Dragons' Wings. What we don't know is how to get him to stop. If he won't believe the Earth King's own seal... well, who else can order him to go home?"

Sokka frowned, like he was trying to figure out one of his own drawings a month later. "How'd Kuei's seal get into the middle of this?"

"Oh, man." Teo sighed, glancing up at the ceiling. "Is that a long story."

Toph grimaced, and rubbed her head.

"I'll try to keep it short," Teo added hastily. "First thing you need to know is, don't earthbend. Not without asking first. Asagitatsu is a barrel of blasting jelly waiting to go off, and Zuko's people can only poke holes so fast."

"Asagitatsu?" Sokka muttered, so low Katara almost didn't hear him. "Oh, man. Go figure. How does Prince Cranky find these things?"

"Second, don't go in the water," Teo went on. "The fires are keeping the drowned down, and General Iroh's been running memorial services for the ghosts, but..." He swallowed. "Zuko warned us, if the fires go out, don't go down there. There's just too many drowned."

Drowned. Katara felt like she'd been buried in ice. But even if a whole ship went down, there couldn't be enough sailors mad at the Ocean to make that many drowned-

Oh. Oh, spirits.

"Drowned?" Aang frowned. "You sound like that's a thing. Not something bad that happened to somebody."

Changchang heaved a sigh. "They were something bad that happened, Avatar Aang. The problem is, their spirits don't accept that and rest. Which means when they find other living humans-

"Don't," Katara blurted out. "We'll tell him. On the way down." I don't want to. But if we have to tell him... not here. Not where there are finally airbenders to be Aang's family.

"Katara?"

She shook her head, determined. "Later."

"It's not good," Sokka put in. "But if they've got memorial flames burning... yeah. That should work. Eventually."

Toph tilted her head Sokka's way. "And how good does it work if Fong stomps them?"

"That'd be the tricky part," Sokka admitted. "Aang-"

Aang nodded, determined. "We need to stop the fighting."

"Yeah," Sokka agreed. "In the long run. In the short run-"

"I have to do this!" Aang insisted. "I'm the Avatar. If I can't stop the war here, where the Fire Nation doesn't want to fight, how can I stop it anywhere?"

Sokka shrugged. "You kind of have a point, but-"

"Kind of?"

"Aang." Sokka took a deep breath. "Nobody can eat a shipload of sea prunes in one meal. Yeah, we want to stop the fighting. But first? Why don't we see if there's a way we can keep both sides from going after each other long enough to cool down." He stepped forward, resting a friendly hand on Aang's shoulder. "You're a good guy, and if anybody can tell them not to fight, you can do it. But first, they have to be able to listen."

"I was raised to believe that all Air Nomads were peaceful. By the will of Subodei, the Air Nomad horde-leader who wished to plunder the world, and by the will of Xiangchen, the fanatic who wished to use war to destroy war.

"Yes, young kinsman. He was as insane as you think. But unlike Ozai's rage, which turns outward to ravage the world, Xiangchen's rage turned inward, toward his own people. He would never be a horde-leader, and he knew it. And you cannot imagine that fury; that envy, Aang. Hate, anger, rage; all of those injure a soul. But envy destroys it.

"Xiangchen hated the horde-leaders, and he envied them. So he sought to create a world in which horde-leaders would be utterly destroyed.

"In a way, he succeeded.

"But he would have done so much worse, if the yāorén had not found me..."

Aang breathed in salty wind as Appa took them down, trying not to think about that look of sadness on Yangchen's face. She'd had friends. Good friends.

Friends, who had dragged her out of her peaceful mountain hideaway, told her she was the Avatar, and forced her to face a war.

Friends who had died in that war, killed by the same volcano they were flying into now.

It doesn't look dangerous from up here.

If he hadn't flown over the Fire Nation caldera, he wouldn't even be able to guess this was a volcano. It looked like a long half-oval of a harbor, opening northwest to the sea, with an island almost in the middle of it, hot air rising from the east side of the cone in a steady, almost invisible shimmer.

The first clue it wasn't just a harbor, Aang thought, was what wasn't there. No houses on the island. None. Not even any boats.

The second... was the fires. Fires everywhere.

"Kind of like the fire fountains back in the islands." Sokka was half-out of the saddle, clinging to Appa's neck to get into easy speaking range. "So that's what you can do with natural gas and some time on your hands. Huh." He glanced east, over Appa's shoulder, and his voice soured. "And that's what happens when you take a bunch of angry earthbenders over enemy territory. Great."

Aang glanced that way, trying not to wince. You could see the brown and gray ruin where Fong's army had passed, leading over the lower spots on the wrinkle of mountains. Like he'd taken a massive rake and ripped the ground to shreds, wherever his army had walked.

Given the Fire Nation traps Teo had told them about... Aang wasn't sure he could blame them.

"Looks like he's still a few miles from the Chip," Sokka observed. "Good. If he's got any sense, he's going to stop right there. No way is he going to want to troops to walk into traps in the dark." Sokka frowned. "Then again, this is Fong."

"That's not fair," Aang got out, aching inside. "He's trying to save the Earth Kingdom."

"Right," Sokka said wryly. "Destroying it so he can save it. Makes perfect sense."

"Guru Pathik says we're all one." Aang rubbed reins between his fingers, glad to hang onto something familiar. "How is what Fong's doing any different from what we did?"

"What? You seriously think that - argh." Sokka rubbed his knuckles against his forehead.

"Someday, I've got to talk to this guy... Aang. Did you hear what Teo said about the people Fong's using to spring traps? We didn't do that to anybody. Everybody who came on the invasion wanted to be there."

"So how do we know they didn't?" Aang said defensively. Because if Fong was doing that to people who didn't want to help... that was just too awful. And they could always run away, right?

"You can be... really scared, and still do what you said you would do. Teo's never talked to those people. How do we know they're not doing what they promised they'd do?" Aang looked back out over the caldera, taking in the shaped stone, sunset glinting off streams, and dark green patches of gardens. "How do we know Zuko didn't start the fight? Remember the Zhangs and the Gan Jins?"

"Kind of hard to forget guys who scream like little girls just because they're up against great big spider-nasty canyon crawlers," Sokka said wryly.

"Yeah." Aang grinned a little. "But those tribes - they'd been fighting so long they didn't even know why any more. They just thought they did. The Fire Nation's been attacking the Earth Kingdom since before Azulon was born, and who knows how long General Fong's been fighting them, and-" He spread his hands, shrugging in the wind. "We know Zuko. Even if he's trying to be nice - and okay, maybe he was - he's scary."

"Point," Sokka admitted. "Guy definitely takes after his granddad." The Water Tribe warrior blinked. "And... when I think about his other granddad, maybe that's not so bad."

Huh? That didn't make any sense, Zuko's other granddad would at least be human-Except... Zuko's other granddad was Azulon.

Um. Maybe Sokka had a point.

"You heard what Teo told us," Aang went on, trying not to think about that too hard. How could other people live with parents being so important, when they meant you had to admit you were connected to people whose teachings were so wrong? "Zuko ran into Fong's people before Teo had a chance to really watch them. Maybe Teo thinks he didn't start it, but Teo doesn't know when people are lying to him. The Mechanist lied to him for years!"

"And how'd he pull that off?" Sokka sounded curious. "Teo's an airbender. Don't you all know when people lie?"

"Well, I do," Aang grumbled. "Just like Toph does, and Master Gyatso, and all the Elders-"

"You mean it's more of a master bender thing."

"...I guess." Aang scowled at the earth-bowl below, taking in the ring of marsh-patches spreading around the outside rim of the caldera wall. Maybe some of that was natural, but he'd seen newly flooded lands before. Zuko's people might not be hurting the earth as much as Fong was, but they were changing things. Who gave them the right? "That's why we've got to talk to them first. I need to hear what Zuko thinks he's doing."

"Aang?" Sokka gave him a level look, only slightly thrown off by blinking away a passing dragonfly. "Don't take this the wrong way, buddy. But right now, you're lying. To yourself."

Aang rocked back against fur. "I don't-"

"If you really thought both sides were just as wrong, we'd be heading to talk to the Earth Army, first."

"They are wrong," Aang shot back. "If Zuko's really not working for the Fire Lord anymore, there shouldn't be a fight."

"You didn't want to fight Fong," Sokka pointed out.

"And I didn't," Aang insisted. "When he sank Katara into the ground..." He swallowed, hard. "That wasn't me anymore. You know that!"

"Yeah, I know," Sokka sighed. "Avatar Spirit. Not you."

Aang blinked away dust, relieved. "Right-"

"Thing is," Sokka cut across his words, "Zuko doesn't have an Avatar Spirit to save his butt. Or his friends' butts." Blue eyes were hard, and a little scary. "We need to think about that when we look at what he's doing. And why."

"So why does he get into messes where he needs an Avatar?" Aang grumbled.

"We don't know he started this fight-"

"I know that, Sokka. Just listen," Aang insisted. "We don't know if Zuko started a fight with General Fong. But he brought Fire Nation people up here, on Earth Kingdom land, and he put them right under an Air Temple. He's the Fire Lord's son. He knows about war, right? He had to know he was going to start a fight with somebody. So why did he do it?"

"...Let's ask him."

Right. Like it was going to be that easy.

They landed near the docks. And that made Aang tense up all over again, because one of those docks looked like it came straight from Ba Sing Se, and another looked like the ones near Shu Jing, and the one in the middle didn't look like either of them. Any one of them would have been okay. All three of them together was just wrong.

The familiar battered Fire Navy ship hanging out in deeper water was just the frosting on the air-whipped cake.

They touched down, and Toph was off onto solid ground before he could jump from Appa's head. "Whoa!" She scrunched her toes in the odd, dark dirt. "Teo's right, guys. We don't want to grab hunks of this unless we have to. It kind of... fizzes. Like dropping water in Katara's cook-pot."

"You want to do the cooking next time?" Katara teased, getting down with a pat to Appa's side. "That's weird. Where is everybody?"

"Usually, Appa gets a crowd," Sokka filled Haru in. The Duke had decided to stay up with the gliders, which the little tree-dweller declared as awesome. "People go ooo and ah and are you really the Avatar-"

"In case you missed the flyers, Sokka, everybody here knows that already."

"Huojin?" Aang blinked at the unhappy Ba Sing Se guardsman, peering past him to catch glimpses of other people hanging back around corners and behind buildings. "What are you doing here? And why is everybody acting scared?"

Huojin's brows went up. "You have to ask? First of all, there was no chance on earth I was going to raise my daughters in grabbing distance of Azula. Second of all - how the hell did you miss the army coming to kill us?"

"I don't care what General Fong wants to do. He's not going to kill anybody," Aang said firmly. "And you're not answering me. Why are people acting like they're scared of us? Fong's not our friend-"

"Neither was Azula," Huojin said dryly.

Aang gaped, open-mouthed. That was - there were no words to describe how wrong that was, Sokka hadn't meant to let Azula in-

Huojin wasn't even looking at him, head craned back to look at the mountains that hid the Northern Temple from view. "The Mechanist's people warned you not to earthbend down here, right? Asagitatsu's touchy..." Something caught his eye, and the guard straightened, relieved. "And here comes the general. Good."

Aang had to take a second look. That was Iroh heading their way, with Amaya and a few others in green and red behind him. But the old firebender had lost a lot of weight. "What's going on here?"

About to speak, Iroh paused, and stroked his beard instead. "A valid question, Avatar Aang. But first... you and your friends may wish to return to the Air Temple, quickly. General Fong will soon be knocking at our door, and he does not intend a friendly visit."

"How do you know that?" Aang insisted.

"Um. Army?" Toph grumbled. "Kind of hard to miss. You heard what Teo said about the people Fong's throwing into traps."

"But we don't know he's throwing them in." Aang didn't look away from Iroh. "They could have promised to do that-"

"You may ask the survivors for yourself," Iroh said dryly. "I assure you, they made no promises to be Fong's boulder fodder."

"Easy for you to say," Katara shot back. "You're the one setting the traps!"

"Katara, just - wait, okay?" Aang kept staring at Iroh. "If they didn't want to be there, why didn't they just run away?"

Amaya gave him a look up and down, and raised a brow. "What makes you think they didn't try?"

"They were still there?"

The healer shook her head. "...You've never tried to run from an earthbender, have you?"

"That some of them are with us, should tell you they did run," Iroh stated. "We have left Fong word of who we are and why we are here, and we have given him copies of our treaty with Earth King Kuei. He has had many chances to withdraw bloodlessly, and we have told him if he retreats, we will not pursue him. But if he breaches our walls, we will destroy him. We have no choice."

Aang felt his face flush red. "There's always a choice."

"If we leave Asagitatsu, she will erupt." Iroh's voice was iron. "If she does, it will destroy countless lives. More, perhaps, than the Fire Nation has ever slain in all these years of war. The Face-Stealer wishes this to happen, to slay entire peoples, and we cannot allow it. We must stand against evil. We must try to mend what the war has marred. That is why Dragons' Wings is here. That is why we will stand against General Fong, no matter the cost." He drew a deep breath. "We have asked him to leave, Aang. What would you do?"

Aang was not going to roll his eyes. "You could try talking?"

"Yeah," Sokka said wryly. "Because that worked so well for us."

"It is a valid idea, Sokka. Unfortunately, it has not worked." Iroh sighed. "General Fong has ignored every request for parley we have made. When we have been able to observe his army, he has quite publically ripped the messages to shreds." Iroh raised a bushy brow. "Do you have any other suggestions?"

"If messages don't work, why not send a person?" Aang argued. "People are a lot harder to ignore."

"And yet I know someone who manages," Sokka muttered.

Iroh was giving Aang a look that reminded him oddly of when Gyatso had caught him up an apple tree when he was supposed to be cleaning between Appa's toes. "Young man. The rules of parley were created for a reason. What one does to the message, is a mark of what one intends to do to the messenger. We know Fong's reputation well enough that Zuko will not risk any of our people in his hands. I know those who have sent messengers to Fong. When you have found the body of a man buried while still alive..." He cut himself off, looking away. "And those were the ones we found and gave honorable fires to. Shall I tell you of the others?"

"Iroh." Amaya rested a comforting hand on his shoulder. "It's in the past. Leave it there. We won't let it happen again." She cast a glance at Aang. "And I think he gets the point."

"If he doesn't, I can tell him," Huojin spoke up. "I've gone drinking with a lot of veterans off the Wall, and some of them used to fight in the armies outside Ba Sing Se. The stories they told about Fong... If I even started most of them, Luli would kick me out of bed for a week for giving the girls nightmares. And I'd deserve it."

Aang tried not to swallow too obviously. Sokka did have nightmares about what had happened to Katara. But... Fong had only been doing that because he wanted the war stopped. No matter what it took. Right? "But if you know Fong - you knew he'd protect the Earth Kingdom. I wouldn't have come up here in the first place!"

"But we are here," Iroh said firmly, "and here we must remain. As we have told Teo and his kin, Asagitatsu is a water volcano. She must have a firebending line to calm her."

"But you can't be here," Aang insisted. "This is the Earth Kingdom-"

"By the word of the Earth King, it is not," Iroh declared. "And in the past, it was not. This land belonged first to the dragon clan of Ryuuko-hime, who dwelled here, and only after that did part of it fall under the use of the Air Nomads. Asagitatsu herself has bid us try to calm her, to hold off disaster." Iroh gave him a level look. "I have always tried to respect the spirits."

"But if you stay here, Fong's going to keep attacking you," Aang pointed out. "You don't have to stay. I'll talk to Asagitatsu-"

"As much as I appreciate the offer, Asagitatsu is not angry, nor confused, nor truly desirous of harming humans," Iroh cut him off. "Asagitatsu is a volcano. She must erupt. She has already been waiting a century too long." He grinned at Aang "How long can you hold back a sneeze?"

Um. Well. "But Roku fought volcanoes to keep them from erupting!" Aang protested. "I saw it!"

"You saw Roku fight other volcanoes?" Katara gave him a worried look, fingers gripping her waterskin. "You only told us about the one on Roku's island."

"Well, yeah, that's the only one I saw," Aang admitted. "But he was showing me the important stuff in his life. If that's what he did, then that's what an Avatar's supposed to do, right?"

For a long moment, Iroh was silent. Took a deep breath, and heaved a weary sigh. "Avatar Aang. If you ever intend to learn firebending, you should know this. Fire is the life of the world, and every volcano is a beating heart. Would you stop Asagitatsu's heart?"

Aang froze. That was - was he saying that stopping the volcano would kill a spirit? But - Roku had-
Roku didn't stop the volcano, Aang reluctantly recalled. He just... slowed it down a little.

So what should he do?

Toph cleared her throat. "You're stalling, Uncle." She cracked her knuckles. "Where's Sparky?"

Sunset. Zuko could feel the flames burning lower inside; a chill echoed by the damp breeze seeping up from the rock passage below. Firebenders could fight at night, just as waterbenders could by day, but none of them wanted to. Which the man heading this way was undoubtedly counting on.

"I used to do most of my work at night," Shirong mused, looking up at the war balloon tethered to give the Chip a good lookout, then out into the deepening shadows in the rocky pass below them. "I'm not looking forward to this."

For more reasons than one, Zuko knew. "You're a yāorén. You're responsible to the spirits, not just me. You don't have to do this-"

"Prince Zuko," Agent Shirong said formally. "You have signed a treaty with Earth King Kuei. That is binding. As a Dai Li, part of my duty is to uphold the law, to foster virtuous acts and maintain peaceful and honorable alliances with the spirits. By attacking Dragons' Wings, General Fong is acting against the expressed will of the Earth King. Even as a yāorén - especially as a yāorén - it is my duty to stop him."

Zuko inclined his head, accepting the rebuke. "Sometimes, duty hurts." He glanced toward Saoluan and Langxue. "If you're going to fight, stay up here."

The waterbender bristled, white lock of hair almost red in the gloom. "I'm old enough-"

"I was fighting pirates at your age. I know." Zuko held his gaze. "When it comes to blades, you're better than half the reserves backing the Chip. But you'll do the most good up here. Where you can move the fire ice where we need it." He paused, deliberately. "And where you'll have the wind. If everything goes wrong, we might all need that."

"...I guess," Langxue admitted, not quite nestling into Saoluan's comforting hand on his shoulder. Smirked a little, and glanced past Zuko, to Lieutenant Teruko. "At least I'm not the only one with a babysitter."

Saoluan whistled, not at all innocent.

Zuko tried not to redden. "Lieutenant. I told you-"

"Yes, sir, you did." Teruko didn't budge. "Lieutenant Sadao and Sergeant Kyo have things well in hand, sir. Even so, I would like to be with them. But you take after both your grandfathers. I gather you didn't get too many stories about Shidan growing up, but I know you've read the military histories of Fire Lord Azulon. You said you'd stay off the battlefield, and I know you meant it. None of which changes the fact that when your people are dying, your first reaction is going to be kill the bastards. And you'll do your damndest to carry it out. Personally."

She was probably right. Damn it.

"We don't even know if Fong's coming," Shirong pointed out. "The bison's not hard to miss; he has to know Avatar Aang is in our territory. And not attacking us. He may think twice-"

Fire flared overhead; three controlled, small bursts from the war balloon.

Enemy in sight.

Zuko took a deep breath, and blew out steam. I hate being right. "...Here we go."

Chapter End Notes

Altitude sickness can be nasty. Ascending the way the Gaang does in canon at the Southern and Northern Air Temples - straight up thousands of feet with no time to stop and rest on the way - is just asking for it. I'll leave out the grisly biological details, but this one dovetails kind of neatly into the Avatar world in canon. Long story short, human pregnancy runs right up against the edge of the body's metabolic limits. If a pregnant woman can't get enough oxygen to breathe, she can't burn enough calories to support the baby's growth and health. This can lead to low birth weight, premature birth, and a bunch of other related unpleasantness.

Which is why it's very, very interesting that the Western and Eastern Temples are at significantly lower altitudes. Sure, they're above sea level. But it's more along the lines of a few hundred, or at most a few thousand feet above sea level; well below what's medically referred to as high altitude (about 4,900 to 11,500 feet). Given the Air Nomads in canon don't spend all of their lives above the treeline, but instead bounce up and down a lot, this is exactly what you'd want for safe pregnancy and delivery. That's kind of cool.

What's also interesting is that in a way, altitude sickness is like the Wendigo. There are physiological limits to human adaptation, and people who break them pay the price. Sometimes fatally.

Chapter 72

Chapter Notes

Warning, this one took a while to write because I was trying to show how brutal war is, without being too graphic. So what's in this chapter - well, it's not pretty. Some of my inspiration came from reading about the Attack on Mers-el-Kébir (British on French fleet) in World War II. Check it out on Wikipedia. Whoof.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Zuko clenched his fingers to stop fire ice that wanted to melt, holding it solid. Nights weren't ever really hot in the mountains, but the winds had turned off the sea, bringing in an overcast that hugged some of the day's heat close. And - it was summer. Fire's season.

Here they come.

Fong's first sally at the wall was more a testing probe than an attack; hapless conscripts prodded forward to unravel a riddle or die.

No riddle this time.

Just death, scything out through darkening air. Bodies fell.

Zuko rubbed sweating palms on a bit of rag. He was in armor again, even if it was mostly bits and pieces borrowed from other marines. Lt. Teruko had insisted.

Not expendable.

He was really beginning to hate those words.

Movement below again. More of Fong's scouts, picking their way through areas where the dead should have already sprung the traps.

Well, yes. And - no.

There weren't any more traps down there. As Fong's scouts realized, when they got almost to the base of the wall, and reached to bend rock away from logs to clear the way-

Red-fledged arrows flew. There were screams.

But Fong had known the Yu Yan would be after his benders. Survivors fell back, some of them raising a mound of earth as a ramp. Troops surged up to crest the wall, aiming to take what had to be just another flimsy barricade-

Except it wasn't.

Behind muck, logs, and steel was another wall, broad and strong enough to stand on. Broad enough to use a spear.

You missed the trap, Fong.

This time, we fight.

If I live through this, Dad's going to kill me, Min thought, gripping the wall a little harder. Lifting one hand to shake it, just a little, as his sweaty palms mixed some of the rock to slippery mud.

He wasn't on the wall. His dad would have killed him for that, for sure. Tingzhe Wen had already lost a brother and too many cousins to count on Ba Sing Se's Outer Wall. That was one of the reasons his father hadn't objected more to his dreams of serving in the Dai Li. Whatever else they did, the Dai Li were specialists. Earthbenders trained for finesse, not raw rock-throwing power. They might raid outside the Wall, but always with a specific goal in mind, disappearing into tunnels where the Fire Nation couldn't follow. They definitely did not stand on pale stone in plain view to get their heads seared off by a tarball.

So he wasn't gripping a bloody spear, holding off the roaring charge. Instead, he was clinging to a rock wall in a niche he'd dug for a quiet trio of gold-eyed archers, listening to the rough, volcanic stone. Feeling how it stretched and sighed with Asagitatsu's shifting magma deep below...

Twitching, like amber shocking silk, when part of that stone moved against the mountain's will. "There!"

Red and black face-paint narrowed, and a shaft thrummed into the night.

Under Min's fingers, the pass wall stilled. Which meant-

Wiry fingers clamped on his shoulder; Kojiro, was the only name or rank the eldest archer had given. "If you have to throw up, do it downwind."

Min swallowed the acid taste in his throat. Dad's going to kill me.

It was almost a comforting thought.

I'll be damned, Sergeant Bo thought, hanging back with the supply wagons as more and more men hit the wall... and went nowhere. Somebody over there finally decided to stand and fight.

On the one hand, that wasn't surprising. The Fire Nation hated to run. Attack, attack, attack; that was firebending to the core. And the man most likely in charge of the Fire Nation defenses wasn't just the Grand Lotus. He was General Iroh, the Dragon of the West; the one man who'd managed to besiege Ba Sing Se for almost two years, and even breach the Outer Wall. He knew how to hold a siege. He damn well knew how to withstand one.

On the other hand... something just didn't feel right.

Your own people are dying because General Fong won't take orders from Earth King Kuei, and General Iroh's band of renegades would rather fight than surrender, Bo reminded himself. Nothing about this feels right.

Still. He wasn't an officer, but he knew something about planning a fight. If only because he was one of the men who ended up shepherding green troops right into the teeth of it. This place was all mountains, dirt and rock everywhere. It ought to be a snap to just roll right over the Fire Nation; either by burrowing their army right under red-armored feet, or smashing the whole pass down on the firebenders in one triumphant landslide.

Ought to be. But it wasn't. The soil around this odd ring of hills was all marsh, slippery clays, and odd bits of razor-sharp rock. Hard to bend, and impossible to march nonbenders through without turning it into a wagon-eating morass. Like it or not, unless Fong wanted to split his forces, the pass was the best way through. It was rock, after all.

Except it wasn't rock like most of the Western Continent had rock. Bo wasn't a bender any more than he was an officer, but he'd been around enough to hear the difference when someone tried to bend. Sandstone was a shunk of sand and slates sliding across each other. The granite and other weird, glassy rocks up here? They fractured. Didn't slide neatly. Broke in odd-sized chunks that the bender wasn't counting on. Worst of all, they crackled.

And with every crackle of rock, came a meaty thunk of arrows.

Pass isn't coming down that way. Not until they run out of Yu Yan.

Dragons' Wings was a bunch of refugees, no matter what Fong wanted to believe. Sooner or later, they'd run out of Yu Yan. Or arrows. Or both.

And then what?

Bo didn't know. And that bothered him. Sure, with a strong wall and determined fighters, even determined amateurs, they could hold Fong off. For a while. Hours, maybe.

But when it came down to blood and steel, Fong had the numbers. He was going to break the wall. And when he did, Dragons' Wings would die. It was that simple.

And after all the losses Fong had taken getting up here... he might spare the women and children. Everyone else - no.

Which was why Bo had let Fong take that poor girl Xiu. If she'd lived through the trap, Fong would probably let her keep breathing once he finished smashing the place. And somebody had to stay on Fong's good side, if Bo wanted to spirit General Iroh out of the aftermath, or they were going to be short one Grand Lotus. The Avatar couldn't afford that. Not now.

Wish the general had talked his nephew into being sensible weeks ago, Bo thought regretfully. They can't win this. All they're going to do is get a lot of good people killed.

And there came the first trickle of wounded, staggering back to the rear as best they could. Sergeant Bo sighed, and grabbed a camp orderly. "You. Bandages, Hot water. Now."

Stammering, the man scampered off.

Good men maimed and dead on both sides, for a prince's pride. Bo's lip curled in a snarl, and he headed for the first blank-eyed soldier. Everyone knew the Grand Lotus had hopes, but... looked like the prince was his father's son after all. I hope Fong takes you alive. So you can see it all, before you die.

Damn it all. Where was the Avatar?

"What do they think they're doing?"

High above the fray on Appa, Sokka glanced at Aang, then at the bloody struggle in the dark below. "I'd say Fong thinks he's going to get past this wall and kill people. And Zuko kind of objects to that."

Aang leaped off Appa's head, shoving the reins into Sokka's surprised hands. Stood on the saddle, twisting and turning, trying to see shadows in deeper shadows. "Do you see him?"

"I don't see much of anything," Sokka said impatiently, scrambling up Appa's neck so he could loosen the reins a little. "This is why night battles are bad." Temul had fought more than her share of them in a very long life, Fire Lord's peace or not. Making all the great names give loyalty to one Fire Lord hadn't stopped individual great names from hating each others' guts. Meaning sooner or later poison, fire, or pointy sharp things came out, usually at the worst possible time. The way the ghost told it, Fire Lord Zouge's lord-loyalty to his vassals had whip-sawed him between spirit-tugs on every side of the fight. In the end, it'd killed him.

Which... kind of explained a lot about Sozin.

If someone stuck my dad in a life that killed him by inches, and didn't even care...

Well, first off, he'd do everything he could think of to wiggle out of getting trapped that way himself.

The Painted Lady's town. Those Home Guards in the port.

When it'd come down to lords bleeding for their people, Azula was the one who'd tried to keep the invasion from hitting the city in the first place. Not Ozai.

He's not loyal to his people. Bet it's a family tradition now.

Even if Zuko was jamming tradition in a vice and squeezing, sticking it out down in Dragons' Wings. Putting the rumors and Temul's memories and everything he knew together - Zuko had a habit of doing that.

And he can do it, 'cause he's an exile, Sokka realized. The Fire Lord kicked him out. No loyalty-ties, either way. Zuko, his whole domain - they're not stuck in the Avatar's trap.

An option Sozin hadn't thought of. First, because a Fire Lord couldn't exactly exile himself. And second - he'd probably just been too ticked off.

That's what I'd be, if someone trapped Dad like that, Sokka knew. I'd be... really mad.

Really, horribly, kill-it-a-lot mad. Mad enough to take on the world. Maybe literally.

So if loyalty's not enough to stop the vassals from going at each other, and there's no waterbenders to pull on everybody's hearts and get all the spears pointed in the right way... Nothing like one big threat to make everyone stand together.

Like airbenders whipping up hurricanes that could wipe out islands. Or the Avatar, who could do it by himself.

Yeah. Explains a lot about Sozin.

No way was that an excuse for what had happened; to the Temples, to the whole world. Nothing was a good enough excuse. But when he poked that idea, and the Fire Nation, and what he'd seen Zuko trying to pull off...

It wasn't an excuse. But spirits, it was a reason.

And Aang was still vibrating in place, staring into the night like he could make the clouds pull back by sheer will, instead of bending. "Maybe if we dropped some lanterns-"

"No," Sokka said firmly. "Night fight. Light equals target. Bad idea."

Katara caught Aang's arm, pulling him back into the saddle. "If no one can see anything, how can they keep fighting?"

"Hey, doesn't stop me," Toph pointed out.

"Don't know how many earthbenders can see with their feet," Sokka said wryly. "Doesn't really matter. All Fong has to do is point them at that wall and say go."

Aang was back up bouncing on the saddle edge again. "But they could hit their own people!"

Rock flew. There were screams.

"Somehow," Sokka said dryly, "I don't think Fong cares."

"But why is he doing this? Nobody else has to die!" Grabbing his airstaff, Aang jumped into the air. "I'm going to stop this!"

"Aang!" Sokka yelled. "Wait! That's not going to-"

Green fabric washed gray by the starlight, Aang vanished into the pass.

Oh, hell.

It was simple, Aang thought, swooping through the night. It had to be. Stop the armies, stop the fighting. All he had to do was put a wall in the right place-

Except Teo had said earthbending was a bad idea. Toph had, too. Even Iroh had gently warned him that Asagitatsu was furious after centuries of neglect, and anything but the lightest touch on the earth in the wrong place could set off a spiritual spasm that would be - well, bad.

But it couldn't be that bad. Fong's army was earthbending all over the place. And he was the Avatar. He could do this. All he had to do was find where in this channel of shadowy rocks Fong's people were going after Zuko's-

Arrows whistled past, feathers scraping his arrow tattoo. Aang jinked right - except there was kind of a rock wall in the way-

"What are you shooting at?"

Kojiro refrained from rolling his eyes. Teenagers. Not that he'd expect an earthbender to be this jumpy, but first combat was hard on anyone. And Min did have fire in his blood. "A pest."

"We can't shoot Teo's people!"

Kojiro smirked. "Trust me. We're not."

After all, Prince Zuko had said to avoid the Avatar if he showed up. And he had. By a gnat's width.

Because orders were orders, but Kojiro was old enough to remember how Lord Kuzon had burned his life out. And why. Byakko had a long memory.

Think you're going to mess up a Byakko battle plan, will you, Avatar Aang? Kojiro nocked another arrow, tracking the fluttering glider down. I think not.

A puff of breath blasted Aang back from the wall, let him skim down the side of the pass without breaking his airstaff's ribs.

Maybe I should get on the ground. If I can't see anybody...

His feet hit earth, and his stomach lurched. Rock... rock wasn't supposed to fizzle, was it? Because this was. Not right under his feet, but... not that far down.

Um. Maybe earthbending a wall between these guys wasn't the best idea.

Maybe if I just pulled up shallow earth, it'd be okay. So, I just have to put it between the guys who walk like earthbenders, and the ones who walk like firebenders.

Except, when he'd been training to see with his feet, there hadn't been any firebenders stomping around. And the earthbender he'd trained with was Toph.

Nobody here walked like Toph.

He could feel people walking, and running, and fighting. But he couldn't feel who they were.

Okay... okay, keep breathing, think... where's the biggest fight? That's got to be the right spot, right?

Except between the chunks of stone being flung one way, and the arrows and streaks of fire coming the other, and the spears and dao and stuff on both sides - the whole pass felt like one big fight. Where could he put a wall that would separate the armies, without leaving some guys trapped on the wrong side?

What do I do now?

Dim red lines glowed in the darkness; embers that had been banked by soil, now uncovered by shovels or earthbenders working with the marines. Zuko sighed, relieved. That bloody light was signal and signpost; retreat this way, and help the guy next to you if he missed it.

Lieutenant Teruko thought they couldn't hold the wall anymore. He'd hoped for a few more hours, closer to dawn, but - he trusted her judgment. And Sergeant Kyo's. The gray-haired marine had handled enough green recruits to know how long their band of combat-shocked volunteers could hold together without breaking.

Step one, bloody Fong's nose. Step two, pile them up at the wall as deep as we can. Step three...

Let Fong have the blockade. Teruko's survivors would take the time he needed to grab it, and retreat to a third, lower wall a good bowshot back.

Let them take it. Zuko breathed in and out, aware of Shirong on his left, worrying rock between his fingers; Saoluan and Langxue on his right, the Kyoshi Warrior ready to kill things while Langxue clutched his katana like a tree in a flood. You ought to know better, Fong. I told you who you were dealing with.

Six years since an heir of Sozin had gone to war. And Fong hadn't met Azula.

On the battlefield, six years could be a very long time.

You should have studied your history, Fong. I did.

Oh Agni, I don't want to do this...

Hold the ice solid. Just a little longer.

"Aang!" Cupping a hand at her mouth, Katara searched through the darkness. Trying not to see the bloody chaos below. Trying not to imagine Aang in that; he'd blame himself for all of it, when it was two armies' vicious stupidity that had caused everything. "Aang, where are you?"

"He could be anywhere." Sokka swore under his breath. "Toph! If we land, can you find him?"

"Land?" Katara objected, pointing to the bloody pass. "In that?"

"Guys," Toph tried to stick in.

"If we have to? Yes," her brother said, grim and fierce as she'd seen him in the invasion, or the Siege of the North. "If we don't find him, one of two things is going to happen. Either somebody who doesn't even know who he is is going to take a swing and kill him - or, they take a swing and don't. And if they don't? It's going to be Fong and the fortress all over again. Only this time Fong's sitting on top of a freakin' volcano!"

"Guys," Toph persisted, a little louder.

Katara couldn't keep from shivering. "Aang... he wouldn't. He's bent near volcanoes before-"

"Not this one, he hasn't!"

"Guys!" Toph yelled in Katara's ear. "We don't want to land in the pass! Trust me on this one. Fong's coming through the pass-"

"Yes, he is," Katara said bleakly. "I'm glad you can't see it. Zuko's people are running from the wall, and if they can't hold it anymore..." She winced. The men of her tribe never gave up until they were dead. People from Ba Sing Se wouldn't be that brave, but - they had to know what Fong meant to do to their families. If they were running, they had no hope left.

Toph waved a fist under her nose. "You're not listening!" She pointed out into the night, more or less where rock walls narrowed below them. "Fong had to come through the pass. Zuko set it up that way! And if he knew that, he knew he couldn't hold the wall! And that means-"

"You think he meant Fong to take the wall?" Sokka yelled. "That's crazy! That's..." His voice died, and Sokka tugged the reins right. "Yip yip! Toph, we're going to land on the crest. Get down and find Aang before-" He gulped.

"Before what?" Katara demanded.

Sokka had his eyes closed, as if he were praying. "Shichi ni sunawachi, tatakae. Please let me be wrong. Please."

Well, Aang thought, swallowing hard as he skimmed his airball up the side of the pass to avoid blood and boulders, at least I found the wall.

And Fong. He could hear the general shouting from the top of the blood stone-pile; the same kind of frightening triumph Aang had heard after the Avatar Spirit had almost flattened his fortress. "Onward, brave soldiers of the Earth Kingdom! The night has cost us, but they have no more strength to face us like men." An iron lantern sparked in a soldier's hand; enough light for Aang to see Fong fling out a stabbing finger. "There is their pitiful last bastion, and it will fall in an avalanche's fury! Onward, and cleanse our land of the stain of Fire! Shatter their dwellings; salt the ground they have planted, and let their blood wash it clean! Do not stop while a single intruder breathes! The Avatar is with us!"

Blood seemed to freeze in Aang's veins, as he leapt into the air to soar toward armor and insanity. No. No, I'm not!

Shadow dancing in the lantern-light, Fong thrust his fists forward.

The earth roared.

Standing on the caldera wall as it shook was like trying to listen in a tornado. Toph snagged some of Appa's fur to make sure she knew which way was up, and tried to center herself in the earth.

Like trying to hold up a rock with jelly.

She could feel the heat burning underground, rock itself burbling thick and sticky as melted sugar. Hot stuff was flowing like syrup around colder, harder chunks of rock, making them melty around the edges. And if it could melt, it could move.

"What's going on?" Katara's hand gripped her shoulder, as the waterbender tried to stand. "Why is Fong bending the earth all the way over here?"

"He's not!" From the sound of it, Sokka was having a little more luck keeping his feet. "This is an earthquake!"

"An earthquake?" Katara's pulse jumped through her skin, even in the midst of chaos. They'd hit a few little tremors in the Fire Nation, but nothing like this. "When does it stop?"

"If we're lucky? Before Asagitatsi decides to go up!" Sokka crashed to the ground with a curse, got back up on one knee. "Toph-"

"I can't see Aang in this!" She had to yell; her ears were shaking so much, Toph felt like she was getting slugged with a cart-full of stone bells. "I can barely see Appa!"

"Kind of figured. Can you do anything?"

"Are you crazy?" Toph yelled. "This - it's a whole mountain, Sokka!"

"Yeah, so? You flattened half a palace once!" Sokka's knees scraped over the ground; his hand caught her wrist, just above her band of space rock. "You're not Aang. I know that. But maybe if you hold a little of this still he'll see it, and then-"

"And then what?" demanded a familiar, unbelievably frustrated voice. "Really. I want to know. Because if you've lost him - in the middle of a battlefield, on an Avatar-eating volcano - then right now there isn't anything I can think of that Aang could do to make things worse. Which means obviously, I'm missing something."

"Sparky!" Toph grinned.

"I should have known." From the slosh, Katara had just opened her waterskin. "Just like your sister. Your people are dying down there! And you're up here safe and-"

Iron chains rang through Toph's hearing, binding Katara with a tangling yelp.

"Thank you," Zuko sighed.

"Hmph." An older voice, thick with the accent of Ba Sing Se. "If the little princess thinks any of us are safe..." The Dai Li snorted.

More space metal moved; Sokka's sword, drawn and ready. "Let her go!"

"No." Zuko's growl cut straight through the rumble. "Asagitatsu is this close to- you know what? I don't have time for this. Saoluan. You talk to them. Sokka likes Kyoshi Warriors. Shirong - Toph, Agent Shirong, he knows the rocks here, if you think you can get anything to hold still. Langxue-"

Toph tuned the rest out, trying to figure out how to stop the unstoppable as her teeth rattled together and Shirong hopped and wove his way over shaking ground. Usually, she'd root her stance all the way down to the mountain's heart; standing as the unyielding rock everything else broke against. But now? The earth itself was shivering, like she'd shivered in cold, thin air.

A rock-gloved hand brushed her shoulder. "We're over Asagitatsu's magma chamber," Shirong called out over the rumbles, almost in her ear. "From what the Byakko records tell us, water volcanoes blow when hot magma gets thrown against colder rock and melts all the gas out of it in one blast. We have to stop the mixing!" His breath caught. "If I just knew how. A whole mountain... I've bent earth to trap men and spirits, but this-!"

Toph blinked away flying dust, and smirked. Yeah. That might work. "You just think it's too big." She took a breath, and stood. No fists clenched. No fancy-dancey stance. Just heels and toes and muscles taking the shock of ground trying to split under her, and holding her up anyway. "If you can't center in the earth..."

It was as hard as trying to lift Appa one-handed. But at least she could breathe down here. Even if it hurt.

"...Then let the earth... oof... center in you!"

Rippling outward, rock stilled.

There's Appa! Heartsick but relieved, Aang soared out of the pass toward pale fur. Maybe he couldn't stop this battle by himself, but Sokka would have an idea. He always did. The earth had quieted down, after all, and that had to be Toph, pulling one of Sokka's crazy plans.

So Appa's easy to see, Aang thought, glad to be back in the air. Sometimes that's a good thing! Especially in a mess like this, when you can't see anything-

Weird. Why did he smell cold seawater?

Snap.

Blue and yellow bloomed on the summit, and suddenly Aang could see everything. Fong on the taken wall, head jerked toward the flickering light. The pass full of bloodied Earth Kingdom troops. The smaller wall Aang hadn't realized was almost at the exit of the pass, spearmen and red armor huddled behind it. Wet trickles from lumps of melting blue ice, that had been hidden in the murk near the top of the pass...

The cold, bleak look on Zuko's scarred face, as he held a handful of fire. And breathed out.

The pass exploded in flame.

Night dragged at his bones. Zuko let his eyes close, just for a moment, trying not to smell charred flesh and bone. There wasn't as much of that as he'd expected. The natural gas had scorched and burned, but the real killer had been air.

Or rather, lack of air. The fire had swallowed it all.

On open ground, wind would have rushed in to feed the flames. Men would have burned, but those outside the fire would have lived. In the tight channel of the pass...

Lieutenant Teruko cleared her throat. "Sergeant Kyo's bringing him now, sir."

Zuko nodded, forcing himself to concentrate on here and now; the stains and soot of the third wall, where anyone who could wrap a bandage was busy with the survivors.

Almost anyone. I want this to be over. "Get some rest when you can, Lieutenant."

"I will when you do, sir."

"Don't do that," Zuko said dryly. "I need you sane."

The earthbender Sergeant Kyo shoved forward had made an effort to clean off the blood and soot, but no amount of water could wipe the shock off his face.

Good. "Major Yilin," Zuko said coldly. "You appear to be the most senior officer still alive. So I will say this one more time. And if you refuse to listen this time..." He let flames dance over his knuckles.

The major swallowed convulsively. "Do what you will to us. The Avatar will never allow the Fire Nation to hold Earth Kingdom land-"

Zuko almost laughed in the man's face. Who knew what the Avatar would do tomorrow, but right now? Aang was huddled up on top of the caldera wall with Appa and his friends; white-faced, singed, and probably agreeing with every horrible name Katara was heaping on firebenders. Seemed that he'd actually been in the air over the pass when the flames had gone up, and that hadn't been fun at all.

Can we say howling updraft? Oh yes. Can't airbend when there's no air to bend...

Tomorrow it wouldn't be funny. Right now... maniacal laughter wouldn't get him what he wanted from defeated enemies. Too bad.

"This is not the Earth Kingdom." Zuko held that green gaze. "By treaty with Earth King Kuei, this domain is mine." Breathe. Don't lose it now. "You can accept that, and treat your wounded, and leave. Or you can march into the bay and drown." He smirked. "I should warn you. It's crowded down there."

They won.

It felt like a spear through Sergeant Bo's chest, even as he pulled a few last survivors out from under scattered bodies in the dark before dawn, helping them back to the temporary camp on the Fire side of the pass. It hurt, deep and tearing in a way he hadn't felt since... never. He'd faced the Dragon of the West before. But not like this.

Fire. The pass had been filled with fire, howling like the polar bear-dogs legend said roamed in packs at the North Pole. A horrible, hungry blaze that sucked away air and life like sand through an hourglass. Only no one would bend this back to cheat time.

They lured us in, and they crushed us. Bo swallowed bile as he broke up a fight over barrels of clean water before the two exhausted men involved actually came to blows. Wounded men were always thirsty. All this time, General Fong thought - hell, we all thought we had them on the run! But...

The Dragon of the West had just been waiting. Biding his time.

A dark smile flickered over Bo's face as he headed toward the little knot of red standing on the third wall. Watching. Some were in armor, some not; one of those who wasn't had a flowing gray beard, and some of the saddest gold eyes Bo had ever seen. General Iroh. And I thought I was going to rescue you.

The way the night had been going, Bo almost wasn't surprised to see a Dai Li loom up out of the smoke. Though he did wonder where the man's hat had gotten to. "State your business," the agent said bluntly.

Bo blinked, and blinked again. Not his imagination. In better light, the ribbon on the Dai Li's braid was red. "Sergeant Bo. Retired. I've... um... got some letters for a tea merchant, name of Mushi. Heard he might be up this way."

"Did you." The agent gave him an appraising look, eyes picking out the knives and brass knuckles tucked around Bo's person as if he were going down a checklist. "This way."

"Okay, I gotta ask," Bo sighed as they headed toward red uniforms. "What's one of you guys doing all the way up here? Long walk from the Inner Ring."

"I never did like the Inner Ring," the agent mused. "I was assigned here, Sergeant. By order of his majesty, Earth King Kuei, to observe and report that the treaty was carried out in exact detail, with the spirits' blessing."

Erk. Near the base of the wall, Bo stopped in his tracks. "You mean, the general really was..." 'Cause sure, he'd been willing to believe Fong was overenthusiastic, and that Dragons' Wings wasn't lying about having a treaty, but - the spirits were mixed up in this? Why?

"In violation of his orders, if you want to put it kindly," the Dai Li said dryly. "Though I think the Earth King will see it more as malicious treason. A few more minutes of earthbenders tearing the caldera apart, and Asagitatsus would have erupted. Which would have killed us, and everyone within a hundred miles of us. Including Avatar Aang." His voice darkened. "And that would only include the immediate deaths. History shows us Asagitatsus's ash can freeze the earth even to Ba Sing Se. The Earth Kingdom starving, and no Avatar to stop the Fire Lord... yes. I think Earth King Kuei would call it treason."

Bo shivered, unable to make his feet move. He'd walked into blood and battles and even fire. But right now - no. He couldn't go any closer to red armor. Not now.

Generals and kings. Always pushing men around like Pai Sho tiles, never tell us why. Damn it, he's the Grand Lotus. I thought he was past all that.

The agent gave him a second look, and nodded. "I'll let him know you're here."

Bo shrugged in reluctant thanks, watching the small knot of armored firebenders above him. Huh; there was one whose armor didn't match, like it was all made for somebody taller. Maybe one of the rare girls he'd found on the battlefield-

Lantern-light caught the scar, as pale gold eyes stared over the battlefield.

Bo frowned, uneasy. That didn't look right for a youngster after his first major action. He couldn't put his finger on why. Just, not right.

"Sir?" An older firebender, in marine armor, helmet pulled off to show short gray hair as he approached the exiled prince. "Sir. My lord."

And that was another thing that wasn't right, Bo realized, as the first light before dawn started creeping into the sky. Not that he knew a lot about Fire Nation manners, but you had to know something about prisoners you caught. Sir and my lord together didn't go to an exiled kid. They went to the ranking military officer on the field. Didn't they?

The prince started, then took a deep breath. "Sergeant Kyo. We need to arrange an honorable burial. It wasn't their fault their commander was..."

"A rock-headed idiot, sir?" the marine offered.

"A fanatic," Zuko said grimly. "Honorable burial. And pyres for our people."

"You did warn him, sir."

"I know." The young man's voice was bleak. "The Avatar bends the truth and nobody ever calls him on it. I tell people what I'm going to do, and nobody believes me. I don't understand people."

"Sir, when someone in your family says they're going to find a man, decapitate him, and burn any town that sheltered him to the bedrock, most people don't want to believe it." The sergeant shrugged. "The Avatar's everybody's spirit-tale. Your clan deals in reality. Mean and bloody as it gets. Most people... well, they can't take too much reality. Not without a hell of a stiff drink." Kyo waited a moment, then gave the prince a sidelong glance. "Sir. I think the lieutenant had some good advice."

"I know," Zuko breathed. "I will. I just wanted to see..."

Cloth caught the wind with a snap, and Bo turned westward.

A flag fluttered high above the wall; the triangular banner-and-streamers Bo had seen above a hundred Fire Nation camps. Only - not scarlet.

Pale, bright blue caught the first full rays of sunlight, streamers of muted blue-green fluttering in the breeze. Fire-red threads embroidered five characters at the flag's heart, four wheeling about the center.

Water. Earth. Fire. Air. Spirit.

Zuko drew himself up, and nodded. "Carry on, Sergeant."

Trying not to gape, Bo watched him walk away. And jumped a foot, when someone cleared his throat behind him. "Gah!"

General Iroh smirked at him. "Sergeant Bo. I hear you have letters for a friend."

"Yes, sir," Bo said stiffly. Great; a Dai Li knew Mushi and General Iroh were connected. What else could go wrong?

Which led him to glance at the wall again, and the pass, and the bodies still lying where they'd fallen. And trying not to shiver, as all the facts finally fit together. "I was going to say all the polite words about your victory, General." As viciously as possible. It was amazing how sharp a good sergeant could make his tongue, without ever using a foul word. Fanatic general or not, these were his people. "But it wasn't you. Was it."

"I had planned an attack from the rear," Iroh admitted. "It would have had much the same result. But it would have taken longer, and more of our people would have died to defeat you. My nephew... invented a different approach." Dark gold was hard. "Had we followed my intent, General Fong would have slain us all. I knew the man was driven, but to deliberately tear at the foundations of an active volcano..."

"His plan." Bo got out. Felt like his stomach had relocated somewhere near his sandals. He's just a kid. Just a kid.

Guanyin's merciful veil - what was he going to be like if he got older?

"My niece recites military history well," Iroh mused. "But it seems my nephew has inherited his father's gift for... aggressive improvisation." The general smiled. "Would you care for tea?"

Water that didn't taste like smoke and copper. Zuko cupped it in his hands, swallowing slow, measured gulps when what he wanted to do was pour the whole pitcher down his throat like a desert-lost madman.

He wanted to. But he didn't. Too much water was like too much anything else. It'd hurt you if you were lucky. Worse if you weren't.

Zuko splashed what was left in his hands over his face, trying not to think about worse.

They'd found a lot of springs along the caldera wall, water seeping through volcano-shattered rock to run as quick, clear glints through moss and ferns. Some they'd channeled into cisterns and tunnels to the fledgling settlement. Some they'd just left alone. This one split the difference. There was a basin, and a shaped ledge for a rough bench, with a hollow under it for buckets and other useful things. Not that too many people used them, besides his marines. This spring was almost a third of the way up the wall. Inconvenient. With enough of a climb to it that the average refugee was cursing all steep slopes before they were halfway to the springhead. And that didn't even begin to consider the rattle-vipers.

Chewing another bit of flesh off a long, wriggly skeleton, Asahi burped.

"You've been around Rikiya too long," Zuko muttered. "You're picking up bad habits." He tapped a foot on the ground, looking for any movement. Most of the surviving rattle-vipers near Dragons' Wings had figured out an ostrich-horse scratching at the ground was a reason to be elsewhere. Most of them.

Dark eyes blinked at him. Beak plucking up a bit of leftover spiny skin, Asahi tossed her head his way.

"No thanks. Not hungry." His stomach was still a seething mass of knots. He'd promised Uncle he would eat something; it was the only reason people had let him escape to be alone this long. And he would. Just - not quite yet.

More water. And have some salt with it. Don't be an idiot.

Yeah. Idiots got themselves dead. Worse, they got other people dead. Whole piles of-

Zuko shut away memories of fire and wind, walking back to the rough-shaped spout diverting part of the spring into an easy fall for a bucket. Filled his pitcher with more water, and moved just as deliberately back to the bench.

Don't think about it.

Sip water. Splash water. Nibble a tiny bit of dried red dulse and salted aya-salmon. Swallow hard, and let his stomach think that over before he tried anything more solid.

But most of all, just breathe. And try to feel where Asagitatsu was cranky. She hadn't liked Fong's last, desperate move...

Fire filled his mind again, and Zuko had to hug himself against the early morning chill.

I don't want to do that again. Ever.

Now, if only he could lie to himself and say he'd never have to.

Asahi chirped at him. Nudged an empty skin with her talons.

Zuko sighed. "We'll look for some more later-"

A shadow moved with the wind.

Silent, Zuko watched Aang land, pasty-faced and shaken as he'd ever seen the airbender. Waited, while Aang folded up his airstaff, thin hands fiddling over a task he knew the Avatar could do in his sleep.

He looks bad. And he's not saying anything.

For Aang, that was a bad sign.

I came up here to be alone, damn it.

Didn't matter what he wanted. He had responsibilities. And one of them had just dropped in for a visit.

Still silent, Zuko poured a little more water into his hands; cupping it over smoke-reddened eyes, patting the rest over forehead, cheeks, and hot throat. He stepped away from the pitcher, one shoulder lifting in a half-shrug.

Biting his lip, Aang poured some into his hand. Gulped it, and stared back toward the thin trails of smoke still marking the Chip.

Hair shadowing his eyes, Zuko waited.

"That was... awful."

Understatement. "Yes," Zuko said quietly. "It was."

"How could you do that?" Aang's eyes were wet. "How could... there had to be another way."

"I had to stop him," Zuko said simply. "Before he ripped the caldera apart. Before he killed everyone, and drove Asagitatsu over the edge." He met that gray gaze, too tired to soften the blow. "I had to stop him, before Asagitatsu killed you."

Aang went dead white.

Damn it. Never know what to say. "Sit down."

One hand fumbling along stone, Aang all but fell onto the bench, never taking his eyes off Zuko. "You... had to... but...!"

"That didn't come out right." Zuko rubbed at a knot of headache, habit making him check Asahi's beak wasn't anywhere near Aang's skin. She would bite, if she thought she could get away with it. "Aang... damn it. Have any of the other Avatars told you about the Face-Stealer? What he's done? What he's after?"

"Roku told me he was dangerous. Kuruk said he stole his girlfriend." Aang took another gulp of water. "Yangchen said he gave Xiangchen visions. And that was part of what killed her."

"Great. Spirit advisors who don't tell you about the spirits. Makes perfect sense." Zuko sighed. "It's a long story. We put it together in bits and pieces. But ages before humans were ever here, the Face-Stealer was. The spirit of the world created him. Because when things live, they have to die. The world was like that a long time. Life, death, and spirits."

"And the Avatar," Aang said bleakly.

"We don't think there was an Avatar then," Zuko told him. "Not until the spirit of the world decided it had to understand humans. So - it became a human. It left the spirit world, like the Moon and Ocean did, to live in a real body. And never went back. Not to stay." He glanced at Aang. "It came to our world, and left the Face-Stealer - its child, its student - alone."

The airbender gulped, eyes wide.

Yeah. He gets that, Zuko thought, utterly tired. "Who knows how long that went on. But a thousand years before Yangchen was born, Avatar Kesuk went insane. And humans - and dragons, and sky bison - they did what they had to, to stop her. Right here." Zuko waved at the bowl of the caldera. "You know how you feel about the firebenders who killed Master Gyatso? That's how Koh feels about us. All of us."

"But... everybody who attacked the Temple is gone," Aang got out. "And - even if they weren't, Gyatso wouldn't want me to..." He trailed off, shivering.

"No," Zuko agreed. "He was a good man." He looked toward the smoke again, like worrying a loose tooth. "But that takes a lot of courage. To say, I'm going to stop. I've had enough. Done enough. Nobody else has to die." He grimaced. "And Fong -"

"Fong wasn't really brave. Was he." Aang was fingering his staff again, eyes anywhere but on pale gold. "Not the way Sokka is, fighting Azula when he can't even bend. Or Toph. That was... what she did in the pass..." He shook his head, wide-eyed. "And Katara. You should have seen her during the eclipse. She fought a dragon!"

Damn. That's where Makoto got to, Zuko realized. So where was she now? He had to know!

But Aang was still as shaken and horrified as Zuko had been in a back alley years ago, with the bodies still burning around him. And he remembered how that awful night had felt, how numb and bleak and empty the world had been...

Aang needed someone to listen, before he flew apart. Makoto would have to wait.

"But Fong wasn't brave like that," Aang said, almost a whisper. "If he was brave, he would have believed in Kuei."

Huh?

"But I still don't know how you could do that." Aang's voice was ragged; he wiped at wet eyes. "It wasn't - wasn't like the North Pole. Or when Fong scared Katara. Or anything like that. You knew you were going to - to hurt them. And you still did it."

"I knew I was going to kill them," Zuko said flatly. "And I did it because I had to. Because Fong was going to kill us. Because if we die, the last chance for calming Asagitatsu down dies with us. Because the great spirits are using us all in the Face-Stealer's damn grudge match, and that is going to stop." He breathed in; let a little steam escape. "But when you cut through all the reasons, Aang? I did it because I am a great name, and that's what we do. I hate death. I hate killing. But Fong was going to kill my people and I would not allow that to happen." He took another breath, and swallowed back any hint of tears. "So I killed him. That's who I am. That's what I am. Zuko, son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai. If there's anyone in my family who can't kill - I don't know them." He had to look away. "So maybe... maybe you should stop asking how. You're not me."

You're not me.

Aang rocked back on his heels, not sure what to think. On one hand, it was kind of a relief. On the other- "Guru Pathik said we were all one. That the differences between people were just an illusion."

Zuko gave him a look. The kind Sokka had given Katara, after they'd caught her feeding Appa purple tongue-dyeing berries. The firebender groaned, and scooped up another handful of water to splash his face. "Way too long a night for this..."

Aang frowned. "You think he's wrong."

"I think," Zuko said, careful as somebody trying to balance three trays of air-cakes, "you're trying to take something really complicated, and make it way too simple."

Oh, come on. "Master Gyatso said the mark of a master was being able to make complicated things simple," Aang stated.

Zuko's brow went up. "And you think you've mastered people?"

"Well - yeah," Aang shrugged. "I cleared all my chakras. It's not like bending!"

Zuko cocked his head, studying him through that scarred eye. Just like-

Just like Temul. Aang held back a shiver.

"So you think bending is the hardest thing to master," Zuko said neutrally.

Um. There was a trap here, he just knew it. "I'm the youngest airbending master in the world!"

"You're the Avatar," Zuko said, deadpan. "From where I'm standing, that makes you the oldest airbending master in the world."

Aang sputtered. That? That was just not fair. He'd earned his arrows, everybody in the Temple had said so-!

"People aren't simple," Zuko went on. "If they were, there wouldn't be dead soldiers down there. Men I didn't want to kill. Men none of us wanted to kill. But we didn't have a choice - no! You stop right there, Aang. We had no choice. Because those soldiers, those Earth Kingdom men who might have been our own family, were the soldiers following Fong. Who kept following him, even when he told them an airbending master - an Air Nomad - wanted them to wipe out women and children."

"But that's a lie!" Aang protested. "I wouldn't do that. I told him I wouldn't! I told him I couldn't! I'd never want that to happen. He was lying to them! Why couldn't they understand that?"

"You don't want that to happen," Zuko breathed. "Really." Fists clenched, and steam hissed from flared nostrils. "Then do something about it!"

Heart beating fast, Aang backed up a step. Maybe... maybe this really wasn't a good idea...

"You want to stop the fighting? You want to keep people from dying? Then you need to stop running when things get hard," Zuko said grimly. "You need to stop. And think. And listen. And you need to be smart, Aang. You need to be very, very smart. Because the only way to stop something like that," he flung a hand toward the Chip, "without killing everybody, is to stop the fight before it ever starts."

"But... you started this fight by coming here," Aang protested. "None of this had to happen!"

"I started this?" Zuko's voice was ice. "I thought you said Fong should have been brave enough to believe in Kuei."

Eep. "Well, yeah, but-"

"Stop." Zuko shook his head, slow and deliberate. "Just stop. And listen. To yourself. You say I started this. You say Fong should have believed in Kuei. One of those is a lie."

"No," Aang insisted; heart racing, hands almost shaking. "No, it's not. I'm an airbender, we don't lie!"

"Ty Lee is an airbender." Zuko's eyes were cold. And sad. "And her entire life was a lie."

Aang gripped his airstaff hard, feeling the ground wobble under him. "That's not true!" Because if that was true, then...

Then Fong hadn't believed anything Aang had told him. Fong hadn't believed it was the Avatar Spirit who'd done those horrible things at the North Pole. He'd thought Aang could kill. Which meant-

Fong believed I was a liar. Fong believed... he could say the Avatar wanted people to die, and I'd do it, if he just hurt my friends enough...

"You were right about Fong," Zuko went on, voice almost as quiet as the wind. "He was a fanatic. Which means he was a coward. Brave people believe they can be wrong. That things get complicated, and life is never as simple as we want it to be. And that you never use anyone else as an excuse." He reached out to lay a hand on black fur and feathers, rubbing behind pricked ears. "Funny thing about being brave. It looks a lot like being scared. Difference is... you don't run." He drew a deep breath. "So decide where you stand, Aang. And stand."

Chapter End Notes

"Shichi ni sunawachi, tatakae." (In death ground, fight.) Got to love Sun Tzu...

Chapter 73

Sleep. Want sleep. Heading back down the caldera wall with Asahi, Zuko sighed. Sleep would be good. Not that he expected to get any anytime soon. Not with fires replaying in his head.

Though, who knew. Aang had said he was going to be taking Katara up to the Northern Air Temple today, so they could talk to Teo again. And the mere thought of Aang being somewhere else, where he couldn't set Asagitatsu off with a sneeze or a tantrum, was enough of a relief to almost knock him out right here-

Sliding closed as he walked, eyes caught a glimpse of ghastly, writhing black.

Zuko stopped. Blinked. Tilted his head back and forth, trying to figure out exactly what he was seeing. From the neck down it looked like a girl in Earth Kingdom travel clothes. But above? "Did a boarupine nest on your head while you were sleeping, or did everybody clear out of the Fire Nation so fast you forgot your combs?"

"Bite me, Sparky." Toph ran frustrated fingers through a poof of black hair, yanking knots tighter. "Nothing wrong with a good coat of dirt."

"There is if Jia sees you," Zuko said wryly. Darn it, Toph should still be in bed. The way she'd curled up on a rock after the flames burned out and the aftershocks died down - if it'd been him, he would have slept for a week. Should think of a way to get her back there. Somehow. "She figured out a way to bend the soil around here so it scrubs you coming off. She did it to Jinhai when he wouldn't come in for a bath. You should have heard him howl."

"Huh." Toph's fingers froze. Deliberately, she untangled them from knotted hair, and made a couple brushing motions that left her noticeably paler. "Does everybody's brother and sister act crazy to each other?"

Zuko snorted, almost feeling up to laughing. "You're asking me?"

For a moment, Toph just stood there, listening. Like she couldn't quite believe he'd said that.

Zuko was never sure which of them started snickering first.

"You - Azula - nursery," Toph managed to get out.

"Dolls lined up in siege ranks," Zuko snickered back, leaning on black feathers. "Ladies-in-waiting were kunoichi, shopkeepers and nobles got drafted. 'Forward, my minions!' Kind of cute. At least, if she didn't know I was there..." Um. Okay. This was awkward.

"You want to know about Azula." Toph pointed at his sandals. "You shuffled your feet like Sokka does when he's trying to sneak around asking straight out. Then you got your stance set so you could punch or run like heck. Got to be Azula."

Oh yes. Awkward. "Is she okay?" Zuko blurted out. "You're here, so the invasion didn't work, and Katara didn't say anything about Azula being dead, and she would, and... that didn't sound good, did it."

Toph stuck her tongue out at him. "Dummy. You know Katara's nicer than that." She sucked her tongue back in, and shrugged. "Okay, you wouldn't know. But she is. Most of the time."

"I'll take your word for it," Zuko said simply. Toph knew Katara. He didn't, not really. Chasing someone halfway across the world wasn't knowing them. Granted, he could predict that any time Katara thought about him, she wanted to break things. But she wasn't like that all the time.

Just a lot of it. "So... do you know anything?" Zuko said hopefully. "Katara said something about, Azula was watching..."

"She was doing what Sokka said you were doing," Toph said bluntly. "Keeping an eye on the whole battlefield." She grimaced. "Your sister's scary, you know that? She figured Aang would jump in before he could think about it, and she took him down with just a chi-blocker and... man, I don't know what she said, but it rattled him almost as bad as Ba Sing Se going down. Dunno if you can do anything about that- What?"

Zuko swallowed the sudden lump in his throat. "But she didn't hurt him. Physically." With Azula, you always had to qualify that. "She left him alive."

"Yeah," Toph drew the word out. "Sparky? What'd you do?"

There was no way this was going to sound good. "I didn't think you were going to stick to Sokka's plan," Zuko began, trying to keep it simple. "I didn't... Azula was in the palace. She finds things out. She finds everything out. She chased you all the way to Ba Sing Se. I thought you'd know. If Azula gets near your plan, you have to change it." He winced. "Toph. I grew up learning the math we use to calculate eclipses. I thought everybody had to know that."

Toph's toes tapped the ground. "You thought Twinkletoes knew he was heading into a trap."

Ouch. "I know. When you put it that way..." Zuko knuckled the side of his brow. "We were talking to Teo after Hakoda left, and he said... never mind. I was wrong. But there wasn't anything I could do from here." He took a breath. "So I sent a message to Azula. I asked to consider - just consider - how a Water Tribe Avatar might not be in the best interests of the Fire Nation."

Toph's jaw dropped.

"Yes, she's crazy," Zuko said grimly, hating that look on her face. Hating how it hurt to even explain; Toph couldn't know how the bottom had dropped out of the world when he'd finally realized that Sokka wasn't pulling an elaborate ruse on the Fire Lord. Sokka honestly didn't know. "She's vicious, and she's cruel, and she's probably killed more people for annoying her than we all took out last night. But she's not stupid. Aang is an Air Monk. Bottom line? He doesn't want to hurt anyone. A Water Tribe Avatar, with what they teach is proper revenge?" Slowly, he shook his head. "She's my sister, Toph. She's evil and she's crazy, but she always - always - thinks about her options. When somebody's dead, they don't give you any more options."

"You told her we were coming." Toph's voice wobbled.

Zuko grimaced. "She already knew-"

"But you didn't know that!" Toph was sniffing now, milky green eyes wet. "You didn't know, and you told her, and - she blew up ships, and she blew up people, it was awful..."

"I wish I could have thought of something else," Zuko got out, hurting. "I couldn't find another way, Toph. She was going to kill something. It was Aang or your army, and if she'd killed Aang-"

"Spirits ticked off, Fire Nation wiped out in sixteen years by a Water Tribe Avatar," Toph snapped. Fists clenched, denying the water leaking from her eyes. "I get it."

"No!" Zuko slashed his hand across, a ripple of heat in air. "If she'd killed Aang, she would have killed you!"

Toph gulped. Blinked, another tear trickling down.

"If she targeted Aang, all of you would have tried to stop her," Zuko got out, weary to the bone. "That's what sworn warriors of a great name do. And if any of them, especially a sworn bender, escapes an ambush that kills their lord - a sworn warrior doesn't surrender. He hides out, maybe for years, gets together a raiding party, and comes back. Hell, Toph, we have plays about it. The only way to take out a great name and have peace is to take out all their sworn with him. And you're a master bender. You trained this Avatar. Azula would be stupid to leave you alive to get stronger and train the next Avatar. My sister is crazy. Not stupid." He gripped his cuff, and swiped at prickling eyes. "Forget strategy. Forget spirits. Forget all the good reasons. If Azula tried to kill Aang she was going to go through you to do it. And if she did that, one of you, maybe both of you... you're my friend, and she's still my sister..."

Asahi rumbled, nudging him with her shoulder. Zuko leaned into it, breathing in fur and feathers to blunt the tang of cold ashes. Words. Sometimes he just hated words.

A gritty hand touched his. "Zuko?"

He wrapped her up in one of Uncle's hugs, bristly hair and all, wishing he could just explain. Azula was like being tangled in a killer rose-vine. It hurt, and he had to get away or die. But she was alive, she was family, and he couldn't destroy her without knowing he'd kill part of himself.

And you're my friend. How can I let someone kill my friend?

Steady and snarky and always willing to poke things. Earthbender, heck; Toph was like one of the first rays of dawn, climbing out of the sky to tickle every shadow into giving up its secrets.

My friend. My family. How can I choose?

Hugging Zuko was like hugging fire. Warm, but it hurt.

Like Shidan, Toph thought. Only Zuko's all kinds of tangled up inside.

Part of the tangle was a hurt-and-sad that tasted like tears, and echoed with the screams she'd heard when Asagitatsu was trying to shake apart. Another bit was relief, like wrapping a down quilt around you on a snowy morning; she was alive, his people were alive, and Aang had actually listened for a few minutes. A third part of the knot was need-and-needed, that burned like not enough air to breathe and tugged like chains; one way was Azula, another was Dragons' Wings, and two others were Shidan-and-kin and Toph-and-everyone-helping-her.

And wrapped around all that need and want and hurt was a memory Zuko had tagged as this is like Toph. Fingers gripping granite as he climbed, trusting feeling more than sight as stone warmed and shadows shifted with the breaking dawn.

Zuko thought she was like sunrise on mountains. That was kind of cool. But... "Um. Sparky? Ease up a little. Breathing's good."

"Ease up...?" The tangle of tears and chains fell away like it'd been cut, as Zuko let go and backed off three steps, running into Asahi. "Right. Not Uncle. That wasn't... appropriate."

Oh man, now where had his screwy reflexes jumped to? 'Cause she could feel a tension in his stance that hadn't been there a second ago. And what was with the distance all of a sudden?

"You've been having nightmares." Zuko's voice was cool, but worried. "Ow. How do you know when you're not having a nightmare? When I wake up, I look for light."

"Smells." Toph wrinkled her nose. "Nothing smells, in a dream. How did you know about the bad dreams?" Duh, he'd pulled a Shidan and snarfed it out of her head-

"After last night? Everybody has nightmares."

...Or, maybe not. Weird. He'd felt like Shidan for a minute. But he couldn't feel her? That sucked.

"They get better," Zuko went on quietly. "After a while. I know what that sounds like, but it doesn't make you a bad person. Just someone who's still alive."

Toph shuddered. "If that's Uncle's advice, we've got to tell him he's crazier than Fong... was." Ooof. It was still hard to think that way.

"It's not." Zuko shifted; an after you sort of shrug and wave. "Come on. I know a way to get to the Wens that dodges most of the triage areas." From the tremor of earth, his toes were gripping his sandal thongs hard. "I can't... do that again. Not yet. If Amaya wants to mend fences with Katara by healing some of the Earth Army so they can get out of here - that's her decision. Better if I'm not there."

Not just toes clenched, Toph realized. That stance was definitely fists clenched, too. "What's wrong?"

A resigned sigh. "They're the enemy, Toph. We beat them, but they're my people's enemy, and they're wounded, and they're not gone. That's... I don't like it." Zuko took a deep breath, and shook his head. "I need sleep."

Toph took a testing step forward, felt him fade back another foot. Darn. What the heck was so not appropriate about a hug? "They're just hurt people now, right? You've got a treaty."

"I've got a treaty with Earth King Kuei," Zuko said flatly. "General Fong wouldn't take orders from Ba Sing Se. Major Yilin... he knows we outnumber him now. Maybe he'll behave. Maybe." Zuko winced. "I just want them to go away. My people have enough problems, and now Aang's here, and... yeah. You like Aang. I'll just go... drown myself under a waterfall or something, I shouldn't talk to people when I'm this tired..." He trailed off, feet shifting as he straightened.

Toph turned toward the black gaping area that was the water below. Whatever had caught Zuko's sight, it had to be that way. "What's there?"

"The cone." Some of the weary embarrassment dropped out of his voice. "Steam looks... okay. Okay, good. Spirits, I thought Fong had killed us all-" He cut himself off. "Toph? Reach into the caldera. Just a little deeper."

Eep. But this was Zuko's domain. He knew what he was doing. Maybe.

Weird, to reach into earth that crackled and warmed, the farther you got from the surface.

"Honored Asagitatsu," Zuko said quietly. "This is Lady Toph Bei Fong."

...And the earth seemed to sizzle against her toes. Eep, eep, eep.

"I think she could help." There was just a little grin in his voice. "She's the greatest earthbender in the world."

Sizzling, but not burning. Hope you know what you're doing, Sparky.

"If you're willing, she could help us. If you want her to."

Warmth, like sunlight through windows, wrapping around her like a badger-mole's testing paw. A sense of movement in the air, like a massive snuffling breath.

"So..." Zuko drew the word out. "You mind if she walks around and has a feel for what needs to be fixed? I know she'll be careful."

Earth-child. It echoed in her bones; like she was hearing it through her skull, not her ears. Be welcome.

Warmth slipped away, and earth was only earth.

Zuko laughed, just a little. "I think she likes you."

"So you just whirl it," Aang spun air between his palms, tighter and tighter, "and then you go!" Seated on his airball, he buzzed around the Temple courtyard.

And for the first time in way too long, he wasn't alone. There was lanky Jing, and curious Ke, and even Sima; though that was kind of weird, a girl bending right along with everybody else crashing through the air-

And Teo, grinning off to the side with Katara, tossing his own mini-airballs into the fray whenever anybody looked like they were getting carried away. Teo couldn't ride an airball in his chair. Yet. But Aang was sure he'd figure out a way, eventually.

Grinning, Aang put his feet down just before the ball vanished out from under him. "You figured all the rest of this out from scrolls?"

"Scrolls and Langxue," Teo nodded, letting the breeze fade from around his hands. "He's just as clueless as we are most of the time, but at least he knows when he's getting it... um."

Right. Put that together with some of the things Aang had seen the wind do as Zuko bent a pass full of fire... yeah. He knew what Langxue had to be. "He's a yāorén."

"You know about that?" Teo said cautiously.

Aang nodded, still tangled up in knots about the whole thing. "Yangchen told me. Two-element benders. They're supposed to help the Avatar. So why is he here?" That was what really stung. If the Avatar was supposed to have help from the spirits, not just friends who'd decided to help him on their own - he could have really, really used another airbender at the eclipse. Why hadn't Langxue been where they needed him? Weren't yāorén supposed to serve the spirits?

More important, why was Langxue doing everything he could to stay away from Aang? He'd barely seen the yāorén. Sure, Langxue had been there while the flames were dying down, wafting smoke away while Sokka and Appa looked for him along the rim of the caldera. He'd stayed while they dragged Aang to Katara so she could heal the bump on his head; landing after that fiery updraft had not been fun.

And then Langxue had left. And Aang had no clue why. It wasn't that big of a bump, and why did it matter how he'd gotten it? He'd been trying to stop two armies from killing each other!

But even though Langxue had looked like he was listening to Aang's rapid-fire account of diving into the pass, he must have already made up his mind who was really right. That Sokka and Katara's version of why they were in the middle of a night battle in the first place - which Sokka apparently thought was Aang's fault, for some weird reason - was the right one, and everything had just gone downwind from there. Because he'd let Aang talk for about five minutes, then started shaking his head, curled fingers into fists that got intercepted by a not-very-happy Saoluan, and finally flung up his hands with a snarled, "Idiot."

And left. Aang couldn't believe he'd left.

Sure, Langxue was a waterbender, and maybe Zuko's people needed healers right now, and yeah, maybe Aang had said something about swords and benders who thought they needed weapons to hurt people, but - Langxue was using air. And airbenders weren't supposed to be violent. Ever. That was what being an Air Monk was all about. If Langxue was an airbender, he had to put that sword down.

Which was when Saoluan had... heh. If it was Sokka, Aang would think she'd kept Langxue from trying to punch him out. Which was crazy. He knew what Langxue was.

But the yāorén had left. How could he do that?

I'm the Avatar. You're supposed to help me!

"Two-element benders?" Katara's blue eyes were wide as teacups. "That's crazy. If the spirits give you bending, they only bless you with one element."

"Yangchen said that's not always true." Aang shifted his shoulders. Sounded weird to him, too. "She said the Avatar wasn't supposed to have to take care of the whole world all at once by himself. The Great Spirits find people who can help. Only they've just... been dying." He swallowed a lump in his throat. "They've been dying for a long time. So Kuruk didn't have any help, and Kyoshi didn't, and Roku didn't. And that's part of why the world's such a mess." He closed a fist on his airstaff, trying not to blow things away just because he was upset. "But she wouldn't tell me who was killing them!"

Teo's gliders looked at each other. Kima gave Teo a look, that reminded Aang of Sokka looking at Katara: Tell him, or I will.

Teo took a deep breath, and sighed. "Yeah. I bet she wouldn't."

Aang snapped his full attention to Teo. "Why not? She was the Avatar, I'm the Avatar - why wouldn't she tell me?"

"Maybe because you're the Avatar?" Kima muttered.

Teo shot her a look, and shook his head. "Aang. It's... not as simple as you think. Langxue warned us about element-starvation. In case one of our earthbending relatives got stuck up here and some spirits got ideas. If he's right... it's not any person killing them." He bit his lip. "Aang - spirits hurt people to make them a yāorén. They hurt Langxue. If he hadn't found Amaya... she's not a regular healer. She's a spirit-healer. Without her, he would have died."

One heartbeat drummed in Aang's ears. Two. "That doesn't even make sense," he insisted. Because it just couldn't. Could it?

"He's right," Katara nodded. "Why would the spirits give someone another blessing, then just let them die?"

Because- Aang shook his head, trying to shake away the thought. Brrr.

"Aang?" Katara's brows drew down, concerned. "What's wrong?"

Oh, he really didn't like this. But she was asking. "Shaman Tao said, one of the reasons there's an Avatar is because spirits don't think like people," Aang said reluctantly. "And sometimes they can't tell people apart really well. Like Hei Bai. Sokka never hurt his forest. He was just trying to help me talk to Hei Bai. But the spirit took him anyway, because Hei Bai was... well, mad. And hurting. And it was humans that hurt him, and we were there." He traced a toe through some of the dust that had escaped scouring winds. "Or the Painted Lady. She wanted to help her village. She just couldn't. And she didn't want to hurt you, but she had to. Because she was a spirit, and spirits have rules, and..." Oh. Oh.

Oh, monkeyfeathers.

"You okay?" Ke whipped across the courtyard to the inner wall, hauling back double fistfuls of carved wooden mugs of water. "Air up here can dry you out fast, you never see it coming... um. But you know about that."

"Yeah. But thanks." Aang gave Ke a try at a grin, and gulped down snow-cool water. Whoof. "Katara? Langxue... he might be right."

In the middle of lifting her own mug, Katara glanced at him in disbelief. "How could he be right? The spirits wouldn't set people up just to die!"

"But... they might not know people were going to die," Aang said reluctantly. "All the other bending healers got lost. I guess spirit-healers could be, too. Yangchen said yāorén get pulled toward the spirits, and then they get pulled back toward people, and then they're a bridge." He gulped. "So... if the spirits do their job, and tug people one way, but there's nobody left to tug them back... then humans aren't making their part of the bridge. And that's not the spirits' fault."

Katara hugged herself against a chill breeze. "But how can you say that? If there weren't spirit-healers, then we couldn't do what the spirits want. That's not our fault!"

"But it's what we have to do," Aang said, trying not to think of the incredulous fury that had blazed in Langxue's face. Trying hard. Because he was the Avatar, he had to fix the world, and he needed all the help he could get-

But Katara and every one of his friends were helping him because they wanted to. They didn't - the spirits hadn't - it wasn't like he'd ever asked the spirits to - to...

But I did, didn't I? Aang admitted to himself. I told Roku I couldn't do it on my own. I told him, and Kyoshi, and Kuruk, and even Yangchen. If the spirits want me to fix things - I'm just one kid!

So he had asked. And when you asked the spirits for help-

Koh. The Painted Lady. Temul.

Yue, fading away in Sokka's arms. Katara, trapped behind a spirit's eyes. Sokka, laughs gone silent and secret when he thought people didn't see, coming back to camp bruised and singed when there wasn't an enemy firebender for miles.

Ask the spirits for a favor, and there was always a price. And... he was the Avatar. He wasn't the one who ended up paying.

"I think I made a mistake," Aang whispered. He didn't want to ask, he really didn't; he wanted everybody to be helping him because they wanted to be. But-

That's... kind of what Fong did, isn't it? He thought everybody wanted what he wanted. Even when they were screaming at him to stop.

I'm not going to be Fong. I'm not like him!

Aang swallowed hard. "Teo. Did Langxue... want to be a yāorén?"

Teo glanced down. Winced, and shook his head. "He didn't like talking about it. But he said nobody wants to be one. You just end up in the wrong place at the wrong time, and the spirits take you."

"Oh," Aang whispered. Oh, monkey-feathers. What did he do? This was wrong, it was all wrong, and it was his fault, he was the Avatar-

No. No, that's wrong.

"Not my fault," Aang managed, trying not to look at anybody. "I didn't do it. But... I'm the Avatar. The spirits wouldn't have - done that, if things weren't so..." He shook his head, hurting. "So it's not my fault. But - my responsibility?" He looked at Katara, pleading. Tell me I'm wrong. Please!

Blue eyes met his, hurt and sad. "Aang, I..." Her voice died, and she had to look away. "I guess it is."

Aang flinched. You're not supposed to say things like that! I'm the Avatar; I'm trying to fix things for everybody. You're supposed to-

Tell him what he wanted to hear? Like Fong?

I'm not him. I won't be like him.

But it hurt.

Only... maybe getting hurt was the right thing to do. Because he was the Avatar. When he made mistakes, when he just didn't know things - people could get hurt. A lot of people could get hurt.

So he had to ask. Even if it hurt. "So... are the drowned my responsibility, too?" Whatever they were. Because with a name like that... he had a really bad feeling about this.

"What? No!" Katara said quickly, crossing the courtyard to put a hand on his arm. "Sometimes bad things happen to people, and it takes their spirits time to get over it. That's all."

Her hand was warm, and comforting, and he just wanted to smile back up at her. Things were going to be all right. Somehow.

"So... do we have to go back down the mountain today?" Katara asked, gaze shifting away. "I guess you have to, if you're going to learn firebending, but - why do you want to learn firebending now?"

She did that on purpose.

On one hand, he couldn't help but feel grateful. He didn't want to be responsible for anyone else's pain. On the other...

She wasn't lying to him. She just wasn't telling the truth. And he'd never noticed it before, because she wasn't lying.

Like Zuko's I don't want to hurt you. Not a lie. But - and this was scary, just so way scary to think about - don't want to, didn't mean Zuko wouldn't.

Air dodged. Water deflected. How many times had Katara deflected him?

"I don't want to learn firebending," Aang admitted. "I just- I have to. An Avatar has to master all four elements. If they don't, they're not really the Avatar. And the spirits won't listen. If I don't learn firebending, I can't lift Kyoshi's decree. And I have to." He tried to smile. "If I can't master firebending, I can't beat Ozai. But if I do - then I don't have to beat him. I can just make him not the Fire Lord anymore. And if he's not - the Fire Nation doesn't have to follow him anymore. They can stop fighting."

Silence. Only the whisper of wind over stones, and Teo's low whistle. "Aang? I hate to say it, but..."

"I know," Aang said in a rush. "Fong... he could have stopped, too. But I have to do this. There are people in the Fire Nation who don't want to fight anymore. If I'm the Avatar - I have to be everybody's Avatar. I have to try." Deep breath. He had to get this right. "I know nobody's seen it for a hundred years. But you've all been up there. Where there's nothing holding you up but the wind, and how well you know it. Air is freedom. And we're going to bring that freedom back."

Even for the Fire Nation.

Scary, scary thought. Because, well... freedom to stop fighting, kind of meant freedom to not stop, didn't it? And what if they didn't?

I don't know, Aang admitted to himself, as the others cheered, and Katara smiled. But Sokka says, sometimes you've got to kick the ice and start walking.

And if he didn't pick something to stand for, people like Fong would pick things for him. Whether he liked it or not. So he had to find something he believed in. Something he wouldn't run away from...

Or maybe, something he'd run away for. Because he'd ended up frozen in the first place so the Elders wouldn't choose for him. Because he'd wanted his freedom.

So I'm going to start with that. For everybody.

And hope.

Katara watching the cheering kids sweep Aang inside for snacks, and hugged herself against the wind. I should have told him. I just... can't.

Aang wanted so much to believe the world was fair. That he was doing the right thing. And he was. Helping the Ocean Spirit had been the right thing to do, and stopping the Invasion of the North was definitely the right thing - and if there were Fire Nation drowned out there, it was their own blasted fault.

Maybe he doesn't have to know.

Because there was no way they were going to stay near Zuko. Firebending teachers or not. Half those people down the mountain didn't like Aang - and how could you not like Aang? - and the other half were... confusing. Earth and fire and even a little water mixed up together; who could live like that?

Zuko's people were trying. When she'd been down there, last night, healing anyone she could... one of those long hours, she'd blinked, not sure whose burned man was under her hands.

That had been scary. In the dark, you couldn't tell whose side was right. You couldn't even tell who you were fighting for.

How many more times would Aang have to fight in the dark?

"Young! You said he was young!" Out in Amaya's courtyard, away from the most fragile of the wounded, Langxue gripped his saya with his off hand and tried not to imagine pulling the sheathed sword from his belt to beat a certain smug old firebender over the head. "You didn't say he was stupid!"

Seated on the low wall around the yard, Saoluan smothered a snicker.

For once, General Iroh looked taken aback. "I understand he has made a less than favorable impression on my nephew, young man. But as a yāorén of old, you must understand how your duty to support the Avatar-"

"My duty to what?" Langxue bit out. "Is that what the White Lotus thinks about us? What you've been telling Zuko? No wonder he hides when he sees you coming! He probably thinks you're going to make him train Aang, because Agni forbid you actually do anything about your crazy brother-" Langxue cut himself off at the firebender's startled blink. Subtle. Hard to catch. But there. "You were! You frosted idiot!"

"Whatever your feelings toward the Avatar, Aang must be trained," Iroh said impatiently. "You are bound to the spirits, and will do your duty, as the yāorén did for Yangchen-"

"The Avatar has to be trained by a human!"

That arched skeptical white brows. "The best benders take their learning from the elements themselves," Iroh said sternly.

"The best human benders," Langxue shot back. "The Avatar Spirit isn't human! The spirit of the world becomes a human, so it knows what being human is. And part of being human means learning from human masters. Zuko can't train Aang in firebending. No yāorén can!"

...Damn. Damn it all, he hadn't wanted to say that.

But Iroh has to know, Langxue admitted to himself, feeling Saoluan's startled gaze boring into the back of his head. He has to know what we really are. Or things are going to get screwed up even worse than they have already. Zuko's a dragon-child. Agni never would have shared him, even with La, if there were any other options.

"You imply," Iroh said heavily, "that yāorén are not human."

"We're not. Not exactly." Langxue almost reached out for the spring running through the yard, but thought better of it. He'd save that for if the general got stubborn. "We live like humans. We die like them. But our spirits are tough enough to walk on the edge of the world. That costs us." How did he put this into words, for a firebender whose only knowledge of yāorén was records older than Yangchen's birth? "We can't bend like normal people. Our chi doesn't just touch one element. And it doesn't just move in this world."

Iroh seemed to pale a little. "You are bridges to the spirit world. Like the Avatar."

"Not like him," Langxue corrected. "The Avatar is a spirit living in the human world. A spirit that can travel back to the spirit world, for a while. We're humans acknowledged by the spirits. It's-" He grasped for words. "Look. Aang opens a door, and steps through. He's on one side, he's on the other. He's here, he's there. He's bending the elements, or he's walking in the spirit world. He isn't... he isn't stuck."

Iroh folded his arms, gauging his reply. "And you are."

"We're... like cracks in the world," Langxue managed. "We're here. We're always here. But... part of us is right on the edge of there. All the time." He grimaced. "Part of our chi is touching the spirits. Always. And the Avatar can't learn that." Which wasn't the whole truth, darn it. "He's not supposed to contact the spirits that way. And he's definitely not supposed to learn mixing elements until he's got the four main ones down first. If we teach him anything, we teach him after he's mastered the four styles. And you know what? I am not teaching that brat anything." The icy rage threatened to flood him again, like spray from a winter storm. Give up my sword. Give up my mother's sword.

Because Air monks weren't supposed to kill. As if not having a sword had ever stopped an airbender who wanted people dead.

...And that made his head spin like a monster wave, gut lurching to the point Langxue just wanted to find a corner to hide. And throw up. He'd lived his whole life listening to stories of the peaceful Air Nomads and the evil Fire Nation burning their temples to the ground. Hyourin had grown up on the run from White Wind arrows, his family flitting from cove to cove under the cover of waterbent fogs and darkness, until the day a desperate waterbender had gotten caught in a forest fire and ended up with his soul burned raw.

We're yāorén, Kaze had said. We have to protect both worlds. But we can't do it without the Avatar. We have to find her. We have to teach her who she is, and what she has to do.

They'd had to break an Air nun out of Xiangchen's keeping, keep her with them, and help her find teachers. All the while running from Subodei's hunters. With a grown woman who had all an Avatar's power, but who'd never so much as lifted a hand in anger. Who hadn't even dreamed it was possible.

Before he'd met Yangchen, Hyourin had hated Air. After...

We broke her heart. We had to, we didn't have a choice. She forgave us all.

But he'd never forgiven himself.

Aang's not Yangchen.

It was the only thing keeping Langxue from doing something crazy. Like stalking up ice and snow to the top of that mountain and shaking him.

Though right now, it was a firebender he wanted to shake. "Even if he wasn't a yāorén - you know who Zuko was," Langxue argued. "Why would you ever ask him to teach Aang?"

Iroh regarded him from shadowed eyes. Glanced at Saoluan's curious face, and finally sighed. "I have lost too many friends over the years. Should I not try to reunite an old soul with the friend he gave his life to find?"

The Kyoshi Warrior flinched, and looked away.

Langxue swallowed hard, hurting inside. If he'd been able to live with his family again, even for a little while... "You didn't think it through," Langxue got out, words like broken glass in his throat. "An old soul. Kuzon gave his life to fix what Sozin shattered. To save part of the world Sozin and Azulon and you were tearing apart. Dragon of the West." He did his best not to snarl. "The nightmare you made, Kuzon lived. Aang slept through it all. Think about it."

A hundred years. Aang touched down in the shadows near the shoreline, far from where fires burned near Dragons' Wings' docks even at night. A lot's changed. I didn't want it to be that way, but... it is.

Sokka had tried to tell him. Katara had. Heck, he'd seen Bumi, and it still hadn't sunken in. Though maybe that was because even a hundred years later, Bumi was still Bumi; the same mad earthbending genius he'd always been. White hair and a king's robes hadn't changed that.

What General Fong had been willing to do, though... and what Zuko had been willing to do to stop him...

It'd been different when Shidan had killed Hama. Shidan was old. Shidan wasn't human. Dealing with Shidan was like dealing with fire that walked and talked and snarled; he was dangerous just by breathing, and you figured that out or got burned. Shidan didn't do sorry.

Zuko... Aang took a breath, and blew it across saltwater to watch dark ripples catch glints of firelight. Zuko made him believe it'd been a hundred years.

The way he looked at dawn. Angry, but... sad. Like Kuzon, when-

Oh, Aang did not want to think about that.

But he couldn't forget it. Kuzon's face through Temul's eyes, when the lord of Byakko knew he was dying. When he'd killed people he cared about - people he'd saved - because every onmitsu left alive was another that might go after his family. Another Air Nomad who'd serve Azulon, when the Fire Lord was burning down the world.

It was scary, but - part of Aang wondered if Kuzon hadn't wanted to die. There had been so much pain there. Pain he'd seen before. In a mirror.

I can't do this anymore.

Only - Kuzon hadn't given up. He'd fought. Down to the last moment, the last breath; telling Piandao the Fire Nation wasn't the Fire Lord. Challenging him to choose.

Aang sniffled, and scrubbed at his eyes. Kuzon hadn't given up. But Kuzon had been older. He'd been an Elder. Elders were supposed to make the hard decisions.

And I'm not. I'm just a kid! I shouldn't have to do this!

Surf shushed up the shore, uncaring.

No. Not quite uncaring. There were flashes of light in the water, purple and blue, spreading upward to join a pale white glow from the waxing moon, that billowed and flowed into silk and snow-white hair. "Yue!"

The Moon Spirit reached out, brushing cool light across his reaching fingers. "You are not alone."

It was something he could hold onto, like a lantern in the dark. But it still hurt. "If we'd been faster... if we'd just made Zhao stop, it's not fair-!"

"He chose his actions. As the Ocean chose his fate. And I chose mine." Yue shook her head. "Even spirits can't make the world fair, Aang. We can only try to make it right."

It staggered him. He had to lean on his airstaff; he wasn't sure Yue could have said what she'd just said...

It's not fair. I can't fix the world. It's too big!

Which had made him want to scream, and want to hide, and want to just run away from everyone. Because some things really were impossible, and if he had to splat himself against a mountain, he didn't want Sokka and Katara and Toph getting splatted with him.

But... Yue was saying he couldn't make things fair.

We need the Avatar, Sokka had said, what felt like forever ago. But more than that? We need you.

"I don't have to fix everything?" Aang got out, almost a whisper. "But I have to stop the Fire Lord, I have to stop the war..."

Her fingers curled around his; flowing light. "You must stop the Fire Lord. Stopping the war... that will be the work of a lifetime."

Aang's knees gave out. He thumped down onto damp sand, clutching his airstaff like one of Appa's horns. Because yeah, Yue had said stopping the war would take his whole life, and thinking about the killing going on that long was horrible...

But he didn't have to fix it all at once. And that meant he could get people to help. All his friends could help. And they could do it a piece at a time, city by city and general by general if they had to. As long as it took. Even if it took years.

And that meant he could do it the way Master Gyatso would want him to do it. Not like Kyoshi, tearing apart an island just to stop one general. Not like Roku, blasting Sozin's palace and then just leaving the problem behind, thinking he'd fixed it.

And not like Zuko. Because Zuko's eyes were like Kuzon's, so angry and sad...

He didn't want to have eyes like that. Ever.

You're not me, Zuko had said. Which had seemed so silly, it was so obvious-

"But it's not obvious," Aang realized out loud. "It's... like one of Master Gyatso's koans. The one about the tile."

Pale braids drifting on the wind, Yue raised curious brows. "I don't know that story."

"North Pole, ice, yeah. But it's an old story..." Aang hunted in memory. "There's a student, who finds his Elder meditating, and asks him what he's doing. Which I thought was kind of obvious, but... the Elder says he's cleansing his soul so he'll be enlightened." Aang grinned, remembering the wicked way Gyatso's eyes had twinkled at this part. "So the student picks up a tile, and starts polishing it with his robe. The Elder tries to keep meditating, but - we're Air. We've got to poke things. So he asks what the student's doing. And the kid says, I'm polishing this tile to make a mirror."

Yue laughed, like a whisper of waves.

"Right!" Aang grinned. "The Elder's scratching his arrow, totally lost, and finally says, it doesn't matter how long you polish it, you can't make a tile a mirror!" And this hadn't made sense before. Now it did. "And that's when the kid throws down the tile and says, doesn't matter how long you keep cleansing, that doesn't make you enlightened!"

As the tile shattered, Gyatso's voice murmured in memory, the Elder was enlightened.

"A tile's not a mirror," Aang said, amazed and relieved. "I'm not a great warrior. Or a general, or a king, or anything like that. I'm me. I've got to stop the war like me. By finding out what's wrong, and how we can fix it." He smiled at Yue. Maybe it wasn't impossible. "And... maybe kicking a little butt. After all, I am the Avatar."

Laughing, Yue stepped back into the light. "Be careful, little brother. And good luck."

Clouds moved across the moon, and she was gone.

"I'm me," Aang repeated, the words like dropping lead weights away. "Man. I feel so stupid."

At least he'd figured it out. Better late than never, Gyatso would say.

Okay. So if he was going to end the war his way, then he needed to know what was actually going on. Including the stuff Katara had skipped around telling him.

There's something going on with the water down here, so she doesn't want me bending it, Aang reflected. And bad stuff happened, and people's spirits needed to let go of it.

So... he could fix that, right? After all, she'd said spirits, not ghosts; so whatever was down there wasn't like Temul, and he could do something. He was supposed to be a bridge between spirits and the world. He'd better bridge.

But if it's people's spirits - I'm going to have to make my power quiet, Aang thought. Just stay quiet, and listen.

Hard to do, with the hiss of flames burning yellow and blue from gas bubbling up through the water. Seriously, what was everybody here thinking? Sure, Fire Nation ships were made of metal. Other nations' ships weren't! How could this place claim to be for everybody when fire was burning so loud it drowned out the water?

With a two-handed push, Aang flicked a wave to douse the flames. There. Now it was quiet.

So breathe in, and breathe out, and hold everything still...

Something was moving under the water.

Katara said they were drowned, Aang reminded himself. If they want to talk to me, I guess it makes sense that their spirits would come up... from... the...

Rusted red armor. Dripping seaweed, dank with a stench that turned his stomach, trailing from blackened flesh and gnawed bones. Blind white holes instead of eyes, some writhing with sea worms and... things.

Um. Those aren't spirits.

And they didn't look much like talking.

Chapter 74

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Saoluan warmed night-chilled hands by the little room lantern, deliberately not glancing to her right, where her little brother perched cross-legged on the top bunk. Let him stare out the window. It probably made him feel better. Spirits knew it made her feel better, having twenty feet of open air under the window. A lot of Dragons' Wings was taking the same approach; building up, leaving only the stuff you could do without on the ground floor. The drowned might one day be put to rest, but storm surge and tsunamis were going to be a fact of life. "Hey. String of coppers for your thoughts."

"Doubt they'd be worth that much."

Ooof. Someone was too depressed to even throw a good tantrum. "Is this about that whole yāorén aren't human thing?" Saoluan slid a smile his way. "Because Shidan was pretty good company, once you got past that humans are so weird attitude." She let some of the poking-fun fade from her grin. "You know it's okay, right? You're still my little brother."

"It's not that." Langxue wrapped his arms around himself, eyes cast down in thought. "I forgot. Who I was, who I am - they get all mixed up in my head sometimes. I had to see Aang airbending before I realized, before I could remember..." He shifted his shoulders, and fell silent.

"Think out loud," Saoluan suggested. "I'm awful at guessing what people think." She grinned, and jiggled her bosom. "Unless it's a guy staring at my girls. Then it's pretty obvious."

Langxue grumbled something under his breath that sounded like Zuko.

"No fair," Saoluan pouted. "He doesn't even notice my girls."

"Guanyin's mercy for small favors," Langxue muttered. "He notices how you hack things into tiny bits, trust me." He knuckled his forehead. "It's not that. Not exactly. Well, I guess part of it's that-" He stopped, and sighed, and started over. "I had to see Aang airbend before I remembered there was a difference. The Avatar bends like any human bender. Just - a lot more powerful."

Saoluan touched the warm metal framing lantern glass. "But yāorén don't."

"Yāorén aren't really like the Avatar," Langxue said reluctantly. "The Great Spirits were creating us a long time before the World Spirit decided to be human." One hand let go, tapped on the edge of his bed. "It's like the kelp forests near Kyoshi Island had a boat run aground in them, and got ticked off about it."

Which had been known to happen. "Yeah?" Saoluan asked. Oh. Oh. "You mean like the old story about the ama, the paua shell divers..."

"Comb out my strands, and mend what you have done, and never trespass again," Langxue quoted the old spirit-tale. "Defy me, and the sea itself will rise and strangle you. But keep to your bargain, little diver-girl, and I shall give you strength to match your courage, and the power to brave the dark waters." He shrugged. "That's what yāorén are. We can see the spirits. We touch them. But we're divers holding our breath. We've only got so much air."

Saoluan flinched, remembering the rest of the story. It wasn't a happy tale, even if it had a good ending. "But you can't leave the sea, either. And everything tastes like salt."

Langxue nodded, short and choppy. "The Avatar... it's like that old story of the raven-wolf who gets himself born as the son of a chieftain's daughter, so he can steal the stars. He is a human bender. He's also a spirit. He's not a crack in the world; he's part of both of them."

Saoluan whistled. "General Iroh thinks you're like the Avatar, only watered down for the lightweights. But you're not."

"Good thing, too," Langxue said dryly. "One bender with the power of a Great Spirit is enough for the world to deal with..." His voice trailed off, as he stared out the window. "Something's wrong."

She felt it then; like a silent, chilling rush of wind. The night was suddenly darker.

"No way," Langxue croaked, pale as milk. "Zuko said... but nobody's that stupid, oh hell..."

A gong clanged in the night, rung in measured sets of three that sent panic like ice down Saoluan's spine.

Harbor fires out. Harbor fires out. Harbor fires out-!

Zombies, Aang thought, frozen to the sand as things lurched forward. Like Sokka and the pentapox, only they're really really dead, that's so gross...

Dead, and coming his way. That couldn't be good-

The one reaching for him had skin sliding off like a black glove. It was going to touch him...

Squicked beyond even a teenage male's tolerance for ickiness, Aang seized water with both hands and shoved.

Ice crackled out over the harbor, wriggling fingers lurching to a frozen halt.

Heart beating fast, Aang drew in a relieved breath. Nothing like a foot of ice to stop anything short of a rampaging saber-moose lion-

Choked, and backed off coughing, trying to spit out a horrible taste of salt and decayed flesh. Ugh. Oh man, how could other nations even think of eating meat, it all ended up like that in the end.

Eyes stinging, Aang thumped into metal armor. Froze. Turned, and looked up. Though not too far up.

Even without the skull-mask faceplate, Lieutenant Teruko's expression would have made a lion-dillo quail.

"Um... hi," Aang hazarded, pasting on a smile. "Nice night?"

Teruko's eyes narrowed.

Oh, come on. "Look, I can explain everything-"

"I don't want an explanation."

Zuko's voice. Zuko's very tired voice; which didn't make sense, the last message Toph and Sokka had passed up to the Temple said Zuko had been tired enough to sleep during the day. And shouldn't a firebender still be asleep now? If anybody could sleep, with that gong going off.

But it was Zuko, with a bunch of other firebenders, and Toph and Sokka prying their eyes open not far behind. Sokka rolled his eyes at Zuko, winked at Aang, and looked behind him-

Stopped dead, jaw dropping as he pointed. "Drowned - you - what the heck?"

"Frozen. I suppose that works. For now." Zuko crossed his arms, face set and cold. "It should hold them long enough to get the fires started again. If not... Lieutenant, you'd better send someone to get my uncle. Plan out which bodies need to be incinerated first if any start breaking loose."

"Sir," Teruko nodded. Gestured to one of the others in armor. "Corporal Shoni."

"Ma'am." The marine faded into the shadows of the street.

Why was everybody ignoring him? "I heard there were angry spirits in the water," Aang started, "and I-"

"I do not want to hear it." Pale gold bored into him, cold and weirdly somewhere beyond anger. "I don't want your reasons. I don't want your excuses. I don't want your explanations. All I want to know is, what did you do?"

Why was that level tone so utterly scary?

Sokka stifled a groan. "Katara never finished telling you about the drowned, did she?"

Toph wrinkled her nose. "I'm gonna guess that was important."

"Yeah," Sokka sighed. "It was."

Zuko's expression didn't change. At all.

Which made that creepy feeling tickling Aang's neck get even stronger. That was not what was supposed to happen. If something that went wrong was somebody else's fault, you were supposed to get mad at them.

Except Zuko wasn't a Temple Elder. As far as Aang could tell, the firebender had given up on whose fault something was, whether it was an army on his doorstep or Azula dropping in on Ba Sing Se. Zuko was only looking for whose responsibility it was to fix it.

But I did fix it! They're frozen. That stopped them, right?

"I'm going to assume you know absolutely nothing," Zuko said, still eerily calm. "I thought, after what Teo and his people saw happen here, that they would have told you not to put the harbor fires out. I thought that Katara, who's so sure the Water Tribes understand the Ocean better than anyone else, would have at least mentioned what can happen to someone who drowns when a spirit goes crazy." He shrugged. "Apparently I was wrong. Though she must have told you something, or you wouldn't have come down here alone, without her, to bend our harbor."

"She wouldn't tell me why not!" Aang shot back, stung. That sounded like Zuko thought he'd lied to Katara. And he hadn't! He just hadn't told her where he was going. Like she hadn't told him why not to bend the water. That was fair, right? "All I wanted to do was find out why. What's wrong with the sea here? What did you do to get all these spirits angry at people-"

Pale gold narrowed. "They are not spirits."

...Oh. Uh-oh.

Toph latched onto Sokka's sleeve. "You might want to move back a bit."

Sokka shook his head. "This is my fault. I trusted Katara."

"Right. You trusted Sugar Queen to tell Twinkletoes something he didn't want to hear?" Toph said sourly.

"Yeah." Sokka grimaced. "Bad move."

"What didn't she tell me?" Aang demanded, frustrated. "How can I fix things with spirits, or - or ghosts, if nobody tells me anything?"

"We would have told you." Zuko's gaze bored into him. "If you'd asked."

Aang shook his head; no way. "If Katara wouldn't tell me, why would you?"

"Because we live here," Zuko gritted out. "We've already got a cranky volcano under our feet. You think we need you waking anything else up? And whether or not you thought we'd tell you anything - we live here! And you went to bend somewhere Teo and Katara told you not to? This is my domain. You and your allies are supposed to be here as guests. Guests ask their hosts before they charge into a dragon's cave. But did you? No! You come sneaking in like a thief, just to poke something you know could be dangerous. And you don't have the decency the spirits gave a rattle-viper, to warn us first! Where the hell are your manners?"

"You have zombies lurching out of the ocean, and you're worried about my manners?" Aang said in disbelief.

"We can deal with the drowned," Zuko bit out. "We've done it before. And between us and Asagitatsu, we had them quiet. Until you decided you just had to poke a problem that we had under control. Because you're the Avatar, you're the answer to everyone's prayers, you're going to fix the world. You can't be bothered with boring little details like talking to the people who live here! So yes, I am! Because you put my people in danger - you put everyone in danger - when you jump straight into the middle of a spirit-mess assuming everything wrong is the humans' fault! And if it was just spirits, that'd be a disaster - but no, you've got to push right over the edge into catastrophe, because you do it with everything! See problem! Airbend at problem! Lie to people to make the problems just hide for a while, never mind what happens when you're gone! You are a flying, chattering menace! You jumped in up to your neck with Fong, you jumped in up to our necks here, and Agni only knows what boiling tar-pits you're going to jump into next, because you never bother asking what's going on!" Fire sparked off his knuckles as Zuko clenched and unclenched his fists. "You are the Avatar. You are supposed to mediate between humans and the spirits. The spirits require anybody who deals with them to be careful, cunning, and above all, polite." A deep, snarling breath. "You - you- What the hell is wrong with you?"

"I'm going to walk out on a ledge here," Toph put in bluntly. "Is this why Sozin could talk you guys into burning out temples?"

Whoa, what? Aang stiffened. That sounded like Toph thought part of the war might have been the Air Nomads' fault!

"Oh, no," Zuko said grimly. "No. I have... records, of Byakko dealing with Master Gyatso. He didn't fly into someone's territory without asking if he could stick around. He didn't swirl up windstorms near the crops. He didn't put out memorial flames." A steaming breath. "No. This isn't an Air Nomad thing. Though I'm guessing he's used that line on all of you. Why do something boring like behave when he can just fly in, do whatever he feels like, and fly back out while someone else cleans up the mess? You spoiled little self-indulgent idiot-" Zuko cut himself off with a slash of his hand. "Small words. I am going to use very small words. And you are going to listen. And then you are going to open that glider and go back up the mountain, and not go near the water again without finding me first."

"Or what?" Aang challenged. "Like you said. I'm the Avatar."

"Aang?" Sokka was looking up. Way up. "I... think you'd better look behind you."

Hot wind. Like ashes from a firestorm. Or... something very big, breathing silent and strong.

Wary, Aang looked.

You trespass.

A curling shape of scales and flames, blue and green and crimson. Large enough to be here and above the cone at once, glowing eyes weighing him like razor-edged scales.

You trespass, Avatar. The third time.

Once you came in storms, maddened and slaying. And I slew you. Again you came, allowing humans to drive my dragons away. And I slew you. Again you come. And my dragon-child bids me not to slay you. Teeth of fiery sparks gleamed in the night; a struck-match taste of sulfur bit Aang's tongue. You trespass.

"She wants to erupt, you know," Zuko said, into that hot silence. "She's angry, and she's hungry, and she wants someone to pay for neglecting her. You're the Avatar. Like Kesuk was. Like Yangchen was. Spirits can't tell us apart."

Aang swallowed, throat dry. "But..."

"And that, is why you have to be polite to spirits. Always," Zuko said coldly. "Because you have no idea who they've dealt with last. Or what that human did to them. Or didn't do. When you deal with a spirit, Avatar Aang, you get the consequences of everything every other human has done to tick. Them. Off." Another long, slow breath. "And that's what you pulled up tonight. The drowned aren't spirits. They're restless dead. And they're restless because they were killed by a spirit. Something they couldn't run from, and couldn't fight. Which means they died hating... and that hate lets something else use them. Whether they like it or not. That hate puts those ghosts and those bodies in the hands of a Great Spirit. One who hates all humankind for the horrible crime of existing."

"But," Aang protested, still not able to look away from those glowing, fire-smoke eyes, "the Great Spirits help us..."

"Do they? Do all of them?" Zuko snorted. "You know there's one who doesn't. And he's the one who holds the drowned. Like he can hold all the unhallowed dead. The Face-Stealer."

"You mean K-" Aang gulped, and cut himself off. Spirits' names got their attention, Tao had said. If anything Zuko was saying was true... that would be bad.

"At least someone taught you that much," Zuko said grimly. "So. Small words. The ocean here is dangerous. Do not bend it. Do not put out the flames. And the next time someone tells you something is dangerous, ask why." He shook his head, slow and angry. "And if they won't tell you, find someone else to ask. Before you bring something like that-" he jerked his head toward iced bodies, slipping back under the waves "-down on some poor damn innocent people who actually believe in you."

Chapter End Notes

Sad thing here is that Aang was actually trying to do something responsible. And failed. Badly.

On his side, Zuko is tired. And cranky. And he just got a jolt of pure adrenaline to an already overloaded system. He is no mood to be nice or charitable, much less fair.

Poor Communication Kills, indeed.

...And Aang dealing with zombies? He's the Avatar. Getting two armies to stop killing each other? Hard. Tackling a bunch of "monsters" he doesn't have to worry about killing? Easy.

Chapter 75

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"For you are crunchy, and taste good with hot sauce," Sokka muttered to himself, perched on the dock warehouse roof where he could just make out the fire-tower in the faint light before dawn. Ordinarily he'd be dead to the world right now, and glad of it. But after seeing Aang off last night, which had been a short but very intense ordeal of yes, I think the volcano means it-

Yeah. Sleep had been kind of hard to come by.

Sokka leaned on the low wall edging the roof; a wall that made so much more sense when you knew dead bodies might come lurching up out of the water bent on mayhem.

Like Zuko makes more sense when you know he's spent his whole life with people trying to kill him, Sokka reflected. Like the Fire Nation makes more sense when you think about people who love fire and sharp pointy things getting run over by a swarm of Aangs.

It still hurt, understanding that. He'd walk through fire for Aang. He already had. Aang was a friend. And when Aang thought about what he was doing, and Aang was trying, he could be a really good guy. Better than Sokka thought he was, sometimes. Aang could forgive things. And people.

Not me, Sokka admitted. I can let things go, sure. But it's not the same. He frowned, something in that thought and the morning chill tweaking a memory. Something about spirits, that had hit him while he was really hoping a volcano-spirit wasn't looking for Avatar-munchies...

The faint steam from the cone was white as Gran-Gran's hair.

"Spirits don't forgive," Sokka said in a rush, remembering one of Gran-Gran's winter tales. "They can forget, but they never forgive. People can change. Spirits are what they are."

He slapped himself in the forehead.

Augh. Aang's got it all backwards. He thinks Hei Bai forgave the villagers, once he showed the big orca-bear... thing the acorn was sprouting.

And that's not what happened.

If Hei Bai was the forest spirit - yeah, he was mad because humans burned the forest down. Then Aang showed him it was coming back. So he turned everybody loose. Because he forgot. Because the forest was growing again, and that means happy forest spirits, and happy spirits don't kidnap people. Usually.

Kicking against the inside edge of the wall, Sokka sighed. "The Painted Lady didn't forgive Katara. She just got what she needed to get to stop taking revenge. Temul didn't forgive the Avatar; she just took something he cared about out from under him, so she could get revenge. Which means the Face-Stealer's not going to forgive people, either. Ouch." And... this was going to be nasty. Aang wanted people to forgive each other and be friends. Koh not only wouldn't forgive humans, he couldn't.

So how do we get Koh into a spot where he's a happy Face-Stealer, instead of a kill-all-humans one? Sokka wondered. Huh. Tricky. If he thinks the World Spirit's his... um, dad or something, and humans-

Thought screeched to a terrified halt.

Humans killed the Avatar. Even if that Avatar deserved it - she had the World Spirit in her. It'd take a lot to forget something like that.

Oooh, and now Sokka felt queasy in a way that had nothing to do with those weird little shellfish-spider critters he'd snacked on last night. Even if they had still been twitching when he scooped them out of the pot.

Humans killed the Avatar. What the heck do we do if Koh's not in this on his own?

Between what people in Dragons' Wings had let drop after their patron spirit had showed up, and what Temul's memories had left him about the Four Deaths, the volcanoes dragons kept happy so they wouldn't bury the world in freezing ash - the fact that Asagitatsu hadn't gone off already was a small miracle. And the only reason she wasn't going off was because Zuko had planted himself here, laying his own life on the line to wrestle with a volcano.

And Zuko wouldn't be here if he hadn't been exiled, Sokka knew. And definitely not here if he hadn't chased Aang across the world before that whole mess in Ba Sing Se. And Aang wouldn't have been there to chase if Katara hadn't lost her temper under the midnight sun in an ice field, and that was...

Midnight sun. Agni.

Spirits lump dragons and humans together, Sokka realized. If Agni wants dragons to live, humans have to survive. Agni's got just as much riding on getting Koh's head back on straight as we do.

Agni did. What about the World Spirit?

...Oh, monkey-feathers.

Damn it, he could not see a downside to Koh's plot. Not from the World Spirit's point of view. Humans got wiped out? Then the World Spirit just wouldn't incarnate anymore. So what? Without humans around, there wouldn't be anyone the Avatar needed to mediate with the spirit world for. Humans managed to pull off a last-minute save and cool Koh off? Again, so what? Then the World Spirit would just keep on keeping on; and the Avatar would die, and return, and die, and return. Any way you sliced it, the World Spirit didn't have a polar dog in this fight. Heck, it was gaining from this. The humans who'd killed it were going through hell, and it could just sit back and watch.

And for a hundred years... that was exactly what it'd done.

Oh hell. Sokka swallowed hard. It fits.

Everything Temul had said, about people's lives getting worn away too soon. Everything that had gone wrong in the world over the last few centuries. Why the Avatar had just up and vanished in a storm, when weather-spirits should have steered clear of doing anything worse than nipping him with frost.

The World Spirit's got an axe to grind. How the heck do we fix that?

He didn't know. For once in his life, there were no shiny ideas, no neat plans put together with sinew twine and sticky-gum; and even though the sea was only an airbender's jump below him, breathing felt like the air was as thin as where clouds scraped the sky...

Do the hard stuff first, Sokka reminded himself; ducking his head, making sure he slowed down his breathing no matter how much he wanted to panic. Count five in, hold two, count five out. Dad, Piandao, Temul; all different as night and day, but they'd all thumped him to stay calm. Because in the middle of a fight panic didn't just kill you, it killed the guy next to you - and if a chief's son or a great name panicked, everybody in the whole tribe was next to you.

Hard stuff first. Impossible stuff later.

A touch of sulfur came to his nose, and Sokka eyed the cone. "There's some of the hard stuff. How do we fix it so the volcano-dragon forgets Avatars being stupid... damn. Damn, I don't think we've got the time. Meaning we really, really need to get off this rock." He swallowed hard. "Gran-Gran, I wish you were here. Aang could really use your stories."

"I wish she was, too." A whispering chuckle, like the crackle of a match. "She sounds like a remarkable woman."

Ack - sword - block-!

Temul held up a translucent hand. "Rest easy, young man. This isn't the Fire Nation; not quite. I do have limits."

Oh. Whew. Though oddly, that made him even more worried. "Is something wrong?" Sokka asked, stepping closer. "Shu Jing? Master Piandao? The Fire Lord?" Oh, man. "Did Aang wake something else up?"

"Not that I know of," Temul said dryly. "Though the spirit here is more than cranky enough. Fortunate I'm not tampering with one of hers; she probably won't bother me. Which may be how her dragons were driven away the first time; she wasn't bothered. Until she was." The ghost drew a cooling breath. "My adoptive son's going to get himself in hot water again playing with flowers, but that's his nature. And Shu Jing holds well; you'd know that, if you only let yourself listen."

Oh, hell no. Spooky spirit stuff was Aang's job, not his. And if he kept telling himself that, maybe he'd believe it. "So it's the Fire Lord," Sokka decided. And there wasn't much time before sunrise. "What can you tell me?"

"Rumors," Temul said succinctly. "Some say Princess Azula vanished from the capital on the very day of the eclipse. You can guess whose flyaway feet Ozai throws that charge at. But some say she didn't go alone. That she had allies, and a plan." Pale gold was deadly serious. "I think you know, Azula with a plan is more deadly than a poisoned blade."

"Kind of figured that out," Sokka muttered. "How'd Zuko last this long?"

"Fast feet. And he's too stubborn to die," the ghost said dryly. "Kin against kin is like fighting a darkened mirror. Even if you win, you'll bleed. Who can bleed longest; that's the question."

Yeah... wait. "Are we still talking about Zuko and Azula?"

"Are we?" Snarling under her breath, Temul stared up toward the Temple. "I could cheerfully tattoo the rest of his hide what for what he's done. For what he is, and what he'd teach any children trusted to his care. But for one spirit with too many legs, he might be what you need. If he'll think."

That was interesting. A little hair-raising, given the Fire Nation tended to reserve tattoos for people of an incurably criminal nature, but interesting. Sokka glanced away, toward the mountains. Still couldn't see the Temple from here, but maybe things weren't as bad as he thought.

Grinning, he turned back toward a cranky ghost. "If you think there's something okay about Aang, we're really in trouble-"

Only sunlight remained.

"You know," Toph circled her hands, shoving hot sand back across the training ground toward Zuko, "Twinkletoes was trying to figure stuff out on his own. Not all his fault it went smooosh." She fanned her fingers, splitting the red-hot lump into three streams he had to fight to heat up again. "Nobody gets to be good without really messing up sometimes."

"I know," Zuko sighed, trying not to bite the words out. They were borrowing a corner of the marines' training ground to work; which had the advantage of keeping him under eyes Lieutenant Teruko trusted, while still allowing enough distance that he could talk to the Blind Bandit without too many listening ears. He needed that right now. "But when you and I screw up, we try to make smaller messes. One fire. One big rock." He breathed out, stifling a snarl. "He put out the whole harbor."

"Aang's got a problem with thinking small," Toph agreed, swooping sand back his way smooth as a flight of manta rays in the surf. "Guess when you're the Avatar, you've got plenty of chi to burn."

Zuko deflected the hot lump with a push. "If he tries to do the same thing firebending he does with everything else, he's going to wind up flat on his back, wondering where all the pretty lights came from. Fire doesn't forgive. Turn your back on it, and it'll sear everything you have." He glanced at Toph's toes, trying to read what move she'd make next. Her earthbending didn't use the same forms as the rest of the Earth Kingdom, which caught him off guard more times than he liked to think about. But if you paid attention to those dirty feet - Toph stepped precisely. A flex of her toes was often the best clue as to what she'd try to bend next.

"What I don't understand is why," Zuko went on, still tamping down smoldering aggravation. "He bends like he's trying to make the biggest, flashiest come kill me sign for the whole Fire Nation. What's the point? He's the Avatar. Anybody who knows that, knows he can break a whole mountain in half. Anybody who doesn't... the fewer people who know who he is, the fewer flaming boulders he's got to dodge. Why does he do it?"

Toph let her arms fall to her sides, almost dropping red-hot sand on his feet before Zuko sidestepped it. Clapped her hands in front of her chest, and fluttered her eyelashes the way Jia would at a boy about to be sunk in quicksand up to his knees. "Oh Aang! That was so awesome! You're such a powerful bender. Did I ever tell you a fortuneteller said I was going to marry a powerful bender?"

"Stop," Zuko managed, stomach already lurching from the cloying sugar in her voice. "Please."

Toph smirked at him, back to her normal smug tone. "Did her good, huh?"

"Urgh," Zuko agreed, still nauseated. "Seriously? You think he's trying to impress Katara? Why?"

Toph crossed her arms. "There's something really weird about me having to tell you that, Sparky. You've got eyes. And people keep telling me she's pretty."

Zuko shook his head in disbelief, feeling sand's heat radiate to his toes. "Mai is pretty. Ty Lee is pretty. My sister is pretty."

"Okay, maybe sometimes eyes don't help," Toph allowed. "Come on. You never tried to show off for somebody you wanted to like you?"

It was on the tip of his tongue to tell her no, never, fire was dangerous-

But Zuko winced, and gave her the truth. "Not with bending."

Even now, he could feel the scar throb.

Toph drew back a little. "You messed up bad, huh?"

"Pretty bad," Zuko admitted. He'd gone over that council meeting a thousand times in his head. What he might have done. What he might have said. What he might have seen, if only he'd known to look.

But I didn't know. And Father... Ozai saw a way to get rid of the heir he didn't want anymore.

Zuko shoved that old ache back, breathing in salt air. "Trying to save the world, and he's thinking about pretty girls. Too bad Uncle didn't have him on a ship for three years." And he was not going to get mad at that, not if he could help it. When the world had fallen apart around him, he'd grabbed onto anything that seemed solid. Katara might be bad news for him, but she'd been there for Aang, solid as a glacier.

Aang needs something to hang onto. The rest of his world is gone. Great-grandfather killed it.

If someone had killed Uncle Iroh right after he'd been exiled...

I'd have fallen apart. There wouldn't be anything left.

A dust-ball smacked him in the chest. "Sad thoughts. Quit that," Toph said firmly.

"Trying," Zuko sighed. "I can't dump him somewhere safe to grow up. He wouldn't stay put." He lit a flame in his palm, staring into it as if he could find answers in the fire. "The Avatar's not supposed to be told until he's sixteen. If Aang was still with Master Gyatso..."

"Kind of not an option." Toph scraped her foot on the ground, sand curling in a wave to follow it. "And he still needs a firebending master. Somebody he'll listen to. He's not real good with that."

Zuko grimaced, dousing the flame. "I know. He doesn't listen to Fire Nation people, and sometimes we just want to bite him-"

"He's not good at listening," Toph cut him off. "To anybody. It's not just flamey guys. I had to throw boulders at him and let him face down a saber-moose lion before he figured out there was no trick to earthbending. There's just you, stubborn, and the rock." She drew the sand into a whirling hoop, fingering it like she'd just thought of something evil to do with it. "Sokka says Roku told Aang mastering the elements took a lifetime, but he had to do it faster. And he could do it, because the Avatar's done it before."

...Of course. He'd been waiting for the next disaster to avalanche onto his head. "You mean, Roku told him it didn't matter what he did, he'd pull off a miracle," Zuko said heavily. "Because he's the Avatar, and the Avatar Spirit knows all this already." He buried his face in his hands. Too much. It was just too much, and it explained everything that had gone wrong so horribly well.

The Avatar Spirit knows bending. Of course it does; it's the spirit of the whole world! But Aang's not the Avatar Spirit. He's a human being, and he doesn't know something until he learns it himself.

Only Roku had told Aang he already knew. Which was exactly what a twelve-year-old trapped in a world trying to kill him wanted to believe.

Just look at the messes you got into when you were his age, Zuko told himself. And you had plenty of people telling you that you didn't know everything.

Sand shushed down to the ground, and quiet steps brought Toph in reach to prod his elbow.

"Sparky?"

"Roku. Is. An idiot," Zuko managed.

Another jab at his funnybone. "Hey. That's Great-Grandpa Idiot to you."

"Which explains so much about my family," Zuko mumbled through his fingers. "What the hell was Azulon thinking? What was Sozin thinking? Were they crazy?"

"Um." Toph's voice dripped this is obvious. "Fire Lord Sozin. Out to conquer the whole world. The word duh mean anything to you?"

Okay, maybe he'd deserved that one.

"So Roku could have thought through what he said a little better," the earthbender went on. "We've still got the same problem. Aang needs a firebending teacher. If you want to get him off the volcano, you've got to help him find one. I'm guessing you can't do it. You, Katara, Aang, the same training ground - could get messy. What about Uncle?"

"Bad idea." Zuko lifted his head. "Uncle Iroh has promises to keep. They might not be good for Aang. They definitely wouldn't be good for teaching somebody. You have to trust your teacher. You have to put your spirit into your bending, and know the master watching over you won't fireball you the minute you turn your back." He groped for the right words. "Uncle wouldn't hurt him. Physically. And that's wrong, too. Fire burns. You have to know that. But when you bend, your spirit's wide open. You have to trust your teacher."

"So we need a flamey guy who can trust Aang to trust him." Toph looked like she'd bitten into a raw limon. "Great."

"And we need someone Aang will listen to," Zuko added, thinking hard. Reaching reluctantly back to memories of a man who'd known Aang, and watched him listen to... "We need an Elder."

"Kind of thin on the ground," Toph said wryly.

"We need someone like an Elder," Zuko amended. "Someone who's been officially recognized as a firebending master. As a teacher. Someone who has the right to be teaching Aang, without running right up against the Avatar's own decree. Someone like..."

Yeah. That might just work.

"I have an idea."

"So I made the drowned." Aang leaned against Appa's side, looking out into the shreds of windswept cloud between the Temple and the next mountain. "Why would the Ocean do something so horrible? We had to stop the Fire Navy, but - storms kill people all the time. Why did sinking the fleet make such a big problem?"

Katara tucked her hair a little closer around her ears. The wind felt so cold when he talked about spirits. "Storms can make drowned, too. Sometimes." She glanced around the courtyard, watching Teo's friends practice wind control with bright orange paper gliders. "Gran-Gran says it's not what the spirits do that make a drowned. It's the person who chooses to fight the ocean. If they accepted that the sea has a right to take them, it wouldn't happen. It's not your fault."

Pushing some of Appa's fur away from his face, Aang looked at her with wide eyes. "How can somebody not fight when they're drowning?"

"When you know it's your time." Katara tried not to frown. Her heart ached. Kids hated understanding this. And sometimes, Aang still was a kid. "Our strength comes from the Ocean. He has the right to take it back."

"Um... pretty sure airbenders' strength doesn't." Aang scratched the back of his head. "And we know firebenders' doesn't. So how can they not fight?"

That was a creepy thought. "The Ocean's a great spirit," Katara said firmly. "People ought to accept that, no matter what nation they are."

Aang crossed his arms, glancing seaward. "So if Agni used a volcano to wipe out the Northern Water Tribe, they shouldn't fight that, either."

"What? No!" Katara planted her hands on her hips. "What is wrong with you? You did what you had to, to stop the invasion-"

"Maybe I don't like that nobody told me what would happen!" Aang burst out. "You knew what the drowned were. All of you knew about it! But nobody told me." He shuddered, turning away. "You knew what would happen. And you let me do it. How's that different from what Fong wanted me to do? How is it any different?"

"Maybe because none of us let you do it?" Katara snapped back, finally pushed past patience. "The Moon was dead, and your eyes glowed, and the Ocean's glowed back, and you were gone. You were gone, Aang! The pool swallowed you whole, and we had no idea what was happening! Let you? How could we stop you?"

"You wouldn't have wanted to stop me-"

"Yes, I would have!"

The courtyard was suddenly very, very quiet.

"I hate the Fire Nation." Katara tried to keep how much out of her voice, deliberately not looking toward listening ears. "I'm glad they died. But I would have stopped you if I could! Not because of them. Because of you!"

"But you didn't tell me." Aang's shoulders hunched down, as if he wanted to bury himself in warm fur.

"I didn't want you to be hurt." Katara winced. "You've been hurt enough already."

"But Zuko's people could have-"

"Zuko knows what's in the water, and he's here anyway," Katara cut him off. "If people get hurt, I'm sorry. But they made their own choices." She swallowed. "Like Hama did. Sometimes... people don't want to be saved."

Now Aang looked at her. "Zuko isn't like Hama."

You saw what he did to Fong. But Aang seemed ready to forgive that. She couldn't see how. "No. He could be worse. He thinks he's doing the right thing. Just like Fire Lord Sozin did."

"And Kyoshi," Aang muttered.

Katara tried to wave that off. "That's not the same."

"How do I know?" Aang stared at her, pale and sad. "How does anybody know what's right?"

"Stopping the Fire Lord is the right thing to do," Katara insisted. "The war is wrong!"

"If stopping the Fire Lord means killing people like I did at the North Pole," Aang swallowed, "I won't do it. It'd be horrible. It'd be wrong."

Katara took a step back. "More horrible than what Ozai's going to do?"

"I don't know what Ozai's going to do!" Aang's fists were white-knuckled. "I just know what I'm going to do. And I'm not doing that. Not again. I've got to find another way!" He shook his head. "I've got to learn firebending."

Katara gave him a skeptical glance. "From someone here?"

"No," Sokka's voice broke in. "Not someone here."

Katara stiffened. Turned. That glimpse of green better not be what she thought it was. "Toph! You shouldn't be up here!" Much, much better to get upset about that than the scarred, scowling figure in red beside her.

"Eh, I came up the slow way," Toph waved it off. "Should be fine for a few hours." She jerked a thumb over her shoulder. "Sparky's got something you need to hear."

"You need to find a firebending teacher." Zuko took the seat Teo had grudgingly offered him, watching Aang and his friends sit and slouch over other chairs and benches in one of the Mechanist's idle workrooms. Better if they were all sitting down for this. And much, much better to have this conversation inside, away from the wind and any large streams of snowmelt. "And it can't be here. Asagitatsu's cranky enough as it is. We're trying to empty a lagoon with spoons, and any time you bend near her she puffs up more steam."

"That's not--"

"It doesn't matter whose fault that is." Zuko let himself glance at Katara, no more. Staring would set her off; avoiding her gaze would imply he was afraid of her, and he'd already seen how much mercy the waterbender had for her enemies. "Right now, you should remember that one of the things that's kept you alive this long is you've always been moving targets. So keep moving. If you stay here, Fire Lord Ozai has most of the people he wants dead wrapped up like a solstice present. Move, and he has to throw forces in at least two different directions. That will slow him down. And we all need as much time as we can get." He met gray eyes. "You need to learn firebending? Then get moving. There's no one here who can teach you."

"You mean, no one who will," Aang argued.

"I mean no one who can," Zuko said flatly. "The civilians we've picked up have barely any training at all. Suzuran's crew? Right now they're shielded from spirit malice - mostly - because they're following Captain Jee, he's following me, and I'm an exile. You're a declared enemy of the Fire Nation. If they tried to train you, they might as well stab themselves with hooks and troll for leopard-sharks. They'd live longer. Uncle Iroh? He's never been exiled. If he were to act directly against the Fire Lord, his brother... You're the spirit bridge. You figure it out." He shook his head. "Besides. Could you trust a teacher willing to turn against his own brother?"

"Yes," Aang answered, without a breath of hesitation. "The right thing is the right thing. It doesn't matter who you are."

"And there you have why I can't train you," Zuko said dryly, tapping on one arm of his chair. One reason, anyway. "I think you're crazy." He shrugged, before Katara could jump in with anything about who was the real crazy person in this room. "So. You need a firebending teacher who doesn't hate your guts, who you and your allies can trust, and who won't get in trouble for teaching the Avatar. Or at least someone who can't get into any worse trouble." He couldn't help but smirk. "I think it's kind of funny you haven't figured out who to look for. After all, he only risked his neck to help you talk to Roku. And escape."

Toph's brows had climbed into her bangs. "Seriously? There's a firebender who likes you guys? Why didn't you tell me about him before?"

"Um." Aang shifted uncomfortably on his bench. "Well... it's been months, and... we don't know what happened to him..."

Lie. "You saw Fire Sage Shiyu get taken by Zhao, just like I did," Zuko stated. "You were in the Fire Nation for weeks. Don't tell me you didn't ask..." He trailed off, as Sokka winced, and Katara looked away.

I don't believe this. I do not believe this. "You didn't ask," Zuko said flatly. "The man risked his life for you! Risked it twice, there's no way he could have helped you get into the sanctuary without breaking loyalty! And you didn't ask?"

"We were busy!" Aang flung back. "Trying to stop the Fire Lord! And... he... it was months ago. There wasn't anything we could do!"

"Busy?" Zuko echoed, still wondering if he was hearing right. "Busy is the komodo-rhinos' corral broke, we can't make smoke-sugar today. Busy isn't... you..." He was not going to set anything on fire. The Mechanists' people had tried to find all the natural gas leaks up here, but who knew what they might have missed. "You're out to overthrow the Fire Lord and you're too busy to find someone who stuck his neck out to help?"

Toph shifted on her bench, toes brushing the stone like she wanted to sink in and grab it. He couldn't blame her. Earth lived for debts and balance. This... well.

Sorry, Toph, Zuko thought, wishing he could wince without giving Katara ideas. Aang doesn't honor debts. He doesn't even see they're there. You've got a bargain with someone who flies away from trouble, and there is nothing I can do about it.

"It's not like his ashes would help us!" Katara flung at him.

Water Tribe barbarian. Which wasn't fair, Zuko knew that even when he thought it, but - she'd been dragged all over the world, and she still didn't know things worked differently off the ice? "Shiyu is a Fire Sage. If Zhao didn't execute him on the spot for treason, he has rights. Including a trial. It's been long enough that he's probably been tried, sure. But he's a Fire Sage. And in case you missed the problem in our backyard-" He jerked a thumb back toward Dragons' Wings. "-we do not kill off master-level firebenders without a damn good reason. You can't threaten their relatives - who are probably also masters - to calm down a volcano if your captive's dead." Breathe. Small words. It's not obvious; not to people who push their problems off of ice shelves. "Odds are he's in prison. Not dead."

"Oh, prison!" Aang brightened. "I was in prison once. You meet some really neat people there."

That did not make sense. At all. "You? Were in prison? Where?" Zuko asked, incredulous. "Who could hold you?" Not that Zhao hadn't done a fair job of that in Pohuai Stronghold. But nobody sane was going to mistake that for a prison.

Sane. Remember who you're dealing with.

"They couldn't hold him." Katara cast a fondly exasperated look Aang's way. "He just wanted to stay there until we proved Avatar Kyoshi was innocent, so they'd stop burning Avatar statues."

"Which didn't work out so well," Sokka sighed. "She didn't kill him. But when she split Kyoshi Island off the mainland, Chin died. Kind of close enough."

Chin, burning the Avatar... aha. Though now it made even less sense. "You were in Chin Village, for Avatar Day," Zuko said numbly. "You know they boil people in oil there, right?" Uncle Iroh had gone into excruciating detail, specifically to hammer home that there were places so crazy even the Fire Army left them alone.

"That's what they said." Aang sounded a little less than sure. Then shrugged, and grinned. "But then their village got attacked by the Fire Nation, so they switched it to community service."

Zuko stared at him.

"What?"

He cannot be that dense... oh hell, yes, he can. Zuko took a deep breath. Funny how it didn't seem to calm him down. "You know," he emphasized, "they boil people in oil there."

"They had that on their wheel, sure," Aang nodded. "But they knew they couldn't do that to me. I'm the Avatar. They were just trying to scare us." Gray eyes were surprisingly sober. "They were still angry about Chin. Now they won't be."

"And that will make the next person they boil feel so much better." Zuko bit off the rest of his words, not trusting himself to say more. What was it like, being blithely confident that you never had to answer to the law unless you wanted to?

"There won't be a next person." Aang leaned forward, determined. "They were angry at the Avatar. Now they're not. People can change."

Usually they have to be dragged headfirst through a fire, first. Zuko didn't look away. "Do your friends a favor. If we're alive a year from now, go back to Chin Village. See if they're still using that wheel."

"They aren't!"

"Then it doesn't cost you anything to check, does it?" Not solving the problem, Zuko told himself grudgingly. Agni only knew he wanted to hammer the Avatar with what it did to people when someone made it so the law wasn't the law, but only what some idealistic idiot decided was right.

But now is not the time.

"If Fire Sage Shiyu's alive, he's in prison," Zuko stated. "Probably one of a few specific prisons; you can't hold a master firebender just anywhere, even with chi-blockers. Think Pohuai Stronghold. Only that was a fortress. Prisons are designed to keep benders from breaking out, or anyone else from breaking in." He smirked a little. "I can give you information that will make it easier. Mai's uncle is a warden." Boiling Rock's warden, specifically. And Boiling Rock was a pretty good bet for where a treasonous Fire Sage would have ended up.

Though most of his information on Fire Nation prisons had come from Uncle Iroh, not Mai. Probably because Iroh had always worried his nephew would end up in one.

Be fair, Zuko told himself. If the solstice had gone just a little worse, he'd have been right.

"You think we should go chasing prisons through the Fire Nation in case we might find a Fire Sage who wants to help Aang." Katara gave him a look askance. "We don't have time!"

"Why not?" Zuko demanded. "Half the trouble you land in is because you don't think before you jump into a mess." I should know. It'd taken the Moon drowning him before he'd stopped jumping into trouble. Mostly. "Why not take some time?"

Aang took a deep breath, and finally looked serious. "Roku said I had to defeat the Fire Lord before the end of summer. Before Sozin's Comet came. Or there wouldn't be anything left to save."

Zuko stared at him. Glanced at Toph, who looked just as startled. It didn't make sense. It couldn't.

It's Aang. It damn well could.

"When-" Zuko cleared his throat, tried again. "When did Roku tell you that?"

"At the solstice." Aang gave him a stubborn look. "That's why I had to get to Roku's temple, even with you and Zhao and that whole blockade... um. You don't look so good."

"Probably because he doesn't feel so good," Toph stuck in, her own face a little green. "You said we had to beat the Fire Lord before the end of summer. I figured fine, sure; we don't beat him by then, the sea-storms start up again, and we're stuck twiddling our thumbs until winter kicks in. But beat him, or everything goes blooie? When were you gonna tell me this?"

"I just did!"

"Why didn't you tell my parents this?" Toph persisted. "Hi, I'm the Avatar, I need your daughter to be my earthbending teacher. That's the kind of thing you said. Not, hi, I'm the Avatar, and I need your daughter to teach me earthbending so the world won't come to an end. I dunno, Twinkletoes; which do you think might have gotten their attention?"

"You've known this since the solstice," Zuko stated. Trying to keep his voice even, when he felt like the end result of a komodo-rhino stampede. "You knew there was a deadline, and..." Months frittering his time away, poking his tattooed nose into anything that looked interesting. Weeks of letting the Dai Li stymie him in Ba Sing Se, when word the Avatar needed to save the world might at least have gotten Long Feng's attention. Time burned away like a midnight candle, when any sane person would have...

Would have what? Zuko asked himself, suddenly weary. Big problems aren't for students, even if a twelve-year-old does have a master's arrows. They're for Elders. And there weren't any Elders left he trusted. Who could he tell? Who could you tell, if you knew the world was coming to an end?

Uncle. Master Amaya. Grandfather. Agent Shirong. Captain Jee and his crew. The Wens. He'd been... heh. So lucky.

And that made him want to break out in a cold sweat. He'd been lucky. Compared to the Avatar. That wasn't possible.

...So maybe it isn't.

He kept forgetting. Everyone kept forgetting. Aang was the Avatar. But Aang wasn't the Avatar Spirit. And when you looked at luck and spirits' favor - oh yeah. The Avatar was lucky. Avoiding airbenders' harmonious accord. Surviving a hundred years in ice. Finding bending masters in a world torn by war. Evading pursuit by the entire Fire Navy and Army for months on end. The Avatar Spirit had had all kinds of luck.

But Aang lost his home. He lost his teacher. He lost his whole world. And he's almost lost everyone he has here, more than once.

Strip out being able to dance through the most deadly scenarios with a smile on his face, and Aang's luck sucked.

I have no luck. End of story. But if the world was going to end? I'd have people who could help. If it came down to it, I could tell Azula. She's crazy. But she wants to rule the world, not destroy it.

Technically, he'd already done that once. Whatever Koh and Makoto had originally had in mind for the Day of Black Sun, it would have been so much worse if Azula had attacked Aang directly-

Damn. Damn it, that was what he'd been missing when he'd talked to Toph yesterday, and Aang before that. And he'd forgotten he'd missed it, what with the walking dead in the middle of the night.

Makoto was in the Fire Nation during the invasion. Aang came here, which means a dragon had time to get here. But she's not here. Asagitatsu would know. Asagitatsu's last dragon; dark dragon or not. The volcano-spirit couldn't miss her.

What's more important than hunting Aang?

"Of course we knew!" Katara gave him a dark look. "But we had to keep moving. Because of you!"

Which left out that after the Siege of the North, he mostly hadn't been chasing them. Too busy surviving a whole fleet being drowned, cast up ashore, running from Azula... Zuko sighed. No point in bringing that up now, is there?

"We got this far." Sokka's shift of weight caught Zuko's eye; that was a swordsman loosening up, even if he didn't want to fight. "Airbending, waterbending, earthbending. And then we saw a chance that might have ended the war, if we'd pulled it off. We've had half a year. Do you really think you could have done any better?"

"Depends. On if I managed not to drop you all overboard." Zuko shook his head. "So this is why Roku doesn't care about you getting mixed up in the war. The Fire Sages have records that say Avatars aren't supposed to do that. Fighting the Avatar Spirit - if it kills someone, it can leave tainted ghosts. Restless ones." He met Aang's gaze. "Like the drowned."

The airbender winced. "Nobody told me -"

"Just... wait." Zuko knuckled his headache. Agni knew, he'd cheerfully dump Aang right back into the bay. But it was hard to hold together the same kind of burning fury, knowing Aang was so desperately alone. "You didn't know. I hear you. You should have known. And you should have asked. But Zhao had you backed against the ice, and desperate people do desperate things." He eyed Sokka. "And desperate people let other people do desperate things. Uncle tells me there are shamans at the North Pole. Lots of them. They would have known what it meant, sending the Avatar against the fleet."

Sokka looked away, definitely not happy. "Okay. Point."

"You don't believe that!" Katara challenged him.

"They were going to marry Yue to a guy she didn't even like, Sis. For the good of her people." Sokka shook his head. "You start saying things like that..." He stared at Zuko. "Where do you stop?"

"Ask my great-grandfather," Zuko nodded. "Fire Lord Sozin didn't stop."

Katara drew back, eyeing both of them like they'd spoken another language. "We're not like that!"

"You're human beings," Zuko shot back at her. "We're all like that. Water, Fire, Earth - it doesn't matter, Katara. We can all. Do. Horrible. Things. And we all tell ourselves afterward that we had to do them. That we didn't have any other options. But there's always another way." He looked at Aang. "Sometimes, there's just no choice we can live with."

Aang swallowed. "I couldn't have let Zhao destroy the Northern Water Tribe," he whispered. "I just... couldn't."

"Then you have to live with that." Zuko sighed. "And we all have to live with what the Face-Stealer stole from their deaths. He has a lot more power now. What he's going to do with it - I'm afraid to think about it." He rested his forehead against his knuckles, trying not to shiver. "I thought the war and the Face-Stealer were two different problems. If they're not..."

Then I have to do something. I don't want anything to do with the Avatar, but - I'm a yāorén. Like it or not. If I don't do something, the spirits are going to come looking for me. And my people.

I hate my life.

"The... he... what?" Aang paled. "That helped him?"

"I don't think helped is the right word." Zuko shuddered. "Professor Wen found some old tomes on the Face-Stealer. He's supposed to be part of the balance. Like the vulture-eagles. He swallows up corruption, so other spirits are purified. But there's never supposed to be this much of it. If death gets stronger than life... He's taking ghosts, to control the drowned, and who knows what else. He wants humans dead, and-"

Oh, Agni. It fit.

"And he's working with Makoto," Zuko grimaced. "The blue dragon. Who didn't follow you here."

Katara arched an eyebrow at him. "Because I tossed her in the ocean."

"I did that once, too. It didn't stick." Zuko shivered, trying not to remember black sand and deadly water; Asagitatsu's claws all that stood between him and death. "She must have something more important to do. Something the Face-Stealer wants as part of his plans. Something... my father thinks is part of his plan."

And we don't know what it is. And we're out of time.

"Roku said you had to stop Ozai before the Comet," Zuko said quietly. "Makoto decided to let wounded prey get away rather than follow you. Put it together... whatever the Face-Stealer's plotting, it's going to crash down on us by the end of summer."

I don't want to do this. I want to do anything but this.

"You don't have time to find a Fire Sage on your own," Zuko stated, feeling each word like a death knell. "So I guess I have to come with you."

Chapter End Notes

Given the justice systems Katara's seen in canon, you can't really blame her for thinking there was nothing they could do to help Shiyu. Just look at a few examples: Chin Village, Ba Sing Se as it was run by Long Feng, and the Fire Nation school where Aang was threatened with being sent to the mines for misbehavior. That doesn't even count the nightmare of what happened to Hama. Katara's got every reason to believe Fire Nation "justice" is cruel, brutal, and fast. Zuko was raised to be one of the people dealing out justice - meaning he knows, in theory, how it's supposed to work. His exposure to the actual results has been... well, limited.

Chapter 76

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Father wants me dead." Azula said it half to herself, going over a map of the northern half of the world yet another time. The sun was warm, but the wind off the sea was strong enough to make her glad of the stone walls human hands had added to their cliff-carved sanctuary. Her Dai Li were combing the island for any earthbound dangers, and Ty Lee's onmitsu were watching the skies. She ought to feel safe. She didn't. "Why does Father want me dead? It... it isn't efficient. Even Fire Lord Sozin made certain he had an heir on the way before he destroyed the Temples. And Father doesn't." She looked up at her two co-conspirators. "Does he?"

Mai shook her head a fraction of an inch, ink-black hair still in its precise, senbon-hiding style despite their flight. "Court gossip is sure he hasn't even looked at another woman since your mother... left the Palace."

True and cuttingly polite at once. It was almost enough to make Azula relax. Almost. "Ty Lee?"

The airbender was playing with the tip of her braid, pink ruffles just a little wilder than they should be. "We don't know any rumors about an heir. But... since you left the Fire Nation the first time?"

Ty Lee was hesitating. Azula hated seeing her hesitate to do anything. It seemed wrong. Like a flutter-hornet with only one wing. "You've heard something."

"There was a report that Fire Lord Ozai was speaking with someone in the Palace Gardens, a few months ago," Ty Lee obliged. "Then our person disappeared."

Azula arched startled brows. "Disappeared." Disappearing out of the Royal Palace was no small trick. She should know. She'd only had to hide a body from the Catacombs, and that had been messy enough.

Gray eyes were sad and sure. "We don't have a description. It was a new moon night. But the report said Fire Lord Ozai said matrka."

Grandmother? Azula thought in disbelief. Ta Min was decades dead. And as for Fire Lady Tejjina, she'd disappeared decades ago-

Disappeared, the day Fire Lord Sozin died.

It can't be. It's impossible.

But it would explain so much. Grandfather Shidan. Grandfather Azulon. Zuko's wordless fits; she'd taunted him for them mercilessly, of course, no one who expected to survive court battles could yield to such a weakness-

And she was thinking about Zuko because she was afraid. Afraid to face the memory, and she would not stand for that. She was Azula, daughter of Ursa and Fire Lord Ozai, and mere fear would never keep her from the truth.

Moonlight. The full moon had shone down as madness pried at her mind; a pitiless cruelty that would see everything bow to its will, would break the world to end its pain, and burn all else to ashes...

Full moon. And new moon. The two nights the sun and moon pulled together. If you believed pap like Love Amongst the Dragons, you never knew who or what you might meet on those nights.

Mother believed.

Mother had also believed she was a monster.

Well. She was right, wasn't she?

"If Father was speaking to Fire Lady Tejjina," Azula got out, the words like broken glass in her throat, "then you already know what she looks like, Ty Lee." She smirked, when all she wanted to do was bleed. "She called herself Nawahime."

Mai's eyes narrowed.

"The dragon?" Ty Lee blurted out. "But I - but you - she-" The airbender swallowed. "You're... not human?"

"None of Sozin's line is human." Azula bared her teeth in a smile. "Just ask the Earth Kingdom."

"I know that's what they always say, but..." Ty Lee shivered. "Those are just stories. No one believes in them anymore!"

"No one at court does. Fire Lord Sozin went to great lengths to make sure of it," Azula mused. "It's just a story. Like spirit vengeance. Fire Sages talking to volcanoes. The Avatar. Stories are always long ago and far away. Not here; not now. No one lives in a spirit tale. Well," she waved it off, "except for Uncle. But General Iroh's been... odd, ever since Ba Sing Se. Everyone blamed it on losing Lu Ten. Who wouldn't be odd after that? Uncle's only child. The shining hope of the Fire Nation. The obvious successor to his father, after Azulon. Brilliant. Perfect. Everything Zuko and I would never be." The old, bitter rage flushed chill through her veins. "Just as Fire Lord Azulon planned."

Mai nodded once, thoughtful.

"I don't understand." Ty Lee looked between them, fingers braiding the wind so it slowed and warmed around them. "Zuko loved Lu Ten."

"Zuko didn't linger in secret passageways when the courtiers started getting into their cups," Azula shrugged. It still stung, knowing what she'd known. Zuko was her brother. Yes, she'd tried to kill him, and cripple him, and any manner of other tactics. But he was hers. Lu Ten didn't get to break him. Ever. "Fire Lord Azulon planned for what we'd be before we were ever born. Why do you think Father's marriage wasn't arranged until after Lu Ten was well advanced in firebending? None of Ozai's children could surpass the heir." She met gray eyes - but only for a moment. She wanted Ty Lee impressed with her sincerity, not terrified. "But I would have surpassed him. What do you think Fire Lord Iroh would have done then?"

Ty Lee sucked in a breath, hurt. "You don't think your uncle would have..."

"Directly? Possibly not," Azula allowed. "But Uncle believes in spirit-tales. And he listens, and waits, rather than act when people drop sly hints of what they plan to do. All it would take is one suggestion by the War Minister's faction that the lesser branch of the family should spend time pleasing the spirits by learning with the Fire Sages, and then a few months of laying the groundwork to discover a few old legends that would excuse their actions, afterward, for the good of the nation. After all, everyone's seen Love Amongst the Dragons. They'd be so publicly horrified, after I was dead, to declare I was a dark dragon, like Tsukikkage. Just like him."

"The liar. The betrayer. The destroyer of clans." Mai's gaze never flinched. "Someone who can gather loyalty to him, even from the most innocent, stealing it from weaker great names. A Fire Lord couldn't allow someone like that to live." She shook her head, just once. "But you're not like that anymore. Lord Shidan... he said it would have been his duty to kill you, if you were. To make it quick, and painless." Mai took a quiet breath. "But even if General Iroh had become Fire Lord - a plan like that never would have worked. Zuko would have stopped it."

Azula's eyes glittered. "My brother-"

"It wouldn't matter how sly they were. Your brother can mess up anyone's plans." Mai's smile was just a crinkle of gold eyes. "Lord Shidan calls it a gift."

Now, that was an interesting thought. One which might move their current situation from incredibly dangerous to potentially survivable. If she planned carefully.

Our situation. Azula looked down at the map again, testing that thought. Mother had called her a monster, and no one should ever trust a monster. But these people believed in her. Trusted her.

And outside of Mai, who had her own reasons for being here... what had she ever done to betray that trust?

Who better to ask? "Ty Lee. Am I... am I a monster?"

The airbender nibbled her lip. "You've done some horrible things," she said at last. "Zuko... he fought you because he was afraid of you. Of what you'd do to the Fire Nation, if you were the heir. I tried to tell him not to fight, but I don't think he understood. You'd do horrible things to people. But I know you wouldn't hurt the Fire Nation. And there are some really bad people out there. People who would do even more horrible things, to everybody, if they thought no one was going to stop them." Ty Lee gave her a brave smile. "But it'd be wonderful if you could stop more people without ever hurting them. Like you did to Avatar Aang. Anshin told me what you said. You broke his footing on the Way, and you didn't even touch him! He must have felt like an Elder sucked all the air out of him... um?"

"His footing on the Way?" Azula asked, startled.

"His... understanding of what the truth is." Ty Lee blushed a little. "You made him see he hadn't been honest with himself. It's like yanking the ground right out from under an earthbender. He must have felt awful." She nodded, satisfied. "He'll learn a lot from that, if he pays attention. And that will save a lot of people."

Azula blinked. Glanced at Mai, whose face seemed even blanker than usual. "...What."

"Your enemies are precious to you," Ty Lee stated, as if quoting an old master. "They teach you what your friends cannot." She bounced in place. "You did a wonderful thing! It wasn't nice, but - he needed someone to teach him. And you honored him with the lesson." Another oddly shy smile. "You're not a monster. You're just really scary."

Mai folded her hands in her sleeves, near far too many knives. Raised a black brow.

You've been challenged, Azula read that look. Do you want to fight? Or do you want to prove her right?

Was this what Zuko had felt like, three years ago? Heart beating fast, hands clammy; certain of nothing, except that her people needed her. Even if they didn't know it. Even if her own father didn't know it.

What Father's planning...

She owed Zuko. Her brother. Who'd fought for their people, even when the whole world stood against him. Who believed in her.

My brother, who can shatter anyone's plans. Even the Avatar's. Azula reached out, and tapped the North Pole. Now, how can I turn that to both our advantage?

Thumping his feet against one of Toph's bent stone benches, Sokka leaned over the maps Zuko had spread out on the table. Peered at one particular island marked with all kinds of terse little red warnings, trying not to care what Katara might or might not be doing to their dinner while Toph threw rocks at Aang. And cackled about it. Zuko had been banned from making tea after Katara had choked on it, Katara had been banned from gathering things to make tea after Aang caught her picking some pretty, white, and sweet-smelling flowers from one of the Temple gardens, and Sokka had managed to trip over that batch of tea before Toph could sample it. Though it had been tricky not getting caught scrubbing out the teapot. Ack.

Put that together with the glorious fun of keeping everybody from each others' throats in one small sky bison's saddle all the way across the ocean from Dragons' Wings, even with Zuko and Toph playing tricks with lodestone-bending to keep busy, and it was shaping up to be his best week ever.

Oh. And based on that nifty little translucent wave-and-grin he'd seen from a balcony when they landed, somewhere in this temple was a sort-of-friendly swordsman's ghost. Hanging out to look after the Air Nuns' place. Probably snickering at all of them. Sokka was sure of it.

"She really wasn't trying to poison you," Sokka sighed, glancing at the gold eyes across the table. "I don't think Katara even knew what suzuran was. Who'd think Air Nuns would keep poison plants in the kitchen garden?"

"Who teaches their kids to ride elephant koi?" Zuko gave him a skeptical look. "Sokka. That was everyone's teapot. If your sister tries to poison me, she'll do a much better job." He paused. "She probably won't. Rip my throat out with ice, maybe. She's an honest fighter. She'd do it face to face."

Sokka buried his face in his hand. "You know, it really creeps me out that you think my sister wants to kill you."

"She does want to kill me."

"Aaaand there you go again, acting all calm about it," Sokka groaned. Lifted his head. "Couldn't you, you know, put a little oomph into it? Scream, yell, react like any regular... human being... never mind..."

"Sokka. People have been trying to kill me since before I was born." Zuko smirked. "If I overreacted every time someone just wanted to kill me, I'd never have time to sleep." He glanced away, shifting uncomfortably. "I know how hard it is to pick something safe from plants you've never seen before. Back in the Earth Kingdom, Uncle almost killed himself with a cup of tea." That lone brow arched at him. "How did you know about suzuran?"

Oh. Um. Darn it. "I don't want to talk about it."

"There's a lot of things none of us want to talk about," Zuko said flatly. "Should you talk about it?"

Ouch. Fair question. "Aang has a lot of enemies," Sokka started. "Not all of them are alive."

Frowning, Zuko nodded.

Sokka swallowed. "We ended up in Shu Jing for a few days."

"You ended up-" The unscarred eye widened. "You ran into Temul? And Aang's still alive?"

Sokka gave him a second look. "You know about Temul?"

"She's hard to forget." Zuko was studying him very, very carefully. "If she met Aang, and he's still breathing..." The firebender winced. "What did she do to you?"

Sokka shrugged. "She needed something to let Aang go. I can live with it."

"You just don't want to talk about it."

"No, I don't want to talk about it," Sokka shot back. "Grandmother scared us all with ghost stories, but dragon-child ghosts can turn your hair white-"

Oh. Hell.

"That-" Sokka cleared his throat, and glared at one too damn observant great name. "That was not fair."

"I had to know what I was dealing with." Zuko looked away. "Sorry. I know about spirits dragging you into something you never wanted."

Which didn't click. There was no way Zuko could have gotten pulled into any mess that could screw up his life as bad as Temul's hi, mine, did for a Water Tribesman-

He said the Moon Spirit drowned him to do him a favor.

And right after she'd rescued Appa, Toph had said Lee was a Fire Nation waterbender.

It'd kind of gotten lost in the shuffle for him, Sokka reflected, stunned. He knew it had slipped Katara's mind, because she knew Lee was Zuko, and Zuko was a firebender, and nobody but the Avatar could bend two elements.

Only it turned out yāorén could. Witness Langxue, a Kyoshi Island waterbender who - according to Saoluan - had gotten thumped with air due to darn near getting killed by a spirit-monster.

Zuko flash-fried Fong's army. With fire ice. Yeah, one waterbender could have shoved all that ice around, I know Katara could have - but she would have been pretty tapped out afterward. Langxue was up, cranky, and ready to fight. So he didn't do it alone. And Amaya wasn't there, she was back with the other healers, rested up so she could handle casualties...

Sokka let out a slow breath. "If I threw a cup of water at you, what would happen?"

Zuko gave him a hard look.

"Right. Don't answer that. Not going to do it. Oh, man." Sokka rubbed at an impending headache. "Spirits. Do not tell Katara."

"I wasn't planning to," Zuko said dryly.

"No, I mean you really can't. A few weeks back, we ran into somebody..." Sokka glanced around the room to make sure no one was in listening distance. Before he'd thought Zuko was paranoid for insisting on looking over the maps where no one could sneak up on them. They were in an Air Temple. Who else could get up here?

Except the way Zuko had walked around open holes in the floor with barely a second glance to check where they were, determined Fire Nation guys could get up here. Great.

Kind of wish the Fire Nation was all we had to worry about. "We ran into a waterbender before the eclipse," Sokka sighed. "A Southern Tribe waterbender."

Zuko drew back, frowning. "But the Southern waterbenders were all-"

"Taken by the Fire Nation," Sokka cut him off. "Exactly. Only Hama... found a way to break out. It was gruesome. What she ended up doing to people in the years since then - put it this way. When Aang first heard the stories, he thought there was an angry spirit loose. So did your grandfather." Sokka scratched under his wolf-tail, trying to find any less ugly way to phrase it. "Katara fought her. Your grandfather... Shidan made sure she wasn't taken alive. It was bad-"

Wait. Wait just a minute. He'd said Hama, and Zuko's eyes had narrowed- "What do you know about Hama?" Sokka challenged him.

Zuko held up a hand, and shook his head. "If it's the same Hama, Kuzon met her a long time ago. He left... records." He paused, obviously picking his words. "If it helps, you can tell Katara her escape tied up chunks of the Home Guard for months."

"Don't think it would," Sokka admitted. "I think we'd all be better off forgetting it ever happened. What Katara had to do to fight her... it messed her up. I don't think she's figured out how much. She acts like she's okay. She's not. We didn't have time for her to talk to Dad, and she puts on a smile for Aang, so he doesn't know how bad she's hurting. Toph wants to help, but it's not something she can throw a rock at. And I'm just the big brother who can't bend. Not a big deal most of the time. But what Hama did? It made Katara hate her bending. The part of her that's always been the most important thing in the world. If she found out about you..."

"She might hate herself the way she hates me," Zuko said steadily. "I don't want that either." He took a deep breath. "And you might have noticed, I don't exactly spread the word around. I know what the spirits want from me. I know what Aang would want from me. And damn it, no. This whole mess got this bad because the Face-Stealer started throwing a tantrum. The only way to handle a spoiled brat is to say no. And make it stick." He looked back at the map, and smiled wryly. "But since you figured it out... now I can tell you why we can pull this off."

"This," Sokka said skeptically. "You mean, find one Fire Sage who might be anywhere in the Fire Nation. If he's still alive."

"He might be anywhere," Zuko agreed, still weirdly cheerful. "But I doubt it. He's a political prisoner, he's important, and he has to be invisible. There's not that many prisons that fit the bill." He stabbed a finger down on the map. "Boiling Rock. The highest-security prison in the Fire Nation. Odds are, Fire Sage Shiyu is here."

Sokka eyed the chart, looking at the ragged, near-circular island. "You put a prison for firebenders in the middle of a volcano? That's like putting earthbenders in a rock quarry!"

"Oh, not just any volcano." Zuko was almost grinning. "The prison's on an island itself. In the volcano caldera. Surrounded by a boiling lake."

Sokka looked at the map. Looked back at Zuko.

The yāorén's smirk grew a little wider.

Sokka pulled out a smirk of his own. Looked at the map again, and started to laugh. "Boiling water... oh man, I can't wait to see the looks on their faces..."

It felt good to laugh, Zuko thought. Especially with someone who didn't believe in Destiny, or Great Plans, or that everything horrible in your life would somehow come out right in the end if you only believed.

Uncle? I love you. But putting your faith in the spirits is like putting it in the sea. Sure, it's bigger than we are. It's more powerful. That doesn't mean it cares.

Sokka knew that in his bones, the way Kuzon had known Mount Shirotona. The way Zuko hoped he'd know Asagitsutsu, if he lived that long. You had to respect the world around you. You had to pay attention. But trust it?

He felt distant waves tremble through stone, and scowled. Turn your back on the sea, and it'll kill you.

Every good sailor knew that. Every marine. Why couldn't Uncle figure it out?

Well. He is Army.

And Lu Ten's death had hurt him, in a way a younger prince hadn't been able to understand. Even now, Zuko was pretty sure he hadn't grasped the depth of it. Kuzon had lost his friends, his wife, his hope. But he'd never lost his daughter.

Uncle has to believe that everything will come out right. That there was a purpose to everything. Even Lu Ten's death. If there wasn't - what does he have to live for?

Hopefully Amaya, now. And more than just her, soon... which he was not going to think about. The whole idea still terrified him. Not to mention, if Katara found out that Amaya was...

Bad idea. Don't go there.

Much, much safer to worry about that last argument he'd had with Uncle before they'd left. Which pretty much boiled down to, stop asking the spirits for help, damn it.

Agni, that had been ugly.

Respect for spirits was fine. Offerings, also fine. But asking spirits for their help was running up a debt with the spirit world, and Dragons' Wings was on shaky enough ground just staying alive. Asagitsutsu had challenged them to channel her eruption into a safer, saner course. Taking anything away from that effort was like setting fire to your own rope bridge.

Still. That hadn't been enough to convince Iroh. Zuko had had to make it personal.

I'm a yāorén, Uncle. When the spirits want things balanced out, they're going to come looking for me. Whether or not I had anything to do with it.

I'm a yāorén, and I'm your nephew. When you run up debts, I end up paying them. Only sometimes the spirits can't find me. You know who they'll look for then? Anyone around me. Master Amaya. Captain Jee and his crew. Agent Shirong, and all the Wen clan. Including Jinhai.

You want to put your faith in the spirit world, so Avatar Aang restores the balance? Fine. But don't you dare drag a little kid into your private war!

Yeah. It'd been really ugly. Because Uncle had latched onto the whole yāorén bit, and tried to turn the subject to how pleased he was that his nephew was following the spirits' will to aid the Avatar-

Which had devolved into knife-edged words over why stopping Koh was not the same thing as helping the Avatar, and exactly how Aang had left Toph hamstrung by her own promises to him, and... Zuko didn't want to think about the rest of it.

Uncle Iroh had walked off, outwardly unruffled, to enjoy a calming cup of tea. Zuko had stormed out to the practice grounds and shattered enough ice to freeze the bay solid.

Compared to that, arguing Jee and the marines into letting him go without a bodyguard had been easy.

Katara's convinced Toph might take my side; and when she feels outnumbered, she goes on the attack. Sokka's got a pretty good idea how much damage I can do on my own. And Aang's allergic to uniforms. Anybody not from the Fire Nation would get caught in minutes if something goes wrong; anyone who was, would be opposing the Fire Lord, and that's just asking the spirits to kill us.

No. The only person with a chance of pulling this off - who could get Aang to the teacher he needed, without pivoting the Avatar right into another Koh-spawned disaster - was an exile.

Granted, as an exile, he was subject to execution on sight. But Zuko was fairly sure he was safer taking his chances with human beings, rather than the spirits that swarmed to Aang like mosquito-moths to a flame.

Spirits. Argh. What did he do about Uncle?

Problem is, he's doing the same thing he's always done, Zuko reflected, looking back at very old memories. Undermining people to "help" them. He did it to Ozai when he was Azulon's heir. He kept doing it when my father became the Fire Lord. And he did it to me for three years on the Wani.

Granted, a thirteen-year-old who'd never been out of the Fire Nation before shouldn't have been in command of a ship to start with. But by the time he'd dealt with his first mutiny, Zuko had already figured out that the rumors and trouble that sent the Wani chasing across the known world somehow always worked to Iroh's advantage.

He'd followed them anyway. What choice did he have? The Avatar had to be out there. Somewhere.

And he was. But I'm not thirteen anymore, and we've got bigger problems than finding Aang. So what do I do about Uncle?

He wasn't sure yet. Hopefully hunting down Shiyu would give him some time to think. Though that wasn't the only thing he had to think about.

I want to tell Sokka. Agni, I want to.

Some waterbenders had died in Azulon's prison. But some hadn't.

Zuko stepped away from Sokka and the maps, heading over toward the cliff-shadowed balcony for a breath of sea air. The salt was thinner up here, much of it blown out against the rocks before it got this high. But he could still taste it, and see blue water far below, and feel the water move with the rush of waves-

Took two steps back, as a heavy wave rolled in like thunder.

...At least Sokka couldn't see his face, Zuko thought, trying to tamp down a rush of embarrassment. They were way too high up here to even be touched by the spray.

Unless, of course, a waterbender got involved. Which was part of why Aang and his friends had settled in this part of the Temple, nearer the harbor, for now. There was less damage to the structures here, where salt air pruned back clinging vines. It wasn't too far to go to yank a net through the bay or gather shellfish. Most important of all, to the uneasy peace he was trying to keep with these people... here, Katara had the whole ocean on her side.

The easiest way to make it so she doesn't squash me, is to make it so she always thinks that she can, Zuko thought darkly.

It was a bitter pill to swallow. Looking this weak around Azula would have gotten him killed.

It's not forever. Just long enough to keep the situation under control. We find Shiyu, I am out of here.

Still. As long as he was acting harmless for Katara and Aang, he didn't want to be near the ocean. No sense in tempting fate.

And telling Sokka about Lituya Bay would definitely be tempting fate.

They're Sokka's people. He should know.

But everyone who'd survived their supposed shipwreck knew what Hama had done. To this day, some of them still felt shamed. Both by what she'd done, somehow forcing a guard to snap his own neck-

And even more, by the fact she'd left them behind.

Hama went mad, and they couldn't stop her, Zuko thought bleakly. She was one of their tribe. She was their responsibility.

That they'd been Fire Nation prisoners had only poisoned the wound more. Some had faded and died of it, like ice caught in summer sun. Some had drifted away, taking ships to the Earth Kingdom to lose themselves in the faceless hordes of refugees.

But some had survived. Zuko knew it, because Kuzon had known exactly where they were. And if Ozai had ever uncovered just how Karasu of Byakko's "fishing village" really produced such fine sea salt, the uproar would have blown the Caldera off the map.

I want to tell him. We're so close. But if we're captured - they'll ask him where to find other waterbenders.

And trapped with the onmitsu, anyone would talk.

Even if death by torture hadn't been an option, Sokka had said Katara's fight with Hama had hurt her. If the Southern waterbenders thought she'd been tainted by Hama's teachings...

Amak wouldn't.

But Amak and Karasu were a whole other kettle of viper-eels. Telling Katara about them would be bad.

Damn it. Sokka deserves to know something. "If Aang pulls this off, and you live through the war," Zuko said carefully, "get a message to Byakko. Tell them who you are, your parents' and grandparents' names. Ask to send a message to Lady Karasu. She's my aunt," he elaborated. "My mother's youngest sister. Kind of a daredevil. She deals in sea stores; salt, fish, seaweed - if it comes out of the ocean, she brings it to market."

Sokka gave him a considering look. "This is important."

"Yes."

"And you're not going to tell me any more."

Zuko shook his head.

Sokka squinted at him, frowning. "Is this something I shouldn't tell Katara?"

Zuko looked out and down at the water again, as a ninth-wave gathered up smaller wavelets and smashed spray against the rocks. Note, don't get caught down there when the tide comes in. "If you get that far, you can probably tell her everything-"

"What?" Sokka set a rock paperweight on the maps, stepping beside him to scan the waves. "Is something down there?"

Zuko gave him a sidelong glance.

"I've fought spirits. We all have." Sokka shrugged, trying to look like he did it every day. And failing miserably. "Any of us start getting too far from Aang, things... show up. Sometimes." He tapped his fingers on the balcony stone. "And I haven't heard Boots in a day or two. That's usually not good. Add in that I know some kind of swordsman-ghost is up here-" He cut himself off. "Damn. I've seen him before. Where?"

Zuko sucked in a breath, hit by memories of pain and loss. "You saw Shih?"

"That's it! That's where I- wait a minute." Blue eyes cut to him. "You know him?"

Lump in his throat, Zuko nodded. "He saved my life. When I was..." He had to look away. "This was the first Air Temple I came to after I was exiled. I was angry. And," he gestured toward his scar, tried to make it a shrug. "I couldn't see very well. I got lost."

"Not hard to do," Sokka reflected. "They really didn't build this place for people who can't fly. It's kind of scary. Stairs that lead up to nowhere, holes in the floor-"

Zuko flinched.

"Ooo, that doesn't look good," Sokka sighed. "What happened?"

"I got lost," Zuko repeated. No need to get into the details of how dizzy and sick he'd been. Not to mention young and stubborn and stupid, pressing on in the middle of the night when he knew he was lost. "I tried to get back to where I thought the ship had to be. Only I ran into a strange little swordsman with a fire built right in the middle of the hallway." He had to pause, shaking his head at his own arrogance. "I ordered him to tell me what an onmitsu was doing there. He said his name was Shih, and if I could move the fire, he'd give me all the answers I needed. So, I tried." He snorted. Now, it was funny. Back then? Not so much. "Something hit me too fast to see, and I was sure I was dead. You don't turn your back on an onmitsu. Not and live." He paused. "Next thing I knew, it was morning. And where that fire had been, in the shadows I couldn't see..."

Sokka swallowed. "Hole in the floor?"

"Went down at least a hundred feet." Zuko still shuddered at the memory. "How did you know?"

"Dad has a story like that, about an ice crevasse and his grandpa," Sokka admitted. He gave Zuko a wry grin. "And Temul showed us a little of what Shih was like when he was alive. I guess he's still one of the good guys..." The Water Tribesman trailed off, looking thoughtful.

Zuko took a wary step back. "What?"

"He was an onmitsu who never wanted to fight again. Who came up here so he'd never have to. Only Temul got here right before Sozin's guys, and he and Gyate ended up kidnapping the kids so they'd live," Sokka said, half to himself. "Temul got them away, but... they were gone when Sozin came for her. I wish - I was hoping they got away all right. But if he's a ghost, here..."

"They did get away," Zuko said quietly. "Don't ask me how I know," he warned, as Sokka shot him a startled look. "I won't tell you. But Shih and Gyate - Shidan knew them. They had long, happy lives. Not every ghost stays on earth because of violence. Sometimes there's just something they need to do."

"I wonder if he'd tell us what," Sokka muttered. Caught Zuko's confused look, and turned a little red. "He looked so happy with Gyate. If he's stuck here, and she's not - that just doesn't seem right."

Ran. Zuko still remembered that pain; knowing she was gone, and he had to keep breathing. Death had softened it, but it still hurt. "You want to help him."

"You're a Fire Nation prince, right? He was a Fire Nation onmitsu. And Aang's an airbender." Sokka rubbed his hands together, like gathering scraps of string into a ball to bat at a pygmy puma. "If all of us can work together to put a ghost to rest - maybe Katara and Aang can figure out you are one of the good guys."

"Except I'm not," Zuko argued. "I'm just trying to save my people."

"And if we don't save the world, your people end up fried," Sokka said wryly. "Hey. You're helping. That's more than a lot of people we've met." He clapped a hand on Zuko's shoulder. "So, how do we track down a ghost?"

It wasn't right, for Sokka to be laughing with him like that.

Shaking out laundry, Katara watched them from another balcony, careful to keep out of sight. Toph and Aang both trusted too much, for different reasons. Toph believed Zuko would only burn down things that deliberately got in his way, and Aang had been walking around in a daze ever since that night with the drowned, trying to work out what it meant to save the world as Aang, instead of the Avatar.

Which was kind of silly. The world was what it was. Aang was the Avatar. He couldn't be anything else, any more than she could be the chief of her tribe.

Sokka... she trusted her brother to deal with Zuko. Mostly. Zuko might have been a prince, but Sokka still was a chief's son. He knew who he was, and what he was. Nothing Zuko could say would change that.

Though I don't think he's trying to change anything, Katara admitted to herself, watching them pick up the maps, evidently discussing yet another of the Fire Nation's uncounted sets of small islands. I think Zuko's trying to help. Maybe.

The annoying thing was, it was actually a good idea. Shiyu was a master firebender, and he'd helped them all when there hadn't been a prayer of fighting the whole Fire Nation. Just two scared Water Tribe kids, a lost airbender, Momo, and Appa.

Zuko always had a motive. His honor. His kingdom. His mixed-up little bunch of refugees and exiles on a volcano. There was always something else behind whatever Zuko was doing. Shiyu had just wanted to help.

At least we know what Zuko's motive is, Katara reflected, hanging up one of her chest wraps to catch the sun better. Get Aang away from his volcano, and stick a finger in the Face-Stealer's eye.

It wasn't a nice motive. But she could live with it, as long as they got what Aang needed. And... it wasn't a bad thing for Sokka to have another boy to talk to. She knew her own temper as much as she knew her brother's. And, well - Toph was twelve, and when Aang wasn't acting old and wise as her Gran-Gran, sometimes he acted like he was five. Sokka had to get frustrated dealing with all of them. If he wanted to take a sword and hack at somebody just to wear the crazy out of himself, and Zuko was willing to let him - better the firebender than anybody else.

And we need help. I just wish it was Master Piandao, instead. Or even Shidan. He wasn't human, but - we knew he wasn't human.

Zuko was like the Earth King's bear. He wasn't any one thing. He wasn't human, but he wasn't not human, either. Who knew what he'd do?

Toph thinks she does. Sokka thinks he does.

And she trusted them. She did. But Aang wanted to believe in Zuko; wanted to think that the firebender who'd chased them halfway across the world could be a friend. And when Aang was hopeful, he... well, sometimes he didn't look at everything that might happen. So somebody had to keep a suspicious eye on Zuko. For all their sakes.

Though so far he hadn't done anything. Yet.

Maybe he means it. Maybe he's trying to help.

And if he didn't... here they were, right over the dark pulse of the ocean.

Right where you can strangle the life from him with a flick of your fingers, when you choose...

Katara shook her head, and looked out at the waves.

Sun glinted on surging water, bright and innocent.

Chapter End Notes

Suzuran - lily-of-the-valley. Very pretty. Very, very toxic. People have been killed by ingesting the water from a vase the cut flowers were standing in. (No, I don't know why they did that either.) Yes, Jee's ship was named that on purpose.

Knowing how to use plants available near the Arctic does not tell you what plants are safe in the temperate or tropical zones. Seriously, it's no wonder Sokka and Katara had trouble hunting and gathering.

Yes, I slammed the movie. "Earthbenders! You are surrounded by earth!" Shyalaman? That was embarrassing.

Chapter 77

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Come on, guys, let's find a ghost," Sokka muttered to himself. Lifted his lantern to scan the corners of yet another echoing, empty stone room. Moonlight would be fine to search any normal building, but an Air Temple? Full moon or not, he wasn't going to chance that a shadow was only a shadow, and not a hole plunging a neck-breaking distance to the waves below. "Why doesn't someone hit me when I come up with these things?"

Well, Aang had thought it was a great idea. Katara was up for anything that made Aang happy. And Zuko seemed darkly convinced that finding a ghost wouldn't get him in any more trouble than not finding a ghost.

About which, Sokka had to admit, he had a point. Zuko was an exile, and technically a traitor, and even if this wasn't officially part of the Fire Nation, it was close enough that it wouldn't matter. Anyone who caught him had the right to execute him on the spot. Finding a ghost who'd saved his life so he could say thanks, could only increase Zuko's odds.

Meaning the only sane person in the whole Temple was Toph, who'd stayed back with Appa to tap her feet on the floor and wait. If Shih wanted to find her, he would. If Shih didn't want anyone to find him... well, hopefully they'd know that by morning. With luck, not in a painful way.

Now, if Sokka could just get his heart to slow down and believe that.

"We can split up and cover more ground," Sokka grumbled, retreating back to the corridor to check the next twisty room. Salt and mold twitched his nose, as his boots stirred old dust on the floor. "Yeah. Just like we did with Hama. Great idea-"

Something was wrong with the shadows.

Lantern in his left hand, Sokka reached for his sword.

Huh. Found the dawn prayer hall.

Zuko had tried to take a section of the temple he'd explored before, three years and a lot of pain ago. He hadn't expected to recognize it. A long, columned hall, half carved out of the cliff wall, with odd ferns as gray-green splotches in the moonlight. The other half was open to sea air, with a few thin domes of verdigris still hanging in a few of the arches.

Wind chimes, Zuko realized, struck by memories a lifetime away. He could see in his mind's eye how the hall would have looked a century ago. Bright, polished-copper domes of wind chimes in every other pillared arch; a rainbow of ribbons dangling down, carved wooden prayers clinking together in the breeze's own music. Red to let angry thoughts flow away in the wind. Green to draw in health for the gardens and mothers. Yellow and orange for the wind-spirits, blue and white to bind new life and sever ties when it was time.

Fragile, perishable prayers. The nuns thought even the most heartfelt wish needed to be renewed and strengthened, the mind rededicated to the Temple's stern principles year after year, decade after decade, life after life.

And there were more practical reasons, as well. Here, the nuns could bring their nursing young to greet the first rays of dawn, stretching tiny fists to the sunlight. If baby fingers and bending yanked on wood and ribbons - it never hurt to make a prayer twice.

Aang's children won't know this.

Oh, Aang might know about the wind chimes. Especially if he asked the yamabushi. But the hues the nuns had used for each tamed desire, the traditions passed from mother to adoptive daughter and granddaughter; how generations of women had walked this hall with storm-restless little airbenders...

Everyone who remembers that life is dead. Zuko swallowed, lantern-light flickering. Even me.

The Temples had been stifling. The Temples had been wrong, locking the minds and hearts of Air into forms more and more alien to the rest of the world. Any one of a dozen chiefs or kings might have raised their hands against the Nomads, if they'd dared... if Sozin hadn't beaten them to it.

But even the most mindbent Air Nomad Elder was still human. And so many of those here hadn't been Elders. They'd been mothers. Sisters. Children.

We did what we could. Saved what we could. Sometimes, everything burns.

And he refused to feel guilty because one teenage firebender and an ancient, cranky dragon-child hadn't been enough to save the world. Kuzon, Temul, everyone who'd risked their lives to help - even with every hand against them, they'd tried.

Zuko had to laugh, low and wry, remembering Temul's chill presence as blood mixed with the rain. "And damned if we didn't go out in style."

I died with a friend, and an honorable man to remember me. Not a bad way to go.

Not like what Sozin had unleashed here. Not at all.

...And damn it, that was definitely not his fault. He hadn't taught innocent women and children to make themselves easy to kill.

"Aang thinks life is precious," Zuko muttered. "Someone's got to get through to him, death is precious too..."

A whisper of wind; or maybe cloth against leather. He didn't glance that way, listening, smelling...

A slosh of water in leather, and he looked into cold blue eyes.

Oh. Wonderful.

Sword drawn, Sokka moved it slowly toward the rippling light.

"Trust your instincts," Temul had said one night, in the middle of kicking his butt yet again. "Those hairs are on the back of your neck for a reason. If something feels off - you travel with the Avatar, young man. Assume there's a spirit until you have good reason to believe otherwise. You avoid more horrible, lingering deaths that way.

"Your tribe says waterbenders are closer to the spirits? That's true. Spirits are energy. Chi is energy. And nothing in life comes free. Anyone who moves energy - benders, swordsmen, onmitsu, dragons - is vulnerable to energy.

"Energy against energy, spirits win.

"So what do you do to fight a spirit, young man? You come from a tribe of survivors; you know this! How does a poor, weak human - a mere scrap of energy, wrapped in blood and bone - fight a tsunami? Think!"

You use tools, Sokka thought now, positioning dark, polished space-metal so it reflected the waves below. Like the chief's special fishing hook Dad catches fish for the Ocean with, so the rest of the catch is ours. Like Gran-Gran's basket-weaves, that make illness-spirits follow the maze, so they don't make it past to people.

Spirits were energy. They beat people with energy, stomping human chi into submission the way Toph would powder an annoying fortress wall. But they couldn't do that if they couldn't touch it.

That's why Sozin and other Fire Lords kept stomping on belief in the spirits, Sokka realized. If you don't know they're there, it's harder for them to get at you. Like the Painted Lady. As long as the jerk running the factory didn't believe - she couldn't hit him hard. Not without help.

He believed in spirits. Flying around the world with Aang, you couldn't not believe. Especially after you'd KO'd a knowledge spirit with a book.

So if he looked right at whatever was out there, he opened a hole in his defenses. Just like lowering his blade in a swordfight. If Sokka saw it, it could see him.

But if he looked at its reflection...

White sparkled in the moonlight above the waves, fine as diamond dust.

Sokka's heart thudded, quick and painful. It's not cold enough for diamond dust.

It never got cold enough for diamond dust. Not in the Fire Nation. Maybe on top of Mount Shirotona, in a really cold year. This close to warm ocean water? Not possible.

And when you had frozen water where you shouldn't... then you had waterbending.

Katara bent water for combat, not to be pretty. Aang probably didn't even know what diamond dust was. And neither of them had any reason to be down there...

Idiot. I'm missing one.

Except Zuko had no reason to be down there, either. And plenty of good reasons not to be down there. Katara was trying to be civil, but Sokka had vivid memories of what had happened the last time she'd had Zuko cornered with his back to the ocean. He kind of doubted Zuko had forgotten it.

Besides. Zuko probably had even less clues about diamond dust than Aang did. Firebenders hated cold.

So. If it's not them, then what-

Something sinuous slipped through the waves.

That... can't be as big as it looks.

Except that red-spider-thing that had gone after Toph had been plenty big, and Hei Bai had been even bigger, and... oh, frost it.

"So if there's some reason you're stuck here," Aang summed up, scratching behind Momo's ears, "we thought... well, maybe we could help you out."

"It was kindly meant." Seated on the edge of the balcony in the moonlight, one sandaled foot swinging free, the ghost smiled. "But I am not bound here by violence, young one. I wait as a guardian, until the time is right."

Oh. Well, that was good. Kind of? "So... when will the time be right?" Aang ventured.

Shih's eyes danced. "Traditionally, a family ghost lingers until one's children have grandchildren."

So there were rules about this? That was kind of neat- Wait a minute. "You've been here over a hundred years!"

"Hmm... no," Shih said thoughtfully. "I have been here less than nineteen years, I believe." He grinned. "But there is truth to what you say. One of my offspring is taking a very long time to do his filial duty."

"No kidding!" Aang shook his head, amazed. "Why haven't you pestered him into doing what's right? I mean, I didn't get it before, but - clans are serious to the Fire Nation, right?"

"First, because pestering someone into good behavior rarely lasts," Shih stated, leaning back against empty air. "Second, he has at last found a strong lady to stand beside, so I believe that difficulty will solve itself. Eventually. Third, because he has been very busy, and one would not wish to place yet another burden on his shoulders. But fourth, and most important of all, the lady I took to wife was born and raised an Air Nomad, and her son likewise. How could I ask him to be bound by teachings he did not know, and heart-ties he does not feel? As well ask young Toph to break a bargain she has made, or the young lord to turn his back on his people." A ghostly finger tapped Aang's nose. "Or those two of the Southern Tribe to turn you away when you are in need, after they have declared you family. It could be done. Humans are capable of impossible courage. But it would break their hearts." Shih settled back onto the balcony. "What would break your heart, young one? Had you wished all your friends to find me, you would have brought them here. You did not. So...?"

Aang swallowed, petting warm fur. The lemur's fingers brushed his shaved head, tickling his ear. "I'm still scared." Which was maybe a silly thing to say to a ghost. "I don't want to do this. I don't want to firebend, or to face Fire Lord Ozai. Or the Face-Stealer. I wish... I wish I could just run away."

Shih sighed. "And here I cannot be kind, much as I might wish it. Aang. The peril you face, the danger to the whole world... much of it is because many people did run away. And have run away, for centuries. Doing the right thing... it costs one. Sometimes only a moment's discomfort. Sometimes a lifetime hunted and afraid, ever looking over one's shoulder for the blades of those you have defied. Sometimes - everything." The onmitsu shook his head. "It is not fair. So many failed to do what was right when it was easier, and now the weight of those failures buries you." He lifted his gaze, determined. "But know this, Aang. You are stronger than you fear. Because you are afraid, and yet you act." A steady nod. "That, is courage."

"But if you don't think it's going to work-" Aang shrugged. "That's not courage. That's just stupid."

"Hmm." Dark brows went up. "Was Zhao stupid?"

"Well, yeah!" Aang flung up his hands. "Killing the moon? That would have put the whole world out of balance, and it took out waterbending, and... er."

Shih's smile was wry. "One would remind you that both those outcomes would have favored Zhao, would they not?"

"But it was wrong," Aang protested.

"It was evil," the ghost acknowledged. "If evil always meant stupidity, your task would not be so difficult, would it? Aang. Always, always know that your enemies have their own reasons. If you can find those reasons, you may be able to persuade them that your plan is the wiser, and will - over time - allow them to reap the most benefit. And if that is possible, then they may no longer be enemies."

Okay. Except that didn't make sense, didn't people just know a good idea when they heard one... oops.

"Katara tried to tell me that," Aang admitted, face red. "She said I should try to master the elements first, not... not use General Fong's plan, with the Avatar State." He scrunched his shoulders, frustrated. "But I just wanted the war to stop."

"It is never wrong to wish people free of hatred and pain," Shih agreed. "But what we wish must be tempered by what we know we can do. And cannot. Was Roku stupid?"

"...Um." Because Avatar or not, he had been going up against a volcano, and apparently even the World Spirit had trouble with volcanoes. But Ta Min and his family had gotten away. So... um. "I don't know?"

"Heh." Shih folded his arms, and gave Aang a knowing look. "Were your two young Southern friends stupid, to go with a young student across an entire world at war, knowing the Avatar would be hunted and hounded by the entire Fire Nation?"

"But Katara believed in me," Aang argued.

"And did her belief make her peril less?" Shih asked, very quiet. "Or more?"

Aang swallowed. Why didn't he know what to say? Katara wasn't stupid.

"Aang!" Sokka skidded out onto the balcony. "Oh good, Toph was right, you're here... we've got trouble!"

"Trouble?" Aang bounced to his feet, glad to get away from prickly questions. "What kind of-"

On the other side of the Temple, fire roared.

Ozai's son, lit by flames. How appropriate.

"Katara." Zuko loosened his grip on the handle of his lantern. Probably so she wouldn't see that he'd been ready to toss it at her, oil and all, spinning out ribbons of flames to wrap her in pain. She knew the thought had crossed his mind. More than once.

After all, if you want to hurt him... and Water never hurts its own... how much more must he want to hurt you?

But he looked away. As if she weren't even worth noticing.

He'll regret that.

"Did Sokka have a better idea where to look for Shih?" Zuko had the lantern up again, looking toward where long-ago builders had gnawed into the cliff. "Or did you get turned around? This place is a maze if you don't have a good map. I wonder if they thought that was part of the fun-"

"You think they built a sacred place for fun?" Katara cut him off. Even in the windless heat of a summer night, she could feel the Temple's power. What it would be like in autumn storms, with winds ready to airbender hands... it must have been incredible.

And he destroyed it.

...Well, not Zuko directly. But close enough.

"They had ball courts, air-cake cook-offs, and calligraphy competitions," Zuko shrugged. "So, yes. You know Aang. He thinks the world exists to have fun in."

"So?" Katara stalked forward, hearing the soft clink of a verdigris dome hanging from a ragged chain. All this ruin, because of firebenders' arrogance... "Why shouldn't it?"

Zuko eyed her, and faded back down the hall to what he probably thought was a safer distance. "That sounds really weird, coming from you."

"You think I don't know how to have fun?" Toph thought so. Sokka thought so. Even Aang thought so. It made her feel cold inside. Ready to prove them all wrong.

Yes... let's have some lovely fun...

"I think we're looking for a ghost, in a deserted temple, so Aang can feel better about Sokka's plan to go find a firebending teacher." Zuko was frowning. "Fun isn't exactly what comes to mind."

What, the Fire Nation didn't tell ghost stories for fun? Oh, that was right, they wouldn't. Their ghosts were too malevolent for that.

Such as the one who lairs here, keeping those powers who would help you at bay... you give so much to all of them. Don't you deserve help? And they hold it from you...

"Destroyed, not deserted," Katara snapped, advancing again. Honestly, no wonder Toph and Aang were confused. Fire didn't care about sacredness, or respect. Zuko only cared about something if he could use it. No wonder the younger children didn't know how to face him. "You know they didn't just leave."

Protect the children...

"Deserted." Zuko's voice was so calm, it grated. "As in, nobody lives here right now. Not like the Northern Temple, or that really weird guy at the Eastern Temple. Who in their right mind drinks banana-onion..." He stopped, scar sucking up the light like a hungry shadow. "Katara? Are you feeling okay? It's been a long night."

She eyed him right back, unable to believe his attitude. "People died here. Horribly. And you don't even care."

"What the heck are you..." Zuko lowered the lantern, face hard-edged by shadows. "I didn't do this."

"No." Keep moving. Keep pushing. Water never failed. It might freeze, it might puff away as mist, but it was never destroyed. Not like fire. "You just didn't stop it."

Water against Fire, Water wins. As it should. Water is home, is family; and family's never evil, it can't be...

"That was a hundred years ago," Zuko snapped, stepping a little sideways. Away from the arches. Away from the water. "How old do you think I am?"

He's afraid of me. Why would he be afraid, if he hasn't done anything wrong?

Unless he just hasn't done it yet.

I knew it. I knew we couldn't trust him. You can never trust fire, it sears and scorches and cooks-

Cooks away the lovely salt blood, oh, let's show him what fun really is...

No. She'd make him confess, first. Aang would want that. "Old enough to know your great-grandfather was a murderer." Now. Now he'll attack me. Now - and I'll just be defending myself-

Zuko... blinked at her. "Which one? I've got four. They all killed people. Be a little more specific."

She'd expected evil. She'd expected rage. But this? Jaw dropping, she took a half-step back, hand near the safety of her waterskin. "You're not even ashamed of it."

Zuko kept staring. Lowered his brows, as if wondering why she was even asking. "Are you?"

What?

"Water Tribe chieftains usually kill at least one guy to prove they're the man for the job," Zuko went on, as if he didn't know every word was acid. "And that's just in your tribes. Ask some historians what blue sails meant to people before Sozin's war." He shrugged. "My ancestors were warriors. I know that. Sozin was a monster. Kuzon was a spy; trust me, he didn't make it to his nineties by being nice. I don't even have a name for Shidan's father, but he was a dragon. That kind of says everything. And don't even get me started on Roku-"

"Roku?" She couldn't have heard that right. She couldn't have.

Liar. You know he's lying, fire always lies!

"Sokka said that, too." Zuko rubbed the side of his head, looking out at moonlit water. "Azulon married Ilah. One of Roku's daughters. So everybody in my family who's still alive is blood-related to an idiot Avatar. I think that explains a lot." He grimaced. "Shih's not here. Maybe we should search somewhere else? There's something weird about-"

"You're lying!" So easy to reach out and squeeze. A crook of arm and hands seized the red running through hidden veins, stopping those hateful, evil words. "You're lying!"

She'd stopped his heart. She'd stopped his heart.

Can't breathe, can't move, can't firebend - focus! You don't need breath, not if you've got-

Fighting for every twitch of his fingers, Zuko let the lantern drop.

Pull it - slap her - distract her, what the hell is she doing-?

Flames spun and slashed at her, pulled from lantern and oil. She flinched.

I can breathe.

It just wasn't doing any good. His lungs were dragging in air. His heart was beating. But the world was narrowing in as if neither of those were true, vision flashing as red as if he were trapped in a burning building, and all the strength his blood carried was smoke-

Blood.

He could feel his heartbeat. Feel his breath. But he couldn't feel his pulse.

She stopped my blood. How?

Flames sizzled and died, as Katara flicked her water over the lantern wick.

She's going to kill me.

He'd done deep dives before, but only with the chance to breathe first. Everything was fading from red to black; the way it had one horrible night, when a satin pillow had pushed down with Azula's implacable determination-

I will not die here!

Moss in the shadowed corners. Where there was moss, there was water.

He raked air toward him with both hands, yanking threads of moisture from night-chilled stone. Not enough to fight with...

But no matter how homicidal a bender might be, it was hard to ignore a palm-full of water crawling up your nose.

His pulse thundered back into motion, light surging back into the world.

He wanted to run. He desperately wanted to run, to put distance between himself and whatever insanity had possessed Katara this time.

But you don't need to see water to bend it.

Which meant whatever she'd done to halt his blood in its tracks - his blood, Agni, what the hell was that? - then the moment she got a chance to think-

Zuko punched fire at her, deliberately flashy, as Katara clawed water off her face. The waterbender snarled, a sudden handful of ice slapping flames away.

He whipped out a thin bolt of blazing heat, searing past her hip. Right through thick leather.

You fight like you train.

Katara had trained herself with that waterskin for months. She scooped her arms to gather up escaping water, focused on her damaged weapon.

Keep her focused on that, instead of the whole ocean down there-

For a moment, he was drowning.

The tribe casts you out, waves whispered at him. The chieftain's daughter has decided. Let go; let it end. For the good of the tribe...

Wrong tribe, bastard!

Zuko breathed flames, walling his mind off from water. Oh, Agni. It wasn't all her fault. Something had gotten to her, the way the haima-jiao had pulled Amaya under-

Katara raised a hand, and the waves rose with it. Impossibly tall, more white foam than water...

For a moment, he could almost hear Toph's voice. Sparky? This is gonna suck.

It was like trying to squash a flea-gnat. The moon was with her. The ocean was with her. If she could connect once, Zuko would be a bloody paste on the stones. But he wouldn't stop moving.

Fire flashed out to knife through her waves; scalding her arms, searing her dress to tatters. She hissed, and healed herself in an instant. But that was yet another moment she couldn't bind his blood, and when she raised her hands to seize his puppet strings-

Whips of flame, snapping at her fingers so she had to flinch out of the form. Tangling and coalescing to snare her in a fiery net. "Katara." Zuko's voice crackled like the flames. "There's something in the sea out there. I think it's a spirit. It's trying to get at you. At any waterbender. Remember Yugoda's training! Get your chi out of the ocean, before-"

Stupid! I've seen this before.

She clutched her arms to her chest before the net could close, armoring herself in a torrent of seawater. Flame hissed into steam, snuffed in an instant.

Now-

Seawater crackled into ice, solid as iron.

What?

Zuko stepped into the moonlight, hands still up in a form she knew all too well.

Pushing Wave. That's... not possible...

Northern bender! Snow-child! Kill it, kill it, kill it!

He's going to kill me!

Katara breathed out, sacrificing her breath to melt her arms free; splitting her icy prison with a desperate shrug. Water surged, knocking Zuko off his feet.

Enemy of the tribe. Die!

Her spray of ice needles sizzled in a desperate overhead kick of flames. Zuko whirled to his feet, a ring of fire rising about them both-

It was like being splashed with boiling water. The world narrowed down to a blinding white of pain.

What am I doing?

Wind roared.

"Katara! Are you okay?" No, no, what was he thinking, she wasn't okay, her dress was all burned and her waterskin had been seared through and there were ashes everywhere.

Aang reached to hug her; stopped, and waved a hand in front of her face. Katara was blinking, like she wasn't sure he was there. Like she wasn't sure anything was there, and thinking was as hard as putting thoughts together up where the air was so thin, even the condor-geese didn't hang around.

The air here wasn't anywhere near that dangerous, but Toph was screaming. Did kind of make it hard to think.

As did the grim look he was getting from Sokka, as the young tribesman gripped Toph by one shaking shoulder. Momo had already jumped off Sokka's shoulder, scampering back out of the room, ears lowered as if he wanted to hide. "Aang," Sokka said. "Aang. We need to-

"Whatever it is, we'll get to it later," Aang said impatiently. "Katara! How bad did he burn you?" After everything Zuko had said, about wanting to stop the war, and - he'd thought Zuko was telling the truth about wanting to help, how could he have been so wrong? "We'll get some water up here, you'll be okay-

"No water!" Katara shrank back. "There's something in the water down there, Aang! It was using the moon... it snuck inside my head and made everything twist around, I should have known it was wrong but I didn't. I just... went after him. He tried to stop me, even when I reached out, and... then the fire circle burned, but it burned that sneak more, and... then I heard you..."

Aang closed the distance between them, shaking his head. "Fire's scary. But you've got to think. Come on, Katara, you never go after people. Even Zuko-

"But I did." She was staring past his shoulder, eyes huge. "Aang. What did you do?"

"What did I do?" He blinked at her, and glanced that way. "Katara, Zuko was trying to-

The columns were gone.

Shards of their tops remained, like ragged teeth of stone. The rest - columns, railing, rust-rotted chains - all had been swept away. Like one of the great whirlwinds had touched down in the prayer hall, shredding it with claws of storm, before carrying the shattered remains out over an abyss of empty air.

There was - red and black and fire. Against the stone, before it...

No, no; he couldn't have done that, this had to be some kind of horrible mistake-

With a tortured squeak, a last bit of corroded copper broke loose and fell.

Toph wasn't screaming anymore. Just shaking under Sokka's hand, fists loose as if the master bender didn't know if she wanted to smash him with a boulder, or just open up a hole and drop away from the world. Her face was dead white.

Feet like lead, Aang trudged to the ragged edge wind had left behind. Below - way, way too far below - wind-raised foam still edged the waves, casting back glints of the setting moon.

The water was black and empty.

"I... he's not down there," Aang managed.

"You wouldn't see him if he was." Sokka's voice had no give in it. "Somebody that thin, doesn't float."

But... but that didn't make sense, if you didn't float you'd be fighting your way to the surface, because everybody needed to breathe-

No. No.

"I... I didn't mean to..."

"But you did." Katara shuddered, hand in front of her face like she thought she was going to be sick. "We did. We killed him."

Shaking loose from Sokka's hand, Toph fled.

Sparky's gone. Toph curled deeper into her self-carved cave, face hugged to her knees. Zuko's gone. It's not fair...

"May one join you?" A sense of presence against stone; weightless, yet obviously there. "Many tears have stained these stones."

Toph swiped at her face with a grubby hand. "I'm not crying. I'm mad!"

"Ah. Then that makes two of us."

The ghost still had no weight, but Toph felt shifts in stone as Shih's energy chilled it.

"One's temper is stretched... very thin, at the moment," Shih went on. "A spiderweb can still prevail against a hurricane if it is only wind. But if the web is poked..." A long sigh. "I should have warded the Temple better. I knew the currents had brought death and pain from the North, and the invasion would only have roiled matters further. In truth, I did ward the Temple." A pause. "Against spirits."

Toph swallowed, tasting salt. "That wasn't a spirit?"

"One thinks not." She could hear Shih's frown. "Had it been a creature of that other world, the young prince would not have fared so badly. No spirit strikes at a dragon-child and walks away unscathed."

And that just grabbed her heart and squeezed. "Strikes? Zuko's dead!" Dead, and it was all her friends' fault, she couldn't believe Aang had done that after all his spirity blah-blah about life being precious, didn't want to kill anyone - sure, don't kill Ozai, who was all kinds of scary-bad, but when it came to Zuko-

"Are you certain?"

She couldn't see this ghost unless he wanted her to see him. Didn't stop her from making a real good guess where the front of his shirt would be, and grabbing. "Talk."

"Erk." Shih squirmed to loosen phantasmal cloth from his throat. "Toph. Prince Zuko is a dragon-child, with an unfinished task. If the Avatar's strike, or the fall, had killed him..."

"Bingo," Toph got out. "One really ticked-off ghost." It hurt. So much. "You... you think...?"

"I cannot be sure," Shih warned. "But I do not know that he is dead. And if there is one thing all the world knows of Sozin's line, it is that they are very hard to kill. Zuko... were that spirit unhoused from mortal flesh and bone, I think that I would know. I think we all would know."

It hurt to hope. More than anything. "Then - that means he's out there. In the water. A-and we don't even know where to start looking." And it would have to be looking, darn it. "I hate that I can't see in water. I hate it! What good's bending if I can't find my friends when they need me?"

"Ah, little one... Toph." Cool fingers brushed her hot cheek. "Even for those with eyes, finding a life cast to the ocean is no easy task. Without knowledge of the tides and winds, one might as well search for one spilled grain in a firestorm. And at night? Red and black vanish in the darkness, especially when wet." Now the chill rested on the top of her head. "If he lives, he does need you. To stay safe, and keep your friends from foolishness. I can protect the waterbenders now that I know there is a threat. So long as they are here. Outside these walls - my strength cannot venture." A puff of air, like a breath of autumn in summer's heat. "You are of age to learn the first rule of rescues. And that, is this: do not become another victim. Before you can save another, you must know you can save yourself."

Toph sniffed. Pulled on an angry face; she wasn't crying. No matter how messed up this was. "You're saying I can't help him?"

...And her voice was not wobbling. It wasn't.

"I am saying, young master of Earth, that if your friend yet lives, he thanks Agni that he is in the water, and you are not," Shih said sternly. "These are Fire Nation waters. He has traveled among these islands. Swum these seas. If any of you would have a chance to survive this, he would."

"But I felt Aang hit him." Toph could barely get the words out. She could still feel that shock through the floor as Zuko had been blown off his feet. Still hear the eerie silence, before the distant splash. "He hit him really hard."

"I know." Shih gathered her into his arms. "I know."

Chapter End Notes

Diamond dust is cool, literally. Check it out on Wikipedia. It's a near-ground cloud of tiny ice crystals, and while you can see it anywhere it gets significantly below freezing, it's most common near the poles. Water Tribes would be familiar with it. Fire Nation? Heh. No.

Chapter 78

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Pain. The jagged, broken kind of pain that meant there was something... really wrong.

What... where...?

Not cold; not warm. Wet, dragging at skin and hair and clothing. Salt on his lips, lapping over his face, and a sandpapery bump that brought tears to his eyes as it jarred broken ribs-

Oh hell no!

Zuko's hand scythed through water, a searing froth that boiled and blackened the leopard-shark's skin from eye to gills, battering it aside so only the wave of its rush slashed him. Instead of the teeth. Lots and lots of teeth.

I need to get out of the water.

It hurt to move. And if it hurt this much when the ocean was holding him up, he didn't want to think about-

Don't think. Just do!

He lifted both hands as much as he could, focusing on the feel of water around and under him. Pressure, lifting, the uneven sway that wasn't at all like a boat...

The leopard-shark hit ice, jarring him to the bone.

Oh yeah. Something's definitely broken. A lot of somethings.

Pain was a warning. He'd been warned. Keep moving.

Zuko blinked past red flashes in his vision, peering through the cloudy ice cupping him, trying to see where his would-be predator-

Another jarring - blinding - crash.

Don't move. Just breathe.

The leopard-shark circled ice, eye rolling at the broken human somehow out of reach.

Focus. Letting his hands sink back into the pool of seawater cupped in ice with him, Zuko lifted them again. Not as high as the first time, passing out would be bad...

And again. And again, ice wobbling and steadying under him as it rose up through the waves. The leopard-shark circled at a distance, blackened gills on one side of it still trying to pump even as a pale wash of blood wisped into the water-

Darkness flashed under the surface like lightning.

Zuko hissed another stream of curses, fighting off pain as the thump of displaced water wobbled his improvised iceberg...

The leopard-shark was gone.

What. The. Hell?

Broken ribs or not, Zuko raised more ice. An inch higher above the water, two...

Something brushed against the layer of frozen seawater beneath him. Slowly. Deliberately.

Not good.

Dark and sleek, like a koala-otter's wet fur. Sinuous as a dragon-fly, despite what looked like a swelling bruise along one side of a thick, furred neck. And teeth.

Zuko had a very, very good view of the teeth, as the long, noseless snout poked over the edge of his ice. Like a zebra-seal's, but bigger; each tooth long as his hand, recurved, and serrated on the back edge for tearing chunks out of prey still living. Ivory was still tinged with a wash of red, glistening as a tongue swept over them and quested outward-

Flicking fingers, Zuko raised ice between himself and being tasted. Held his breath as pink flesh brushed over frozen water...

A shush of fur slipping into water, and it was gone.

...That was too easy.

He couldn't see much in the water past the glint of sun on waves. He couldn't see that furred, saw-toothed unknown lingering in the water.

Which didn't mean it wasn't there.

He couldn't swear to how big it was. He hadn't seen more than teeth and snout and fur. But it was big. Sky bison big. Big enough he'd be a few nicely-sized bites. It could be waiting.

...Which would mean it was smart enough to look for food inside ice. Terrific.

I'm dead.

Not a joke. Not a whimper. Cold, calculated realization.

I'm in the middle of the ocean. I've got no clue where. I've got broken ribs, broken who knows what else, my only float is a chunk of ice, and something wants to eat me. Something with really, really big teeth-

He knew those teeth.

A kadzhait. That's a kadzhait in the water.

For a moment, his eyes stung with something that wasn't pain. A thousand years. Over a thousand years, and Koh hadn't won. Water's spirit-animals were still out there.

They're alive. He wanted to pump a fist at the heavens, and shout it to a particular Face-Stealer's face. The walking whales are alive!

...And this one wanted to eat him.

It's not just a walking whale.

Not if it was hanging around to tear him into little bite-size pieces. That wasn't just a kadzhait. That was a sea serpent.

Of course. What else would I fall into the ocean on top of?

...No wonder Katara went berserk.

She'd trained as a combat waterbender, not a healer. And she'd trained fast. The North Pole being what it was, the Avatar being who he was - that meant she'd trained under Pakku.

Amaya had had a lot to say about Pakku.

He trains teenagers, not kids. Not people just starting out with waterbending.

Amaya had assumed her student knew nothing about waterbending. Firebenders created flames with their chi. They never had a reason to keep some mental distance between their spirit's energies and the element they bent. Amaya had had to teach him that from scratch, like a particularly grumpy toddler.

If it grabbed her through her water - Katara didn't stand a chance.

Though at the moment, he was a lot more worried about his own chances.

No one's going to come looking for me. I saw Aang's face when he blew me out of that hall. He's not going to let anyone come looking for the evil firebender who hurt his precious waterbender.

Toph would look. Toph would try.

But Toph couldn't see in water. She'd never find him.

This is all my fault. My own, stupid fault.

Granted, that scene in the prayer hall had looked bad. If you couldn't sense the wrongness in the ocean - and he was starting to think Aang didn't sense things until they lurched out of the water and tried to strangle him - then, yes, it definitely looked bad. But he still hadn't expected to get blasted off a cliff-

Because you felt like you were in the Fire Nation, Zuko swore silently. Idiot!

To Fire Nation eyes, it would have looked like Katara had tried to kill him, and he'd tried to kill her back. Simple. Obvious. And a fair fight, meaning nobody with any sense got in the middle of it until someone died or surrendered.

Nobody with sense. From the Fire Nation.

Aang wasn't Fire Nation. Aang was the Avatar.

Teruko was right. The Fire Nation can't trust the Avatar. Ever.

He'd tried, because not even a Fire Sage like Shiyu could teach a firebender if he didn't trust his student. He'd tried.

Bad mistake.

Bad enough to get him killed. And he did not want to die here. His people needed him. His family needed him.

And... Toph would be sad.

Get real. Toph would kick your ass and start yelling about how stupid it is for a waterbender to drown.

And an angry Toph was a scary, scary thought. She knew about spirits. She'd find a Fire Sage to drag him back some far-off ghost watch, just so she could kick his spirit's ass.

"And that is not going to happen," Zuko said under his breath. Glared out at the waves, that might or might not be hiding a monster. "You hear me, Tui? I am not going to die here. My nation isn't Zhao. My nation isn't Sozin. You want me dead? You're going to have to come get me!"

Silence. Only the slap of waves, the quiet creaks of ice in warmer water.

"I am not going to die," Zuko breathed. "Maybe you'll kill me. But I am a son of Fire, and I will not surrender."

Steadying breath. And ow.

First things first. Ribs. Zuko winced again, as salt stung cracking lips. And then, fresh water.

Still cracked, Zuko judged, feeling along half-healed ribs with water-wrapped fingers. Not good. But... not as bad as it was.

He was out of the water now, clothes wrung dry with a flutter of fingers. Seawater stole your body heat a lot faster than air. Even without a sea serpent waiting to snack on him, staying in the water would have been a slow death.

Though he'd separated out some fresh water to rinse off before he'd put dry clothes on. Even months later, the memory of the sores eaten into his skin by seawater and all the little lives in it was vivid, ugly, and almost as painful as watching corpses drift by their raft. Three weeks adrift with sea vultures circling had taught him more ways the ocean could kill him than he had ever wanted to know.

The sea doesn't care if you live or die. The sea just is. If you pay attention, if you do everything right - maybe it won't kill you. Yet.

So. Rules of survival. Shelter, water, fire, and food.

Shelter, check. Not the best shelter, drifting on ice in these waters meant he had to keep reinforcing it as it melted. But it definitely beat drifting like a log in the current with a kadzhait snaking through the water.

Speaking of. Water, check; he currently had quite a bit pooled in a hollow in the ice. Which was a much, much better situation than he'd been in the last time he'd been lost at sea. So long as he could concentrate enough to bend water away from everything else, thirst wasn't going to kill him.

And fire, check. As long as his chi held out.

Shouldn't be a problem, if the sun comes up soon... Zuko craned his head back to eye the constellations through thin patches of cloud. Midsummer. If the Manriki-Gusari is that high over the horizon, and the Ko-Manriki is raised for the kill... ah, hell. It's not even midnight yet.

Not good. But if he could see the Ko-Manriki's haft, then he knew where north was. If he could put that together with the direction of the current-

Ice shuddered under him. Red sparks of pain flashed in his vision.

...Yeah. Don't think starving is going to be my main problem...

After a while it got into a rhythm. Thump, pain, reinforce the ice. Thump. Pain. Reinforce.

But rhythms were good, no matter how painful. Rhythms let part of your brain handle surviving on automatic, while the rest of a terrified mind tried to sit on panic and think.

Lost at sea. Nobody knows where I am. Going to die- Stop that!

Okay. The key problem here was lost. So how did he get un-lost?

There's the Ko-Manriki. That's north. So I got blown off the east side of the southernmost of the Temple Islands...

Blown off by unstoppable winds, fueled by an airbender's fury. All an Avatar's fury, turned on him-

Aang. Isn't. Here. Zuko stuffed that nightmare back into a box, and studied the glory of stars above, diamonds scattered above the black silk of thickening clouds. I was blown east, then washed out by the tide. I don't know where I am exactly, but it doesn't matter. I wasn't out that long. I can't be more than a few miles out. Probably. What I need to know is, am I still in an offshore tide, or am I all the way out in the Black Current?

He pulled up some of the ice into a thin shield against the wind, and broke off more in curved fragments. Hugged one arm against the worst of his ribs, and threw.

A scattering of white ice thumped into the waves. Bobbed almost under the surface; rose up, and started drifting.

Zuko licked a finger, and checked the wind. Waited-

Thump. Ow. Damn it.

It's gone all the way around my iceberg, Zuko realized. Bet it's going to try something else this time - gah!

Ice slooshed into water underneath him, soaking his shoes before he could jump aside. The translucent tunnel of water bored deeper, down to where a suddenly-visible head was directly under where he'd been standing, massive tongue fluttering to bend ice back into flowing sea-

Zuko bared his teeth, and snapped a dart of flame down.

Steam geysered back up. Ice shuddered with a terrible moan, as a howl seemed to shake through his bones.

Balancing on wobbling ice, Zuko snapped his arms out in a push to freeze the hole-

Pain. Whiting out the world.

-Grit his teeth, and lurched through Pushing Wave; north, south, east, and west.

Solid ice sheeted out over the waves, locking in scattered fragments.

It won't melt through that in a hurry. Zuko breathed shallowly, waiting for the sea serpent's next move. Huh. Current's going... mostly north. Looks like I am in the Black Current.

On the one hand, that was reason for panic. Heading north, to empty, colder water.

On the other - he hadn't been in the water that long. The Black Current was strong, but not fast. Given time, yes, it would get him to treacherous, uninhabited waters. But right now? It could be one of his best allies.

The current pushes north past all the Western Air Islands. For the next few days, I'll be heading past land.

I just need to get to it.

A spray of breath, turning to icy fog in the cloud-dimmed night. Sparkles of it drifted roughly southward, quiet as mist.

Shaping an arced wall of ice at a right angle to the strengthening wind, Zuko rolled his eyes. "If you're trying to be ominous, it's not working."

Dark fur slipped under the water, not even a ripple left behind.

"Oh, right. 'You don't know where I am, so I could be anywhere.' Come on." Zuko raised his voice. "My little sister was scarier than you! When she was six!"

Ice cracked, webbed claws tearing it into long gashes of seawater with a flex of one massive paw.

"That's where I thought you were," Zuko murmured. Clasped his hands together in front of him; twisted a fast figure-eight left, and push forward-

Shards of ice exploded outward. Some were blocked by fur and hide, poofing into harmless snowfall. Others...

In the webs between claws, shards drew blood.

"Get lost!" Zuko yelled, as the sea serpent yanked back its paw with an indignant squeal. "You want me out of your waters? Fine! I want me out of your waters. Go find someone else to gnaw on!"

Predators don't like to get hurt. Why the hell is it still wasting time with me?

Obviously, he hadn't made himself a painful enough meal. Yet.

Or it really is a sea serpent.

Langxue had said they were supposed to be like dark dragons. Just as alien to human ways of thinking. And just as smart.

Which means it holds a grudge. Not because I hurt it. Because I'm alive, and I'm not alone.

Except he was alone. Just a speck of life lost in the ice and currents. No one to search for him. No one to help. Only himself, and the waiting hunger of the sea...

Zuko stopped himself before he'd gone two steps toward the water, dragging sanity back like a lead chain. Toph would look for me if she could.

And it didn't matter that she couldn't. She was out there, and she cared. He was not going to disappoint the Blind Bandit by giving up just because of one measly little ocean. He'd done this before. He could do this.

But not alone...

Zuko planted a hand above his knee before he could take another step, and glared at the waiting water beyond the edge of ice. "Oh. That's you." He smirked, no matter how badly his nerves had tied themselves in knots. "I thought I was just having a bad night."

Deliberately turned his back, and stalked back toward the ice shield.

Three. Two. One-

Years baiting Azula paid off. He dropped and spun before the lurch of ice that heralded an angry sea serpent clawing its way up out of the water like a zebra-seal.

..Bad idea.

Chest and lungs felt like he'd been impaled with flint shards. But the spray of deadly ice-needles sailed harmlessly over his head, and he had just enough breath to lift his right hand and snap it outward.

The fire-whip slashed out and up, scoring a long black sear down his enemy's snout. The sea serpent jerked its head back and left, limber neck shifting its head away and spearing ice up to impale Zuko's arm-

Something in furred muscle seemed to seize. The ice-spears melted even as they tapped cloth; drips turning to a summer-melt that sheeted across the berg and down, dropping the sea serpent back into the ocean with an indignant squeal.

It couldn't move its neck through the form. Zuko got to his knees, breathing shallowly, smoothing air with his fingertips to seal the hole with a sheet of opaque ice, black in the dark before dawn. He still felt that pressure of alone and despair... but he'd fought through worse nights. That bruise. Has to be recent; it's still getting worse. It fumbled the form, so it melted the ice instead of spearing me. What the heck could have tangled with something that big-

The answer smacked him like a meteor, and Zuko started to snicker. Oh, it hurt to laugh. But he had to. "He got you, too!"

Fury, all but bubbling from the sea.

"He did." Zuko smirked, dragon-sharp. "There you were, having fun twisting Katara around in your schemes. Then the whole sky caves in." Another careful, shallow snicker. "Avatars and stone walls. No wonder Great-Grandfather built the new palace based on wood." He tried not to giggle. "You know the funny part? He didn't even know you were there!"

Fury. Pain. Hatred, like a drowning wave.

Zuko clung to the reality of cloth sleeves under his fingers and fire in his core. He wasn't aching in the water. He was not-

Alone, cast out, not-of-the-pod. Claws and tails poised to slash the ocean against him; water roiling as elder-females held back a young dam yowling her loss, oh the taste of tender flesh had been so sweet...

"Sick," Zuko breathed, staring up at the fading milky river of stars, just barely visible through the clouds scudding across the sky. Common sense said he shouldn't take his eyes off the water. But his last bout drifting had taught him he needed to look at something beyond the disaster he was in the middle of, or he'd dive right into panic. With a sea serpent gouging at his mind... he couldn't afford panic. "Sick, and stupid. Even Azula isn't that crazy. What did you think they were going to do after that? Ignore it? Let you stay?"

Something dragged at the ice, like a thousand grasping hands.

Drowned? But if there were drowned in the water they'd be coming after me by now, not just grabbing the ice-

It was still too dark, too long before dawn to see the water as more than shifting black. But the scents were different here. Not the clean salt of deep ocean water. More of a tang of sea wrack, decaying kelp blades broken loose and drifting...

Yes!

Something was dragging at the ice. Something even the keenest eyes couldn't spot from the water's surface. You had to be underwater, deep under; or crow's-nest high above it, looking through blue waves forty and more feet down, where the sun's heat barely touched.

In colder seas, kelp grew to the surface. In Fire Nation waters - it stayed deep.

But the kelp's holdfast needs to get some light, it can't be more than a few hundred feet down... I'm in the shallows! If I can just keep the ice angled so the wind pushes me east-

Wind hurled the downdraft that meant storm, rain pouring down in torrents that twisted sea and ice and sky into one.

Screaming blackness rolled his spirit under.

You hope! You dare to hope, to believe in human-pod that only deserves death! Die! Die! Die!

Blinded, soaked, heart racing with terror, Zuko pulled his chi out of the water. All of it. Breathe. Have to breathe, have to center-

Ahhh yes... Water splashed; one massive limb surfacing, shaking water off fur. A low rumble, a waft of cold air...

Zuko blinked rain out of his eyes to see a third of his iceberg slide away, cut razor-clean by one flick of claws. Oh hell.

He scrambled through gusts of rain as the berg moaned and shifted, lightened side shuddering up and up out of the water-

The kadhait flicked its snout, melting an ice-chunk on the opposite side to send his shrunken haven rolling back the other way.

"Cute," Zuko snarled, slipping and gripping slick wet ice to try and center himself over the largest lump left. Just like Azula. Only worse. Azula tortured things to make sure Ozai never forgot his avored child. This creature tormented just for the pain. Because there were bonds that should have held a kadzhait, heart-ties of love and family every sane being counted on to survive, and this male just didn't have them...

He's not sane.

He's going to keep hunting humans. Hunting waterbenders - and after he's done with me, he'll go back after Katara. And Aang.

The Avatar's mind, pulled under by a sea-serpent's hate. Kesuk all over again. He could almost hear Koh laughing-

Ice shivered, yet another shred of safety calving off into the rippling ocean.

He's a kadzhait, Zuko thought, scrambling grimly back to his knees. A miracle. But... I can't let him get away.

Calm welled up in him like lava. He couldn't use water. The few knives he still had on him likely wouldn't get through the sleek fur, much less the hide and blubber armoring the kadzhait's vitals. He'd used up most of his chi just surviving, and in the middle of the damned ocean there was no fire to pull from-

Yes. There is.

It was raining, and he was about to die. Again.

But this time, he wasn't chi-blocked.

Probably won't work. But a little less ice, and I'm dead anyway. "Your name!" Zuko roared, as yet another avalanche of ice melted and slid away. "You called me a snow-child? Then I swim under the moon's light, just as you do! I want the name of the swimmer who would slay me!"

A furred tail-fin slapped the water, three harsh cracks. No pod. No name! Die!

Calm. Like a pool of waiting lava. Like the unseen sparks that clung to every drop of rain, cold fire flowing from the storm for any with the heart to feel it...

He swept his arms as if casting a net, gathering shreds of lightning. The ancient way. The dragon's way; when the clans went to war in storms, and a twist of wings separated the quick from the dead. "You first!"

Thunder split the sea.

Teeth, drifting in dark water.

Don't want those near me.

Rational thought seemed to pop in and out like a loose tooth. He was in the water. That wasn't good. Near something dead, which also wasn't good-

Fadeout. Squawks and clicks. A pressure, bobbing him back to the surface.

Wind out there? Okay. Breathe....

A distant crack-thump; sails catching wind.

The rising sun gave him a spark of energy; enough to see shadows on storm-lit water, and billows of wet cloth rising black against the sky.

What color are the sails?

How do I fix this?

Katara huddled against the cliff wall, arms pulling her knees to her chest as the first rays of sun peeked through the storm, painting the seas below. It was beautiful up here. Even now, with half the hall in ruins.

I'm supposed to be holding us all together. Not ripping us apart. I'm supposed to be the responsible one.

Except - she was afraid that was exactly what had gotten Zuko killed.

Katara tucked her chin to her knees, testing that painful thought. She was the responsible one. She kept Aang grounded, when he wanted to just fly away and have fun. She was the one who told them all what was right.

And Aang let me. She swallowed hard. Because figuring out what's right is hard. And... Aang doesn't do hard. Aang's a kid.

And taking care of kids was her life. Except for waterbending. Gran-Gran had made that clear for years. So when yet another kid was dumped in her lap - and Aang was so hopeless at surviving on his own, he couldn't be anything else - she'd just... taken over.

He let me decide what was right. And I was wrong.

So now Aang was rooms away, buried in Appa's fur. And Toph was hiding with a ghost, and Sokka was-

"Hey, Sis."

She looked up, throat tight. "Sokka?"

Sword sheathed over his shoulder, Sokka stood over her, face grave. Sighed, and went down to one knee, arms open.

She clutched his tunic, burying her face in his shoulder. "I'm sorry. I made an awful mistake. I'm sorry..."

"I got you, Sis," Sokka said quietly. "I'm not going anywhere."

"Toph - Aang was out there in the dark..."

"Toph's dug into a wall, and I told Aang not to go near her," Sokka reported. "Aang finally figured out you were serious about the tides washing anything that might have made it through the fall out to sea. He tried to drag me out on Appa to look some more, but Shih showed up, with a sword, and - whoof. I didn't catch everything he said, but there was something in there about Kuzon, and faces turned away; whatever that is. Aang looks like somebody smacked him over the head with a boulder. Which, you know, I kind of wish I'd done a while ago." He took a deep breath. "I've still got Zuko's maps. It won't be easy, but - if Shiyu's in Boiling Rock, we can get him out."

It was like a thrown boulder to her gut. "Sokka, you don't understand! Aang - and I - we can't go on like this!"

"No. We can't," Sokka said flatly. "But what you, and Aang, and all of us have to fix between us, doesn't change what we have to do for everyone else. The Fire Lord's still out to take over the world. The Face-Stealer's still after humans. We don't get to quit just because it turned into a disaster. We're responsible for people-"

"That's how the water-spirit got me!" She didn't want to say this. But she had to. "I'm supposed to be responsible for my tribe. My family. I'm supposed to help people who need me. To protect them. And... it made me think..."

Sokka almost said something. Shook his head, and waited.

Katara winced. "It made me think I had to protect you from Zuko."

Sokka let out a slow breath. "Why?" His tone wasn't accusing, as he waved at the room. Just curious. "What did he do that made you think we couldn't trust him?"

"Nothing." Katara rubbed at the goosebumps on her arms. It felt like the words had thorns, as she tore them out of her throat. "He didn't do anything. He was just here. Looking at the prayer hall like he cared. The same temple where his great-grandfather... killed everyone."

Sokka fingered the end of his wolf tail, obviously thinking over the best thing to say. "Except Fire Lord Sozin didn't kill everyone here. And you know why. Temul. Kuzon-"

"I know." Katara gritted her teeth. "But it didn't matter. He didn't even act ashamed. And then when he lied about one of his great-grandfathers being Avatar Roku-!"

"He wasn't lying."

She stared at her brother.

"Sozin and Roku used to be friends, remember?" Sokka reminded her. "Aang saw that in Roku's vision. And Roku's family didn't know what happened to him. They just knew he was gone. So later, when Sozin had a son... Ilah married him. Fire Lord Ozai, Iroh, Azula - they're all Roku's grandkids. And great-grandkids."

No way. "That's..." Katara shuddered. "Azula? Is the Avatar's..."

"Yeah," Sokka sighed. "I knew about that. I guess Zuko thought you knew it, too. And that's my fault. I should have talked to you about Roku's family. We should have talked about a lot of things. But we didn't, because..." His shoulders slumped. "I was ashamed. I couldn't protect you guys from Temul. All I could do was give her another target."

That sent ice-spiders down her neck. "Sokka? What did you do?"

"When we're in the Fire Nation, Temul shows up at night," Sokka said bluntly. "She teaches me, when you guys aren't around. The same way Master Piandao would if he could be there. Mostly by kicking my butt," he admitted. "I didn't want you to know."

She'd liked Master Piandao. She wished they could have stayed longer, for Sokka's sake. Even if there was a cranky ghost hanging around. But the Avatar couldn't stay in one place too long... and she knew enough about the great names now to know that one traveling around the Fire Nation with them would have made Aang an even bigger target.

And all of Shu Jing would have been in trouble with the Fire Lord. Domain lords aren't like chiefs, but... they're still supposed to be responsible for their people.

So the cranky ghost is training Sokka instead. Katara wanted to rub at a headache. Why does that seem like the Fire Nation all over?

Still, she gave her brother a look askance. "Me, or Aang?"

"Kind of both," Sokka shrugged. "She doesn't like Aang. And don't know if you've noticed, but Aang doesn't like things he can't bend out of his way."

Katara swallowed. "I noticed." She tried not to shiver. "Is that... is that why you didn't tell Aang Zuko's a waterbender?"

Sokka whistled. "You saw that, huh?"

Not just a trick of her eyes. "How? That's - it's not possible-"

"It is," Sokka said bluntly. "I figured it out the other day. And I've been kicking myself for not putting it together after we met Langxue. Toph told us Lee was a waterbender."

"She knew." That hurt. "Why didn't she tell us?"

"Why didn't you show Aang that firebender's helmet, way back at the Southern Temple?" Sokka said pointedly.

"I didn't want him hurt! We knew what it was like to - to lose people to the Fire Nation. And there wasn't anything he could do, it happened so long ago..." Katara swallowed, thinking about that snowy cliffside. And what had happened afterward. "That didn't work out so well, did it?"

"I dunno, maybe it did," Sokka shrugged. "If he'd gone all glowy-eyes Windball of Doom out there, where we didn't have much to duck behind - might have been bad." He rubbed the back of his neck. "Though man, if I'd known he could do that, I might not have jumped into that airball game. Getting thumped off posts is one thing. Facing down a tornado? Not my idea of a good time."

"Right. The airball court." Katara smiled, remembering happier times. "I was so glad you were there, even if you were my annoying big brother. You really helped him feel better..."

Except Aang feeling better had come from walking right over her brother. Who didn't know the rules. Who couldn't airbend.

Like Toph, who'd been blasted out of the ring, losing her championship and her pride, to an attack she literally couldn't see coming.

Like Zuko, who'd been so busy trying to save both of them from the Thing in the water, he'd never had a chance to protect himself.

Sokka was holding her shoulders, bracing her as she covered her face with her hands. "Katara? Tell me what's wrong. Please."

Katara took one deep breath. Another. "Toph was right."

"Yeah?" Sokka's eyebrows were up, confused.

"Not just because of me," Katara admitted. "I would have been upset. I am upset. But..." She hunted for the right words. "Aang would have been worse. He's used to being special." Oh, this wasn't easy. "Like I was."

"Katara, you are special," Sokka told her, not a trace of goofiness on his face. "You're just not perfect. Who is?" He sighed. "Don't know if it helps, but... pretty sure Zuko would have told you he wasn't special. A Fire Nation prince, stuck as a waterbender? The spirits couldn't have messed him up worse if they'd tried."

She gave him a disbelieving look.

Sokka let go, one finger drawing a little circle in the air. "Turn it around. How would you feel if you started throwing sparks?" He grimaced. "How would the whole tribe feel?"

Katara shivered. Even imagining it made the floor want to drop out from under her. "I would have felt tainted," she got out. "But Aang would never understand that. He's the Avatar. He's supposed to bend other elements. That's what all his teachers told him. The one person in all the world who can bend all the elements. That makes him special." She met her brother's eyes. "You keep telling him he's special because he's Aang, not because he's the Avatar. But... I don't think he believes you."

"I think part of him's scared to believe me." Sokka looked at the stone rubble where copper domes had hung. "If he's special because he's Aang, then that means he's different. Because he's Aang, not the Avatar. And the Air Monks... I don't think they did different too well. Harmonious accord - ugh." He grimaced. "So. Yeah. I didn't ask Zuko if he could waterbend, and he never said he could. We kind of agreed to keep it quiet." Blue eyes rolled skyward. "I should've known better. Spirits always find a way to get you when you try something like that."

Katara shook her head. "Sokka, spirits don't try to get you."

Her brother raised an eyebrow. Which was so much like their father doing it, it just wasn't fair. "Hei Bai," Sokka said plainly. "Wan Shi Tong. Red octopus-spider things that go after stray earthbenders. Whatever went after you last night. Let's not even get into drowned zombies and one really cranky volcano. And the Painted Lady-" He cut himself off, face haunted. "I thought we'd lost you. I thought this was going to end up just like Gran-Gran's story about the ghost wife, dragging her whole family down with the net her husband found her bones in."

But that was just a story, Katara almost said.

Except the Avatar had been a story, too.

She'd trespassed on a river-spirit's name. And just like Gran-Gran's stories said, if you took something from the spirits and they didn't like it, you'd be lucky if all they did was slap you.

But I didn't mean to. I made a mistake.

Stone grated on stone, as another bit of shattered rock fell into the void.

"Do you think the spirits care?" Katara asked, voice low. "If we make mistakes."

Her brother looked at her, and broken stone, and sighed. "I think some of them care. The Painted Lady tried to let you go as soon as she could. Yue - she's tried to help all of us, right? And the past Avatars have tried to help Aang. Kind of. Though somebody needs to tell Kyoshi that maybe all the truth all the time isn't the best policy when we're trying not to get boiled in oil."

Oof, yes. Avatar Kyoshi had been impressive enough to scare a whole army into running. Except Kyoshi hadn't stuck around, and a twelve-year-old airbender convinced of his own innocence wasn't going to impress anyone into admitting how idiotic their laws were.

"Some of them care," Sokka repeated. "But some of them can't figure humans out with a map and a compass. It took the Avatar for Hei Bai to get that a bunch of villagers didn't burn down his forest. What would have happened if Aang had still been an airbender-sicle? Or even if he'd been like Roku, living on some backwater island with his family, weeks away from where the trouble was? We got lucky. They got lucky." Sokka looked at shattered stone, and shook his head. "Aang's used to bouncing around the world and always ending up in the right place at the right time. To tossing his bending around everywhere, and getting lucky." He glanced at her, face quiet and sad. "How many Zukos do you think are out there, Sis? How many people who just aren't lucky?"

"You always told me a real warrior doesn't depend on luck," Katara objected. "Aang's not a warrior. And he never wants to be."

"That means he's got to be even better," Sokka stated. "A good swordsman can kill somebody. It takes a great swordsman to disarm them without killing them. Aang wants to never kill anybody else, ever again? Then he can't depend on luck. He's got to be good, and he's got to be careful. And he's got to start thinking before he blasts things all over the place." Sokka snapped out a hand toward the ruined pillars; the same kind of sharp motion Katara had seen Zuko use to deflect Azula's flames. "Or does he think the Fire Lord's going to stand on the edge of a handy cliff? Oops, sorry, I didn't mean to kill anybody, but boy, isn't it a good thing he's dead?"

"Well, wouldn't it be?" Katara challenged him. "Wouldn't it be better for everyone?"

"Not for Aang." Her brother's eyes were hard, but sad. "Think about it, Sis."

I don't want to!

But not thinking - about her own hate, about why she'd suddenly wanted Zuko dead - had hurt her family enough already. She was responsible. She could do this.

Katara swallowed, mouth dry. "He'd be lying to himself," she said in a small voice. "He'd say he tried to do the right thing, when he just... took the easy way out. But he's a kid, Sokka. He shouldn't have to do something this hard!"

"He's a kid," Sokka agreed heavily. "That's why he has to do it the hard way. He's the Avatar. Like it or not, want to be or not, he's the Avatar. If the guy who can call up the power of the whole world always takes the easy way out - spirits. We'd be better off stuffing him in a metal box with Bumi and taking on Ozai ourselves. It'd be awful. It'd be ugly. But Aang wouldn't be lying to himself about what he did. And didn't do." He winced. "Once you start lying like that, where do you stop?"

She chafed her arms for warmth, fingers rubbing against skin and leather. "Do you think you can stop lying now?"

"Katara, that's - darn it." Sokka looked aside, guilty. "Okay. You got me on that one. It's just - what's Dad going to say? Temul adopted me. I don't think he's going to want to share with a ghost."

"Dad," Katara said confidently, "is going to march right up to that ghost and tell her to stop taking things that don't belong to her. Then we can all argue it out." She nodded, decisive. "A good master cares about his students. If she's as good a teacher as you say she is, she'll talk to him."

"Probably more like growl, snarl, and hmph," Sokka said wryly. "Are you okay?"

"If you didn't know how to fight with a sword, then in the invasion..." She didn't want to think about it. "I don't think it's right. But I'll yell at her later."

Sokka looked at her askance. "Wasn't what I was talking about."

"No," Katara said at last. "No, I'm not. I wanted this to be like the stories. The Avatar comes back and saves us all. But Aang's not like the stories."

"He's just a guy, trying to do the right thing," Sokka agreed. "Like the rest of us. And sometimes, even when we're trying, we really screw up." He raised his brows, in a look of mock surprise.

"Even you."

"Gee. Thanks," Katara said dryly.

"Yeah?" Sokka's grin had just a little hope in it.

"Yeah," Katara sighed. She felt the weight of the world lighten, just a little. "I kept trying to do everything just right, Sokka. I worked so hard on my bending, and Aang makes it look so easy, and then Master Pakku said I had to train him..."

"Master Piandao said, when you're in the middle of a fight, you don't have time for perfect," Sokka reminded her. "You do it as well as you can, and you try to stay alive. And you hope the people fighting with you have your back, because you're going to screw up somehow. Loose rocks on the field. Earthbenders out of nowhere. Fog rolls in, and nobody can see three inches in front of their face. Things happen." He shrugged. "You're not perfect. Aang's not. We'll deal." He took a deep breath. "Come on. We've got to talk to an earthbender about breaking into a prison in the middle of a caldera. A prison with chi-blockers."

Brr. "Are you sure we should?" Katara asked, heart hurting. "Zuko was going to be doing this with us. And whatever was out there..."

"We'll make it work." Sokka shrugged, and gave her a stubborn smile. "Even if everything else goes wrong... I'm pretty sure there won't be any water spirits to go after you in a volcano."

Chapter End Notes

I feel compelled to add an obligatory "don't try this at home". I've tried to do the research, but I am not a survival expert.

Of course, if you do end up in the middle of the ocean with a giant killer-whale-type-critter telepathically messing with your head and trying to eat you... I'd say, use whatever you think will work.

The discovery of tropical kelp forests is fairly recent; people thought they had to grow in cold water. Only a few years ago did someone theorize they could grow in deeper warm water, and start looking. And found them, off the Galapagos and other places. Search on ScienceDaily for kelp, you'll find it.

Chapter 79

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Byakko ships in the harbor. Two Water Tribe ships in the harbor.

If I go back to bed now, can I pretend this never happened?

Leaning on the windowsill of the Fire Nation-style small house, Zuko eyed the heavy steel storm shutters on either side of the window, and the Water Tribe camp on the beach hundreds of feet below. Oh yes. This is going to end so well.

Behind him he heard the door open, and a startled intake of breath. "You're up."

He knew that voice. He took a deep breath, glad there were only twinges of pain, and gripped the ledge harder. If he turned around... he wasn't sure what he'd do. "Lady Karasu. I am grateful for your hospitality." Don't look. "How tense is the situation with the Southern Water Tribe and their allies?"

Near-soundless steps, coming closer. "What makes you think it's tense?"

He gestured at the green gardens and trees around Karasu's village, all clinging to slopes over five hundred feet above the water, and at least a hundred feet above where the steep earth turned to a grassy, stony slope down to the beach. None of the Water Tribe tents were even fifty feet above high tide, and as for the earthbenders' sandstone shelters... well. "Because none of them are above the tsunami line."

"So they are." It was a wry, resigned chuckle. "We've tried to politely suggest they find someplace else to go. The Fire Lord may not be the most loved person in Byakko's domain, and we do have some leeway to trade with other lands. But the presence of so many... aggressive merchants... could be awkward to explain."

Awkward. Right. Avoiding a poisoned dagger in the back was awkward, too. "But you don't have the soldiers to drive them off without losses. So you can tell anyone who asks that you were waiting for the tsunami, if you had to." Zuko grimaced. "Though some of your sea-gatherers probably don't like that idea. At all."

"Like it? No. But family has to take care of family." Karasu sighed. "And Chief Hakoda's reaction to long-lost kin hasn't been all they hoped. Especially for my husband."

"Your husband?" He had to look. Had to.

She looks so much like Mom.

The same long, dark hair, caught back with carved shell combs. The same elegant, deliberate movements, of someone who'd trained in the blade as well as courtly grace. Her robes were far less costly, and edged with Byakko's dark blue mountain stripes, but outside of that...

His eyes were blurry. Zuko blinked furiously, determined not to break down.

"Amak's keeping the youngsters at bay," Karasu said ruefully. "Getting your brain back together after flowing lightning takes quiet. And the legends say anyone tormented by a sea serpent... being around a lot of people too soon can hurt them. I hope you feel up to visitors shortly, though. They all want to meet their famous cousin."

"Infamous," Zuko countered, voice rough. "If you think you've got trouble with Aang's invaders here, if word gets out that I'm here-"

Karasu raised one brow. Tilted her head, in an all too familiar stubborn gesture. "It's a sailor's duty to pick up those shipwrecked, is it not?"

Zuko swallowed, and bowed to her. "Was the kadzhait found? The sea serpent," he amended at her startled look. "We found some very old archives near Asagitatsu." He couldn't keep himself from growling. "Though I thought kadzhait liked cold water."

"I have no idea if kadzhait do," Karasu said thoughtfully. "The pods who come to our harbor like to be called rakko. They say they're several tribes, even though they call those with different coats cousins." She leaned back a little. "The spotted ones seem to be the most trustworthy. The deep-hunters - they're larger, with dark sable fur - act more friendly, but some of them have a nasty sense of humor."

"I noticed," Zuko said wryly.

"That wasn't a deep-hunter anymore." Karasu folded her hands. "That was a sea serpent, and all the rakko are grateful you ended it."

Zuko almost took a step back at that one. She didn't look like she was lying. "I thought Water hated anyone who hurt their family. Even if they'd rejected one of their own first."

"That's what they'd prefer to do, yes," his aunt nodded. "But as my husband says, the rakko are children of the sea. The ocean doesn't care if you still love even one who's gone mad. The water it bends will still kill you. So they are angry, and they are sad. But all the pods know what it had done already, and what it wanted to do." A wry smile tugged at her lips. "Even Chief Hakoda agreed it had to die, after what it did to two of his men."

Zuko winced. "Are they-?"

"Dead," Karasu answered. Her hands brushed each other, as if wiping away blood. "What it left of them... didn't live long. Fortunately." Her shoulders rose, and fell. "So you see the fangs of our dilemma. How could we have driven the Water Tribe from our shores, when the sea serpent might give them worse than death, bending their very minds to madness? It would be more merciful to slaughter them in the night, even within our very walls."

Brrr. "Killing guests..."

"Would be ill fortune for us all," Karasu nodded. "But let the sea serpent have them? We couldn't call ourselves human." She drew a deep breath. "We were hunting the sea serpent with the pods' help, hoping it wouldn't come to that. And then... we found you." Slim dark brows arched up; a silent question.

Zuko nodded once. "How much do you already know?"

Karasu gave him a narrow look. "You were unconscious."

What did that have to do with anything? Of all Shidan's daughters, Karasu took after him the most in touching hearts and minds-

But there's no way I should know that.

Grandson or not, Shidan kept his daughters' secrets close. Shidan hadn't told him...

He told Kuzon. A lifetime ago.

"You're a healer." Zuko shrugged, still stiff. Quelling a flutter of panic; Karasu only pried into unconscious minds to save lives, and she never went deeper than she had to. If she had any hint of Kuzon's memories in his own, he'd know it by now. "You already knew about the lightning. And the sea serpent. I figured the exposure was obvious."

"I was wondering what happened before you hit the water." Karasu's eyes were shadowed. "You seem to have hit it from a very great height."

"I did." Getting angry was pointless. They needed solutions, not things burning down. "Rumors of the Avatar's death are greatly exaggerated." He glanced out at the water, looking for furred bodies in the waves. "If you've had the chance to speak on friendly terms with Chief Hakoda, then you may have heard his daughter Katara is a waterbender. Who started out self-trained, and then took only combat training from Master Pakku, in the North. She doesn't know how to keep a buffer between herself and the water. At all." He looked at his aunt again. "The sea serpent got to her. She tried to kill me. And by the time I got her fire-circled so she was sane again... the Avatar blasted his way in to see me apparently trying to set his girlfriend on fire." He waved a hand, one flick of his wrist. "Whoosh."

He'd never seen Karasu's jaw drop like that before. "How has he survived this long... wait. His girlfriend?" The look she shot at Hakoda's ship should have set the sails on fire. "Why is her father not sharpening his sword? He's a hundred and twelve!"

Caught off guard, Zuko snickered.

Ow. Still sore.

Though sore beat cracked ribs any day of the week. "Hundred and twelve-year-old brat, you mean. Didn't the wanted posters get through the Fire Nation... no, I guess they couldn't have. Even Aang wouldn't have enough luck to dodge the Home Guard if they knew who they were looking for." Another snicker. "Hakoda should be sharpening his sword. So he can threaten his daughter with cradle-robbing." Self-conscious, Zuko shrugged. "Up until late last fall, Aang was locked in an iceberg. Some weird Avatar thing. He's been alive a hundred and twelve years. But he's only lived through twelve of them."

Twelve. And he still won't think. He wanted to crawl right back into bed. Hadn't the world done enough already?

"He's just a kid," Zuko said wearily. "A kid who thought he'd never have to grow up until he was maybe thirty. If Fire Lord Sozin hadn't started the war, Aang would have gotten one nasty surprise when he turned sixteen."

Silence fell between them. Zuko could hear the wind over the waves, the hustle and bustle as his aunt's neighbors smoked fish and dried seaweed for market, the rattling crunch of someone shoveling salt into sacks to ship later.

They're doing well here.

None of Kuzon's family had dared hope it would work, all those decades ago. Those waterbenders who'd survived Hama's breakout wished they hadn't. Even after agents of the White Lotus had arranged for their transport ship to be "lost at sea" where Byakko could intervene...

Oh, I really don't want to remember that.

That ostrich-mare's-nest of a mess had involved smugglers, pirates, and more than a few slit throats. Some of them innocent throats. It'd been enough to leave Kuzon with nightmares.

Yet after all that, Kuzon hadn't been sure they'd saved anyone. Yes, the Southern waterbenders were still breathing. But alive? They couldn't even work up enough fight in themselves to want revenge.

Let me take them where the sea rules, Karasu had asked. If they have any hope to survive, it will be there.

The sea ruled Lituya Bay. It was an excellent harbor; shallow at the mouth to give incoming ships pause, but otherwise deep and uncluttered. Freshwater ran down from the mountains, and edible seaweeds and shellfish were there for the taking. Any captain would treasure such a haven.

Until the mountains shook again.

Yet Karasu's gamble had worked. There was no ice here unless humans made it, true. But in a place where even the strongest of Fire had to plan for the will of Water... knowing the ocean held all their lives in its hands had given the survivors strength.

Some of them, Zuko thought sadly, remembering bodies washed up in sea wrack, or never found at all. Lituya Bay had gotten very, very good at tracing where currents might drag a body.

Stop thinking about it. Think about something else. Like Karasu. Who'd been silently, wistfully pining after one stubborn waterbender the last Kuzon had known, painfully aware it would never work.

Now she's married. With kids. Did not see that coming. I wonder what happened?

His aunt sighed. "Your mother wasn't there to tell you when you came of age. So I'll tell you, as I told Shila when she made her first lone hunt; as I'll tell Kasumi, Hayato, and Aumanil, when they master their blades, and their elements. Once you have the power to take a life, you are no longer a child."

Shila, Zuko repeated in his head, hoping to soon have faces to fit the names. Even if he couldn't stay, he wanted to know them. To see the hope Kuzon and Byakko had wrested from Sozin's despair. He needed hope. He was just... so tired. Sea serpents and Aang and the Face-Stealer, when could he just rest?

Shila, he told himself again, gripping onto the thought of a future with both hands. Kasumi. Hayato. Aumanil. Half those names would give the court nobles fits. Which was probably the point. Cousins. I miss having cousins. I wonder if I could bring the Wens here, someday.

"Now." Karasu folded her arms, determined as Ursa on the track of a missing lessons book. "Before Amak loses track of one of our youngsters - they're so good at sneaking, the rascals - would you like to tell me just how powerful Hakoda's daughter is? There was still ice in the water when we found you!"

"...Right." This is going to be awkward. "That... wasn't Katara..."

Water streamed from hand to webbed paw to hand, chasing fleeing sparks in a net that went through and over and under with dizzying speed. Up the stony beach, Hakoda kept his own hands busy mending a much more ordinary net, hoping it would keep his mind occupied enough not to say anything rash. Days on the same boats and then hours in the same subs with the swampbenders had been weird enough. He'd been watching Lituya Bay's children playing with the rakko for days now, and it still gave him chills. Fire and water weren't meant to mix with laughter. He'd seen what fire did, when water didn't fight back...

"If you want to shred something, there's always seaweed."

Hakoda glanced to his left, where a graying waterbender in Byakko's dark blue and red twisted water in and out of ropes of ice as he kept his own watchful eye on madcap young benders. "Katara was never like this."

"No?" Amak braided ice, adding decorative edges of frost-rime. "I suppose she wouldn't have been. Without someone to show her how to grasp the water the first time, she would have had to guess at all of it. Playing by herself would be hard." He looked down, voice quieter. "And playing alone is even harder."

"She wasn't alone," Hakoda said firmly. "Sokka never let that happen." He took a breath, anger stirring yet again. "But all these years we thought she was the last. You say no one keeps you here. Then why didn't any of you ever come back?"

Ice melted to water between pushing hands; then a mist of chill fog, sparkling in the sun. "Shame," Amak breathed. Sighed, and said it louder. "Shame, Chief Hakoda of the Southern Tribe. Though I have to admit, I wonder which Southern Tribe it was. Does anyone keep the old names now? Or is it just his village, and their village, and the one over there we don't like because everyone knows we're better than they are? The way we've always been, since our ancestors left the North. We didn't want to be ruled by the Northern Chief or the waterbenders; we didn't want to be ruled by anybody. And we weren't. Which worked just fine. Until it didn't. Until someone who actually wanted to do us harm came for us, and wouldn't stop coming."

"The Fire Nation never should have been allowed to get that far," Hakoda said darkly. "If the Avatar had faced the Fire Lord before he attacked the Air Temples-" He cut himself off, suddenly aghast.

Amak raised surprised brows, and nodded slowly. "You're a father too. Counted up the years, did you? The year Sozin's Comet came was twelve years after Roku's death. The Avatar would have been twelve."

The Avatar still is, Hakoda thought, suddenly ashamed himself. He'd been fighting the Fire Lord for years, hoping to give his children time to grow up. Every shore he'd visited, sooner or later you'd hear the same old refrain. If the Avatar hadn't abandoned us...

The Avatar was twelve. The same age Sokka had been, when Hakoda had left a brave young boy behind in his village, in the hopes that he'd be safe. "Damn."

"You're taking it a lot better than I did, the first time Karasu showed me their histories," Amak mused. "It took me weeks to let myself count the years and realize what had happened. Months more to calm down and work through how much Sozin must have gambled on that one day of power, and what he'd won from it. If any part of his plan had gone wrong - if anyone had been willing to face the firebenders before they attacked the Temples - the last hundred years of war wouldn't have happened. And the people I loved wouldn't be dead."

Hakoda knew that pain in Amak's voice. He'd heard it himself, after Kya had been murdered. And yet... "There had to be someone who-"

"Had to be?" Amak cast him a grim look. "Bending runs in families, Chief Hakoda. And you know we protect our own. There didn't have to be anyone from my village left alive. Not after they came and burned. Not after the rest of us spent years in the Fire Lord's tender care."

Hair prickled on the back of Hakoda's neck, hearing that old hate. He couldn't help but take a step back.

Amak glanced at him. Looked at where Hakoda's boots had been on the rocks, just moments before. And sighed. "There's your answer, Chief Hakoda. That is why I didn't come back."

"Anyone would be angry at what the Fire Nation did to us," Hakoda said bluntly. "You would have been welcome among the tribe-"

"I would have poisoned the tribe!" Amak's hands clenched, ice sheathing each finger like a massive claw. "I'd have twisted my hate into everyone near me. Including your daughter!"

Tide surged near them. Hakoda found himself gauging the distance to the foam, wondering how much warning he'd have.

Amak looked his way again, and shook his head. Straightened his shoulders, and looked out where one girl's sparks had just been doused by a fast stream of ice-water, leading to what looked like a general fray of water-splashing. "Even the most trained bender can slip, Chief Hakoda. And I wasn't even a warrior's age when they caught me. There's only so much pain a man can bear without lashing out at something. When Hama did, from within our prison walls... when she found a way out, a way that turned her into a monster..." He sighed, shoulders slumping. "Those of us who were still sane, wanted to die rather than become such a nightmare. Many of us did. We were shamed, Chief Hakoda. All of us. We were... tainted. When the ship we were put on was struck by lightning and foundered - some let the waves take them down." He laughed softly, eyes crinkling in faint humor. "I didn't. Too young to give up hope. Or just too stubborn, I guess. We were in the water, and we weren't dead yet. I... wanted to know what might happen next." A wry smile lit his face. "The next hand that reached for me, smelled like the storm. I took it." A deep breath. "Piece of advice, Chief Hakoda? Never, ever get my wife mad in a rainstorm. You wouldn't like what would happen next."

Which made no sense whatsoever. "Firebenders are weaker in the rain." Except for one. He still remembered Bato's face, and his words. The rain caught fire.

"Not Byakko firebenders." Amak sighed, watching spotted fur splash through waves. "Look at them. Young and trusting. Like your daughter would have been. Waterbenders are supposed to be blessed. But the rakko know some of their own can go insane." He shook his head. "Even then, that rogue still slaughtered pups. Like it slaughtered your men."

Hakoda flinched from that bloody memory. Manarak and Kaskae - what the sea serpent had left on shore had barely been recognizable as human. Death had been a mercy.

And after that, Hue had told them they were lucky.

Two dead, and he calls us lucky.

Unfortunately, Hakoda had to agree with the pantless swampbender. They had been lucky. The swampbenders had recognized stalking evil when they felt it tug their bending toward the ocean, and had stampeded for the oil lamps. They'd waved flames in circles around themselves and every man tugged toward the sea, smudging them with greasy smoke to break the monster's call.

Hakoda hadn't needed fire to keep him out of the waves. But he'd felt that lonely, angry call. If Katara ever felt that - his lonely, motherless daughter...

He didn't know what she might have done. He didn't know what he would have done.

I don't think I'm going anywhere without lamp oil again.

"Murderous as any twisted human," Amak mused. "I wonder if it was one of us, once."

Hakoda almost dropped the net. He couldn't have heard what he thought he'd just heard. "What?"

"The sea-born." Amak gave him a quizzical look. "You know the old story."

"Sea-born?" Hakoda said uneasily. The Avatar had been an old story, once. "I don't remember Kanna ever mentioning them. Whoever they are."

"Kanna. Your mother?" Amak's brows climbed. "That's right, Bato said she was from the North. Where they spend all their time with politics instead of winter lamps and stories, so they write everything down." He let out a slow, thoughtful breath. "The problem with that is, if no one reads it, people forget the story is there." He glanced at Hakoda, and waved at the ocean westward. "And if the only place you have the story is in a book, and someone takes the books away... much of the Fire Nation doesn't even know there was a time they didn't want to conquer the world." He *hmp*ed. "Well, that's not happening here. We've started proper story-tellings every winter, and every child born here is going to hear about the spirits. And what other lands and people are really like." He glanced into the distance, face drawn. "As long as we can. Our island's trade is valuable enough that people can ignore some oddness... but it only takes one to betray a whole world."

Hakoda put fragments of whispers together, and tried not to look at the waterbender too darkly. "Is that what they told you? That one of our tribe - one of our own people - betrayed you to the Fire Nation?"

"Your daughter was the first waterbender born in the South in over a decade," Amak said levelly. "How did they know to come looking?"

How indeed? part of Hakoda wondered. But that way lay madness. He had to trust his tribe. "You're right. You should be ashamed. That you could believe any of us would turn over a waterbender to Ozai's army-!"

"I told you we were tainted," Amak admitted, blue eyes dark and sad. "Though - perhaps broken is a better word. We were kept in heat and dry and metal, away from water for years-"

"I'm not a bender, I don't understand," Hakoda cut him off, impatient. "I've heard that before. I don't believe it. Hue's just as human as everyone else. Insane when it comes to seaweed, but human."

"We are human," Amak agreed. "But I doubt you do understand. Being held away from your own element, what you were born to bend... it ravages the spirit." He glanced at the Water Tribe chief. "It's as if someone shattered both your legs below the knees, and said, get up and walk."

"You're walking around just fine," Hakoda said dryly.

Amak drew in breath for angry words, judging by the red flush in his face... then sighed, letting his shoulders fall. "You don't understand." He looked away. "In a way, that's worse than the prison. Those of us who survived, knew you wouldn't understand. And... blood of our enemies or not, those who rescued us live with benders. They knew how badly we were wounded. They wanted to help."

"Help," Hakoda said, skeptical as if Amak were reading him fortunes in the clouds. "You married a firebender."

"That came later," Amak said quietly. "After her grandfather was murdered by Fire Lord Azulon."

Hakoda started. "He killed one of his own lords? Not the brightest move he could have made..." He trailed off, looking at the children playing on the shore. Glancing up the slope to where a bunch of swampbenders had gathered, kibitzing as Hue traded deep thoughts on sea-greens with some of the local seaweed-harvesters.

Hue said we'd be safe here, Fire Nation or not. Because Byakko has traded with the Great Swamp for over a hundred years... and they don't turn on people who trust them.

At least, not without warning them first...

"Byakko doesn't want to fight this war," Hakoda thought out loud. "Why?"

"Because it's wrong. Because they love to fight, but hate to kill. Because most of Byakko's people live on Mount Shirotona, which is a deathtrap waiting to go off if they lose too many firebenders. Take your pick." Amak scooped a thin thread of water out of thin air, braiding it between his fingers. "But most of all? Because Lord Kuzon was an airbender's friend. And that child, he couldn't save." He whistled softly. "You have no idea what a firebender will do to regain their honor."

"I might," Hakoda said dryly. "I've met Zuko." Which was another worry. "Why is he still alive?"

Amak snorted. "He's stubborn. And we got to him before the damn sea serpent's body drew in the scavengers. A little bruising on his lungs isn't going to kill that youngster."

"He's Azulon's grandson," Hakoda cut him off. "Doesn't your wife have a blood feud with him?"

Amak was looking at him as if Hakoda had suggested jumping head-first into a leopard-shark's jaws. "Vendetta is legal and specific, Chief Hakoda. You can't carry out a vendetta against the Fire Lord. There's no higher authority to appeal to. And if you did, you'd go for the murderer. Not his offspring. Besides which-

"He's an exile," Hakoda said shortly. "No one's going to care. Your wife may even think she's doing her domain a favor, if she's a bender who knows spirits. That boy attracts the worst luck I've ever seen. Drowned come calling, by Tui and La. If anyone else figures that out, they might think it was worth turning him in to the Fire Lord just to save your hides... What on earth is so funny?"

Amak was biting his lip, as if he were trying very hard not to laugh. "How many Kuzons of Byakko do you think there are, Chief Hakoda?"

"I have no idea," Hakoda said honestly. "What does your wife's grandfather have to do with what happens to an exile?"

"Kuzon of Byakko married Ran the Bright-Bladed," Amak said, in the familiar sing-song of a Water Tribe lineage. "Of Ran he had one daughter, Kotone, Lady of Byakko."

Hakoda choked. Kuzon. Kotone. He wasn't that familiar with Fire Nation names, but the odds of those two names showing up together, again, in the same domain...

"Kotone of Byakko married Shidan the swordsman, whose home none know," Amak went on with relish. "Of Kotone he had three daughters. The eldest Chihisen, who won her own blades in the Home Guard, married Tsubasa the Archer, and bore Haruko Byakko's heir-to-be, just this past spring. The youngest Karasu, who married Amak of the Southern Water Tribes, and bore Shila and Hayato of fire, and Kasumi and Aumanil of water-

Hakoda sucked in a breath, and possibly a bug. There was something caught in his throat, at any rate. Flame. She... they named their first daughter Flame? A Water Tribe name?

"Yet the name known to most of the blood of Fire is that of their middle daughter, Ursa," Amak went on.

Not a coincidence. Oh. Damn. "Zuko," Hakoda said numbly. "Son of Ursa... and Fire Lord Ozai."

"You really think my wife's going to turn on her own nephew?" Amak said wryly. "Or that anyone here would be stupid enough to risk her wrath by trying?" He laughed once, eyes dancing with sardonic amusement. "I don't think so."

Spots.

Zuko blinked. Scrubbed at his eyes, and blinked again. Still spots. Green and blue-dappling and pink, of all things. Bright spotted and speckle-dashed fur surfing through the waves in all the shades of live coral, and then some. "Ack."

Karasu chuckled. "They are a bit more colorful than the deep-hunters."

"No wonder everybody thought they were extinct," Zuko managed. "Who'd believe something like that was real?"

One dark brow arched. "You know that's what some nations say of dragons."

"Show me a dragon that ever looked that... that..." Zuko shook his head, trying to pick just the right word for the sort of otter-crocodile creatures bouncing in and out of the surf with his dripping wet cousins, chasing sparks with bent streams of water or turning other streams in the web to currents of ice or fog.

"Brilliant? Agile? Enthusiastic?" Amusement glinted in gold eyes.

"Silly," Zuko said firmly. He looked beyond the water-and-fire game, where Hakoda and the waterbender who was another uncle seemed to be discussing something. Probably him.

"Oof." Karasu clucked her tongue. "You are definitely Ursa's son. She was always so serious." His aunt paused. "That, or you were raised by raven-wolves."

Why do people always say that? "Worse," Zuko said wryly, watching the kids catch sight of him. This was going to be a disaster, he just knew it. "Uncle Iroh and a bunch of komodo-rhinos. And a few marines."

"I should have guessed." Karasu sighed. "Do you think it was all that time at sea that let the Moon snare you?"

"No, I blame that one on Uncle," Zuko said dryly. "He helped the Moon survive at the North Pole. She just returned the favor. Take out the Fire Lord's heir in the process - that was just a bonus." He growled.

"Did you want to follow your father that badly?" Karasu asked quietly.

"I didn't want Azula to follow him." Zuko shook his head, pained at the memory of flames, and his sister's vicious smile. "With Mom gone - there wasn't anyone looking out for us. We were just paid off tiles for whichever courtiers thought we might be useful." He lowered his voice, trying not to sound bitter. "Even Uncle. Even now. I have to do something about that, when I get back."

"Consider that carefully. General Iroh's a wily old foxdeer." Karasu beckoned to the youngsters, both two and four-legged. "And calm down. They are not going to eat you."

"No, their moms will just nibble on me a bit," Zuko muttered under his breath. "I'm not good with people, Aunt. Really, really not good. Worse than Grandfather not good."

She stared at him. Both brows climbed.

"Trust me. It is possible." All those young eyes, coming this way. Disaster. Absolutely. "I grew up with Azula trying to kill me. I'm... not good with kids. Or adults. Or anybody." He glanced at Hakoda's closed face, still out of earshot. "And he may not have figured out about the tsunami hazard, but he knows you're up to something."

"Oh? Why do you say that?"

"He's been fighting the Fire Nation for two years," Zuko shrugged. "We're always up to something."

He wasn't swarmed, at least. Most of the other village youngsters hung back, and his cousins kept a responsible distance from a relative not yet properly introduced. Though the younger rakko eeled in and out of the surf closer to him, snuffling with those odd nostrils near the tops of their heads.

"Shila, Kasumi, Yakone..." Karasu reeled off a tumble of names; Zuko winced, desperately trying to commit them all to memory. "Zuko, son of Ursa and Fire Lord Ozai, lord of Dragons' Wings, visiting us as kin."

He accepted their bows, and bowed back, consciously shaping the Flame with his hands. Watching, out of the corner of his eye, as Hakoda looked over them all and shook his head.

Yes. We don't like to squash up against each other like you do when relatives show up, Zuko groused silently. If you threw sparks when you got stressed, you'd want space too. "I am glad to see Lituya Bay prosper," he stated. "I will endeavor not to impose hazards on this domain that can be avoided."

The kids blinked at him. Looked at the lady of their island, and at Shila.

Good thing she likes braids, Zuko thought, banishing the whisper of unease behind a polite, neutral expression. The young lady's skin was a little darker than Azula's, her hair a lighter brown, and her gold eyes had a softer version of that slant he'd last seen in Katara's face. But there was no mistaking the family resemblance. "Mother," Shila said wryly, "is he serious?"

"He grew up in court," Karasu stated. "Nephew. You're among kin."

"And I thank you for that kindness, Aunt," Zuko said plainly, heart hurting. "But every minute an exile lingers in your domain, you're in more danger. I have to get moving." He glanced at Hakoda, and the Water Tribe ships. And wondered, just for a moment, what Karasu would have had planned for the earthbenders among the invasion survivors if the Water Tribe chief hadn't been able to keep them peaceful. Shake the earth enough - even a small tsunami was devastating.

Better if I never ask. "I have information that should make it in Chief Hakoda's best interest to withdraw from your isle and waters," Zuko said formally. "Lady Karasu. It might be better for Lituya Bay and Byakko if you don't have too many details."

Her gaze was shadowed. "I see."

"Thank you." He bowed again. "If you'll excuse me."

It hurt to walk away. Like fire. Like a stone knife to the gut.

Keep walking.

Hakoda was waiting up the slope with Amak, a look of stunned disbelief on his face. "You can't turn your back on your own family-"

"My family, who I never knew," Zuko said harshly. "I've never been here. I didn't have their names. I didn't even have a portrait. Do you want to know why? Because I am Ozai's son. And my mother knew I loved him. So she told me nothing about my family. What you don't know, you can't ever betray." He glanced between the two Water tribesmen, for one blinding moment hating them both. "They're my family, and they want to trust me. And I can't let them. I am an exile. The Fire Lord's forces might kill me when they catch me, or they might try to bring me back alive for a public execution. They will kill anyone who's harbored me." Anyone who cares about me. "They're children. Karasu's loyalty ought to shield them from any tie to me. But the Fire Lord might say that doesn't matter."

A fist of fire, coming down...

He shoved that memory back into the darkness. He'd had plenty of practice.

Hakoda winced.

Amak's breath whistled between his teeth. "You need more time healing. An attack like that creature's is meant to strike at the bonds of family. You should go back to bed-"

"There isn't time." His nails were biting into his palms. Zuko loosened his fingers before they drew blood. "I was the Avatar's guest. Under his roof, providing him aid at his own request, at risk to my own life. He knew that. But while I was helping him - while I was saving his waterbender's precious neck - he attacked me." Zuko bared his teeth. "I'd say with intent to kill, but I know Aang. He didn't think about killing me. He didn't think at all. He just blasted me over a cliff and let everything... fall."

"He just..." Hakoda was shaking his head slowly, as if he didn't believe his own ears. "He put you in the water, and that monster found you?"

"Found me?" Zuko smirked. "Oh, I wish. It didn't have to find me, Hakoda. Aang dropped me right on top of it."

"He-" Words seemed to fail the chief.

"Of course, he didn't know it was there," Zuko said caustically. "He would have, if he'd given me one minute to explain... but, you know Aang. Why ask questions when he knows who the good guys are?" He shrugged. "But for once - who knows how - I got lucky. Most of the rocks Aang blew down with me, missed me. One didn't miss the sea serpent. Must have stunned it, at least for a few minutes." He let a puff of steam escape, taking a bit of that acid fury with it. "And after that, was a very long night."

"You were..." Slowly, the chief shook his head. "My own men couldn't fight that thing."

"They didn't know what they were fighting," Zuko spread his hands, palm up and empty. "I did. I've fought water-spirits before. This wasn't a spirit, but - same principles. When it tried to grab waterbenders... I knew how to fight it." He shuddered, remembering that red haze in his brain as his body had clamored for air. "It was still close. Think I was safer in the water with it, than outside where Katara could... never mind."

Amak shot him a sharp look at that. Mouthed something, too soft for most to hear.

"Hama?" Zuko frowned. Trying not to let his sinking heart show in his face. Now there was a name he'd hoped he'd never have to hear again. She'd been nasty enough when Kuzon had visited the South Pole. After Azulon's prison had twisted her - the survivors had never, ever said what she did to escape, and Kuzon had known better than to ask. "Who's Hama?"

"Someone from my village. A long time ago." The chief tensed, glancing out at the waves. "What happened to Katara?"

Damn. "It's over now," Zuko tried to wave it off. "I think she knows better than to do that again. But she really needs to talk to some healing benders. Someone who knows what water can do when it's not being friendly-"

Hakoda took a deliberate step forward. "What happened?"

You do not threaten me. Not here. Not ever. Zuko raised his brow, and jerked his head toward the bay. "What do you think happened? She's angry, and she hates me, and the moon was up. It got right in and..." Stop. Yes, she nearly smothered you. But this is not helping. "I'm... sorry. She should be all right. She managed to figure out something was twisting her bending. She was fighting it. She tried." Breathe. Breathing was good. "I circled her with fire to break her chi's link to the ocean. She was getting her head back together. But that's when Aang came in, and-" He sighed. "If you saw a waterbender in a fire-circle, what would you think?"

"I know what I would have thought a week ago," Hakoda admitted. "And I would have been wrong."

Huh?

"Hue says there are spirits in the swamps that can't handle getting cold," the chief went on. "One called a foxfire can make people lose their minds and wander into deep water." He grimaced. "And then it eats them."

"Hinotama," Zuko nodded. "They show up in some Fire Nation swamps. If they could stand hot spices we'd be in real trouble." He snickered. "One good shake of festival fire-flakes, and they flit right back to the bogs."

Hakoda looked at him askance. "You were adrift in the ocean with a monster, and that's what you call trouble?"

"After the Siege of the North, Uncle and I were drifting for three weeks," Zuko said, matter-of-fact.

"This time I didn't even have to chase off the sea vultures." He waved it off. "Your son and daughter were okay the last time I saw them. But if they go where I think they will, that won't last. They need help. They need your help." He nodded toward the ships. "And you need them. You can't get out of the Fire Nation with just a pair of ships. Not without risking all of your allies winding up as ash-smears on the blockade. With the Avatar... it's still a risk. But your odds get a lot better."

"Honorable opponents," the chief murmured. "You have something I want; where my children are, and where they're going. And we have something you want: ourselves, out of here, so your family's out of danger." He nodded. "I take it this is where you propose a truce."

"No." Zuko swallowed, suddenly lightheaded. "A truce implies that when it's over, we're on different sides."

Hakoda's eyes narrowed, thoughtful.

Amak crossed his arms, scowling. "Young man, you know that Byakko can't-"

"Byakko can't," Zuko cut him off. "I'm not Byakko. I'm Dragons' Wings, and I can." His voice dropped. "I'm the only one who can."

Steeling himself, he matched Hakoda gaze for gaze. "The Fire Lord has to be stopped. I can't face him; he'd challenge me, and I'd lose. He's a master firebender, one of the most powerful benders ever. And I'm... not." Facts. He had to stick to facts, and ignore that memory of agony.

It wasn't easy. In a way, the Agni Kai had hurt worse than dying. Death ended.

"I can't face him," Zuko repeated. "But sooner or later, he'll try to destroy my people. I need your help, Chief Hakoda. Just as much as you need mine."

Hakoda weighed his offer, and sighed. "Aang almost killed you."

"He did," Zuko said flatly. "I won't forget that. But if the Fire Lord isn't stopped, he'll carry out the Face-Stealer's plan. And then all the careless Avatars in the world won't matter."

"Except carelessness always does," Amak said gravely. "Carelessness in breaking a spirit-sworn word, most of all. The Avatar is a powerful spirit, but he's not immune to the spirit world's laws. If you were here under his protection, and he broke that word... he's at great risk."

Zuko shot his unexpected uncle a wry look. "They're going to Boiling Rock. I don't think they'll hit a sea serpent there."

"Boiling Rock?" Amak frowned.

"Island inside a caldera lake," Zuko filled in. "A kadhait wouldn't last two minutes before it was boiled alive."

The waterbender grimaced. "That's what I thought it was." He cleared his throat. "No. They definitely won't encounter the rakko there."

Zuko gave him a narrow look. "So what are you worried about?"

"...Something worse."

Chapter End Notes

There are a few dozen species of dolphin. Some with surprisingly limited distributions. So whether or not the species of arctic-loving kadzhait Avatar Kesuk was familiar with survives in the present of Embers, there are other walking whales. And yes, spotted - and even pink - dolphins exist. Really.

Lituya Bay is a real place on the coast of Alaska, with an interesting geological history. (See Wikipedia.) I've actually toned it down a bit for Embers.

Chapter 80

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"I can't believe it." Keeping her voice low, Katara sorted through another book of neatly inked entries. "They keep records of the names of criminals? Where anybody can see them?"

"Anybody has to have a key," Sokka said under his breath, checking for locked drawers in the warden's desk by lantern-light. Going over the plan in his head again, one more time. Take Appa to Boiling Rock under the cover of night, check. Have him hide near the shore away from the small port, check. Sneak over the caldera wall in a shroud of wind and mist, freeze a path across the otherwise boiling lake, ignore all the eerie, almost alive whistlings and wailings of boiling water under ice, and get through supposedly impenetrable steel walls, check. Now if they could just scoop up Shiyu and get out before dawn... "Or a Toph. How many holes did she have to punch in walls for us to get in here?" Aha.

"There are a lot of people here," Aang said quietly, going through his own stack. "No one knows everyone. They have to write it down."

"There are too many people here," Katara said firmly. "Anywhere you get so many people together you don't know everyone... well, just look at Ba Sing Se."

"And anywhere everybody knows everybody means you never get a chance to start over." Aang flipped through pages, frowning at notes in High Court script. "You never get a chance to move beyond your mistakes."

And there was Serious Aang again, Sokka thought. And hid a wince. On the one hand, this would be a really bad place to be playing catch with a butterfly. On the other - he hated seeing Aang like this.

Though he hated seeing Toph like this more; leaning casually against her hole in the wall, but radiating enough prickly to make a boarqupine look friendly. She hadn't punched anyone for days. Instead she spent her time with Boots - when the spooked hide-behinder got up enough nerve to make a sound - and answered questions when people asked them. Outside of that... she'd made it wincingly clear she was only sticking around until they were out of the Fire Nation and Ozai was done for.

The deal was, I help you beat the Fire Lord, Toph had said just this morning. When he's done, I'm done.

Scary. Toph was their rock. Pun definitely intended. But even rock could crack.

"But if they have to keep track of... people you don't name... it's on paper." Katara frowned. "Any firebender could... well, fwoosh."

"And that's how they disappear people, sometimes," Sokka agreed, struggling with the lock before throwing up his hands and snapping the drawer open. They were stealing a Fire Sage; he kind of doubted the warden would miss that. "Still, Temul says that most of the time, you don't go around forgetting where you've got a firebender stashed. Can be hazardous to your health-"

"Temul says?" Aang frowned at him.

Heep. "Um, long story..."

"I found Suki!" Katara waved a sheaf of papers. "She's here!"

It was like Boomerang sailing out of the sun. "Suki's here?" Sokka blurted out. "But- why- how?"

"The Kyoshi Warriors in Ba Sing Se." Aang was pale. "Azula must have..."

"Duh." Toph bent and unbent a piece of iron wall between her fingers. "Snoozles. Breathe. She got here alive, right?"

Sokka gasped for air he hadn't realized he was missing. "But this is crazy blue fire, if she got Suki-"

"She's alive," Katara said firmly. "I've got her cell number right here. We'll just break her out, too." She turned pages, lips pressing into a frustrated line. "But I can't find Shiyu anywhere."

Sokka blew out a breath, and flipped through the ledger from the warden's desk. No... no... aha. "He's not listed with the regular prisoners. He's in... looks like they call them the Icicles. Little solitary cells, away from the sun, but up away from the lava." Sokka blinked, remembering what he'd seen an angry Avatar do with lava. Yikes.

...And what did it say about him, that he's rather think about Roku and lava than his kind-of-sort-of-not-exactly-girlfriend? He'd seen what Azula was willing to do to her own brother. And that was somebody she maybe cared about, between times trying to kill him. What she might have done to Suki, someone she didn't even know...

"She finds what you love, and she takes it away."

Sokka tried not to shudder. The look on Zuko's face when he'd said that... maybe Azula not knowing Suki was a good thing. "Okay. Where do we need to go to get Suki, and is there anyone else we should break out while we're here?"

"Why not break everybody out?" Aang gave him a serious look. "Nobody should have to stay in a place like this."

Urk. That was such a bad idea, he didn't know where to start. "Aang, a lot of these people are criminals-"

"Exactly." Aang looked even more serious. "We need to beat the Fire Lord. We can't do that if he hides behind his army the way he did at the eclipse. So we have to keep his army busy." He waved a hand toward the corridor and cells outside. "This is a lot of keeping them busy right here."

"Use your enemy's strength against them." Katara brightened. "Like waterbending. It could work."

"Except these guys are on an island in the middle of a boiling lake," Sokka pointed out. "The only mess they're going to make in the Fire Nation is right here."

"So I earthbend them a way out." Gray eyes were determined. "If we want people to keep fighting, we have to prove we're not beaten. We have to do something."

Yeah, but do we have to do this? Sokka glanced at Toph. Who was still leaning in the hole, face blank and bored.

Her toes were twitching, though. Which hinted she didn't like this, either.

But she's not going to say anything. Not unless one of us asks her, flat out

Blank, mute, and stubborn about it. Like a miniature mountain, complete with stormy rumbles around the top of it. Which was really, really annoying. Just when Aang was starting to get his head together and act like a young warrior instead of a kid, Toph was pouting like a bratty five-year-old. It was driving him up the wall.

Sure, she'd probably lost Zuko. The jerk hadn't shown up dripping and mad the next morning; given Prince Ponytail's past record of dragging himself out of rubble just to snarl at them, that meant he probably was dead. But everybody fighting had lost somebody. She needed to get her head straight and work with them.

Right now, though, he'd just act like he hadn't seen the toes. She wanted something, she could start talking. "We'll think about it after we get out," Sokka said firmly.

"After?" Aang rocked back on his heels.

"A lot of these guys are Fire Nation criminals," Sokka pointed out. "Criminals, Aang-"

Somebody pounded on the door.

Aang's eyes went wide. Katara put a finger to her lips. Toph huddled in her hole, utterly silent.

Sokka blinked. And tried to figure out why someone knocking made his heart want to hammer its way right out of his chest. The warden's office had been left locked; nobody else should be in here, and if it was the warden out there they should be listening to a key scrape the lock, right?

Wait a minute. You wouldn't knock unless you thought someone was in here... and the warden wouldn't knock at all, so - who's out there?

An oddly familiar scent tickled his nose. Just a trace, he couldn't place it-

Blasting jelly?

The door exploded.

When she got out of here, Suki thought, putting a pinch-happy guard down hard, she didn't know if she was going to kiss Sokka senseless, or kick his butt. Though right now "kick" had a distinct edge. A riot? What was he thinking?

"An efficient use of momentum, young Warrior." The raggedy gray-haired elder Toph had broken out of a cold cell slid inside a chi-blocker's range, and delivered two swift kicks that made even Suki wince.

Curled around his agony, that one barely noticed her iron-bar love tap to put him out.

Meanwhile her might-be boyfriend and his bunch of benders were making a hole in the growing riot. Literally. Toph stomped open a tunnel that unleashed a rush of steamy air, making even the shielded night-lanterns flicker, and jumped in without even a mad cackle.

Who rained on her parade... ooo.

Someday later, she'd tell Sokka how amazingly cool he looked chopping through spears and poking even lightning-fast chi-blockers into being somewhere else. Someday. Not yet. Wouldn't want him to get a swelled head when they still weren't out of-

The edge of Toph's tunnel was slick as glass.

If I get out of this alive, Suki thought, heart in her throat as she whipped down into darkness, we're going to talk about stairs- yipe!

She sailed out into dark, steam-hot air, expecting the next moment to be a boiling, lethal splash-

Sand. Hot sand. Kind of gritty and sharp-edged, no matter how much moonlight softened the look of it. But way, way better to fall into than the steaming lake a few feet away.

Toph yanked her into a stumble sideways. "Gangway, more coming through!"

Thump, and a gray old firebender blinked through even grayer sand. "Almost like riding a lava tube..."

Thump, splash.

Suki helped Katara scramble clear, raising a brow as the waterbender scooped her water back out of the sand with barely a wiggle of her fingers. "Nice."

"Nice?" Katara gave her a quick smile, then yelled up the tube. "Sokka, Aang, if you're not right down here, I'm letting Toph cook dinner!"

"Hey!" Toph's hands made sandy fists. "I don't cook!"

"Exactly!" Katara listened, and grinned. "Here they-"

Whoosh.

Katara's smile twisted into a horrified grimace, as she shot out her arms, drew back and swirled her hands-

Steaming water crackled into ice, reaching up to catch their last pair of troublemakers in a frozen embrace even as water boiling up from the lake shattered it from the base upward.

Katara's pushing fingers caught them in a swirl of water, hovering above the roasting steam. She yanked it back to the shore, dropping the pair on gray sand. "What happened?"

"There were - um - a lot of them." Aang sat up and dusted himself off with a flutter of wind. "So I blasted them back a little. But..."

A leather-wrapped hand waved from the sand. "Every action has an equal and opposite reaction." Sokka pried himself off the beach. "That's why balloons are so tricky to fight from. Everything you push, pushes you back - and could somebody close up the hole before anyone else follows us?"

Toph stomped her foot, and twisted it. The stone tube grated shut like nails on the world's biggest writing slate.

Nerves jangling, Suki really hoped she didn't hear screaming.

Though right now, it was a little hard to hear anything, with the burble and bloop of boiling water way too close. Just breathing took concentration. Suki had thought it was hot enough inside the prison. Down here by the water she was beginning to feel like chicken-pig soup - with her as the chicken-pig. "Hey." She breathed shallowly; even her throat didn't want to be here. "It's great to see you. It's really great to be out of that cell. But how do we get out of here, and why are we bringing a firebender with us? No offense, at least some of you guys are okay, but..."

Aang swallowed, and stood to bow to the old guy. "Fire Sage Shiyu. We need your help." He looked down. "I need a firebending teacher."

"Do you?" Gray hair long and scraggly, if still tied back with simple dignity, Shiyu looked him over curiously. "As avidly as the young prince was pursuing you, I had expected General Iroh to be your firebending master by now."

Suki'd heard of people turning pale before, but this took the apple-cake. Aang blanched, color fleeing his face like it had a torch-bearing mob after it.

Scary thing was, Katara and Sokka were almost as gray. "Oh," Sokka croaked. "Iroh."

Toph snickered; harsh and somehow, half a breath from tears. "Yeah. Uncle Iroh. Dragon of the West Iroh. Sozin's grandson Iroh. Fire Lord Ozai's big brother Iroh." Her laugh would have done a sea vulture proud. "Good luck, Twinkletoes. After this war's over? You're gonna need it."

Suki's eyebrows shot up. Granted, she hadn't know Toph that long, but the girl seemed nice, under all the Earth Rumble bluster. What in the world could have happened to make her want Aang to hurt?

Shiyu glanced at the Water Tribe pair, taking in how Sokka faced him, while Katara shifted on her feet. Turned his gaze back to Aang, worry creasing his face. "Avatar Aang. What happened?"

Aang gulped. "It was- I didn't mean to, but-"

Katara grabbed for him. "Get down!"

The world went slow as Suki flipped backward away from a shooting spear of something lava-red. With teeth. From the corner of her eye she saw Sokka start to drag Shiyu back; Katara still tackling Aang to the ground as more steam-hot flesh sailed over them. Toph vanished behind triangle-plates of sandstone, backing away from the menace she couldn't see.

Upside-down in midair, Suki looked into four eyes the size of flaming boulders.

What the hell is that?

It's strong.

Katara stood in the quick spiral Toph had yanked up in the sand, slashing discs of ice at endless flailing limbs. Her ice melted almost as soon as it touched the dark rainbow-of-reds carapace, water flowing back to the quick grab of her hands. Whatever it was, was hot. So hot, Shiyu was doing an odd form of waving hands; she'd almost snapped at him to stop dancing and throw fireballs, until she'd realized the air was cooler around them.

Not cold. She wasn't sure she'd ever be cold again. But furnace air swirled, and turned just cool enough to keep breathing. And to keep from melting her discs as soon as they left her hands.

Ice hit it. I've hurt it.

She knew she had. It'd stopped trying to grab Suki and shot those monster jaws after her.

"It's a spirit!" Aang was on his toes, caught between dashing to her side and staying with Shiyu. Who was praying to Agni as he moved. Very loudly.

"More Avatar stuff?" Sokka slashed at one swath of swimming-centipede-limbs, ducking under a jaw-shooting counter-slash.

"I guess? That water's boiling, it can't be a living centipede... archer-jaw... whatever it is!"

"You guess?" Sokka yelped.

"Hey, give him a break." Suki whipped her iron bar off the ground with her toes, caught it in time to smash at shooting jaws coming for Sokka. "He's right, isn't he?"

"Divine messenger," Shiyu was intoning, "child of the breath and the ten fingers..."

"From the way he's going, I'm guessing yes." Sokka moved with Aang, slashing at razor-edged muscle as the airbender yanked up his own stone shields to block the endless swarm of limbs.

"Hey! Less praying, more fighting!"

Of course we have to pray, Katara thought desperately. We're fighting a spirit!

But how could they appease a spirit that wouldn't talk to them? The Painted Lady had at least told strangers what she wanted, and while maybe Hei Bai had been one big roaring creature of scary, the villagers should have known what had happened to his shrine. It was their own fault for not paying attention. This spirit had to know they didn't belong here, but wasn't asking for anything.

And those are really. Big. Teeth.

Katara dodged back from the flutter of centipede-legs, slashing out at what should be vulnerable glowing blue joints-

The fleecy back rippled, like air above roasting rocks. Shiyu's cool breeze faltered.

For a moment, she almost felt like she was flying on a rope with Jet again. The same sense of lightness, the lurch in her stomach that might have been as much excitement as fear-

Sand slapped closed around her like a gritty pillow.

Oh. That hurt.

But she was breathing as the sand rushed away, not splattered against the prison foundation like a smashed egg. "Thanks, Toph," Katara coughed, as more sand slipped away to form another wall in front of them.

"So what is it, besides ugly?" Toph twisted her head from side to side, trying to catch every echo. "It feels like a really, really big millipede... Don't spirits go after benders first? Why'd it try to get Suki?"

"I don't- down!" Katara sheathed ice over stone and them, trying to cover Toph with her own body as those horrid jaws shot out like lightning.

Ice shattered. But the stone behind it held, just barely.

Long, fanged jaws snapped back into the snail-fleshy mouth. The dark back rippled again-

"Hey, thousand-toes!"

Aang's airball over him, Sokka slashed into a hard hide of red-black rainbow. There was a whistling shriek.

"Sokka hurt it," Katara realized, stealing quick glances to where she'd slashed the carapace with ice. "It heals from bending, and it likes fire, but Sokka's sword hurt it!" Though not much. It was so big.

Toph grinned at her. "And Suki's got an iron bar."

"The prison's all steel and rock!" Katara thumped a fist into her hand. "It probably couldn't get in there if it wanted to! But we didn't hurt it, why is it-"

It likes heat. It lives in boiling water. That shriek - we heard it before. I thought it was just water melting my ice-

To get into the prison... I froze part of the lake.

"...This is my fault."

"What?" Toph gripped her dress before she could get up. "No way! You're not going out there. Aang's the spirit-talk guy. You let him talk to it!"

Another airball zoomed overhead as Sokka dove in to cut at endless waves of feet. Suki hung back by Shiyu, ready to smack at shooting jaws. "He's not talking!" Katara insisted.

"Then maybe that's the right thing to do!" Toph scowled, planting her hands on the beach and shoving, breath hissing between her teeth. "Hot hot hot rock, darn it..."

A ridge of the lake-floor humped up, yanking the worm-centipede-thing up in the middle and sending clawed feet skidding awry. Aang gave a ringing shout, airstaff sweeping a gust of wind to blast the spirit up and back into boiling water.

Steam closed in, drifting up from settling waves.

"Um." Sokka cleared his throat; sword still raised, sweat rolling down his face. "Aang. Didn't that thing come out of the water in the first place?"

"Oh dear," Shiyu breathed.

Toph frowned. Tilted her head back, as if to look at the gondola car Katara heard overhead, probably being cranked across so the prison warden could chase after them. "Anybody else hear sizzling?"

Water rippled like molten glass.

"Look, will you just wait?" Aang called out to the waters. "We didn't mean to upset you. We can straighten this out. Just let me listen to you."

Glassy water stirred, steam spiraling above it.

"Avatar Aang!" Shiyu was studying the water with alarm. "Kanaloa are creatures of flame and the deep sea. Wildness incarnate. They aren't known for listening to anyone."

"Well, it's listening now, right?" Aang lowered his staff, sitting down. "Just tell me what's wrong, and we'll fix this..."

That's not just heat. Katara rolled away from Toph, suddenly desperate to put distance between herself and a potential innocent target. It's angry-!

It was like trying to stand in hurricane winds. Rage and hate and will not be tamed, will not be caged, will kill, kill, feed!

Katara breathed in steaming air, and deliberately let herself feel the heat of it. The volcano's heat. Outside. Not hers. You can't have me!

Because if it only wanted her, maybe it had a right. But her friends, her brother - they hadn't hurt it. They hadn't caged it. They hadn't frozen it.

I won't let you use me to hurt them!

Boiling water mounded up like foam, like lava. The bubble burst as the kanaloa lunged for her, hot tendrils of water striking out below the jaws, fast as an octopus-

Katara slapped her hands together in a parting arrow, water-tendrils shattering off that point of will into drifting snow.

I can do this. I can fight it! If I just remember I'm me-

Red-hot agony sluiced down her back, and she screamed.

"Aang?" Toph's jaw dropped, even as her heart leapt at that horrible scream. Why would Aang-?

No time for answers. She scooped a shield of sand over Katara, crunching a fist closed to seal stone against more boiling water. Yanked the waterbender, stone and all, into a grating skid behind her. Retreated all the way to the prison foundations, and set her stance like a mini-mountain. Because for once she wasn't sure sealed stone would hold; there was something in the water, something she must have been fighting every time she touched rock that wasn't dirt-cool, and if all it needed was heat to fight bending- "Sokka! Suki! What's going on?" Because she felt their frightened shivers through the sand, the two of them grouping up with Shiyu - who was also shaking - as Aang's footsteps on the beach turned deliberate as a stalking tide.

Sokka gulped. "...You don't want to know."

That was going to earn him a face full of dirt later, Sokka just knew it. But Toph was already taking care of the important stuff - keeping Katara away from the kanaloa - and he didn't want its attention on her any more than it already was. And he definitely didn't want Aang's attention on her.

If that was still Aang in there. At all.

Never thought I'd miss Avatar glowy-eyed scariness.

Aang's eyes were glowing now, all right. Glowing a blue as hot as Azula's fire, and twice as scary. "You dare try to tame my home. Oathbreaker! Liar!"

"Ash and frost," Shiyu whispered, almost gray. "What did Avatar Aang do to offend Fire?"

"Um." Sokka's sword seemed to weigh down his arms like lead. This was worse than facing Hama. This time, if his blade swung at Aang, it'd be his brain behind it.

But he didn't dare back down. If this kanaloa was a fire spirit, not just a water-thing, then he and Suki were probably the only thing between Shiyu and the same kind of take-over-your-brain heartscrewiness that had made Katara attack Zuko.

But we weren't between the screwiness and Aang. Damn it.

"What could he have done?" Shiyu persisted. "All the Fire Nation is at war with the Avatar. What oath could he have broken to those who seek his death?" The sage shuddered, not taking his eyes from Aang's hands, curling like the kanaloa's claws curled through water. "The Great Spirits shield the Avatar from the most malevolent spirits of their element. Agni does not rule the deeps, but the kanaloa is born of fire as much as it is of water. What could Aang have done, to forfeit that protection?"

Sokka winced. "Would it help if I said he's sorry?"

Shiyu gave him a look of utter disbelief.

"...Right. Spirits don't believe in sorry." Sokka grimaced. "I don't do spirits! Meat, sarcasm, swords - what more can the world ask of a guy? What do we do?"

Suki knew swords; she knew not to get too close, so he had room to swing. But from the look in her eyes, she really, really wanted to be shoulder to shoulder with him. "He's the Avatar, right? He talks to the spirits. Maybe he's talking to this one."

"Yeah," Sokka said under his breath. "Let me tell you the kind of luck Aang's had talking to spirits. Asagitatsu came that close to charbroiling him, and Zuko was there to talk her down that time..."

Shiyu choked. "You found the Blue Dragon? How- no one in a thousand years-"

Aang raised a hand, and boiling water rose up with it. And up, and up... and finally Sokka stopped looking up, because his knees were knocking together bad enough already and there was nothing a sword could do to stop this.

Suki traded a glance with him, and took a deep breath. "Aang! Listen to us! We're your friends. What can we do to help?"

Aang's laugh echoed in time to the pulse of jagged jaws. "Die..."

"Everybody get down!" Toph yelled.

Something large and massive and metal dropped out of the sky.

Gondola, Sokka realized, mouth hanging open as the wave fell apart into harmless ripples, steam gushing up from frosted steel on top of a very squashed kanaloa.

"Yes!" He almost sagged in relief. "Toph, you rock!" Sokka waved his off hand at the twitching monster, hearing a few stray non-monstery groans. Apparently there'd been somebody in the metal when it came down. Ow. "Or in this case, gondola..."

"Wasn't me, Sokka!" Toph's voice sounded about as panicked as he'd ever heard her, as she grabbed up sand and dove under the rock shielding Katara. "Kind of busy!"

The kanaloa whistled like a steam kettle, flailing under the weight of steel. Aang's head jerked sideways with a snarl, blue-glowing eyes narrowed as he began to raise the airstaff. "You dare-"

With a banshee howl, fire and wind and one small body slammed against foundation stone.

"Aang!"

The air fluttered with fire.

Leaves. Sokka blinked at them, stunned, gaze catching bits of brown and gold and scarlet as they billowed and swirled in flames. Leaves on fire, where the heck did they come from?

Splorch. Squelch. Splish...

Dripping from his black hair all the way to his pointy-toed boots, crazy bits of ice dropping off folds of soaked fabric, Zuko squished his way out of steaming water up onto the shore. Stomped past the still-twitching kanaloa, and glared at one unconscious airbender. "You have no idea how long I've been waiting to do that."

One possessed Avatar down, Zuko thought, brushing more water off of himself; nose wrinkling at the taste of sulfur he hadn't quite been able to escape. Bleah.

Given that he'd just had to shatter frozen steel cables and dive off a falling gondola into a boiling lake because of said possessed Avatar's blinding idiocy, nasty water in his mouth was getting off easy.

Subtle. We planned to be subtle, Sokka. Sneak into Boiling Rock, find your guy, sneak out. I thought you could do subtle.

Zuko had tried for subtle, using the gondola roof for his surreptitious ride over. Every firebender was at a low ebb just before dawn, so that was exactly when the Warden liked to get new supplies in. Regular. Like clockwork. Really exhausting, annoying clockwork. But useful, if you could fight the pre-dawn snooze and ghost up onto a roof like a shadow. Which he had. And settled himself in to wait, meditating as the gondola rocked into motion and started pulling across-

And then the alarms had gone off, and a monster had shrieked, and he knew exactly where Aang had to be. Damn it.

He eyed the monster, and considered what Amak had been able to tell him about that power of fire and water. One spirit... pinned, but not down yet. Okay. That first-

"Um." Picking his jaw up, Sokka lowered his sword, still dazed. "Aren't you... dead?"

The strange girl in prisoners' dull red gave Sokka a weird look. Fire Sage Shiyu winced.

Zuko gave the Water Tribe warrior a smirk, and knew it was all teeth. "Not yet."

"Sparky!" Rock poured away from Toph like a mini-dust storm. "I need help! Katara's really hurt!"

"Do what you can," Zuko said grimly. She's okay. Thank Agni. "We've got to put the kanaloa down before Aang wakes up again. I'm not going to get another free shot."

"A kanaloa is the spirit of the wild heat of the ocean-fires," the Fire Sage warned, glancing toward Aang. "I tried to tell the young Avatar, it cannot be tamed-"

Zuko folded his hands in the Flame as he faced the kanaloa, and took a slow, deliberate breath. "I didn't say anything about taming it."

Water and Fire. If Amak's right, this thing's as strong as the islands themselves.

As strong as the Fire Nation, and just as fragile. He knew how to kill it.

We are Fire. We are the blood of dragons. The only thing that can destroy us... is each other.

Fire and water. He'd done this before, in a garden in Ba Sing Se...

His right hand drew off rippling heat with one smooth pull, as his left pushed water down.

In the midst of volcano heat, frost bloomed, crackling across a carapace dry as dead leaves. The pinned monster writhed, squealing.

"I'm not here to negotiate," Zuko said grimly. "I'm not here to understand you. I am here to take these people out of here alive. The Avatar included." Another slow pull, frost spreading in white waves. "Let us pass. Or die."

Shiyu sucked in a breath, shocked; arms rising in the first move of a block. "Young prince, this is a spirit! You cannot-"

Zuko suppressed a snarl, and flicked a glance at the sage that would have had even Captain Jee thinking twice. "I have it on very good authority I can." He let his good eye narrow. "And if you don't like it, take it up with the Moon. And tell my uncle to stop asking spirits for favors."

"You... what...?" Shiyu took a step back, dawning dread on his face.

"I get really tired of explaining," Zuko growled, focusing back on the kanaloa. "You. You're old. Probably as old as this lake. Maybe older than this island. You know what I am. Don't you."

Thrashing limbs hesitated. Slowed.

"I thought so." Zuko smirked. "I know what you are. I know whose kin you are. And I won't let you in." The Face-Stealer was old, so very old; but he could taste the same malice around this creature. "Ask your elder what I've done to the drowned. Ask the ocean where the sea serpent's bones lie. Ask who woke Asagitatsu! Do you think you can face me?"

Serrated jaws snapped. And dissolved into steaming water.

Zuko took a shaky breath, as the kanaloa melted into rivulets of dark water, and slipped away into boiling depths. "I guess that's a no."

"...You just bluffed a spirit-monster." Sokka's sword sank, as he blinked. "You're scary, you know that?"

"It wasn't a bluff." Zuko shook himself, and headed for Toph's little bowl on the beach. "Toph, hang on, I'm... damn."

Toph's breath almost hiccupped, as she tried to run sandy hands near but not on blistered skin. "It's bad, isn't it?"

"I've seen worse." In a mirror. "Keep her hair out of it, okay? That'll help." Zuko pulled water out of the sand with sweeping gesture; no way was he using the lake with a cranky kanaloa still out there. Besides, while not much survived in hot springs, the things that did survive tended to munch humans in a very bad way.

The strange girl yelped. "He just-!"

"I know. We found some crazy stuff while you were gone." Sokka went to one knee as Zuko bent water over his sister's seared flesh. "You can do this, right? Amaya... you were really learning from her..."

"Babies, stoves, pots of boiling water," Zuko said grimly. "At least if your sister comes to, she's not going to scream without a good reason." Careful... have to be fast, before things get too set, but careful...

Katara moaned, coughing pink-stained water. "Aang... he's not..."

"Someone should check he's still breathing," Zuko said dryly. "I don't think I hit the wall with him that hard. But I could be wrong."

"Z-Zuko?"

"Good to see you're alive." Zuko tried to make his voice a little gentler. "I saw you trying to fight the kadzhait. I was hoping you'd made it."

"You could have told us you made it!" Still holding Katara's hair up, Toph made a fist at him. "I thought you were gone! I th-thought you were..."

"For a while there, I thought I was too. Ever try to fight a fifty-foot waterbender with teeth, while you're in the water? Very. Not. Fun." Zuko breathed in steam, and tried to reach for that sense of water-seared lungs. "Okay. Some of this I can fix now. Some of this we'd better let Amak handle, he's got a lot more experience healing lung-scalds-"

"Amak?"

Two pairs of blue eyes on him. Katara swallowed, deliberately not pulling away from his hands. "That's a-"

"Water Tribe name," Sokka finished, straightening. "What the - how did-?"

"Guys!" The girl waved her free hand at them, iron bar lifted. "Water Tribe reunions later! We've got problems!"

Aang coughed, and gulped back the urge to throw up as the world spun around him. Everything hurt.

"Don't move." Shiyu's voice. Felt like probably Shiyu's arms, carrying him over rough ground. "You hit the wall very hard, young Avatar. And I doubt the kanaloa was gentler before that."

"Ugh." Aang blinked at blurs of blue and green and... red? Right, Suki-

Wait. That hair was way too dark to be Suki's.

But the world jerked again - Toph's earthbending? - and he had to concentrate on keeping last night's dinner down. "What did... the kanaloa want?"

Old arms trembled. "Nothing we dared to give it-"

"Explain later!"

Wait. Wait, Aang knew that snarl, from the dark hair running in front of them. But it was impossible...

"The kanaloa backed down. That doesn't mean it gave up," Zuko growled. "It's fire and water, it owns this lake, and in case none of you noticed, Toph can't bend this path back down into the water without getting her feet charbroiled, that's a prison full of angry firebenders back there, and whatever you did cut them loose, damn it, Sokka-!"

"Hey, I had to improvise, okay?" Sokka shot back. "The map didn't say angry snake-bug here!"

"Because I didn't know! Thank you so very much, Fire Sage Shiyu!" Angry gold glanced back at them. "You're supposed to keep maps of the Fire Nation. Maps with where angry spirits are on them. And you knew it was here. You knew! Why was that not on the map?"

"Ah. The maps... your uncle borrowed... three years ago." For the first time, Shiyu sounded less than certain. "Well, when he said they were for your education... and... you had been exiled. And we knew the terms, if you'd remained much longer in Fire Nation waters, well..."

"You would have let me get dumped here when I didn't know about the kanaloa?" A definite snarl. "You would have fed me to that thing - do you have any idea what it could have done with me? To everyone here? To anyone in range before someone got lucky enough to kill me?"

"We... didn't think it would do anything with you, Prince Zuko," Shiyu admitted, voice strained. "After all, it wasn't as if you were..." His voice died.

"Azula?" Zuko growled.

Aang winced. He wasn't even Fire Nation, and he knew Zuko was touchy about that. How had Shiyu missed it?

Zuko's alive. Wow. I need to tell him I'm sorry, so much...

How is he alive?

"Oh man, they're coming faster," Sokka panted, on one side of Katara; Suki was on the other, helping her stumble along. "Toph! Can you-"

"You want to juggle hot rocks with your feet, you try it!" Toph's voice was sharp with pain. "Zuko-"

"I'm trying, but it's a whole volcano," the firebender got out, one hand pulling on air like taffy; the heat-waves streamed away like silvery ribbons in the dark before dawn. "It's like trying to tone down Asagitatsus all by myself. Just skimming the heat off the top hurts."

He's... using Sozin's bending, Aang thought fuzzily. Like when the Fire Lord was fighting with Roku, before...

Oh, that was a horrible thing to remember. But this wasn't a volcano after them. Was it?

Aching all over - it felt like his bruises had bruises - Aang craned his head to look over Shiyu's shoulder.

...Uh-oh.

Red uniforms. And red... not-uniforms. A lot of them. Appearing out of the steam and night like glowing embers, borne on a flood of lava.

Maybe I shouldn't have opened those cells...

A wall of blue fire blazed, racing between them and the charging horde.

Heart in his throat, Aang craned his head toward the shore.

Blue light turning dark hair black, Azula smiled. "Hello, brother."

Chapter End Notes

Okay, I feel I have to put this in... just as I came up with "mockingjay" without having ever read (or watched) the Hunger Games, I named Yakone without ever having seen Legend of Korra. (And I still haven't seen it.) Yakone as a character in this story had been named for over two years before LoK showed up. As in, before we had names of any of the characters in Korra, including Korra herself. Yakone is an Inuit or Ahtna Athabaskan name that supposedly means red aurora; I figured it'd be an excellent fit for someone with fire and water parents. The fact that someone named Yakone is an enemy waterbender in LoK is pure coincidence.

As for the monster... look up Polychaete, and especially the Pompeii worm. Heee.

Chapter 81

If Agent Bolin had loaded her down with any more protective charms, Azula thought, she would have jangled when she walked.

At the moment, she wouldn't have cared if she had. Holding a wall of fire against determined, angry firebenders wasn't as easy as it looked...

And something was pushing at her.

Something's down there, Bolin had told her. In the water. I can feel it in my scars.

Watching steam roil from the waters, Azula believed him.

Hate them, something hissed at her, burn them, destroy them-!

Oh, please. As if she didn't have to deal with that impulse every day. The vast majority of people were annoying, insignificant worms not worth your time to burn them to cinders. You'd wind up doing nothing else. And that, as Mai so eloquently put it, would be boring.

"And I hate being bored." Azula smirked as her brother and his ragged associates ran past her, sneering at whatever was trying to lure her into such an obvious trap. "Could you be any more childish? Hate, burn, destroy; you don't even know how to take a subtle revenge."

The fire-pulse of hate... hesitated.

Azula chuckled, as the little earthbender hung back long enough to scoop up the last bit of rock bridge and curl it into a shielding wall, allowing boiling water to make a moat between them and their pursuers. "Just watch."

After all, she had time to spare. Her loyal agents and onmitsu had already extracted all the truly valuable hostages from the riot. She couldn't hear them loading the airship from here, but - ah, yes. There were Mai and Ty Lee at the crest of the crater, the airbender waving a pink silk scarf in mission accomplished.

Azula stretched her legs in an easy jog to catch up with the others. Time for a little fun. "You look rather ragged around the edges, brother." She had to kill someone for that. No one got to torture her brother but her.

Zuko shot her a sideways glance. "I've had better days."

"Aww." Azula tched. "Did the nasty spirits bite you?"

"Brotherly-sisterly trying to kill each other later!" Sword drawn, Sokka put himself between her and the path to the beach. He waved the others on, with an extra wave for the Kyoshi Warrior when the brunette looked stubborn. "What are you doing here? How did you even find us?"

Reluctantly, the others starting heading down-slope to the beach, where surviving Water Tribe ships and one flagless ship that was probably Byakko's were pulling up anchors. While one very large, very furry six-legged beast lowed, eyeing her from under a shaggy fringe of hair.

Azula glanced at the bison. Then at Sokka, one brow arched. "Do you really have to ask?"

"...We get out of this, we'll paint him blue, I swear..."

"Try black," Zuko advised, stepping subtly between her and the aggravated Water Tribesman. "Harder to see in a bright sky - wait. Wait." He gave Sokka a sober look, then turned his attention back to her. "Azula. Why are you here?"

"I'm hurt," Azula pouted, one hand almost over her heart. "I can't worry about my big brother?" She smirked. There wasn't much time for this... but there should be just enough. "How was your birthday present? Flammable, I hope?"

"With the proper application of a few unusual materials, yes." Zuko took a steady breath; not so deep as to warn of breathing fire. "Why are you here?"

Interesting. This wasn't the hotheaded brother who'd tried to fight her under the cherry blossoms, before Uncle had tossed her off the ship so they could escape. It wasn't even the desperate refugee who'd faced her lightning in Ba Sing Se. It was like the voice of his letter; one domain heir to another of a different domain, trying to arrange delicate matters to their mutual benefit.

And she'd read the reports on General Fong. Aim him at a Fire Nation settlement, and the man wasn't likely to stop himself short of total annihilation. Which implied he had been stopped.

As did Sokka's sudden gulp, and pallor. Hmm. Perhaps the Avatar's bunch of young idiots would finally take her family seriously?

I wouldn't count on it. "Oh, it was convenient," Azula shrugged. "So many interesting prisoners, so many hostages, that Fire Lord Ozai wasn't making full use of. Why not? After all, the Avatar's little band makes such a useful distraction." She shot a sly glance at the airbender leaning on a ragged Fire Sage, and lifted her voice to carry over the mutter of waves. "Though I have to say, I never expected him to set loose an entire prison of maniacs and murderers. How viciously practical." She shook her head, almost in pity. "Or it would be, if the Warden didn't already have plans for mass escapes. Did Zuko tell you he's Mai's uncle? He's very prepared. The day this prison stops sending its usual coded messages is the day the Home Guard assumes the worst, and takes... appropriate measures. I wonder how many will survive?"

The airbender flinched. Good. Escaping from prison was a legitimate reason for someone to be killed on sight. Hadn't he thought of that when he made his plans?

Probably not. So, how to twist the knife deeper...

"Still, practical is good. Wouldn't you say so, brother?" She dusted her hands off. "Maybe one day he'll even appreciate your handling Fong for him. That man wouldn't have let peace exist while he lived. If you hadn't killed him... the Avatar would have had to. And my, wouldn't that have been such a splendid way to start peace in the world? Killing one of the Earth Kingdom's most decorated generals." She snapped her fingers, as if it had just occurred to her. "But now everything's fine. Avatar Aang and his allies can blame it all on you, the evil Fire Nation prince. How convenient."

The airbender was starting to look positively green. How amusing.

I wonder if I can actually get him to pass out?

"You're sick!"

Ah, the waterbender. Looking very much the worse for wear; Azula could read the stiff movements of someone trying not to aggravate a serious back injury.

"Twisted, crazy," Katara ranted on, "you sent an army after your own brother-!"

"And he won." Azula raised an eyebrow, unimpressed. "You should show a little patience. After all," she turned back to Zuko, "I'm here to do you a favor."

"In exchange for what?" Her brother was holding his ground. Steady as if a fleet full of angry Water Tribesmen and earthbenders didn't exist.

"Nothing. I... owe you one." Painful to admit, but true. "The Fire Nation is better served if Avatar Aang remains alive. A pity Father can't see that." She drew a fine scroll from her sleeve, and tossed it.

Zuko caught it, eyes never leaving her face.

"Since he hasn't been able to kill the Avatar yet, he's taking the next logical step," Azula said briskly. "If a Water Tribe Avatar would destroy the Fire Nation... then he'll use Sozin's Comet to make sure that never happens."

"No way. He couldn't do that without killing all the-" The little earthbender went pale.

"The Northern Water Tribe," Katara breathed. "Oh, no."

"They're coming." Hearing the faint sounds of a furnace in the air, Azula took a step back. "I doubt even you can stop this invasion, Avatar Aang. But it should be interesting to see you try."

"Azula!"

She narrowed her eyes at her brother.

"You'll always be my sister." Pale gold was steady. Almost smiling. "And you know where to find me."

...Damn volcanic mists. The sulfur made her eyes sting.

Blinking, Azula caught the ladder that fell out of the sky, and let it carry her away.

"Augh. Toph. Air."

Arms wrapped around one living, breathing firebender, Toph buried her tears in warm silk. "Don't you ever ever ever do that again!"

"I'll try." Zuko held onto her a moment longer, then carefully untangled himself, guiding her hand to the ship's rail before he let go. "I'm glad you're okay. But there are things I have to do now."

"Yeah." Toph slapped a hand against blind wood. "Like punch one idiot right in the nose!"

"...He doesn't get off that easy."

Uh-oh. That was Zuko cold, angry all wrapped up in thinking until he got almost as scary as Azula. "Sparky? Kind of don't like fighting when I can't see people throwing things."

"Like I said." Zuko's voice was still cold, with that little edge that reminded her that yeah, he was the crazy Fire Princess' older brother. "He doesn't get off that easy." He raised his voice a little, to carry across Hakoda's ship to where Amak was moving more water over Katara's still-ouchy back, and the rest of her friends were talking to Appa as he swam along with them. "Fire Sage Shiyu. If you intend to teach Avatar Aang, you should be aware that should he ever act again as he did at the Western Air Temple, he will be the focus of personal vendetta from my sister. And possibly General Iroh. I suspect Lady Kotone would restrain Byakko from replying as my grandfather Shidan would wish, but I wouldn't count on it. As for the people of Dragons' Wings - they're not all Fire Nation. Visiting there could get very messy."

Toph could almost hear the snap of teeth biting out the words. Ooo boy.

"Look," Sokka started, "I know you've had a bad few days. But we've kind of got something more important to worry about-"

"We have nothing more important to worry about."

Toph felt the heat, as Zuko's sleeve snapped through air in one noble flick of dismissal.

"There is no we here, Sokka of the Southern Water Tribe. Your ally's actions have insured that. Once I copy my sister's message and Amak pronounces your sister sufficiently healed, we no longer exist. You can go wherever you want. As long as it is somewhere away from Byakko."

There was a quiet thumping, as if someone was tapping a Water Tribe boot against the deck. "You said you would oppose Fire Lord Ozai," Hakoda said levelly.

"Read a map, Chief Hakoda," Zuko said dryly. "If the Fire Lord's heading for the Northern Water Tribe, he'll need to resupply with food and water somewhere before he crosses the arctic sea. Do you want to bet he'll skip getting some target practice in, too?" His voice went flat. "There's something much more dangerous than Fire Lord Ozai trying to get loosed on this world. And I intend to end that. Now."

"What I did was wrong." Aang's voice was low, as if he'd chewed over the words again and again, trying to get them just right. "I'm sorry-"

"Fire Sage Shiyu." Zuko's words marched on, as if Aang hadn't spoken. "If you take him as a student, you should be aware that Avatar Aang does not feel himself bound by other nations' laws and customs. Not the Water Tribes. Not the Earth Kingdom. Certainly not the Fire Nation. Very well, then. If he demands to be treated as an Air Monk, then I will treat him as they would for his crime." His breath was almost a snarl, as his weight shifted toward Aang's voice. "You are shunned."

Hakoda rocked back on his heels, feeling tension thicken the air. Zuko didn't say he was going to do this-

Which, damn it, should have been a warning sign. Sokka had told him, they had to pay attention to what the Fire Nation didn't say. Zuko had promised an alliance against Ozai, and that he'd lead Hakoda's people to where Hakoda's children were most likely to have gone. And yet, despite the injuries Amak said Zuko had survived, the exiled prince hadn't said he meant to take revenge for Aang's thoughtless act. He hadn't said anything about Aang. At all.

The airbender hadn't been this pale on the Day of Black Sun.

"I do not hear you. I do not see you," Zuko went on, every word like a tolling bell. "Your words are the stifling breeze. Your presence is empty air. I turn my face away."

Aang went dead white.

"But," Katara started to protest. Caught Hakoda's look, and winced.

Zuko took a slow breath, shoulders falling. "Kuzon wanted him found. He's found. The world needs him to have a firebending teacher. He's got the best one I can think of. But he will. Not. Listen." He shook his head. "I can't do this anymore."

Silent, he walked away.

Aang's knees gave out.

"Aang!" Sokka caught the airstaff before it could clatter to the deck.

"What the heck did he just do?" Suki narrowed her eyes at the retreating firebender. "He tried to burn down Kyoshi Village, and you're letting him say things like that? What's wrong with-"

"Suki, just stop," Sokka said urgently, catching the airbender's arm. "Aang. He doesn't have the right to do that. I know what you did, but he's not a Temple Elder, he can't-"

"No." Aang swallowed hard, and cleared his throat, not even trying to stand. "He's right. He has every right to do... what he just did."

Shiyu sighed, folding his arms as if he were wearing heavy red robes, and not a prisoner's tunic. "And why do you believe Prince Zuko has the right to speak so, Avatar Aang?"

"Because..." Aang shivered, just a little. "I violated the right of hospitality."

"The... whosawhat now?" Sokka gave him a look askance.

As well he might. Hakoda had been listening those times when Aang spoke of his people. He didn't remember hearing about this.

"Ah." Shiyu nodded. "I have read some of Avatar Roku's writings of his time among the Air Nomads. But it is not the same as the understanding of one who is from among them." He drew a careful breath. "Perhaps you could tell us of it?"

"If you welcome someone to your camp, they're under your protection," Aang said quietly. "If they... do something you don't like... you're supposed to tell them to get out of camp before you do anything else. And - I didn't. I saw him, and the fire around Katara, and I... blew him away from her."

"Off of a cliff," Hakoda stated, trying to keep his voice neutral. It wasn't easy. "On top of a sea-going monster. The same monster he was trying to protect my daughter from."

Still circling water across Katara's shoulders, Amak was deliberately silent.

He promised he wouldn't get involved unless it came to violence, Hakoda recalled. Zuko is family, but Aang is the Avatar. Benders can't cross the will of the spirits lightly...

Which is why Zuko asked you to teach Aang about consequences. Damn.

Easy enough to say he'd been across the world when things had gone wrong. He'd had time to speak with the boy before the invasion. But defeating Ozai had always seemed to be more important.

And it is important. The Fire Lord wants to destroy us all. But we can fight that. How can we fight the spirit of the world?

"But I didn't know there was a monster-!" Aang cut himself off. "I didn't know. I should have asked. Master Gyatso would have asked. But I was scared and there was fire around Katara like the last time she got burned, and I didn't mean to kill him! I just... pushed him away. Except - I didn't look where I pushed him." He took a shaky breath. "And that was wrong. I - was wrong." His voice wobbled. "He's got every right to shun me. And I don't know how to fix this."

I've been asking that myself. "You can't," Hakoda said plainly.

Sokka's gaze jerked toward him. "Dad-!"

"You can only do what you are doing," the Southern chieftain went on. "Take your punishment like a man, and learn from it."

"But that doesn't make sense!" Katara's glance his way was full of frustration, and more than a little guilt. "Why is he punishing Aang? The water-spirit got in through my hate. I'm the one who started this, Zuko knows how much I hate him-

Shiyu coughed, one hand politely covering it. "Young lady, that would be the point. Prince Zuko does, indeed, know that you hate him. If you attack him, it may be regretful, but it is not a betrayal. Whereas you, young Avatar..." Dark gold eyes sought gray. "You claim to hate no one. You believe you mean no harm to anyone. And then..." He cleared his throat, and eyed Amak. "How badly was he hurt?"

Blue eyes went dark. "He's a healer," the older waterbender said plainly, gathering up water from Katara's back; molding it into spiky ice the way another man might unsnarl fishing line when he fretted. "And he's Shidan's grandson. Which means he's tougher than any human has a right to be. Even so... he almost drowned. He almost had every rib shattered. He spent all night at sea, with no shelter, fighting a rogue rakko out of his head. You can ask Katara what that takes. Better yet, ask the Swampbenders. They knew enough to grab for the lamp oil the first time it started whispering to them." His gaze flicked to Aang, just for a moment. "For someone who claims not to wish him harm, you came closer to killing him than anyone else has managed. And anyone includes the pirates who blew up the Wani, Admiral Zhao, Fire Princess Azula, and numerous unpleasant spirits, the last one being an angry kanaloa."

Aang winced.

That was cruel, Hakoda thought, eyes narrowed at the older man. Aang knew he'd committed a crime. The airbender was punishing himself for it already. And yet-

If it'd been Katara who went over that cliff... I'd be angry, too.

And the waterbender had already admitted what anger lurked in his nightmares. Anger deep and terrible as the sea itself; so terrible, Amak had shut away all thought of going home, for fear of bringing that poison into the tribe.

Hakoda had his doubts that it could truly be that bad. Family was family. Even if Amak had no close kin left, he should have come home. But that Amak was angry - yes. Of that he had no doubt at all. And Hakoda knew from hard experience that robbed of its target, anger was a boomerang that bounced off a lot of skulls on its way back. Witness what had happened to their truce on the beach.

And that's why he took his water away from Katara, Hakoda realized. He didn't want to risk catching her in the backlash. Amak knows his anger's looking for a target, he doesn't want it to be her-

Which was exactly what Aang hadn't managed. Huh.

"And that is the problem, Avatar Aang," Shiyu said plainly. "As we say in the islands... your actions shout so loud, I can't hear what you say." He spread empty hands. "Prince Zuko cannot believe you. And so no, he will not listen to you. Not until your actions - your actions, young airbender, not your words - prove that your hand and tongue do not make liars of each other." The Fire Sage took a long, considering breath. "In a way, I must say I am grateful. With you as a declared foe of the young lord, the rest of his domain will simply treat you as an enemy."

"And that's supposed to be good news?" Sokka almost yelped.

"An enemy, rather than a betrayer and a liar?" Shiyu said dryly. "Yes. That is very good news." He swept his gaze over Sokka's friends. "If I understand what's been said, the Avatar has claimed to be the young prince's friend-"

"He burned down part of my village," Suki said sourly. "He chased you across the world, his sister captured my Warriors-"

"A lot of stuff's happened since then," Sokka shrugged. "He's the one who told us where to find Shiyu. And if we hadn't found him, we wouldn't have found you. Not to mention, big scary water-fire monster?"

"Okay, maybe he's not all bad," Suki allowed. Tilted her head at Aang, blue eyes wide in disbelief. "But you want to be his friend?"

"He's not what you think," Aang said quietly. "I guess... he's not what I thought, either."

"Nor are you what he thought. And that is the problem," Shiyu said gravely. "You claimed to be a friend. And there is no creature so treacherous, so deadly to a domain of Fire, as one who claimed to be an ally."

Aang flinched.

"Wait, wait - treacherous?" Suki's fist rested on her hip in disbelief. "Aang? He's-" She flung up her hands. "I don't know what the exact opposite of Princess Crazy is, but he's it! And Zuko acts like she's still his family, and wants to get the Avatar angry at him instead? That's crazy!"

"Not if you ask a Fire guy," Sokka sighed. "Zuko knows Azula might put a knife in his back next time. He kept her out of range. Where he could see it coming."

"So they're both crazy," Katara said firmly. "Sorry, Toph."

"Nope, I'm good." The earthbender was inching her way down the rail, dark metal reaching out from one hand like black fingers to feel polished wood. "Sparky is crazy. He knows that. He's just not crazy like his sister."

"Anyway," Katara said awkwardly. "What do you mean, deadly to a domain? Aang hit Zuko."

"But an attack against the lord of a domain is never an attack against only one soul," Shiyu said gravely. "Avatar... Aang. Have you studied a spider-fly's web?"

"Monk Gyatso said it was a lesson in compassion," Aang nodded. "That we should care for every life, even one that small."

"It is more than that," Shiyu stated. "It is the fragility of life, and how it turns on things unforeseen."

Burn one strand, and the entire web goes up in flames. I do not know how much you know of firebenders, and loyalty... but for those who blood is Fire, there is always a gap in our defenses. A vulnerability in our hearts, that evil souls may prey on." Shiyu glanced across the deck, where Zuko was watching the waves. "For those who follow him, the young prince is their fortress against Fire Lord Ozai's will."

Aang blinked at him. Closed his eyes, and finally nodded. "We're all connected."

So the village elders might say, Hakoda knew. But you didn't send elders to fight a war-

"But a fortress won't help them," Aang went on, gray eyes far too old. "Just like the polar night won't help the Northern Water Tribe. Not if Ozai attacks with the Comet behind him." He took a deep breath. "If what I need to fix this is actions - let's start there."

"Okay." Suki sat cross-legged on the deck as Sokka and his dad spread out maps of the northern seas and the rest of her friends gathered around. "This may be kind of obvious, but why are we trusting Azula?" She shot Katara a look, as the younger girl ran more healing water over her own back. "She sent an Earth Army after Zuko? Seriously? General Fong's... dead?"

"Very, very dead." Sokka looked almost green. "That was one of the worst nights of my life. Of all our lives. Ever. And the worst thing is? I can't even get mad at the guy for doing it. He was up against an army, and there were kids behind him, and a whole volcano ready to go..." He shuddered. "Can we not talk about that?"

Suki frowned, and reached out to pat him on the shoulder. "And you trust his sister?"

"We don't trust Azula." Aang looked at the map, shoulders slumped in a way that was a little sad, and more than a little scared. "But I trust Zuko."

"The guy who's been chasing you across the whole Earth Kingdom," Suki pointed out. "The Fire Lord's son."

"Fire Lord Ozai's exiled son," Shiyu said mildly.

"Who was chasing the Avatar so he wouldn't be exiled anymore," Suki argued.

"Yeah, well, he quit," Sokka shrugged. "Guess we know why now. Yue's got a really weird sense of humor."

"The Moon is a changeable spirit," the Fire Sage agreed. A little white around the eyes as he said it. "It's always been said the prince has no luck. I'd never believed that to be true, but... Agni. What a terrible burden."

"I..." For once, Katara looked like she was uncertain what she wanted to say. "Waterbending should be a gift."

"Not to a child of Fire." Shiyu folded his arms in a way the Kyoshi Island elders used to mean, this discussion is over.

Not that Suki intended to argue with him. There really had been ice dripping off the prince? Wasn't that - well, impossible? "Okay," she rubbed the hairs standing up on the back of her neck, "that's a really strange reason to trust someone."

"Take it from me. After a few rounds with the Dai Li? Fire Nation guys start to look way too honest." Sokka tapped some of the most southernmost islands on the map, squinting at how far they were from the North Pole, and how near to Fire Nation waters. "Thing is, it's not, do we trust Azula. The real question is, what happens if we don't, and she's right?"

Suki really didn't want to think about that. Because that would mean the Fire Lord's daughter wanted to help the Avatar. And the Fire Nation never did anything that kept them from coming out on top. "It's the North Pole. Ice, snow, and a lot more ice. There's nothing up there to burn."

"But it's summer," Katara reminded her. "The sun won't go down for weeks."

...Which made Suki's head just hurt. The sun wasn't supposed to do that!

"And with Sozin's Comet lighting the sky, even the weakest firebender will not need fuel to burn," Shiyu said grimly. "Let us hope Prince Zuko reaches Asagitatsus swiftly. If the Fourth Death has finally been relocated, and no dragons have been tending it... the Comet might well be the last prod that brings the spirit to full rage."

Aang shuddered. "Maybe we should-"

"Big blue spirit-dragon that doesn't like you, remember? And eats Avatars?" Sokka shook his head. "Either Zuko keeps a lid on the blast, or he doesn't. The Northern Water Tribe builds everything out of ice. All Ozai has to do is start melting stuff, and they're gone."

Katara shuddered, back sparking with pain as still-tender skin objected. She could see it all too easily. The sculpted temple collapsing into a formless pool. Chief Arnook's meeting hall just slush seeping back toward the sea. Years, sometimes decades of crafting, gone in an instant. Everything the tribe owned would be lost to rising waters; tools, yak fodder, everything. Even if the Fire Lord didn't kill anyone, the next winter would.

"But they're waterbenders," Suki protested. "Why would anybody build out of ice?"

"Why do firebenders build places out of bamboo?" Sokka shrugged. "It's there. And if the bad guys come calling, it gives you more to throw at them. Zhao found that out the hard way. But he just had ships and regular firebenders. If Ozai's going to have the kind of firepower that took out the Air Temples, and he uses it all on the Northern Water Tribe..." He grimaced.

"It'll be bad," Aang said quietly.

"Worse than you think." Katara looked past the map, seeing that city of white and blue in memory. "Master Pakku trained us with ice. Water, too, but there was always ice around. If the Fire Nation melts the city around them - I only know how to pull water out of air because of... what Hama showed me. Does anyone at the North Pole know what to do when their ice melts?"

"If we believe Azula." Suki gave her a look askance. "Why would she tell us anything that's going to hurt the Fire Lord?"

"Possibly, because even one thought a dark dragon may be driven too far." Shiyu rubbed one ear, as if it burned. "Byakko watches over its own, even those of the Fire Lord's family. Prince Zuko told me his sister fled the Caldera in the wake of the invasion."

Katara waited, but that was apparently where the Fire Sage had decided to stop. Which made her want to strangle him. "So? What does that mean?"

Shiyu gave her a quizzical look. "Young lady?"

"And you guys call Sparky crazy." Toph crossed her arms on her lap, almost smirking. "At least he knows he's got problems talking to people."

"I think what they mean is, so Azula left the capital." Aang gave Shiyu a serious look. "Why does that make a difference in whether or not we believe her?"

Shiyu frowned at him. "You opened Avatar Roku's memories at the Winter Solstice. Surely, you recall what he knew of Fire Lord Sozin's court-"

"I didn't open his memories, I met Avatar Roku," Aang said impatiently. "I know he was Fire Lord Sozin's friend when they were kids, and he probably knew all kinds of stuff about the Caldera. But I don't. I'm not Roku!"

For a revered Fire Sage, Katara thought, Shiyu looked like he'd eaten a bug. And not one of the almost tasty Swampbender fried kind. "You don't know anything about Fire Lord Ozai's court," Shiyu managed. "Oh, Agni."

"Beat yourself up over it later." Toph wrinkled her nose at him. "Tell us why it makes a difference why we believe Azula now."

"Because... oh dear. Politics and history can be the study of a lifetime. I thought Avatar Aang would only need gentle hints of who might be trustworthy in the Fire Nation now..." Shiyu bent his head over his hands, thinking. "I hardly know where to begin. There are so many competing factions, so many divergent interests-"

"And you were in the faction that hoped Zuko just might get lucky." One hand holding down the map, Sokka gave him a narrow-eyed look. "You know, that would have worked out a lot better if you'd talked to the guy who was actually looking for Aang."

"Young man, I've had many conversations with General Iroh since he returned from Ba Sing Se six years ago-"

"It wasn't Iroh's life on the line!" Her brother's jaw worked, as if he wanted to be angry and sick at the same time. "Gah. I feel so stupid. No wonder Zuko wanted off this ship. It wasn't just Aang he was worried about, was it?"

"Sokka?" Hakoda asked, beating Katara to it.

"Zuko probably saw it the minute he knew you didn't tell him about the kanaloa," Sokka said grimly. "Took me until now to catch on. If that thing's like other evil spirits, it would have eaten an untrained firebender. You wouldn't dare let the Fire Lord's heir come near it, no matter how strong you thought he was. Unless you didn't want him to live to be the heir in the first place!"

What? Katara thought, chilled. Toph squeezed up against her, hand finding her arm and latching on.

"You didn't talk to Zuko because you didn't want Zuko to find Aang," Sokka barreled on. "You wanted Iroh!"

"Young man, I..." Shiyu took a deep breath, and sighed. "I would never have wished the young prince ill. I knew General Iroh would be clever enough to keep his nephew from Boiling Rock. Or I thought I did," he admitted, "until the prince appeared on the solstice. But what I wished for him does not matter. General Iroh is the true first-born heir of Azulon, no matter how Ozai might have forged the will. Lady Ursa... there is no proof of what she did. But it is known. And the child of a regicide cannot inherit. There is no greater proof of a dark dragon than to slay your own kin."

"That... that... You're a Fire Sage! Assassinating a domain lord is a legal way to stop a war, and you know it!" Sokka shot back.

Katara stared at her brother. Shared a stunned glance with Suki, and shrugged helplessly at her father when he looked taken aback. Explaining about Temul wasn't something she wanted to get into right now. Or maybe ever.

Sokka wasn't even looking. "And Fire Lord or no Fire Lord, killing a dark dragon is the duty of the clan, flat out! Ozai wouldn't do it, Iroh wouldn't do it - did you ever think maybe Ursa didn't have a choice?"

"Fire Lord Azulon was the true-born and only heir of Fire Lord Sozin," Shiyu stated, spine stiff. "There was no reason for his kin to raise a hand against him."

"Except Ozai's nuts," Toph shrugged. "And if he's nuts, what was Azulon?"

"As bad or worse. Just ask Byakko," Sokka said dryly. "Shidan's got all kinds of reasons Azulon needed to die. Starting with Lady Ran, Lord Kuzon, and a whole bunch of onmitsu assassins."

"Tribal elder arguments," Hakoda said, as if to himself. "That's always messy." He gave Katara a sympathetic look. "You weren't even born yet, and by the time you were old enough to understand Kanna had spent years soothing ruffled feathers. But it wasn't always decided that I would become the next chief. There were a few other candidates, and some good people had their own reasons to back them. It all got argued out eventually. But for almost a year, things were very tense." He gave Shiyu an up-and-down look. "The Fire Nation has to be loyal to the Fire Lord. But it sounds as if they don't have to be loyal to his chosen heir. And when you're talking about people, that means an argument. We invaded the Caldera after Azula failed to stop us. Whoever was backing her as the heir must have found themselves in a very tight spot."

"And if she fled the Caldera, that means Fire Lord Ozai failed to intervene on their behalf," Shiyu nodded. "She is out of the Fire Lord's favor. And if he withdrew his protection from his own daughter and heir... then it is likely that if she is caught, she will suffer her brother's fate."

Aang stared at him. Gray eyes narrowed, just a little.

"Avatar Aang?" Shiyu inquired.

"Azula's a scary person," Aang said firmly. "She's done horrible things. She might even be really evil. And I've seen evil. But you know what? None of that matters. Because I don't know everything Fire Lord Ozai did to Zuko, but I know enough. What happened to him shouldn't happen to anybody else. Not even Azula." He looked down a little, sad. "And all you're worried about is, is this going to make sure she's not the next Fire Lord."

"It may seem harsh," Shiyu started, "but it is crucial to our people-"

"It's manipulating people. It's wrong! It's - like the Temple Elders, they wanted to take me away from Master Gyatso, and I wasn't going to have any say in it-" Aang took a deep breath. "You know what? It's not going to matter anymore. As soon as I master Fire, Avatar Kyoshi's decree is going down."

"You..." The Fire Sage's eyes bugged. "Avatar Aang. Think of what you would do! The consequences to innocent people-"

"A lot of them are going to die. I know that!" Aang swallowed hard. "I know that. A lot of innocent people are going to die anyway. At least if I do this, they won't die because people who think they know better want to pick who gets to be the next guy to go crazy trying to keep all of you from killing each other!"

Shiyu's jaw dropped.

"That's what Zuko says happens to the Fire Lords," Aang said firmly. "They have to keep all of your great names' loyalty, even when the nobles hate each other. Maybe I don't know how that works, but I see what it does. Temul of Shu Jing faced Fire Lord Sozin instead of breaking her word, when she knew he'd kill her. Kuzon spent his whole life trying to find me, and he died still trying. Zhao went after the Moon Spirit for the Fire Nation, and Iroh tried to stop him for the world. Firebenders... they're like setting off sparkler-rockets. You get them started, they don't stop until they hit a whole mountain. And a Fire Lord would have to... to try and hang onto all those people tearing away like rockets, and keep something kind of like hospitality with all of them, and nobody could do that! Katara couldn't do that, and she's one of the nicest people I know!"

Katara's face burned.

"Zuko and Azula and Fire Lord Ozai - everybody here thinks they're crazy," Aang went on. "You think they're crazy. And Iroh chased me with Zuko all winter. He's just as crazy as they are. He just doesn't look like it. Being Fire Lord - even being close to being Fire Lord - makes you crazy." He flung up his hands. "Maybe I don't know everything about being the Avatar, but people aren't supposed to be crazy! And the people who lead a whole kingdom really aren't supposed to be crazy. It's got to stop. And I'm going to stop it." He crossed his arms. "So if you think no Fire Lord means people are going to get hurt - figure out what we can do to fix that. Or at least, make it so less people get hurt." He gulped, but straightened. "You figure that out, and we'll... figure out what to do with what Azula told us. Right?"

"Right," Sokka said firmly. "I've got a few ideas." He raised a brow at Shiyu. "You want in?"

"Perhaps... later," Shiyu said shakily. "I am a Fire Sage, not a soldier. If Avatar Aang truly means to abolish Kyoshi's decree... I believe I must meditate on this."

Katara watched him make his way below, and had to wince. "He thinks his people are going to die."

Suki hugged herself. "I didn't meet a lot of good ones in Boiling Rock, but... if Shiyu's okay, he can't be the only one in the Fire Nation. That's got to be horrible."

"And that's kind of why I think we can believe Azula. Maybe," Sokka put in. "If Ozai is planning to take out the North Pole - okay, sure, fine, you take out the Northern Water Tribe. There's Katara and Swampbenders and Kyoshi Island waterbenders and who knows who else is out there. All Ozai's big plan is going to do is wipe out the one bunch of waterbenders who weren't in the war. It's going to be one big mess, Azula will have to pick up the pieces, and she's got a hundred years of history and a whole bunch of onmitsu telling her wiping out a whole nation doesn't work. She's going to get a Water Tribe Avatar dumped on her. A ticked-off Water Tribe Avatar. Nobody backstabs Crazy Blue Fire like that and gets away with it." He nodded at Aang. "She didn't kill you in the invasion when she had you down. I'm guessing that means she is telling the truth. She wants you alive. Which means this-" he tapped the copy of Zuko's scroll, "-might not be a lie either." Sokka chewed his lip. "Of course, wanting you alive might mean sending you off on a wild chinchilla-goose chase so you don't get hurt. Maybe."

"Azula?" Suki said under her breath. "Want someone to not get hurt?"

"Well... kind of, yeah," Aang said reluctantly. "She is Zuko's sister. She..." He groped for words.

"You didn't see what happened to General Fong. It was awful. But Zuko didn't make someone else start the fire that killed Fong's army. He did it." He took a deep breath. "Azula - she's awful, but she's responsible. Just like that. When she tells her people to do horrible things to our people, she's right there with them." He gave Suki a weak smile. "I know it sounds crazy, but I think... if Azula wanted me hurt, she'd do it herself."

Suki opened her mouth... then slowly, closed it. "Huh." She leaned a hand on the deck, thinking. "I didn't think about it much, when she came after Appa. The Fire Prince was chasing you, now it was the Fire Princess. What was the difference? But she fought us just like her sidekicks." She shook her head, as if eyeing an unpleasant memory. "She took us seriously, too. The Kyoshi Warriors have beaten a lot of benders because they think people who can't bend can't fight. She came right after me and didn't stop until I was down." She slanted a glance at Sokka. "I owe her a rematch."

"Somehow, I think we'll all get a chance..." Sokka trailed off, staring at the map. "Ooo. Yeah..."

Katara looked between him and her father. Who was smiling.

"And this is when I wish you guys would make maps out of dirt, like sane people," Toph grumped. "What? What do you see?"

"Not see. Exactly. But I know what we could see, and-" Sokka made himself stop, and rubbed his hands together. "This is an invasion, right? We've seen that. From both sides. It's a lot of work, and you've got to get everybody together before you go in, so you're sure they know what the plan is, and what did Azula do to us when we tried it?"

"Zuko told her we were coming," Hakoda pointed out.

"Yeah, well - the Earth King's plan told her we were coming," Sokka said ruefully. "We changed a whole bunch of details. But we couldn't change where we were going. If Ozai's really going after the Northern Tribe, he can't change where he's going, either. He's got to fly the airships north. They've got to have fuel. Only so many places they can pick it up before they have to start getting it from ships. And if he's going for the day the Comet hits - timing. We can get him on timing. He's got to be at or past certain islands in the next week or so, or it just won't work. We head there, we see what we can find, and we'll know."

"And if we know, we can do something about it," Aang said firmly. "If they need supplies to invade the Northern Water Tribe, then - no supplies, no invasion. It's one day. If Ozai misses the day of the Comet, then he can't kill the Northern Water Tribe." He took a deep breath, and let it all rush out in one big sigh. "There's something we can do. There really is."

"There's always something we can do, Aang," Hakoda said practically. "We just have to keep open eyes and an open mind, so we know it when we see it." He chuckled. "Though I never thought even an open mind would mean trusting the Fire Lord's daughter."

"We're not trusting Azula." Toph crossed her arms. "We're trusting Zuko."

"That's even harder to believe." Suki shook her head. "I know, I know; a lot's happened, and he did face down a monster for us. But after what he said to Aang..."

"That's kind of why I do trust him." Aang rubbed the back of his neck. "More than Iroh. Even more than Shiyu; and Shiyu knew he could die helping us. But he's a Fire Sage, so he did it anyway because... well. Because I'm the Avatar. I'm supposed to fix the world. That's what Iroh says. Shiyu, the Earth King... everybody thinks I'm going to fix everything."

"But you don't have to do it on your own," Katara said firmly.

"And that helps. A lot," Aang admitted. "But you guys still think I'm going to fix things. And Zuko doesn't. He doesn't like me. He thinks I'm trouble. And... I guess I kind of am. Maybe not just because of me. Maybe because everybody expects I'm going to pull some awesome spirit powers out of nowhere and somehow nobody will get hurt except the bad guys. But Zuko's going up north to stop a killer volcano, just because somebody's got to do it. He doesn't want my help. He's..." Aang looked at Toph with odd, dawning wonder. "He's doing what yāorén were supposed to be doing all these centuries. Stomping on a problem when it's small, before it gets so big you have to have an Avatar to fix it all."

"If you think Asagitatsu's a small problem, you're the one who needs your eyes checked," Toph said pointedly. "Do us all a favor, Twinkletoes. Don't tell Zuko he's doing what he's supposed to be doing. Sparky's had it up to here with spirits," she waved a hand way above her head, "and if you set off that sparkler-rocket, the whole mountain's gonna blow before he's got a chance to cool down."

"Um." Aang gulped. "Good point."

"Seriously?" Suki said to Sokka in an undertone. "Zuko could set off a mountain?"

"It's a really touchy mountain." Sokka winced. Spread his hands apart. "Has a dragon-spirit, big as... um. Bigger than the serpent in Serpent's Pass. With wings. And fire. Incinerates drowned zombies in one breath. Did I mention touchy?"

"Drowned?" Suki shuddered.

"Yeah. Found that out the hard way," Aang said sheepishly. "But Zuko and Langxue and the others are handling it. And they're not asking for help. They kind of just want me to stay out of the way. Not like... well. Almost everyone else."

Katara had to look away. "Zuko doesn't want to use you." Her heart sank. "Not like I have."

"You never used me." Aang leaned toward her, serious and worried. "None of you guys have. You help me. All the time. Even when you're just there. And I help you. That's what being friends is."

Katara rubbed her hands over each other, trying not to feel the pulse of blood under her skin. "But I've made so many mistakes."

"Well... yeah. Me too." Aang reddened. "Master Gyatso said that's part of learning to be a good person. If you don't make any mistakes - you're not trying hard enough." His ears were all pink. "And you guys forgive me when I make mistakes. How can I not forgive you?" He shrugged, and gave her a penguin-sledding grin. "Now, if we could just teach the spirits to figure that out, this whole mess would get a lot simpler!"

Chapter 82

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Back to the smooth stone wall in a shadowy corner of Dragons' Wings' new town hall, Agent Shirong watched flying notes, maps, and almost fists, as everyone with a scrap of authority in the settlement tried to figure out what was going on at once. "Sometimes, I love my job."

A little out of the shadows, Guard Huojin gave him a look.

It wasn't nearly as venomous as the looks Dai Li got used to. There was actually a little concern in it. So Shirong waved an expansive hand, willing to explain. "All the yelling is right here. No malcontents brooding in shadowed corners. No simmering tension because everyone pretends the war doesn't exist. All the malice that would normally draw spirits is getting aired out and beaten with sticks. Whatever's left will be small, weak, and easily managed when it does rear a spirit's head." He smiled wryly. "Thankfully. Asagitatsu's still touchy, despite all our work. A bit closer to a snarly lion-dillo than a trainload of blasting jelly now, but still nothing to trifle with."

Huojin blinked at him. "Fire Lord Ozai is bringing a fleet of airships. Right to our doorstep. Even if he does plan to take them to the North Pole after. And you're worried about spirits?"

Be on lookout for airship invasion of Northern Water Tribe, part of Zuko's terse hawk-message had read; sent ahead, before Byakko's ship could bring him into the harbor. Sources: Fire Lord intends Comet assault. Prep for air fleet diversion and/or target practice. Consult Teo, companions for air current info.

Which was a short and almost diplomatic way of saying, everyone had to get ready for potential flaming death from above. And by the way, they had to talk mostly pacifist gliders into coughing up information to save people they didn't even know.

When Zuko gets more than a breath to think, Shirong thought, Teruko and I need to remind him that there are differences between difficult and impossible.

Granted, dealing with Teo was far from impossible. The young man was here, after all, his own notes tucked in his lap. The gliders did, if grudgingly, admit it was better to have allies than to try and eke out a living on the roof of the world alone. But even if some of them were born airbenders, the Mechanist's people were still very much a small Earth village. Their nearest neighbors came first. Outsiders had to prove themselves, again and again.

Still, Teo had come. If mostly to get any scrap of news of his father. And he'd gotten news all right. "He's fine," Zuko had reported as soon as Teo's wheels squeaked up the hall ramp. "He's with Chief Hakoda. Looks okay. Misses you. I would have put it in a message, but sometimes even hawks get caught."

So now the glider was slumped in his chair, ignoring the yelling around him to just breathe. And smile, with the kind of whole-hearted relief Shirong had felt realizing that yes, their ice-bound train was going to float.

And if that's not a cue from the spirits, I don't know what is. "Yes, I am," Shirong answered Huojin thoughtfully. "We have firebenders, earthbenders, and waterbenders. We've been warned. We're already shaping shelters for our people, even if Ozai scorches everything above them to ashes. But if Asagitatsu goes up..." He shrugged.

"Okay, point," Huojin sighed.

"Besides, if the Fire Lord does show up..." Shirong allowed himself a nasty smile. "Spirits may not be able to tell most humans apart very well. But the people who follow an exile, versus those still bound under Avatar Kyoshi's decree? I think Asagitatsu will know very well who belongs here. And who doesn't." He rubbed a bit of obsidian between his fingers, contemplating the irony of delicate glass formed by all the fury of earth and fire. "Though I admit, the balance between the spirits here isn't a sure thing. Ozai is acting under Kyoshi's decree. That gives his actions a sort of... weight. Like a boulder, ready to roll downhill."

"Damn it. Never wanted to know anything about spirits..." Huojin sighed, hand almost drifting to his sword. "All right, tell me. You sound like it's just one side of a bar brawl."

"In a sense," Shirong nodded. "Ozai may be acting in line with Kyoshi's decree, but our young prince helped the living Avatar. If there's confusion among the spirits on whose side they should favor... well, at least it should be equal confusion."

Sage acquired, Zuko's message had gone on. Tossed at student. Student and companions reunited with allies. Leaving them to own devices. Thank Agni.

Shirong hoped tossed at had been a figure of speech. With what he now knew about dragon-children, he wasn't at all sure.

Though leaving them to own devices was even more ominous than manhandling a Fire Sage. That phrase had the same sort of teeth-gritted, about to set off sparks feel to it as Zuko's current glare at his uncle across the map table. Shirong wouldn't be in the middle of that battle of wills for all the jade in Ba Sing Se.

Though unlike some of the more nervous onlookers, he at least knew why those two hotheads were glaring at each other. And it didn't have anything to do with the graying waterbender now comparing Fire-influenced Southern Tribe techniques with Amaya's Earth-touched Northern moves at one side of the hall.

...Well, not much.

Need-to-know info on Boiling Rock was critically lacking, the message had read. Research Kanaloa. Shirong: Earthbending effective but not sufficient to deter spirit. Langxue: Any other info on spirit? Ask Prof. Wen? Gen. Iroh: Not Amused.

Having now wrung a few details on the kanaloa out of Amak - and a few more out of Iroh, mostly furious denials that he'd known about any spirits at Boiling Rock - Shirong understood that completely. The haima-jiao had been terrifying enough with only Amaya under its thrall. A fire-water spirit able to suck in an unprepared Avatar- His mind shied from the thought.

It'd be bad. How bad, I'm glad I don't know.

And the worst part was, their young prince probably felt guilty the mess had happened in the first place. He'd advised Sokka to look at Boiling Rock. Never mind that he hadn't known about the danger.

No, not the worst, Shirong decided. The Fire Sages had underestimated Zuko as much as everyone else had, yes. But what truly unsettled a Dai Li was that apparently Iroh hadn't known about the kanaloa, either. Which implied-

Well. It implied quite a few unpleasant things. But the most important one to anyone who cared about the young man who had faced the spirit...

If Zuko ended up sent to Boiling Rock, Shirong thought, the Fire Sages didn't believe Iroh would rescue him.

And that was one of the more charitable interpretations of the Sages' actions. Shirong grimaced, thinking of a few others.

"Oh, that's not a good look," Huojin groaned. "Hit me and get it over with."

"We should never let a Fire Sage be alone with the prince," Shirong said simply.

The guard gave him a look askance. "Most of them are loyal to Ozai. No kidding."

"Most of them are loyal to the true Fire Lord," Shirong corrected him. "That may not be the same thing."

"...I'm not going to like this, am I?"

"Heh." Shirong relaxed a bit. At least Huojin was honest about it. "It occurred to me that if I were a Fire Sage, loyal to the Fire Lord, unable to raise a hand against the royal family, and yet utterly convinced that Ozai's children should never inherit, especially Azula..."

"Nope, not going to like it at all," Huojin muttered.

"Then I might consider the fact that young men do noble and idealistic - and stupid - things," Shirong went on. "And that if Azula cared about nothing else in the world, she did seem focused on obliterating all her brother's hopes." He tapped a finger against obsidian. "So. Give him just enough information on the Avatar that eventually he'll figure out there has to be more, and come back. Meaning he breaks the terms of his exile, leading to either execution or confinement in the deepest pit of a dungeon the Fire Nation has."

"Boiling Rock." Huojin looked like the words had squirmed in his throat.

"Exactly." Shirong's eyes narrowed. "They didn't think Zuko could ever be a master firebender. So either the kanaloa would take him, or it wouldn't. What was important was that Azula is a master. And she'd come to gloat. And if anyone would know how to make sure a spirit that hates iron could go past those protections..."

"A Fire Sage would," Huojin agreed warily. "But why would anyone want to have Ozai's daughter possessed-" He cut himself off, paling.

"The Dai Li have the authority to kill even the highest nobles in Ba Sing Se, if there's no other way to save the city," Shirong nodded. "I'd imagine the Fire Sages have similar latitude. After all, if she were possessed by a rampaging spirit... they'd just be protecting the Fire Lord."

Huojin eyed him, and shivered. "I am so glad I'm not you."

"Sometimes I wish I weren't, either." Shirong sighed. "One of us should have gone with him. Though given what happened, I wouldn't have been much help. Water. Not my field of expertise."

"A whole damn ocean with a broken head isn't anybody's expertise," Huojin growled. "I'm going to get a straight answer out of him on what happened. And then I'm siccing my girls on him."

"Ouch," Shirong murmured. Though he understood the impulse. Uncovered new need-to-know info on ocean and coastal hazards, that bit of the message had read. Tropical sea serpent. Langxue: Skeleton accurate size. Apparently not immune to cloud-to-ground lightning. Ribs healing.

Lightning. Oh yes. He definitely understood the urge to throttle some straight answers out of the prince.

But he wouldn't. Knowing Zuko, if he admitted to the ribs he'd probably dealt with a host of lesser injuries, along with all the effects of a night adrift. Shirong might avoid the sea where possible, but he'd talked with enough of Jee and Donghai's sailors to have an idea of how nasty it had been. Lucky he wasn't further north, had been the consensus. Cold water kills faster.

Though luck hadn't had anything to do with it. Which was why their two main firebenders were glaring at each other hard enough to make the room hazy.

Iroh was the first to move; one hand flicking the matter away. "You cannot shun the Avatar!"

Zuko was unfazed, gold eyes not even narrowed. "I already have."

Avatar Aang is shunned, that heart-sinking part of the message had read. Gen. Iroh: Review available info shunning, cross-reference attempted manslaughter domain lords. Capt. Jee etc.: Treat as possible enemy. Do not allow on Asagitatsu.

Oh yes. That had definitely put the catowl amongst the sparrowkeets.

"He is the spirit of the world," Iroh stated. "We face formidable enemies in both this world and that of the spirits. The Face-Stealer, the drowned, my brother; Asagitatsu herself, if she is not satisfied. We cannot turn against one who would be our ally!"

"What part of tried to kill me did you not hear?" Zuko bit out. "And before you say it was an accident - yes! Exactly! He tried to kill me, by accident! Is that the person you want stepping into the middle of a volcano about to erupt? When Asagitatsu already doesn't like him? When we know the Face-Stealer pulled everybody's strings to make sure Asagitatsu killed Avatar Yangchen?" He brought a fist down on the table; the thump made half the people listening twitch. "This is our last chance. Agni loves us, but there's been too much blood shed. Too many lives and spirits twisted up so that nobody knows what's right anymore. If Aang blunders in here the way he blunders in everywhere else, we will all be dead. And he will be dead with us, and the Face-Stealer wins." Zuko drew a deliberate breath, letting a wisp of steam escape. "Well, not on my watch. I've lost too much to the Avatar and the Fire Lords and the spirits and the whole. Damn. Mess. We are going to fix this." He straightened in his chair. "We stopped General Fong. We can stop the Fire Lord."

Which made Shirong feel oddly warm, even as his stomach tried to take a dive through the floor. Facing the Fire Lord...

But we did defeat Fong, the Dai Li reminded himself. If Zuko believes we can do this - maybe we should believe, too.

"He's bringing airships and supply ships with troops, not marching an army overland," Zuko went on. "Airships will be tricky. Granted. But airships are a direct threat to the Air Temple. They're not shy about mixing it up with the Fire Nation when they want to live. Bring the airships down, and we've got half the battle fought. As for the supply ships, Asagitatsu's own fires give us a way to take them down. And if they put those out..." Zuko's eyes glittered. "The drowned want lives. That would be the last mistake those ships ever make."

Iroh was shaking his head, a doubtful scowl on his face. "If the Fire Lord comes on the Day of the Comet-

"Uncle, he can't," Zuko said soberly. "Not if he wants to use it against the Northern Water Tribe. At the airships' best speed, even if they're twice as fast as we've seen, it'd take three days to get from here to the North Pole. If he uses the Comet against us, he won't have it against them. And he's my father and he's crazy. Not an idiot. He knows heat rises. And he may not know how many firebenders we have here but he knows you're here. And, again, he is not an idiot." Zuko took a deep breath. "If he attacks here, and with our luck he probably will - we'll be facing firebenders. Not the Comet." The prince's sober look lightened, into a smirk that made Shirong reflexively glance around for death-defying drops or highly flammable enemies. "I got details from Sokka while we were heading to the Western Temple. Those airships carry explosives. Lots of explosives." An almost gleeful shrug. "Fuse, fire-ice, a few catapults..."

Iroh stared. Rubbed at what was probably a headache.

Couldn't happen to a nicer guy, Shirong mused. The Fire General's mood had ranged from grimly cheerful to downright amused while the rest of Dragons' Wings had been dreading the approach of an Earth Army. General Iroh had had no trouble facing Earth General Fong.

Facing Fire Lord Ozai? Heh. No, he wasn't nearly so happy about that.

Granted, the man was family. But Zuko and Azula were brother and sister, and he hadn't seen Iroh have any qualms about asking Zuko to face Azula. At least, not when it was to protect the Avatar.

Sauce for the chinchilla-geese is sauce for the gander, as they say, Shirong thought dryly. Shoe pinches when it's on your foot, doesn't it?

"...You have given this some thought," Iroh said at last.

"The Fire Lord does not tolerate challenges to his authority." Pale gold glittered.

Jee winced. Shirong made a note to corner the captain later, and determine exactly what he knew about the circumstances of Zuko's exile. Likely quite a lot, the way Iroh had glanced aside. Which was not something Zuko had expected, from the way his good eye narrowed. Surprise stoked a white heat of fury in the young prince, so hot the Dai Li almost felt his skin searing-

Then it eased, as Zuko let steam hiss from his breath. "Yes, I've thought about it. I know a lot of us have; though we all hoped the war wouldn't land on our doorstep this soon. But it has. So. What do we have ready? What do we have that could be ready, if we've got a few weeks? What do we need to shut down, until the Comet's gone, and we know one way or another who's left standing?"

He looked to the crowd of his people, and the answers started coming.

Shirong listened with half an ear, mentally juggling numbers and speakers to see if they agreed with reports he'd already read. The shelters were all but complete, earthbent into the caldera wall itself; if it had preserved the White Lotus cache through the last blast, it was their best chance. More supplies and half of the first new crops had been stored up in the Northern Temple. In the event of a blast, Changchang and the rest of the elders had already agreed to take in any of Dragons' Wings who made it there. The Temple-dwellers should make it; Teo and his friends had apparently taken some of the same sealing and filtering devices Ji had used to close off natural gas leaks, and come up with screens that ought to let air in but keep lung-destroying ash at bay.

That was above. As for below - the drowned had been seen in the deep waters, but they hadn't surfaced again. Fire watches had been kept every night, with memorials every dusk, and each one seemed to draw in another restless ghost to find peace. It'd take years at the current rate, but Amaya and everyone else who dealt with spirits believed the harbor would eventually be safe again. Of course, if Asagitatsu decided to take an active hand...

"How are we doing relieving the magma pressure?" Zuko gave Shirong a direct look.

"Slow, but apparently steady," the Dai Li reported. "Our dragon-lady seems to have taken Lady Bei Fong's earthbending in good humor. Professor Wen and his associates have managed to nudge trickles of steam to the surface in several locations, and according to our local airbenders..." He glanced at Langxue. Who grinned, just a little sharply, and poked Teo in the shoulder.

The glider started, looking up from his maps. Reddened a little at all the eyes on him, but drew himself up in his chair with confidence. "The pressure's a lot better. Compared to how it was when Fong hit the pass, at least. More like an eggshell than a soap bubble. If we have a few more months, we can do this."

"We might not have a few more months," Zuko grumbled. Looked up at stricken faces, and sighed. "We've got to keep trying. Every day we take the pressure off her, everybody gets safer. Right now, if Asagitatsu goes up, she'll make a smaller hole." The prince grimaced. "I know that doesn't sound like much. But that could mean our shelters make it. That the gliders make it. That Ba Sing Se won't starve just from the ash-fall; and we've all got people we care about down there. Earth King Kuei took in some of my people, and damn it, I want to see him kick Wan Shi Tong's ass."

That got grins, especially from the sailors. Shirong made a mental note to check just what they'd been up to, those last few hectic hours in Ba Sing Se.

"Teo, if your wind-maps are right... the ash will still head for the North Pole, even if most of it blows south afterward. We need to talk to the Northern Water Tribe, and send them a message to warn them what's coming." Zuko glanced down at the map. "That's not going to be easy."

Because even in the middle of summer, the seas up there were icy, Shirong knew. Sane hawks didn't go that way, and neither did sane sailors. Which meant they might be able to talk Donghai into it...

"Not so difficult as you may believe." Iroh stroked his beard. "I have invited a few friends already."

"...What."

Shirong watched them both intently, almost ignoring the guard beside him. A pity Kuei didn't grow up with siblings. If he'd grown up with Azula... er, Guanyin grant, someone not quite that bad... well. He would have known when Long Feng started managing him.

As Zuko obviously did know; Shirong could see it in the pallor of tightened lips.

"I do not know precisely when they will arrive," Iroh went on, apparently oblivious to the nerve he'd struck, "but it should be soon. Perhaps later today."

Zuko was silent, perhaps a second too long. "Did you consult with Master Amaya on the details of their visit?" he said at last. "The Water Tribes know about the drowned, and I suspect they will take precautions, but it's hard for anyone to grasp how many are out there."

Ooof. Loaded question, oh yes...

Huojin leaned in. "What the hell's going on?" A bare whisper; not a hint of hiss that would make it carry. "Zuko's the domain lord here. Just ask the volcano-dragon."

"Better yet, ask Fong's ashes," Shirong murmured back. "I know that and you know that. Apparently the general hasn't quite grasped the concept."

In a way, that made things worse. Long Feng had known he had no right to claim the city. General Iroh - former Crown Prince Iroh - seemed to see command as automatically flowing to him. Why should it rest anywhere else?

He's never had to deal with a recruit who's grown up enough to be his equal, Shirong concluded. Not that I've had many. I hope Quan and the rest are holding together. We left them in a sticky situation. Though not quite as sticky as ours. I hope.

He needed to spend some time with his family. Remind himself what this was all for, when everything seemed bleakest.

And it wouldn't be a bad idea to talk to Tingzhe about youngsters, and growing up, and how to handle it, Shirong considered. He and Min were fighting about the Dai Li before we left Ba Sing Se. Not so much now that we're in pursuit of spirits and enemies, and not honest men. But he knows what it's like. Maybe he has a few ideas.

Any ideas would be welcome right now. Lee and Mushi had been an apprentice healer and his tea-master uncle; a fight between them would only rattle the other denizens of their apartment building. A fight between General Iroh and Prince Zuko? There was no way this could end well.

And the worst of it is, neither of them wants to fight. Shirong hid a grimace. I have to talk to Tingzhe.

For more reasons than one. Meixiang's ancestor Gyokuro had been a Fire Sage, and Shirong had seen well enough that she knew a few of their teachings. If anyone here could help him unravel what the Fire Sages might have intended for Ozai, Iroh, and Zuko, it would be his adopted sister.

"Let me know immediately when any Water Tribe vessels are sighted," Zuko instructed Captain Jee and the rest of the sailing contingent. "We don't want any misunderstandings. On any side." He glanced at Shirong. "Let's see if Asagitatsu might give us some hints about settling her down sooner."

Asagitatsu sighed in her sleep, content. Death and destruction. Life and warmth. Both were in her nature. How fortunate she was, to have a dragon clan that nurtured both.

Fire and Water. Water and Fire.

One worked with the steady, grim haste of an antlion, digging into earth and stone to turn deadly steam to harmless, rising wind. The other whispered among the waves, gathering the wronged dead to her call. Both were just. Both had been wronged. Both sought recompense for evil done centuries ago, and fresh blood shed within the last season's turn. Their purpose shone in the spirit world like paired blades; one dazzling as sun on the sea, the other dark and silent as moonless night.

It made her weep, the beauty of those blades. And to sense them ready themselves, preparing to strike, duel, kill...

Fire kills to live. Who would have my gifts, must sacrifice.

Which would live, and which would die... that was the interesting question.

He shunned me.

It was like sticking his tongue under a loose tooth, Aang thought, sitting between Appa's horns so all he had to hear was the rush of wind. He just couldn't leave it alone.

Zuko shunned me.

Part of him wanted to curl up in Appa's fur and just bawl. Not because the world had ended. Because it hadn't. He was shunned, which meant the whole world ought to turn their faces away from him, except-

The rest of the world wasn't the Temples. The rest of the world didn't know. And most of those who did know, didn't care.

Which meant Temul hadn't been lying.

She was a ghost and she was awful and she'd done something horrible to Sokka just because he was Aang's friend. Because she wanted revenge on the Avatar, and she didn't care who she hurt to get it. But she wasn't a liar.

We shunned evil people at the Temples, and they went away, Aang thought, huddled in on himself in misery. Where did we think they went away to?

Funny, how the Elders had never mentioned that.

They didn't mention a lot of things.

"Hey." Sokka's voice, as the Water Tribesman made his careful way up Appa's neck, sword over his shoulder. "You okay?"

"No." Aang looked down at the reins in his hands. "Everything's so messed up."

"From what I've heard, it took at least a thousand years to get this messed up." Sokka gave him a serious look, wind ruffling his wolf-tail. "There's plenty of blame to go around. Don't cow-hog all of it."

Aang shifted his shoulders, feeling guilty. "I thought you were planning stuff with Fire Sage Shiyu."

"Yeah. About that? Turns out Fire Sages know a lot more about spirits than armies. And Shiyu doesn't know anything about airships. Except they're supposedly against the laws of nature, and should never ever work, and he still can't believe any firebender would break the root of his form and get on one." Sokka coughed, but blue eyes were full of mischief. "Right now, Katara's got an icepack on his head to keep his lunch down."

"He gets airsick?" Aang blurted out. "Oh, that's awful. Master Gyatso used to have ginger candy for people. I wish I had some... um?" Because Sokka was giving him a measuring look; a little happy, and a little relieved.

"It's okay. Katara's got this." Sokka waved a hand. "She doesn't have anything as nice as ginger candy, but he'll pull through." Propped up on his elbows, he gave Aang a serious stare. "You know you don't have to do this all on your own, right? And you don't have to do it all at once. All we have to do is delay Ozai's fleet so he can't use the Comet on anybody-

"I know, I know; people were fighting before I got back, they're not going to stop just because the Comet's gone. But the Avatar's supposed to fix things." Aang scowled, frustrated. "Like Avatar Kyoshi, making it so Chin couldn't ever attack her village again... um." His shoulders drooped. "I guess that didn't work out so well. Changing the land like that, yanking the sea right into lava; that probably made a lot of spirits unhappy."

"When it happened that fast? Yeah, probably," Sokka agreed. "But lava and water run into each other in the Fire Nation all the time. It doesn't have to make spirits upset. At least not bad enough to go after humans," he amended. "Gran-Gran says spirits get upset every time summer freezes into winter, too. And every time the winter ice cracks and the snow spirits have to sleep while the sun's strong. They don't like it, but they live with it. Humans have to be careful at the change of the seasons, the spirits get grouchy, but it passes. The spirits know their season will come back. They just need time to think it over."

"Time." Aang rubbed his fingers through Appa's fur, treasuring the rumble he got in return. "That's the real problem. There's just not enough time."

"...If you say the Avatar Spirit might let you play with time, I'm going to have to sit on you." Sokka was wide-eyed as a badger-frog, one eyebrow twitching. "'Cause if you went back from the future to fix the past, wouldn't that make the past be part of the future, and... head hurting now."

"Uh-uh. Time's not an element." Aang shook himself at the thought, weirded out. Sokka was right; that was enough to make anybody's head hurt. "It's just... that's what got Kyoshi, isn't it? She ran out of time. Earth's supposed to sit and wait, but she waited too long. With Chin and with the fire pirates." He chewed that over a little more. "Master Gyatso said the smallest breeze can divert the mightiest storm. You just have to put that breeze in the right place..."

Sokka whistled. "And the right time?"

"Yeah. Like-" Aang winced, remembering screams and fire.

Sokka sucked in a breath. "Do I want to know?"

"Zuko. And General Fong." Aang swallowed. "It was awful, but... if he waited, it would have been so much worse."

"Because Fong would have been in the village. Yeah." Sokka shuddered. "I hate to say it, but if you know somebody's not going to stop - no. Don't wait." He paused, and grimaced. "Maybe try to hit them with something that won't kill them, if you think you can talk to them later. But don't wait." He sat up a little. "You've got a plan? I thought I was supposed to come up with the plans."

"Not a plan. Just an idea," Aang admitted. "The Fire Lord's not going to listen, right? Not as long as he thinks he can use the Comet to beat the Water Tribes. But what about after that? When he can't, and the Comet's gone for another hundred years?" He took a deep breath. "Roku said I had to defeat the Fire Lord by the end of summer. Zuko says Fire Lord Ozai won't stop unless somebody kills him. But Roku didn't say I had to kill him." Another breath. He felt a little lightheaded. "Isn't losing one battle a defeat?"

"...Technically," Sokka said at last. "Very tricky use of words." He scowled. "Which kind of makes it sound even more like something a spirit would really mean. Huh."

"So... if I want to do something that's not big, and doesn't have to kill a lot of people, and do it in time..." Aang gulped. "Airships need the wind. What if I made a storm? A little one, out at sea, so innocent people don't get hurt."

"Whoof." Sokka's fingers clenched in thick fur.

Aang winced. "Bad idea?"

"Maybe not," Sokka said thoughtfully. "It could work. If we can find them."

"We can find them," Aang said, confident now. "The wind will show us the way."

"If Avatar spirity weirdness kicks in and helps out, I'm all for it," Sokka shrugged, peering out toward the horizon. "But if Ozai's already past our best guess for his supply bases, I don't know where we should look."

"Who needs to be the Avatar?" Aang gave him his best air-cake-tossing grin. "I'm an airbender, and it's summer. If Ozai wants to make it all the way up to the North Pole in time, he's got to take the high wind-road."

"The... what?"

"The fast way north," Aang explained. "It's summer, remember? The high wind-road's going to go right from the northern Fire Islands up toward the Northern Water Tribe. And from there it dips back over the mountains and pushes things back toward Ba Sing Se." He waited for an answer; shrugged when Sokka only blinked at him. "That's why I think Azula isn't lying. If the Fire Lord times it right, he can sweep right over the Water Tribe and still get back to start a whole bunch of fires in the Earth Kingdom before the Comet's gone. It makes sense."

"The fast way," Sokka said numbly. "We spent days getting north the last time! You never said there was a faster way."

"Because it's not there in the winter," Aang said, puzzled. "You use sails. You know that the winds change in different seasons..." He frowned into the breeze, thinking about that. "Only that's down near the surface. And the high wind-road's really high."

"Aang? Let me get a map."

"That's okay," Aang waved him off, "I've got one."

"Yeah, you've got the one with the crazy... arrows... on it..." Sokka smacked himself in the forehead. "Why didn't you say those were winds?"

"What else would they be?" Aang unrolled the old scroll that had lasted through the ice with him. "See how this one curves up past the Western Air Islands? That wind pretty much follows the current up north of the Fire Nation. If they take that, it pushes you up here." He tapped the thick dotted arrows in summer-red. "See? You get up to here - you have to get really high, but I bet they can - and the wind pushes you fast. Maybe five times as fast as Appa could fly on his own, even going all out."

Sokka caught the edge of the map before it could slap him in the face. "But if this is right, then the wind goes right over-"

"Yep!" Aang said cheerfully. "That's why we went there first on the way north. Even in winter it's the shortest way. In summer, it's really fast..."

Oh. Oh, that was bad.

Sokka swallowed. "Ozai's going to head straight for Asagitatsu."

For a long moment, all Aang wanted to do was hide again. Couldn't the spirits give him just a little break? Ever?

Except he already knew this was coming. Maybe that was all the break they could manage.

Aang rolled up his map, determined. "Then we're going to find him first."

Chapter End Notes

Gentlemen and ladies, I give you the jet stream. It is awesome.

Ironically, besides the Air Nomads, the people most likely to know about high-level winds are the Fire Nation. Messenger hawks are implied to fly for very long distances; even from the Fire Nation to Toph's home village in the Earth Kingdom. The easiest way they could do that is to use air currents like the jet stream. Put that together with Fire Lord Sozin getting the chance to raid the Air Temples for maps, and they could know a lot.

Soundtrack thoughts:

Shirong POV - Two Steps From Hell, "Dragon Rider".

Asagitatsu - Within Temptation, "I Wish I Had An Angel".

Gaang - "Invincible".

Chapter 83

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"...So that's how the high wind-road works in summer," Aang summed up, finger tracing arrows on the map that led from the middle of the ocean up the west coast of the Earth Kingdom and past Asagitatsu north, before they dipped back down into the middle of the Eastern Continent. "If the Fire Lord wants to invade the North Pole on the day of Sozin's Comet and still hit the Earth Kingdom, that's how he's got to go."

Katara let Toph lean against her on the deck. The earthbender might be in a better mood now that she knew Zuko was alive, but she still hated ships. Especially wooden ships, that didn't have metal she could scrunch her toes into.

And at that, she was doing better than Shiyu. The poor Fire Sage had been about as seasick as a person could get and still be alive. At least the sea-cinnamon tea seemed to be helping now. He was actually able to sit on Hakoda's deck and listen, without dashing to the rail every few minutes.

Aang drew his finger back down, not far south of the abbey where they'd found Bato and Sokka had beaten a shirshu with perfume. "And that's the best place for me to stop him. If I push the wind and the warm water down here," he dragged his finger farther south, "storms are really easy to get started. It'll have enough strength to hold together when I reach the invasion fleet, and then..." His shoulders slumped. "It's going to be awful. But if I can hit them with a storm here - mostly they're the only ones who should get hurt."

"Mostly?" Shiyu gave him a concerned frown. Winced, and rubbed some of Katara's ice over his forehead. "I know it's early in the year for storms, but surely those who dwell on the coast are prepared."

"There's always one cranky old geezer who can't let the fish get away," Sokka grumbled. "Trust me. I've been there." He poked the map himself. "Yeah, messy. But it sounds like it could be a controlled messy. I think that's the best we're going to get."

Aang took a deep breath. "But what about the drowned?"

Shiyu sighed. "There are some risks that must be taken, if my people are to be brought back to the will of the world. So long as the Face-Stealer does not seize them, the drowned will seek their homes in the Fire Nation. The great names will deal with them."

"Some of them will," Sokka said sourly. "The one good thing about this plan is there won't be a lot of people drowning. One of those war balloons falls out of the sky, it's going to be like hitting a mountain-" He saw Aang's stricken look, and winced. "Sorry."

"I hate this." Aang hugged himself tightly. "I really, really hate this."

"I know," Katara said softly. "We all know that, Aang."

He kept looking at her, gray eyes almost pleading. She didn't look away. But she didn't bend, either.

You want me to say I hate it too, Katara thought. But I don't. I can't. I told you, I'll never turn my back on people who need me. And everyone the Fire Lord is going to attack needs me. I can't think killing people is wrong just because, Aang. I wish you could understand that.

"I know it's not really going to help," Sokka sighed. "But they're Fire Nation. If they're anything like the people we know - they'd rather get hit by one big hammer-smash of wind than get sucked under by the ocean."

Aang shook his head. "Dying is dying."

"No, it is not," Shiyu said firmly. "Not to the ghost left to pass over. For one of Fire to die by Water is a dreadful shock to the spirit. Storm and wind are not a kind death, but they do not so rend the soul. If the Face-Stealer seeks to twist their spirits after such a death, he will have to work to do so." The sage folded his hands, cloth-wrapped ice set aside. "If it must be done, we will do it cleanly. How can we help?"

"I... kind of don't think you can," Aang sighed. "I'm going to be bending in the middle of a storm. And if I get close enough to be sure where the storm hits them, I'm going to be bending with people throwing fire at me. In wind and waves and hail and all kinds of mess." He looked up, determined. "I can fly in that. Appa can't."

"We did okay in the last storm," Sokka objected.

"Almost drowning isn't okay," Aang shot back. "And the time before that, the last time Appa and I ended up in a storm that bad, I got frozen for a hundred years. I'm not doing that again. I just found you guys. I'm not sleeping for another century while the world goes to pieces because I'm not here!" He gulped, fingering his airstaff. "That iceberg took everyone away from me. Even Bumi. He's all old, and responsible, even if he acts crazy. I can't... I can't lose everybody again." He stared at the deck, shoulders slumped. "I know the Avatar's supposed to be detached and let people go. But I can't. I need you guys to be alive. To be safe. If you come with me on Appa, I'd be worrying about you when I should be worrying about the Fire Lord. That just won't work." Aang took a deep breath and looked around at them all. "You keep telling me I don't have to do this alone. And you're right. I'm not doing this alone. You're going to take care of Appa, and Fire Sage Shiyu, and you're going to warn the Northern Water Tribe. So I'm not doing this alone."

"I rather think I'm old enough to look after myself," Shiyu murmured.

Toph smirked, folding her arms. "Say that again when you're not kissing the rail every hour."

"I'd like to see you do as well in one of those accursed war balloons," Shiyu said, just as dry. "Being surrounded by one's opposing element is no place for a true master." He pressed ice to his forehead again, and gave Aang a considering look. "It will be a long flight."

"Kind of more a bunch of long flights," Aang grinned. "Katara's got this awesome idea for ice ramps!"

It was a good idea, and Katara was glad she'd had it. Aang was a master airbender, but even the Avatar had to rest sometimes. Bending up an ice ramp to land on and take off from solved a lot of problems.

Only if those problems hadn't been solved, maybe Aang wouldn't be doing this...

"Still. You will have long hours alone, under the summer sky," Shiyu said thoughtfully. "It will be an excellent time to meditate on sunlight."

"Meditating?" Aang's face fell a little, then brightened. "Oh yeah; practicing firebending will be great! Out over the ocean, nothing to burn; I can throw sparks, and swoosh some fire-"

Shiyu cleared his throat. "A certain firebender informed me that airstaffs are well waterproofed, specifically to allow flight in storms. So are sky bison, by virtue of their thick fur."

Aang blinked at him. "Um... yeah?"

"And both fur and waterproofed fabric," Shiyu went on, inevitable as lava, "are highly flammable."

The deck was quiet, except for the slap of waves.

"Meditating. Right." Aang scratched the back of his head, and smiled sheepishly. "Omm..."

"I don't care what Uncle says. This can't be a spirit-tale." Draw. Part into ready stance. Stab. Retreat to guard. "Meditating doesn't solve my problems."

Browsing on some bluebriar shoots up the hill, Asahi snorted.

Spiral. Outward block up, inward block down. Working through the dao forms, Zuko could picture the sword and spear he'd strike aside, leaving both foes open to attack or retreat.

He didn't want to retreat.

"It's Uncle. We've got enough problems with the whole world trying to kill us. Why do I have to have a problem with Uncle?"

Slide in. Right hilt to the Fourth Door of the Soul. Left slash down, across the Eleventh Door.

Most male opponents - and the female ones with sense - protected the groin. Beyond the obvious potential for pain, the likelihood of a quick death from blood loss was enough to sober any soldier. But if you smashed a hilt into someone's throat first, they were a little too busy trying to breathe to worry about that second blade slipping in.

"Okay, maybe it's not the whole world trying to kill us." Zuko sighed, stepping back into guard. "But I promised to protect my people. These people. Here. I sent out warnings, I helped the Avatar get Fire Sage Shiyu, and we helped Teo and his people get prepared to survive if everything goes wrong. Every other resource I have, I need to use to protect right here. I'm the great name of Dragons' Wings, and they're counting on me to do my duty." He puffed out steam. "And when it comes to the spirits, it's my duty as a yāorén to handle what the Avatar can't. Aang's busy. Asagitatsu's my problem. Why doesn't Uncle understand that?"

Asahi scratched at the turf, and gave him a sidelong look.

"Why doesn't he understand that?" Zuko asked himself, more quietly. Because this was hard to think about; he didn't want to be at odds with Uncle Iroh...

But he was. This time it'd only been inviting a bunch of waterbenders in without asking-

Only. That's kind of like only dropping the Rough Rhinos into the middle of Ba Sing Se.

Still. That was all that had happened this time. What about next time?

With Uncle, there's always a next time.

The worst of it was, he didn't understand why.

We got out of the Avatar-chasing business due to a sudden case of not wanting to be dead, Zuko thought, pacing forward and back in stance. Or in Azula's hands. Kind of the same thing at the time. Uncle was for that because he wants the world back in balance more than he wants to be Fire Lord. We hid out in Ba Sing Se to figure out what to do next... more like, I was trying to figure out what to do next, he was just as happy making tea. But I thought he agreed with me, when we were planning out this settlement. If we couldn't fix the world by ourselves, then we could at least patch up some of the cracks. That's a solid goal. That's a good goal. Damn it, I'm not a Pai Sho player; I can't go in for all the tiles when the other guy's got the whole field in his grasp-

Pai Sho.

He could see the tiles fall into place on the board, an arcing pattern that unlocked secrets... and for some, victory.

The Lotus Gambit. A risky move that requires trying to encompass every quadrant of the field.

Uncle was the Grand Master of the White Lotus. He wanted to save the entire world.

I can't.

Asahi whickered at him, tearing apart a leafhopper she'd munched up with the vine tips.

"I can't think about the world." Zuko sheathed his dao; no sense waving around sharp metal when he'd finally put his finger on the problem. "He does, and I can't. This... is not good."

One step at a time. He'd found the problem. What to do about it would take a lot more thought.

"Don't teach when you're angry," Zuko muttered to himself, and reached out to scratch black feathers. That, both Tenzin and Uncle agreed on. And he wasn't angry now. Tired, and a little frustrated, but not angry.

Now, I can teach. Zuko grinned. And reminded himself to stop smirking before he went too far. For some reason, Jinpei got suspicious when his teacher was too happy.

Can't imagine why. It's not like we have a shortage of leaves to practice with...

Bending the storm was like riding Omashu's mail chutes, Aang thought. Exciting. Terrifying. With an awesome guilty rush of maybe I shouldn't be doing this.

Part of the scariness was how the winds over the ocean seemed to know what he had in mind. They knotted together faster than he could have imagined, wind and water and stored heat from the sun churning into high, koala-wool fluffy clouds; thickening further into gray, then near-black, lit inside with spiderweb-scrawks of sky-lightning. The wind carrying him almost stilled. Shuddered, and blew more fiercely, twisting him east and west in the sky.

Time to go.

He banked west and north, blanking his mind into meditation to ignore some of the strain in his arms. Even if Ozai knew enough about the winds to move fast, it'd still take the fleet and the storm some time to cross paths. Time to be in the silence, and the wind, and the...

Now.

"The problem with General Iroh," Shirong leaned back against a boulder, helping Amaya and Tingzhe keep watch over their respective kin, "is he loves playing Pai Sho with other people's money."

Is he breathing right? Amaya worried, watching Zuko guide Jinhai through punching a small fireball. He'd tell me if he weren't, he's learned enough healing to know not to be stupid. And if I remind him he has to be able to fight, he'll behave and let me check him. I hope. "That is my husband you're talking about, young man," she reminded him. "He's never gambled without a very good reason. Even for money."

"I'm sure he does have reasons," the Dai Li said dryly. "I've watched him work. Your husband is a good man." He cleared his throat. "But I think the general has a few bad habits."

"Prince Iroh is a good man," Tingzhe said firmly. "However, for most of his life he has been General Iroh. And generals have different responsibilities than princes, or kings, or even a young great name."

Amaya gave him a deliberate look. Tingzhe Wen had learned to weigh his words under the Dai Li's watchful eyes, and even now he had the distracted air of a man too lost in dusty tomes to consider any possible offense given from what was just a theoretical scenario, certainly...

Part of her wanted to shake him until his glasses fell off. They were friends, not just patient and healer, and this was her husband and nephew about to be caught at odds with each other.

Then again, this was her family on a slow boil. Safe enough at the moment, but a pair of master firebenders could explode as violently as Asagitatsu if things went wrong. Add in her own temper to the mix, and the fact that Zuko was also a waterbender, meaning any family fight might spread outside their own walls if they weren't careful... Perhaps the distracted professor was the one she wanted to hear, after all. "How are they different?" Amaya asked. "They're all responsible for their people."

"Ah. Yes, and... no. Not exactly." Tingzhe raised a thoughtful, lecturing hand. "You're familiar with chieftains, and the Earth King; with the City Guard, and Suzuran, and... hmm, I hadn't considered that before, a captain like Jee is 'master after Agni' on his ship, which is a bit more like your chieftains-"

Shirong coughed. Deliberately.

"Ah, yes; where was I?" Tingzhe polished his glasses on his sleeve, then set them back on his nose with a chuckle. "Well. There are many kinds of generals. Foolish ones, such as General Gang; blind ones, such as the late and rather less than lamented Fong. By what reports I did manage to lay hands on from outside the Wall, General Iroh was quite different from those gentlemen. He was a good man, a good soldier, loved and followed by all his men with willing loyalty. But he was, nonetheless, a general. And all generals have one thing in common. With very rare exceptions, when they decide to take an objective... they don't pay the price."

"Take an objective," Amaya repeated. The phrase chilled her, with its echoes of war and death and blood. She'd seen enough death in this war already. The thought that more was coming made her want to howl her grief to the moon. Why did the Fire Lord have to come here?

Because we are here, she told herself, sad and proud. Because we defy him. And Ozai's plan will not allow that defiance to exist in this world.

Well. They'd just have to see who'd planned better, wouldn't they?

"Indeed," Tingzhe nodded. "For while the duty of a lord is to govern his people well, the duty of a general is to carry out his king's commands. He must not waste lives. A good general, I'm told, hoards his men like jade, while he spills his enemies' blood like water. But his duty is not to save lives." He sighed. "It is to spend them as he must, to achieve his grand strategy, and send his enemy down to final defeat."

Amaya shifted her weight from foot to foot, watching for any betraying hesitation in Zuko's breath. Amak seemed to be a well-trained healer, but she hadn't been there to haul her nephew out of the water and see all of the sea was properly bent out of his lungs. She couldn't help but worry. "You believe Iroh's grand strategy is to defeat Ozai, not just ward him off?" She grimaced. "He may have a point, even if it means weakening Zuko's authority. If Avatar Aang can't face the Fire Lord and kill him, and for all his power the Avatar is a child... someone has to do it."

Shirong reached up absently, as if to tug down a missing hat. "I wish his goal were that modest, Healer."

Sparks flew, and Amaya drew a sharp breath. She rolled her shoulders, and made herself relax again; Jinhai had managed to bend it all back into the training circle, even if the last half-dozen had wobbled in just over the edge. Zuko crouched down to look at exactly where they'd landed, sketching out with hands and words where Jinhai's form had faltered. "I'm just a backwater Northern Tribe healer, true," Amaya said dryly. "What greater goal is there than defeating the Fire Lord?"

"Restoring the balance of the world itself."

Amaya's gaze flicked to him, startled. Surely he had to be joking.

But Shirong's answering stare was as starkly serious as she'd ever seen it. And Tingzhe added a reluctant nod of agreement.

"But we can't," Amaya protested, stunned. "We're just one small tribe. There aren't enough of us to fix the world, even if we tried. And that would be assuming the rest of the world would ever listen to a bunch of sun-struck lunatics who've abandoned all propriety to live with other nations. If I didn't know better, I'd assume we'd all fallen prey to midnight sun madness." She spread her hands, tracing the shape of the caldera. "Keeping Asagitatsu calm and the drowned contained takes all the time we can spare from surviving. We might manage a short battle with the Fire Lord, but if any of us were lost, none of us might survive..."

There. There was the problem. Not one she'd expected in a husband so wise to the ways of war. "But he doesn't think he can lose," Amaya concluded, looking aside.

"Are you sure it's that innocent?" Shirong's gaze slid aside to study the shadows with her. "I saw Long Feng work."

"Iroh's not Long Feng." Amaya gave him a level look. "He'll always be a charming rogue, and more than a bit sly, but he doesn't pull strings from the shadows." She sighed. "He just doesn't see it's time to stop pulling."

"Speaking as a father, I can attest it is a bit difficult to be certain when to let your children decide to stand in the path of an avalanche." Tingzhe folded his hands in his sleeves, watching Jinhai gnaw his lip as Zuko explained again what his root was, and why not to break it unless he had to. "The prince has been in a great deal of danger for a very long time. It can't be easy to stand back and let him juggle all our fractious people, airbenders, the drowned, and a volcano. On top of that," Tingzhe cleared his throat, "Zuko has a temper."

"Firebender," Shirong chuckled. "Dragon-child. Take your pick."

"Oh, I do know," the professor said dryly. "Min has more than enough of his own, even when he's solidly rooted in earth. But that temper can make it a bit difficult to distinguish no, I don't want to and you can't make me, from no, I've thought this through and I will not allow this to happen."

Shirong groaned, and thumped his head against the rock. "If Iroh wants to bring the world back into balance, he has to work with the Avatar."

"And Zuko is shunning him," Tingzhe nodded. "Obviously a hasty, reckless decision, by a young man who deliberately tells the spirits to get lost at every opportunity."

Amaya winced. Young men usually didn't have the authority to banish someone from the tribe, but Zuko was of age to do it if there were no other warriors present. "He is a yāorén," she noted. "I thought it was his duty to tell some spirits to get lost."

"It is. Even more than a Dai Li's," Shirong grumbled. "And what part of lethal airbending strike did Iroh miss?"

"Ah. But to you, Zuko is a recruit. Your charge, even now, and your responsibility to rescue from spirits he hasn't a prayer of fighting on his own. Not an heir of Sozin, whose duty is to shoulder the ire of the entire world." Tingzhe gave him a look askance. "Given your encounter with the xiāo yāo jīng, you know how badly a new recruit can fumble a desperate situation. But," he raised a finger for a moment more, when Shirong would have protested, "you also know how you moved past that error, and learned caution. And you've seen your own recruits gain the skill and experience to be trusted in the field, even with your own safety. True?"

"Some do," Shirong nodded. "I think Min will get there. Eventually."

"Yet you would trust Zuko at your back against the most dire spirit that took it into its mind to strike out at the living." Tingzhe shifted his gaze to Amaya. "Just as you would trust him with lives in his hands. Because he is a trained healer, and a trained yāorén. As much as anyone can be trained for that, when no living yāorén has walked this world in a thousand years." The professor wove his fingers together, and studied the backs of his knuckles as if they held the secrets of the ages. "But Zuko is not a trained general."

Which made no sense. "He was on that ship with Iroh for three years," Amaya objected.

"And evidently that was not nearly long enough." Tingzhe glanced back up at her. "After all, a properly trained general would seize the opportunity to obtain all his objectives in one fell swoop."

"Risk it all to win it all." Amaya felt faint, and knuckled a pressure point behind her ear to steady herself. "We can't."

"More to the point, the lord of Dragons' Wings can't," Tingzhe agreed. "He is bound by loyalty, by family, and by oath to look to us first." He sighed. "If General Iroh cannot accept that... whatever plan the Avatar has to defeat Ozai's invasion, I pray he succeeds. For all our sakes."

I wonder if Avatar Yangchen ever fought like this?

Rain running cold over his arrows, Aang puffed out his cheeks to blow a wind that would carry him up and over the nearest war balloon, and hoped she hadn't. Because that would mean Yangchen had been fighting alone, with no one to fly with her, and... he really hoped she hadn't had to fight alone. It was awful.

You saw Katara do this. It works.

Aang scooped the water off himself with one hand, trusting the wind to hold him against his glider. A flick of his wrist, and water slashed through red fabric like a storm of razors.

Hot air gushed out as he grabbed the glider again; smoky, and a little smelly, like a platypus-bear that'd had too much cabbage. The metal rib-work groaned, airbag crumpling as the hull dropped like a stone toward the deadly waves below.

So far to fall... don't think about it.

No time to think. Monk Gyatso had taught him a lot about gliding, but nothing about how to keep an even keel with a spiral of water winding down his arm, and eeep-

A fireball whooshed past, missing green paper by inches.

Yanking the water back to settle as a cold glob along his shoulders, Aang spun up an airball and sent it whirling that direction with the push of a hand. More fireballs went sailing awry, whirled away from their target; some buffeted upward to impact as ashy spots on red fabric. None of them caught, the rain slanting out of the wind was too heavy for that, but the charred spots rippled ominously.

Hey. It's fire, yeah - but waterbending is getting your enemy's force turned against him. I can do that!

This was going to be tricky. Making that many airballs, while he was trying to hang onto his glider?

Who said I needed to hang on?

Grinning, Aang flipped over, and spun air between his hands. The staff pressed hard against his shoulders, the wings really weren't designed to fly upside-down...

But I only need a minute.

It was kind of like air-juggling, or snaring a dozen butterflies. He didn't need big winds. He had plenty of those already. He just needed little whirls of contrary wind.

Well, that and some fireballs... here they come!

Aang spun back upright, tossing the airballs with his glider wings like Haru and his dad had tossed bits of coal. The swarm of fireballs whirled like dust in a gale, spiraling up and away to hiss out in falling rain or burn dark spots of weakness in wet red cloth.

Yeah. I can do this!

-And it felt awful to be so glad about that. But he'd seen the Invasion of the North. He'd known what they were going to do to the Northern Water Tribe. And he still wasn't going to let that happen.

It's still wrong. It's just wrong to hurt people. And it's worse than wrong to want to.

He really, really hoped there weren't any ships on the ocean under this storm.

Except there would be, at least Ozai's supply ships, and maybe fishermen like that old geezer he'd rescued with Sokka...

I'm not running away. Not this time.

Aang pulled the glider up and caught an updraft, heading for thinner air. Slicing open the war balloons worked. That was all he was going to think about.

Maybe... maybe I don't have to take them all down. Zhao's fleet ran after his ship got slashed; maybe if I can just find Ozai's war balloon... only which one is his?

Well. The one with the fancy gilded bits kind of looked like a good bet.

Okay. One set of water-razors, coming up-

There was something dark moving under the war balloon.

For a moment all Aang could think was maybe he really had gotten lucky, that some of the quivery weirdness he'd felt in the storm had pulled together into spirits after the invasion fleet; nobody was supposed to be up in the air but sky bison and birds, and maybe he could just fly off and let a flurry of the hail-slick sickle-weasels Master Gyatso had told shivery stories about do what they did best...

Dark hair, and red robes iced with rain, and pale gold that stabbed through thin air.

...Why did he come out of the cabin?

Water-blades seemed to shiver out of Aang's grasp, slanting away in the hail and wind and rain. He had to bend them back-

Lightning boomed, and he flinched, banking up and away from where he'd meant to fly. Which... okay, not good, he was aiming away from Ozai's war balloon and sailing up behind another. He'd have to turn and fight the wind and go back, and he knew he had to, he knew it, but he didn't want to.

I know those eyes but Zuko's got a scar but Sozin had those eyes too, and he just left Roku there, he let his best friend die on purpose, I have to remember that. I have to... I have to...

"Decide where you stand, Aang. And stand."

Aang swallowed, queasy in a way twirling through the air never made him feel. I have to stop the Fire Lord. But... I can't do this.

He had to find another way. He didn't have to kill anybody, after all. He just had to stop the war balloons from getting to the North Pole. Maybe... maybe if he iced the tops, made them heavy enough they had to go down, out of the high wind-road-

The back of his neck prickled.

Like Azula - but he can't see me, I'm behind one of his ships-!

Light and darkness and roaring.

Smoke in his nose. Burning wood, crumbling to ash in his hands.

Red fabric seared to black in an instant, red-hot steel screeching as it came apart, dropping the fragments of a war balloon like metal hail.

He hit his own ship to get me?

Everything convulsed, muscles twisting until he thought his neck would break. The sky flipped upside-down, water was flying toward him-

It's not black.

Water borrowed colors from the sky above it. The sea should be a dark mass of hungry waves, scrawled on by white lightning...

And it was. But down, deep down, were translucent shapes of misty gray, streaming glimmers of blue light like strangling kelp. He knew those shapes. Only they shouldn't have been faded. They should have been hard lines of steel and iron, touched with black and flying streamers of red.

The largest had a diagonal gash, right to left; as if a massive blade had slashed the command area off in one careless blow.

A blade, or a waterbender... wasn't that Zhao's...

He couldn't think.

Lightning. Why is it always lightning?

He twitched a finger, and the sea swallowed him.

Chapter End Notes

Whoof. Aang POV - well, let's just say I find it very alien trying to write an avowed pacifist. Hope this worked.

Okay, apparently "Invincible" is by Hedley, and "I Wish I had an Angel" by Nightwish. I can remember odd facts about the ecology of lizard-dispersed fruiting plants, but not song titles and bands. Go figure.

If you really want angst, take another look. Because there's one big mistake Zuko's been making all along, and it's about to bite hard...

Chapter 84

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"It doesn't burn." Huojin waved a lantern through the column of warm vapor, looking even more dubious now than he had the first time. The lantern flickered, almost going out. "This is supposed to be venting pressure off Asagitatsu. Kai swears there should be some natural gas coming up in these fumes."

The elderly earthbender in charge of the easterly vents nodded, bare toes twitching against the ground as he surveyed this vexing phenomenon. "The earth-channels reach down into the same core. It shouldn't be a fire-fountain, young lord, but there should be a flame."

"Couple of kids saw this wasn't burning, decided to toss stuff through it," Huojin sighed. "Started with leaves, went on to matches and candles... I've got them doing laundry now. The hard, heavy, rock-pounding stuff." He rolled his eyes. "So. Not burning. Why?" The Guard narrowed his eyes at it. "And how soon should we start running?"

"It doesn't feel like a spirit. Move back." Frowning, Zuko lit a lash of flame, and flicked it at the shimmer of air. Like the lantern, his whip dimmed. "Well, whatever's in there, we don't want to breathe it. Langxue?"

"It's some kind of air." The island-born yāorén whirled a small sphere out of the column, molding it between his hands. "Feels funny, though."

"In what way does it seem odd?"

Zuko glanced at his uncle. "I thought you were going to meet the Northern Water tribesmen when they docked." And keep anybody from killing each other. That was why Saoluan was down at the shore, instead of keeping an eye on her little brother. Kyoshi Island's reputation for neutrality, and then coming in on the Avatar's side, would hopefully slow down any violent reactions.

"We suspected spirits at work," Iroh said easily, studying the waver of hot gases. "They will understand."

Right. And Captain Jee was about to take up dancing with feather boas.

The skepticism must have bled through his try at polite neutrality, because Iroh smiled. "The Fire Nation may leave spirit matters in the hands of great names and Fire Sages, but the Water Tribes live closer to the will of the world. We could learn a great deal from them."

Sure we can, Zuko thought dryly. Things like how to hide from the rest of the world for eighty years, and then get saved by a giant water monster.

The spirit of the Moon had hid out as a koi fish, for Agni's sake. If she had to be scaly, couldn't she at least have picked a leopard-shark?

"So," Iroh went on, as if the thought of unescorted Northern Tribe members wasn't sending visions of watery drowned doom dancing through his head, "how is the gas odd?"

"It moves weird." Langxue reshaped his airball, frowning. "A lot of it's... well, like air. But part of it just wants to fly loose when I bend it. It's like..." He chewed his lip, as if trying to bite down to the right words. "Like trying to bend a flooding stream full of rocks and feathers. The feathers keep drifting to the surface."

Huojin raised a startled brow. Zuko frowned. Something about that description tweaked a memory. Not one of Kuzon's; something much more recent...

Kai was looking at them all as if they'd been sun-struck. "Air isn't anything like honest earth!"

"He didn't say it was rocks," Zuko defended his fellow yāorén. "Pumice isn't the same as granite. Seawater doesn't bend the same way as a river. Grass fires are fast and cool; wood fires are hotter. Air can be different. You're a miner." Years retired to Ba Sing Se, from what Zuko knew; but no one here was really retired now. "You know about damp."

"That I do," the gnarled earthbender admitted. "That's not a calm thought, young lord. Outside the mines, air should be air. Good. Pure. Healthy to breathe."

"If this is what I suspect, it would not harm one to breathe it for a moment," Iroh stated. "Though it would be startling. Can you bend those feathers together?"

Langxue's brows drew down. His hands moved in smaller and smaller circles, until he was spinning a globe the size of a small limon. "Now what?"

"This should not be dangerous. But it is delicate work." Iroh circled a finger near the sphere, sparks crackling in its wake-

In the spinning air, sparks glowed orange-red, flecked with deepest violet.

"Ha! As I thought." Iroh let the charge fade, and nodded to Kai. "Seal this vent. We would have to tap deeper into the reservoir of natural gas to burn off fumes here, and that may be more trouble than it is worth. We do not have the resources to exploit this yet. But in time, it may bring us closer to our neighbors than we dared imagine."

Closer to...? Zuko thought back on that odd-colored spark, and half-heard conversations between refinery workers rescued from the Nara gas-fields years ago. The tsunami had done more damage than anyone expected there, given they used unique devices in that field to produce not only natural gas, but- "It's sun-damp?"

"It is, indeed." Iroh looked into the distance, calculating. "This could be of great value to us. Eventually."

"What's sun-damp?" Langxue's gaze flicked between them, wary, as he let the gas flow away.

"And is it about to jump out and eat us?" Huojin put in.

Zuko snorted, and shook his head. "Short term? It's fine. Just don't breathe it."

"And long term?" the Guard persisted.

"Ah." Iroh waved them all toward the docks, obviously planning to belatedly greet his guests. "That is where things become interesting..."

"So this is where you finally washed up." Leaning away from the table as the firebenders kept talking, Pakku eyed the young healer who'd followed in Kanna's paddle-strokes decades before. Though Amaya's trip hadn't been nearly as favored by the spirits. He could understand Kanna taking off for the Southern Water Tribe, a bit. He'd given her his necklace despite the elders' frozen disapproval, knowing full well the waterbending masters of the tribe wanted such a talented young man settle down with a healer for a wife, so he could raise strong, waterbending sons. They'd both been such stubborn youngsters.

But Kanna wasn't a bender, and she hadn't had the patience to change their minds... or perhaps she'd just been practical enough to see the elders' brains were frozen in their ways. She'd taken a kayak and a full set of supplies, and set out southward.

That had been then. When years later Amaya had taken off rather than consider the elders' proposal on his behalf - it did make a man wonder. Kanna had at least joined their distant kin. Amaya had paddled off to the Earth Kingdom rather than be faced with his necklace. Was every woman he'd chosen to show interest in destined to never be satisfied?

At least Kanna had mellowed with time. From that fire-etched necklace at her throat, he doubted Amaya ever would. Particularly given the way she folded her hands over each other on the table, giving him a look he was accustomed to aiming at his more feckless students. "You haven't heard a word Prince Zuko said, have you?"

"There wasn't that much to hear." Pakku flicked a gaze over the younger members of his impromptu delegation; brown-tufted Tunerk closed his mouth, the young waterbender obviously thinking better of repeating any incautious statements about being grateful for fire fountains in the midst of an honest harbor. "You're planning to face an army of firebenders with only a handful of benders of your own. If the drowned in the water don't kill you, the volcano will. And if you manage to placate both of those, an army's coming to wipe out my tribe. Again. Only this time they've abandoned the sea to profane the air instead, and if they decide to wipe out Ozai's rebel son on the way-"

Zuko's good eye narrowed at him. But the youngster said nothing. Very unlike a firebender.

"-It might slow them down for a few days," Pakku went on. "So go ahead. Try to fight the Fire Lord's best forces by throwing rocks at them. I'm sure we could use a few more hours to prepare." He gave Iroh a deliberately unimpressed look. "The only thing I don't understand is this sun-damp you seem to think is so important. Ozai's fleet is - hah! - all hot air." He shrugged. "If it's wet hot air... well, that makes things simple. A few waterbenders in the right place to raise some freezing mist, and we can let the sea have them all."

That lone brow went up. Lowered again, as the young firebender glanced at his uncle; a sidelong look that might have been amused, if the situation weren't so dire.

The Grand Lotus cleared his throat. "In this case, old friend, damp does not mean wet. It is a vapor, much as fog or steam are. A part of air, that may indeed damp out a flame as swiftly as a glass bell."

If he hadn't been watching the boy, Pakku wouldn't have caught it. But he was, and that flinch of anger and betrayal was as visible as a drop of blood in clear water.

For once, Pakku was tempted to agree with a firebender. Old friends weren't supposed to help invade your city. Yes, by Sokka's account, Iroh had helped save the Moon Spirit, by telling Princess Yue she bore its grace and so some of its life. But Pakku couldn't shake the conviction that if General Iroh hadn't advised Zhao on how to carry out his invasion, then maybe, just perhaps...

Chief Arnook was proud, and strong. But the loss of his only daughter had torn at his soul; and the loss of his only heir made the Northern Tribe's future dangerously precarious. One lucky shot at Arnook before he and the tribe's elders could settle on an acceptable adoptive heir, and his people would turn on each other when they most needed to fight as one.

"Sun-damp is unusual," Iroh went on; expression so mild, Pakku knew the firebender had caught his frown. "It is not poisonous, though breathing it will not sustain life. It does not burn, even though it is found in some vents of natural gas. But most important of all, it is light. Much lighter than even hot air." Iroh's brows rose. "So light, even sheathing a war balloon in ice might not sink it. So you may have a problem, old friend. The sacks of sun-damp that lift a war balloon are as vulnerable to ice as any ship's sails. But first, that ice must reach them."

Pakku opened his mouth to object... and closed it, long mustaches bristling, as he recalled the slim reports the White Lotus had had of Ozai's airships. Yes, waterbenders could fling razor ice high and far. Hundreds of feet high? Thousands? They might have a problem. "Hmph." He gave Zuko a long look, from eyes that had stared into the midnight sun. "Your father's spent years plotting to crush the world under his heel. And you think you can drag him back to earth?"

"Maybe I can't." Pale gold was colder than ice. "But I have people who trained to hit a flying target. And if the war balloons rise out of our range... then they're in Temple territory." The young man didn't blink as he turned away from Pakku, toward the crippled youngster in his odd wheeled chair. "What do you think?"

"I think I really hope Aang and everybody got to the war balloons first." Teo gripped the arms of his chair, pale but determined. "If he didn't... I want to know a lot more about sun-damp. But we already know the most important thing. What's in those balloons may be light, but it's still air."

As if that matters, Pakku almost said, the Avatar's not-

The Avatar wasn't the only airbender anymore.

Even more than the yāorén, that idea made his head hurt.

Pakku folded his hands together, fingers tapping against each other in calculated antagonism. "And you think you can train Earth-born mountain-clingers to shape the wind, with nothing more than old scrolls and luck."

"Guess so." Teo gripped one wheel, tilting it back a little to give Pakku a look as stubborn as Katara's before she'd done her untrained best to flatten him. "Why, are you offering anything else? Langxue's helping us out. So air and water aren't that far apart."

Willowbark tea. He needed some. Soon.

"I've heard you're the master of the waterspout," Zuko said dryly. "That's air and water. You probably could help them. If you felt like climbing up a mountain, instead of down into caves after a musty old archive."

"That musty old archive holds knowledge that could set the world back on the right track," Pakku stated, eyes narrowed. Did this young scamp of a firebender actually think he could prick a master's pride into helping his ragged band? "It lasted through one eruption. We can't count on it surviving another."

"You want to get White Lotus archives somewhere safe." Zuko flattened his hands on the table. "I agree. Losing that information once helped start this whole mess. But it is on my land, and some of my people are yāorén. Including one of the yāorén whose past life died to mark that cache. I want copies."

"Copies? Of every document in there?" Pakku glared at him. "There's not enough time."

"Not even if we had a battalion of print-carvers ready to go," the prince agreed. "But you have time to make copies of some of it. Do it. And give me the name of someone who will be obligated to deliver copies of the rest, if we survive." Pale gold never wavered. "Do that, and I will have no problems with the White Lotus taking the archive into their care."

"The name of..." Pakku trailed off, struck by a sudden foreboding.

And the young man was quick, for all his stubbornness; pale gold narrowing at Pakku for just a moment, before he turned to the firebender beside him. "Uncle. Is there something I should know?"

"Oh, many things," Iroh stalled, stroking his beard.

Pakku kept his expression locked in a scowl, even when he wanted to bury his face in his hands. He didn't know. The most powerful man in the White Lotus is sitting right beside him, and he didn't know. Tui and La, he wanted to frost Iroh. We're doomed.

"Sir!" A runner burst in; one of the Fire sailors, from the color of his clothes. "Sky bison, headed this way!"

"What do you mean, the invasion fleet's coming right over us?"

One of these days, Sokka thought, studying a colorful layout of the northern coast plus Asagitatsus caldera and the Northern Air Temple, he had to find out who'd drummed it into Zuko's head to always have a map. And give them a big hug.

...Unless it was Ozai. He didn't think it was Ozai, sounded a little too practical for the guy who wanted to take over the whole world. But who knew?

"Okay, we're going off Aang's maps. Could be way out of date," Sokka admitted. "There was this one place with an ice spring... eh, never mind." And if Toph were here, he'd get a poke in the ribs for that. But Toph had been corralled by Katara into Fire Sage-wrangling; it'd taken all Katara's persuasion and an earthbender's stubbornness to get Shiyu to walk those last few feet into a water-healer's den. Even though he needed it. Apparently prisons weren't good for your health. And given how bad sea-sickness had hit Shiyu afterward... well, Katara wasn't going to let the chance to consult with another healer go to waste. Even if she didn't agree with Amaya about betrothal necklaces, or Fire Nation princes, or - well, much of anything. "But those maps worked for us to get all kinds of places, and if Aang's right about the winds coming from the way air just likes to move over the world, well - that shouldn't have changed much in a hundred years, right?"

"Not unless Toph got a few of her Earth Rumble buddies to pull up a new mountain chain." Suki tapped a fan she'd gotten from somewhere against the outer ring of the caldera. "He said the high wind-road cuts right across there, right?"

"More like... there. More or less." Sokka sketched the curve of up and down Aang had shown them; maybe not straight over Dragons' Wings, but Aang had said the wind-roads could be pretty wide.

For a moment, Zuko looked as though he wanted to breathe fire. But he just took a slow, deliberate breath, and kneaded the side of his temples above his scar. "...Damn."

Suki frowned at him. He looks almost as bad as the day he shunned Aang. Though maybe a little less wet. "You didn't know?"

"I don't think anybody here has flown that high," Zuko said plainly. "Nobody in the Temple even knew they could airbend two months ago. Before that, they were gliding on the hot air from Asagitatsu's vents. The higher you go, the less lift you've got." He grimaced. "I knew you could find faster winds at altitude, but I had no idea where they went."

He stared at the map again. Suki frowned, more than willing to jump in with more questions-

Sokka shook his head. Wait, he mouthed.

"...Thanks. For the warning."

Sokka pushed back in his chair, keeping his face open and serious. An alliance needed honesty on both sides. After that mess with General Fong... well, he figured Zuko would listen to blunt, plain self-interest a long time before he'd believe any pretty speeches. "Hey, we're here for a reason. Make that a couple of 'em. One, Aang said he wasn't sure he knew what he was doing with the storm, and if things went a little sideways he might get blown a long way. He figured if we met up here, we'd at least have someplace safe to catch our breath. Two..." Sokka had to brace himself for this one. "If Aang's lost out there, we'd need a spirit miracle to find him. Now, this is Aang. We might get one. But the last time Aang went down in a storm he froze solid for a hundred years, and if the World Spirit decides it's taking another time-out - and heck, it might, we told Aang about Asagitatsu and if the Avatar State took him over it might figure the best thing is to just take a nap while the volcano blows its top. Forget about the rest of us; if the World Spirit thought it was that important to keep people from dying Aang would have woken up a long time ago..."

He had to stop. He had to not think about Mom. Because that wasn't Aang's fault, and it wasn't Zuko's fault... and it wasn't his fault, either.

The Fire Lord's fault? Oh yeah. Definitely. Which kind of made him look forward to this...

Or not. Not really.

"Stopping that fleet is up to us," Sokka stated. "And if we're going to stop the Fire Lord, we'd better hit him before the Day of the Comet."

Zuko gave him a long, cold look. "Asagitatsu's still under pressure. If firebenders fight here, if they drop bombs the way they did on your invasion fleet - the whole caldera could go off."

"Yeah," Sokka said quietly. "I know that." He had to look down at the map, matching colors and lines to the fields and houses and fish-drying sheds they'd flown over on Appa. Just the smell of salted fish had made his throat close up, it was so much like home. "I hate to say it, but you know Ozai better than any of us. If he brings a fleet over Dragons' Wings - what do you think's going to happen?"

"I think a lot of people are going to die." Zuko looked at the map again, and winced. Traced one of the caldera edges, fingers trailing up the map to the Northern Air Temple. "We have some ideas on how to take the airships down. Teo's got a few more, but they're risky. You've worked with the Mechanist's people before, and you know a lot more than I do about what an airbender can pull off and survive." He glanced up, and spread an empty hand. "Can you help them?"

Sokka tilted a raised eyebrow Suki's way. "Well, Commander? Want to meet a whole bunch of people just as crazy as Aang?" He frowned, still trying his best to look confident, suave, and debonair. "Bunch of airbenders. Doesn't quite work. Flight? Gaggle? Fluttery?"

From the way the Kyoshi Warrior covered a giggle with her hands, not quite. "Maybe we should ask them what they'd like to be called."

"Smarter than I am," Sokka said in an obvious whisper to the firebender. "Gran-Gran's never going to believe I got this lucky."

Which got a fan pitched over his head, but hey. He almost deserved that.

Despite himself, Zuko snickered.

"Yeah." Sokka stood, and cracked his spine back into line. "Let's do this."

"Rebels, scalawags, and the flotsam of Ba Sing Se." Pakku stepped down into the ancient archive, avoiding a moving stack of manuscripts that turned out to have a person under it. "Not exactly the people I pictured following the heir to the Dragon Throne."

"It would seem the spirits decided that the Dragon Throne will serve other purposes," Iroh acknowledged. Sighed, and gave his sour-tempered friend a look of shared amused tolerance. "Forgive my nephew. He did not take the Moon's gift well, or gracefully."

"I can't imagine why." Pakku strode between a crisscross of scroll cabinets to glare at the kadzhait's skull eye to eye socket. "He's only been told since he was ten that he'd be Fire Lord after his father. Including by you, who lived your life before Ba Sing Se as Azulon's own heir. Why in the world would he take that to heart?" The Water master scowled at the skull; tilting his head one way, then another, as if to test a long-dead monster's hunting instincts. "He was probably counting on the throne to save him from his insane sister."

"Sarcasm is a delicate garment, old friend." Iroh waved a dismissing hand; let us speak of more pressing matters. "It is appreciated by the discerning eye, yet it tears in careless company."

"Sarcasm?" Pakku didn't quite turn his back on ancient bones. "I read your letters, Iroh. I tried to be polite answering them when matters turned to your own family." He drew a breath, let it wisp away as frost. "Now, I'd say that was a mistake."

Iroh chuckled, missing the weight that would have made it look even more harmless. "You tried to be polite?"

Pakku turned from ancient ivory, and slapped one hand on a still-dusty scrollcase. "For once in your life, stop being impressed with how clever you are and open your eyes." Blue narrowed at him. "Healing may be women's work, but Yagoda consults me on some particularly tricky cases. When a young boy tells you his sister tried to smother him - Moon and Ocean, Iroh, it's possible that his sister tried to smother him."

Iroh held an old uncle's smile, never letting a trace of a grimace touch his face. Yes, certain members of his family were a bit less than completely sane. But how like water, to circle around the point. He waved at the shelves now growing empty. "And what has that to do with our current difficulties?"

Pakku's long mustaches flicked with an impatient huff. "What doesn't it have to do with them? I've been in our records; what few there are left from that long ago. Even the fragments make it clear the Great Spirits can't just draft another element's bender without permission. Given the odds of the Fire Lord's exiled son praying to the Moon Spirit for anything..." Pakku fixed him with a hard look. "Your nephew's not as quick as Sokka, but once he knows something's off, he seems to have a way of burning through obstacles to take it down. Sooner or later, he will know who gave La permission to meddle with his spirit. I wouldn't want to be you when he does."

A chill unease crept down his spine. Iroh glanced around the archive, but Pakku had picked his moment well. All the refugees who'd volunteered to help the White Lotus clear the archives were outside taking a break for food and tea, and the only other man in earshot was Tunerk. The younger waterbender didn't look happy to be overhearing this, but he was a junior Lotus as well as one of Chief Arnook's lesser headmen. He knew when to keep silent.

Iroh cleared his throat. "I admit, our current yāorén seem remarkably less than pious, given how close they are to the spirits-

"Of course they are." Pakku lifted a scroll from yet another stack, unrolling it an inch to skim the first few lines. "Chiefs believe. A hunter out on the ice believes. Those of us who have lost much to the spirits... they know." He rerolled the ancient paper, as if careful attention to each curve of ink would save the world. "It's easy to look over the ocean from a ship's deck and say how impressive a leopard-shark is. When you're struggling in the storm waves and a shape of fins and fangs is trying to tear you apart? No." Pakku stared at ancient bones. "No, I doubt your nephew will ever believe, Iroh. Not as you do. He's lost too much. And he won't sit idly by while you push him to lose more."

Iroh flexed his toes in his boots, itching to take a threatening step forward. But, no. Those wounds were well scarred; and if sometimes Lu Ten's death ached as if it had been yesterday, still, he was a master bender. And he had long since mastered himself. "Do you say I have not lost?"

Pakku tapped his fingers on another shelf, raising bright motes of dust. "Old friend. You lost your son to humans. Sad as that is, it happens." He swept an ancient cobweb out of a corner of old wood, looking more weary than angry. "You taught your nephew he was born to rule. And then your prayers destroyed any chance he had, Avatar or no Avatar." He nodded toward the stairs rising out into the sun. "Now these people have chosen to follow him. They need him, Iroh. I'm the farthest thing there is from a Fire master, but your nephew's volcano isn't exactly subtle about what she wants." Long fingers traced an arc in the air, as if to encompass all of the caldera. "And you think he'll abandon them to a hungry volcano - abandon people he's loyal to - to pack up and sail for the North Pole, because you say so?"

Iroh straightened to his full height, abandoning charm. "We are here when the Avatar needs us. Even my stubborn nephew sees that cannot be an accident. He is a responsible young man, chosen by the spirits. He will put the world's needs first."

"Will he. As he did when he killed his insane sister rather than let her live to become Ozai's heir?" Pakku said acidly. "Because Sokka tells me he's had the chance to do just that. Twice. Obviously, he hasn't. He's fought her. He's stopped her. But much as it scorches me to admit it, that young man is a waterbender. And Azula is family." The Water master advanced on him, eyes thin slits, as if he were staring across a dazzling snowfield. "And you expect your nephew to abandon his duties to protect his own people, so he can go to the Northern Water Tribe - who know very well he stole Avatar Aang away while your admiral attacked our guardian spirits - and fight his father?"

Iroh coughed into his fist. "That was not quite the way it happened-"

"Do you think Chief Arnook cares?" Pakku shook his head, like a komodo-rhino shaking away a pesky mosquito-hornet. "He lost his daughter, Iroh. And that wound's a bit fresher than Lu Ten."

"Your chief follows the will of the spirits," Iroh said firmly.

"Most of the time. But Arnook's human." Pakku didn't give an inch. "One slip. One careless word of who and what your nephew is to our people, and he's in the water and drowning. He may not be the sharpest blade in the armory but your nephew is not stupid."

Iroh allowed himself a glare. "The balance of the world requires-"

"Not stupid, and a waterbender. The day he fights his father without his own people's lives on the line is the day I take up lava-sculpting."

He was, Iroh decided, insulted. "Zuko is no longer loyal to Ozai," he said flatly. "He broke his loyalty to his father. It nearly cost him his life-"

"Do I need to toss you in a waterspout to wash out your ears?" Pakku crossed his arms, frost appearing where his fingers brushed his sleeves. "This isn't about loyalty. This is about family." The waterbender raised a white brow. "Though I wonder. You were on campaign when your brother was born; you spent most of his life burning down the Earth Kingdom. Have you ever thought of Ozai as family? Or was he just Azulon's spare, the luckless idiot who got stuck with the throne when you couldn't bear to be bothered anymore?"

For a moment, Iroh saw red. Heard a sudden silence, and tracked it to where Tunerik had ducked into a defensible corner, face pale and a waterskin in hand.

More sensible than his teacher, Iroh decided. "You go too far. Insane or not, enemy of the world or not, he is my brother."

"And he's Zuko's father." Pakku let the sneer fall away, face lined and sad. "Old friend. Take it from one who tried to teach the Avatar what not to do. There are things you can't ask of a man. Of anyone."

"There are things no human can ask, true. But Sozin's line wrought a grave injustice on the world, and Sozin's line must atone for that terrible wrong. Whatever you may think of Prince Zuko, he knows his duty." Iroh inclined his head, one old soldier to another. "And I know my nephew. This will work."

This isn't working.

Aang blinked sand out of gummy eyes, dragging in a breath that only tasted a little like sea spray. More like green trees, and hanging moss, and maybe a few birds... and oh monkey-feathers, he was glad to be breathing anything, the last time he'd gone one-on-one with lightning it'd taken Katara and Zuko to put him back together, and watching those two circle each other like leopard-sharks was scary-

Jungle. Solid ground under him. When the last thing he knew, he'd been falling out of the sky onto a sea full of ghost ships.

Where am I?

Chapter End Notes

When it comes to dealing with the spirits, the White Lotus masters and the yāorén are a bit like politicians versus beat cops. Politicians make stirring speeches, negotiate, ratify laws, etc. Cops have to deal with the squabbling neighbors, the law-breakers, and the inevitable body on the floor. And cops who deal with homicide (much less get shot at themselves) tend to end up with a very cynical attitude.

It took me a while to figure out, but one of the things that was blocking me is the darn airships. Fortunately or not, I happened to know something about rigid airships/dirigibles/zeppelins/pick your favorite term, before I ever saw ATLA. Which means... well. Long story short?

Hot air balloon does not equal airship.

Seriously. The fuel required to keep that much regular air hot, and lift the cabin mass, and the crew, and the bombs, and fly across the sea from the Fire Nation with no apparent chances to refuel... No. Not happening. Word of God says bending is not magic. Based on the amount of sustained bending we see in canon - no. Firebenders as the fuel for a small war balloon like Zuko steals in canon? Maybe. Might work. For the rigid airships, it just won't. You need a lifting gas, lighter than air. We generally have two good candidates, hydrogen and helium.

...I think we can all agree that gas bags full of hydrogen and cabins full of firebenders are a bad idea.

Believe it or not, helium is an option.

For over a century, we've extracted helium from natural gas wells using a series of techniques including fractional distillation (low temps and high pressures) and running the end result through activated charcoal.

Fire-breathing statues in town squares? Natural gas, check.

Coolers in Boiling Rock? Refrigeration and therefore low temps, check.

Coal-powered warships? Ability to create boilers capable of maintaining high pressures, check.

Activated charcoal... heck, if you can make steel, you've got this down.

So. It probably wouldn't be industrial-grade 99.9% pure helium like we use today. But pure enough to give good lift, yes. The main trick would be identifying helium as a separate gas in the first place. We first found it by examining spectral lines, studying the sun. In the Avatar 'verse... the characteristic that makes helium good for airships is the very thing firebenders would be able to latch onto to identify it. It'd be the parts of the gas vent that don't burn.

...Unless you're in the heart of a star, and I think we all agree firebenders aren't doing fusion. Or Azula would be even scarier.

Given all of the above, and a few firebenders with enough curiosity and time - yes. The Fire Nation could figure out helium as a separate, and very weird, gas. And they probably have been working on it for years. As Kryal pointed out, there is no plausible way you could make the jump from "can't make a hot air balloon work" in winter to "long-range working rigid airships" in that following summer.

Of course, airships brings home the "Fire Nation are Germany expies" idea even more, given bombs from airships launched a London Blitz most of us have probably never heard of... starting in January 1915, WWI.

Some books of interest:

Dr. Eckener's Dream Machine: The Great Zeppelin and the Dawn of Air Travel, by Douglas Botting.

Sky Ships: A History of the Airship in the United States Navy, by William F. Althoff.
Zeppelin! Germany and the Airship, 1900-1939, by Guillame de Syon.

Steampunk fans, write your congressman. Save the Strategic Helium Reserve!

Chapter 85

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"I am in so much trouble." Aang groaned, rubbing at his sore arrow. Although it was more like sore everything. He didn't feel as bad as he had after Azula had zapped him; nothing had ever felt as bad as waking up after Azula's lightning. But every once in a while his muscles just seemed to want to twitch, like the sneakiest all-over case of the hiccups ever.

Which kind of made sense. Master Gyatso had told him hiccups happened when the muscles in your diaphragm got into an argument with your brain about when you were supposed to be breathing. And sometimes the only way to get them both to agree was to hold your breath as long as you could, so both sides got the idea they were supposed to quit it already-

Aang thumped the back of his head against a mossy tree, startled. "A hundred years without the Avatar. I was in the ice. I wasn't... breathing."

Weird thought. Crazy as Bumi. But if Master Gyatso and Guru Pathik and everybody were right, and the four nations were supposed to be balanced - the Fire Nation trying to take over the world was one big hiccup.

"Well, if holding your breath doesn't work," Aang grumbled, "next thing to try is one big scare-"

No. No, I've got to stop kidding myself.

"I'm not just blasting away war balloons." Aang hugged himself, vaguely wondering why his clothes weren't all scratchy. Dry, he could understand; he'd hit the water, but he was out of it now. And... well, who knew how long he'd been out of it, period. Plenty of time to dry out. But why weren't his clothes all salty?

And... that was avoiding the hard part. Again.

Aang took a deep breath, and tried again. "If I was just blasting war balloons, then... then Ozai wouldn't have stopped me. Because... if it was just balloons, then he wouldn't have been there..."

There are people on those balloons.

And he had to accept that. He had to remember that. Because Air was about truth. A bender had to know why he was bending, if he wanted the wind to answer. And if he tried to tell himself he was just blasting balloons, he was lying.

...Which made him want to shiver and shake, even in air rainforest-warm. Air Monks weren't supposed to lie. It shouldn't be possible.

But I did. Even for just a little while, I did. And that was... awful.

Almost as awful as the truth. He couldn't stop the balloons without killing the people. Maybe the Avatar was supposed to be detached, but he was a master airbender first, and bending the wind to take down those balloons was tricky bending to start with, and any bending just got harder when it was tangled up with your emotions. And there was no way bending the wind to take the fleet down wasn't going to make him a shaking mess, because he didn't want to kill those people. Even if they were part of the Fire Army. Even if they wanted to melt the whole North Pole. He wanted to stop them. But he didn't want to kill them. He didn't want to kill anybody. Not even Ozai.

And the thought that the only way he could stop Ozai was to kill a whole balloon crew, people who might be like Zuko before Toph had dragged him off on an adventure, maybe even some firebender who might not be a good guy but maybe thought he was doing the right thing... it just made him sick.

It's wrong. It's just - all wrong.

And it wasn't fair. His nightmares had always had Ozai as... well, kind of a festival play monster. Bandy legs and beady eyes in a beard, with fire all over the place. Not a real person at all. Not a man, like Zhao or Long Feng or even the mayor of Chin Village. Not even a crazy person like Azula; maybe she was spooky and awful and evil, but if Ozai was her teacher then she was doing what her teacher wanted. And... Aang kind of understood that. A little.

Funny. He knew Ozai had taught Azula. But somehow, his nightmares had never zapped him with lightning.

"Maybe that's 'cause I can't remember the lightning," Aang muttered to himself. "I know she did it, I kind of sorta remember her with sparks all around her - but I can't remember it. It was just Ba Sing Se and then the beach and... gah." He thumped his head back against the trunk again. "Monkey-feathers. No wonder Toph got so grr argh trying to teach me. I can't even stay on one track when I'm trying."

And the track was that Ozai was a person. Just like everybody else.

...Okay, maybe not just like everybody else. Normal people didn't hit their own soldiers with lightning to get an enemy.

Aang shuddered, remembering the chaos of the Earth Army after Iroh had zapped General Gang. Remembering the smell; seared meat and ozone and death. Iroh had taken out a whole bunch of Earth Kingdom soldiers to make sure he got Gang. And Iroh was one of the good guys. Mostly.

Ozai... really wasn't a good guy. Which meant - Aang shivered just thinking about it - maybe he didn't care how many of his own guys he fried. Just as long as he got the one he was aiming for.

Me.

He really didn't want to think about that. He'd never wanted to be the Avatar. It wasn't right for someone to try to kill him because - well, not because of anything he'd done. Just because he was there.

Aang laced his fingers together, hands gripping his thoughts before they could slip again. Because it was just so easy, so Air, to slip away from an awful here-and-now to a better future. A future where everything had been fixed. Where it was fair.

"But I'm the Avatar." Aang watched his knuckles pale. "If I have to balance the elements, then I can't just have the future. I have to have the past, and what didn't happen, and now."

And part of now was - he couldn't look Ozai in the eye and kill him. He couldn't.

"It doesn't even make sense to try!" Aang flung up his hands, thoroughly frustrated with the world, the spirits, and everybody who'd waited a hundred years for the Avatar rather than fix their own problems. Because the Fire Lord wasn't a spirit problem. He was a human problem. The only spirits in this mess right now were local ones like Hei Bai and the Painted Lady; spirits who were ticked off because their little patch of the world wasn't right. Agni and Yue and the other Great Spirits - they were just pulling strings in the shadows. Like puppet masters, letting their human dolls take all the risks and the pain... and oh, he was so messed up if he was comparing the Great Spirits to someone as dark as Hama-

Someone like Koh?

Aang smacked himself in the forehead, wishing Sokka was here to do it for him. Wishing anyone was here to do it. "Argh! How can I figure out whose butt I really ought to kick when I can't even figure out where I am?"

Well, that was something he ought to be able to fix. Maybe his glider was a charred mess somewhere, but he could still climb.

Look out birds, here I come!

Three branch-dodges and a mouthful of leaves later, he was swaying at the top of a tree. Okay, jungle, more jungle, ocean, and it was kind of weird to see jungle wherever he'd washed up, he'd swear he was farther north than that-

Wait. Those waves didn't look right.

Aang frowned, squinting at the sun-dazzled water. The waves just didn't look like water against a shore. More like the way water had splashed together behind the big Fire Nation ship he'd been on with Hakoda and everybody, he hoped Hakoda had made it to the North Pole okay, he missed them...

I'm on an island. Islands don't move. What the heck?

Maybe he'd hit his head when he got zapped? He did feel sore. Even if he didn't feel any sorer on his head than anywhere else.

Aang rubbed it to be sure, and shook his head. Nothing seemed to slosh around, he wasn't dizzy. He didn't think he'd hit his head.

But how can an island be moving?

Frowning, Aang skidded back down the tree trunk to thump his toes against the ground. "Duh. If there's an earthbender around here somewhere, they could do it. They'd have to be as good as Toph, but - hey! Maybe the guys found me-"

The ground didn't feel right.

Curious, Aang widened his stance. Closed his eyes, and stomped his foot, listening.

Roots and earth and... not earth. Not anything like rock. Or metal, or ice, or anything that would bend.

"If it's not rock, then... maybe it really is moving," Aang muttered.

Which meant whatever he was on, it wasn't an island. So what was it?

"One way to find out." He pointed himself toward the ocean, and started running.

Splash.

And ack. The water was just as cold as it should be, if he was still near where he'd hit the ocean. So why was the air tropical above the shore-?

Something huge swooshed past him, black and rugged as a wall of lava. The current tossed him easily as a waterfall would a stray leaf, twisting down and down into dark water...

Use the twist. Work with the water!

Aang spun himself in the current, spiraling back up to the surface like a reverse whirlpool. Coughing, he tread water. "Whoof, that was close- ah!"

The current yanked at him again. Aang pulled a layer of ice under him, and ran for it.

Back on the shore, Aang squinted at the pattern of waves. The ones over here seemed to match that weird current, a steady rhythm that fit that moving wall, regular as oars, or fins...

No way.

He'd seen the statues. And sketches in Wan Shi Tong's library. But no one had ever seen a live one. Not in a thousand years.

Not since Avatar Yangchen died.

Airbenders from an Earth village. Waterbenders on Kyoshi Island. Firebenders hiding in Ba Sing Se. Just because he couldn't see it, didn't mean it wasn't there.

There was a warm feeling in his chest. Something Aang hadn't felt in months. Something he'd left on a terrible shore near Ba Sing Se, and never quite picked up again.

Ice-surfing halfway around the island, Aang dove into cold waves.

The water was faintly milky, little creatures scattering light to cast the massive form he sought in darkest shadow. But Aang felt the maelstrom of a slow blink, saw enormous amber eyes fix on him-

Bigger than the Wani, a webbed claw lifted him toward the light.

Aang breathed in as they breached the surface, watching torrents of seawater run from the edge of a shell like waterfalls. "Um. Hi?"

"Little brother." The Lion-Turtle's voice thrummed through his bones like thunder. "It has been a long time... since another bender sought my counsel."

"I could use anybody's help right now," Aang admitted. "But I'm not really your little brother." Er. As far as he knew, anyway. "Am I?"

"You bear within you the Spirit of the World. My kind were its first mortal children. So we are kin."

"Wow. You're that old?" Aang looked at the waves still foaming under them; evidently the Lion-Turtle had no problem swimming with just three feet. "I guess you saw this whole mess get started, huh?"

"Hmm." A few ponderous strokes. "I saw Avatar Kesuk fall. Some might say that was the beginning."

"...Really, really old," Aang managed. "You were there? What happened?"

Two strokes. Three. "The Avatar is human. And sometimes, humans go mad." A long, slow exhalation. "The Avatar is spirit. And when spirits are injured by humans... there is always a cost."

"But..." Aang swallowed. "If she went crazy... I've seen what the Avatar Spirit can do when I'm not in control of it. It's scary. It can kill people. They had to stop her!"

"There is always a cost." Waves and wind and silence. "Even for what is right."

Aang opened his mouth. And closed it. And felt like steam ought to be coming out of his ears. "Great. That's just great. And now that cost has got a whole nation gone crazy, and how the heck am I supposed to fight that?" He flung up his arms, automatically keeping his balance on slick scales. "Avatar Kyoshi stopped Chin the Conqueror, sure - but all she had to do was stop Chin. One guy. Spirits are what I'm supposed to deal with. Not Ozai. Not the Fire Nation. Spirits. And the balance of the world. If all the Fire Lords since Sozin have been trying to conquer the world..."

Quiet. Just the shush and hiss of water being churned by massive flipper-paws, as the Lion-Turtle waited patiently.

Aang blinked. "If all the Fire Lords since Sozin have been trying to conquer the world, then Ozai's not the real problem."

He could feel the Lion-Turtle's breath through his bones, like a silent earthquake.

"...I'm going to have to think about that," Aang said quietly. "But even if Ozai's not the problem... I've got to stop him from melting the Northern Water Tribe into the ocean. Or a lot of people are going to die, and nothing's going to get fixed."

"The Spirit of the World is a source of life." The Lion-Turtle seemed to slow, breath suddenly visible as frost as his flipper-paw lifted higher. "Find your answers here."

Wobbling, Aang stepped off onto blue ice. "Whoa, wait, wait, where am-?"

More blue ice rose in the distance, shaped and formed into a soaring wall. One circle centered in the highest arch, bearing the stylized waves of the Water Tribe.

"...Oh."

Zuko eyed Lt. Sadao. Whose expression was sinking fast, from eager helpfulness to about as miserable as a junior officer could get and still be alive. Took a deliberate breath, trying to enjoy the salt air on the docks rather than twitch as he watched the White Lotus pack up as much as they could of the archive onto a wooden, flammable, breakable Water Tribe ship. It wasn't as if Dragons' Wings' lord was lacking in other things to worry about. In the satchel he had slung over his shoulder was a whole sheaf of paperwork he was trying to commit to memory: a map of the current volcanic vents, Teo's estimates of how much pressure was left in Asagitatsu, and rough sketches of the current aerial defenses being set up. Sketches that were almost as rough as the defensive measures themselves; he knew all too well that even with Sokka cackling madly as he dove into helping bang devices together, everything they had was slapdash, makeshift, and mostly put together with a lot of string and good intentions. Just the thought of how they'd stored fire-ice underwater in stone to have it when they needed it had worry gnawing at Zuko's gut. Hopefully they'd designed the stone vaults to leak slowly rather than blow, and any stray gasses should just get caught up in the flames already burning over the harbor. But if Ozai's airships dropped a bomb in just the wrong place...

So Zuko sat on his temper, and picked his next words very carefully. "I'm going where?"

Sadao winced. "Sir..."

"Since when?"

"It was... very sudden, sir..."

"Oh, I'll just bet it was."

Behind the lieutenant, Seaman Saburo murmured to his hawk, and tossed her up to fly.

"Seaman?" Zuko said pointedly.

"Nothing kills sailors faster than screwed-up command chains, sir." The seaman shrugged. "Sent the captain a note that somebody slipped up."

"Somebody slipped, all right," Zuko growled. And he wanted to march onto Master Pakku's ship and straighten someone out with his bare hands...

Stop. Think. On that ship is where Uncle... no, where White Lotus General Iroh wants you. So that's the last place you want to be.

And it hurt to think that. Like saltwater on a burn. Uncle Iroh wasn't Azula.

But the situation jangled down all his nerves, and he'd have to be dead to ignore the similarities. Appeal to family. Appeal to duty. And a ship that was not and would not be under his command.

Stepping onto that deck might not be as stupid as running the blockade after Aang on the Solstice. But he wasn't going to count on it. "Lieutenant. General Iroh is on that ship?"

He could see the lump in Sadao's throat as the man gulped. "He was ten minutes ago, sir."

Zuko nodded once. "Convey my respects," he deliberately pitched his voice to carry, "and inform General Iroh I would like to speak to him at his earliest convenience." Thank Agni for military formalities. You could stamp down a lot of fury in icily polite language.

...Which, knowing firebenders, was probably the point.

"No need." Iroh stepped out into plain view on the deck, a gracious smile splitting his beard. "Perhaps we could discuss this over tea?"

And for one instant Zuko couldn't help but see the Fire Nation's red-and-black above Azula's ship, a so-called honor guard waiting to take them as prisoners...

Breathe. Just breathe.

He blinked, and made himself see wood, and blue pennants, and curious Water Tribe sailors finding other places on deck to be. "I don't think so," Zuko said evenly. Civil. He was going to be civil, as befit a great name. "It'd be very inconvenient if your ship should happen to slip its moorings while we were discussing this."

That set Iroh's teeth on edge; Zuko could see it in the slightest crease of a frown around gold eyes. "I admit, Master Pakku's ship will wish to take advantage of the tide. But surely we have time for a polite conversation."

And that politeness would drag him around and around in circles until Iroh got what he wanted. No. "You might. I don't." Keep it civil. "I'm not leaving."

Iroh leaned on the railing, taking a deep, patient breath. "We have discussed this."

"No, we haven't." Facts. Stick to facts. "Sokka and Aang think the invasion fleet is going to take the high wind-road-"

"Impressive as the young man is, Sokka is not trained in logistics." Iroh drummed fingers on the railing. "Onsenzakura is the closest secure colony to the Northern Water Tribe. You know yourself that the currents travel there. Those are the winds nearest the surface; those are the ones my brother and his men will know of."

Headache. He had one already. "Uncle. You don't know that."

"It is the only sensible-"

"What the hell about this entire year has been sensible?" Damn it, keep a grip! "You taught me to always make sure I considered every line of attack. If the invasion does go by way of Onsenzakura, and you and the other White Lotus masters head for the North Pole to fend it off - fine. You're masters. They need you. But I am not a master." You drummed that into my head often enough. "Up there I'm just one more half-trained bender. But if Sokka is right, and the fleet comes this way - Asagitsatsu's still touch and go. They need me here."

"Master Piandao has surely begun his pupil on the arts of war as well as of the sword," Iroh said patiently. "But I believe I have a bit more experience in these matters."

Which... made no sense. "Who in world has experience with airships?" Zuko said pointedly. "Oh, wait - that might be the people who've been working on them the past three years, while we were chasing a phantom no one had seen in a century?" He shook his head. "Sokka's been on that flying furball for half a year straight. When it comes to air tactics, I think he knows what he's talking about."

...Which was a mistake, he knew that even as he said it. Iroh straightened, and gave him the look of a disappointed teacher. "Nephew. You are well aware, amateurs study tactics. Professionals study logistics."

I am right, and you are the failing amateur. Agni, he'd seen that look so often.

And it was one look too many, on top of a lifetime of looks, and he just couldn't take it anymore. "You just can't let it go." Zuko's fingers curled; he barely felt nails prick his palms. "You can't believe my father found an opening that you didn't!"

"There is no opening-"

"Yes, there is! The high wind-road is up there. And if the invasion follows that road, the Fire Lord can hit three things he hates in one day! The Northern Water Tribe. The Earth Kingdom. And me." Breathe in. Hold, before he started firing off sparks just because. And out. "Screw logistics, Uncle. A chance to hit one target efficiently, versus commandeering every soldier in sight to grind all of your opponents into the dust one more time? I know my family."

"No, you do not." Iroh shook his head, as if he couldn't even believe they were having this conversation. "You left the Fire Nation as a child. A child in anger and pain, long before your father could show you the depth of his knowledge. I have been there since my brother was born. I know his training. He will focus on the one target he must destroy to set the balance of the world forever awry; the birthplace of the next Avatar." He thumped a fist into his palm, eyes shadowed. "But he will not prevail. We will defend the Northern Water Tribe. Sozin's line will not fail the world again!"

A child. That's all he... Zuko felt himself start to tremble. Swallowed hard, and held himself steady with all the will years of surviving had trained into him. Don't fight fire with fire. Sidestep. Redirect. "So repaying the damage Great-Grandfather did to the balance of the world is more important than anything else."

Iroh sighed, fingers patting the railing in relief. "I knew you would understand, nephew."

Yes. I do. And he didn't know whether to set the whole dock on fire or fold into a cold, bereft ball of misery.

Can't do either. People need me...

His men needed him. Men like Lt. Sadao, and Seaman Saburo, all but holding their breath as they watched this play out. Because until it did, they didn't know who to follow-

General Iroh. Interfered. With my chain of command.

Zuko focused on that, and not the cold wailing in his heart. Snapped his fingers, letting sparks cascade to the dock. "Lieutenant. See that General Iroh and his associates have all they need to depart."

In the midst of turning away, Iroh's head whipped back toward him.

"I understand," Zuko said, letting the words cut bone-deep. "I understand that even the Dragon of the West can fail to properly calculate his strategic options. Because I am not Lu Ten. And you are not going to sacrifice my people to fix the damage you did to the world as Azulon's general!"

Iroh's jaw worked a moment, soundless. "Zuko-"

Don't let him recover. You can't. "You think Lu Ten's death served some greater purpose. Wake up!" Zuko snarled. "The spirits don't care that much!"

Iroh drew a Crown Prince's dignity around him like formal robes. "You have no right to say such things!"

"You're right," Zuko said icily. "I don't. I am exiled. Outcast. Disinherited. Which means I am officially banned from repaying any penance Sozin might owe the spirits. Whatever I do? Even if I saved the Avatar's life? It won't count." He gestured at the dock, the harbor, the rough buildings behind them. "All I can do is what the spirits have left me. I am the great name of Dragons' Wings. I will not abandon my people."

A thread of smoke drifted from the railing. "You cannot abandon your duty to the spirits-"

"The White Lotus does not command here." His head hurt. His heart hurt. And he could feel the trembling in fire and waves, as Asagitsatsu sensed the threat of leaving. But he had to draw the line. Here. Now. He had to succeed where Azulon and Ozai had failed, and pin down the man who'd made skating out of inconvenient loyalties the center of his life.

Oh. Great. Like I'm ever going to pull that off.

But... it didn't matter if he did. So long as everyone around him knew where Iroh's loyalty wasn't.

"I am the Lord of Dragons' Wings," Zuko stated. "Either you are loyal to me, or you are loyal to the White Lotus. Choose."

A few yards away, Captain Jee held his ground with an effort. He'd dropped down from Suzuran's decks to the dock as soon as he'd seen the hawk coming, he didn't need a message to read that angry set of the prince's shoulders-

I wasn't fast enough.

Then again, maybe no one could have been fast enough. The gauntlet Zuko had just thrown down - declare your loyalty - was the kind no one walked away from without blood, death, and fire...

Iroh was silent.

Zuko drew a sharp breath. Nodded once; a short, tight movement that had Jee biting back the foulest curses a sailor knew. He'd seen that stiffness before. If General Iroh tried to argue his case now, while the prince was as word-lost as a dragon-child could be-

Zuko turned on his heel, and stalked away.

Jee exhaled in pure relief. Good. He knew he was in trouble. Now, if I can just get Teruko to sit on him until his words come back...

Except there was a more critical problem, still standing in shock on the Northern Tribe ship's gangplank.

Bad as he looks right now, the prince will just walk it off, or finds something that needs breaking. If I let General Iroh run around loose, after he's failed to claim loyalty here...

Well. That would be bad.

Drawing himself up to his best parade stance, Jee nodded respectfully; loyal sailor of the clan, to a visiting lord. "General Iroh. If you and your allies hope to reach the Northern Water Tribe before the Comet, I think you need to leave. Now."

Waves, and the wind.

Pakku eyed the solitary figure at the railing, whom everyone else was very carefully working around. "I tried to tell you. You asked a waterbender to leave his tribe and fight his family-"

"...Do not speak to me."

No fool, Pakku fell silent.

Chapter End Notes

I haven't been able to track down a more technical term for it than the "Joan of Arc advantage." In short, when a new technology is introduced on the battlefield, young officers and amateurs are likely to be able to use it to walk all over experienced generals who've never used the stuff before. This was one of the reasons Joan was so effective; cannon were a recent introduction on the battlefields of the Hundred Years War, and she used them to devastating effect.

Iroh is an experienced general. But he's an experienced general who's never used airships to fight. While Sokka has flown on Appa since the start of winter, and faced Ozai's use of airships on the Day of Black Sun. It's not only possible that Sokka has a better read on the upcoming fight than Iroh, it's likely.

On top of everything Iroh doesn't know about airships in combat, he's now reached the moment he's prepared himself for since he broke the siege of Ba Sing Se. Seven years of dedication, of turning the darkest day in his life into a hoped-for triumph. When something you want that badly is in your reach, you tend to lose sight of everything else; witness Zuko chasing Aang. And under stress, people tend to fall back on old habits. Unfortunately, even in canon, Iroh has a habit of manipulating Zuko for his own good. Mix that with Zuko's reflexive paranoia (if you can call it paranoia, when everything really is out to get you), and boom.

And there's nothing uglier than a serious fight between two people who love each other.

Chapter 86

Chapter Notes

Warning, Azula being creepifying.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"What's going on?" Suki demanded as the four of them plus one worried lemur headed down the rough road toward Suzuran.

"When you find out, tell me," Sokka said grimly. So far they'd heard at least six versions of what had gone down before the Northern Tribe ship had hoisted anchor. Iroh and Zuko had had a fight. Somebody'd disowned somebody else because of the waterbending - which seemed kind of unlikely given Iroh had married a waterbender. Some kind of evil spirit had swooped up out of the archive, turned all the people on the ship into undead pirates, and swept out to sea cackling about rum...

That old busybody, Katara had been able to set straight with a vivid description of Iroh flinging fire at Zhao's mooks at the North Pole, and a few choice words about Water Tribe pirates that had pinned the old gossip's ears back. But the simple fact she'd had to say it meant things had gone very, very wrong.

So now they were heading to get the closest thing to the truth Sokka thought they'd hear from anybody here. All the while crossing his fingers that this was the right call.

We could still head north and meet up with Dad... no. I believe in Aang. Ozai's going to hit here first.

"We could still fly out and catch Master Pakku to ask," Suki pointed out as they hurried.

"No. That wouldn't look good." Katara shook her head. "We're not just Aang's friends. People see us as speaking for the Avatar. Even when it makes no sense. Aang can tell them he disagrees with us all the time. But right now Aang's... not here. And if we're going to help him when he gets here, we need the people here to believe in him. If there was a fight - Zuko's here. He's the one we have to deal with. And everyone fights better when they trust their chief." She hesitated in her stride, casting a worried look at Toph.

"Trust him, don't trust him," the earthbender grumbled. "Make up your mind. The mountain feels twitchy, but she's not going off."

Pale as Toph was, Sokka knew she had to have been worried about the volcano finally blowing its stack. Which would suck. A lot.

But they'd hit the rock-studded mix of a dock Suzuran was anchored at, and there was just the guy Sokka was looking for. In full, neat uniform, speaking softly to a healer in dark green, and not looking at all like he thought the harbor might geyser up flaming lava any second now. "Captain Jee," Sokka hailed him. "We've been hearing a lot of rumors... um."

"You're not the only one." Amaya looked tired, dark circles under her eyes and a blue shawl over her shoulders, as if she felt the breeze more keenly than they did. "Captain. Iroh swore he discussed this with my nephew."

"It's possible he may have mentioned it," Jee allowed. "In the middle of juggling logistics ledgers, Prince Zuko is likely to say mmph to just about anything. But I feel I must point out, milady, that Langxue is up at the Temple with the gliders, Lt. Teruko is overseeing defensive emplacements, and General Iroh timed his request for when he knew Agent Shirong would be busy coordinating the vent-bending." The captain paused, and lowered his voice. "I know the prince hates to be crowded. And here..." He gestured at a plume of flames rising from the harbor waves. "I thought it would be safe to give him some time to breathe. I'm sorry to say the general probably calculated that I'd do that."

Amaya sighed.

"So he made sure Zuko was alone. Go figure," Toph said impatiently. "What happened?"

"I haven't spoken to the prince directly yet." Gray brows drew down as Jee stared across the water to the harbor mouth. "He's in no shape to talk."

Amaya winced.

"But from what I did overhear, and what Lt. Sadao told me..." Jee bent his gaze on Sokka. "You believe that Fire Lord Ozai will bring the airship fleet by way of the high wind-road, and strike Dragons' Wings on his way to burn out the Northern Tribe."

"Aang showed us the map," Katara jumped in before Sokka could consider his answer. "He's a master airbender. I know he's right!"

"Prince Zuko agrees with you," Jee nodded. "Unfortunately, General Iroh doesn't." He glanced at Amaya. "To speak in the general's favor, milady, by most tactical considerations he would be right. Heading for the North Pole by way of Onsenzakura would give the Fire Lord a known and trustworthy source of supply, with a relatively short air route to the field of engagement. It makes sense. Especially if - as General Iroh appears to believe - the Fire Lord intends to wipe out the people most likely to harbor the next Avatar."

"How can you just say that, like it doesn't matter to the world that the Avatar would be..." Katara trailed off, narrowing her eyes at the firebender. "What do you mean, if?"

"We've all heard of the swampbenders by now," Jee shrugged. "If you think fighting on ice is bad, let me tell you, swamps are worse. Everything's wet, your armor rots off you, and there are cat-gators out to eat you every time you turn around. Unless the Fire Lord splits off a division of airships just to deal with the Foggy Swamp on the same day as the North Pole, he knows he won't get all the waterbenders. If, again, he's after the Avatar at all." Jee glanced at the Suzuran's moorings, as if he were completely absorbed in every twist of knotted ropes. "There's always the possibility that-"

"Don't say it!"

Sokka grimaced. "Katara. I know it's awful. And he's tough. But we have to..."

Katara shuddered, deliberately moving her hand away from her waterskin. "Aang's fine. He's just late."

"I hope so," Jee said quietly. "In short - if the clash of the spirits is the most important thing on Fire Lord Ozai's mind, then yes. The general is correct. His approach to the defense of the North would be valid. But I was in command of the Wani when we first encountered the Avatar. I know who was sleeping, and who was burning the midnight oil trying to track down a flying foe. After what we all saw, chasing you into the heart of a hurricane - we know the winds are different high up. And Nara, where they mine sun-damp from the gas, was hit by a horrendous storm only a few years ago. They'd know it too."

Sokka raised a finger; wait, clarify that. "Sun-damp's that gas Teo was talking about when we went up there, right? Lighter than air... which is really, really weird to think about. And you mine it?" He grumbled something even he didn't understand under his breath. "Man, I wish we'd known that before Aang flew off. Maybe it would have helped."

"It still might." Katara had a slightly evil look on her face. "Air can have water in it. Just how damp is this sun-damp?"

"Er... what?" Jee asked warily.

"What's sun-damp do when it's full of water?" Katara clarified. "Like air in a storm?"

"I... honestly have no idea." Jee frowned. "The prince would know more, if any of us do. It was a secret project. Would knowing that really help?"

"Ooo yeah," Sokka muttered, thinking of the last time Katara had pulled out the ice claws. Given he'd seen her pull them out of the air, and master waterbenders like Katara could pull on water they couldn't even see - he didn't know if he should wince, or cackle like Toph in a winning match. Maybe both.

"This is going to be good." Suki shared an evil grin with Katara, before giving Jee her best warrior-leader look. "But you respect General Iroh. Why do you think he's wrong?"

The captain let out a slow breath, considering his answer. "The general is a very spiritual man. He's lost a great deal, and he's dedicated himself to undoing his grandfather's mistakes. He looks toward a future he never expects to live to see; the world made whole, and the Avatar returned." He paused for more thought. "Prince Zuko looks at a future he will have to live in, with the rest of us. If the prince is wrong, our absence from the North Pole will not turn the tide. If the prince is right - we will be all that stands between Ozai and Asagitsutsu."

Toph tilted her head back, almost meeting him eye to blind eye. "Shaking in your armor, huh?"

"Not as badly as I will be if the prince is right," Jee admitted. "I wish you'd left with the general, milady."

"The Northern Water Tribe has plenty of healers." Amaya crossed her arms; dark red threads glinting a pattern of thorns along her sleeves. "Iroh and I discussed this weeks ago. I won't stop him from running into a firestorm, and he won't stop me from defending my family." She drew in a shaky breath. "Though after what I felt here... I would have sworn there was a thunderstorm about to unleash hell, the water was that jittery... please tell me we have a good plan for defending the children."

"I believe we do," Jee nodded. "Though we're open to all the help we can get." He looked directly at Katara. "We had the chance to interrogate some of the surviving guards at the coal rig you infiltrated."

Katara raised her chin. "Where you were holding innocent people prisoner."

"Prisoners you managed to free, with good luck and improvisation," Jee fired back. "They'd given up. You gave them hope and courage, and roused them to fight for what they believed. Are you willing to use that talent here? I know the prince. He doesn't want to fight his father. I know he will. He has to; we're here, and he won't abandon us." The firebender inclined his head to her. "But it's easier to stand fast if you know your companions will stand with you."

For once, Sokka saw his sister actually taken aback. "I don't know," Katara admitted. "I'll... need to think about that."

"You should," Amaya said soberly, drawing her shawl a little tighter. "Helping a battle-fury flow isn't something anyone wants to do lightly. Especially with what's in our waters, if the fires go out." She looked just a little rueful. "Even if I were a strong enough bender to touch so many hearts, I don't have the endurance to maintain the effort. Not now."

Katara started, with that weird adding-it-up look Sokka had last seen before he'd drifted into a feverish haze that had ended with sucking frogs. "Are you...?"

Amaya's smile looked a little tired. "We can discuss it with my scrolls, if you like. I doubt Yugoda had the time to show you some of the finer points of checking a patient."

Jee did one of the fastest double-takes Sokka had seen on a firebender yet, face going almost as gray as his hair. "Milady!"

Amaya's smile brightened. "Don't worry, Captain. I'm no youngster; I know enough not to overdo it."

"Oh, there really are fates worse than death," Jee breathed. "Excuse me, I have catapults to oil..."

"Men," Amaya chuckled, as the captain almost bolted for the gangplank.

"Squeamish," Katara agreed. And smirked at him. "I should tell her about you and the fishhooks."

"It seemed like a good idea!" Sokka glanced between them, feeling like maybe Jee had the right idea. "What are you guys talking about, anyway?"

At guys, both waterbenders broke out laughing again. Sokka looked at Toph and Suki, and spread empty hands. "What'd I say?"

"Got me," Suki muttered, facepaint not thick enough to hide her bewilderment.

"And you share a saddle with Sokka." Amaya got her giggles tamped down, and waved a beckoning hand. "Come along, young Warrior. I think we need to have a talk."

White face dubious, Suki followed the pair toward shore.

Sokka hung back a moment, with the only sane bender in sight. "Why do I think I'm going to regret this?"

Toph looked just as freaked out as he felt. But she cracked her neck, and gave him the Blind Bandit's grin. "I bet we both are. But I'll bet you rock candy Ozai will hate it worse."

"My father will try to destroy this place, you know. It's everything he hates."

Cloth folded over her arm, Xiu paused. Took a second look at the worn-out prince stalking along the rock ledge, and traded a questioning glance with one worried marine. Lt. Teruko shrugged, obviously less than happy. But nothing was on fire. Yet.

Why does that make me even more worried?

Well. Easy answer to that. She'd finished this last piece of work at just the wrong time, and run into Agent Shirong and the rest of the Wens just as they'd been trying to figure out who would be the best person to tell Zuko he still had a family. So she'd volunteered to come up here instead, because if that fight had been even half as bad as some of the ones she'd had with Grandmother, family would just be more salt on the wound. "If you're telling me to run while the running's good, thanks," the weaver shrugged. "But this is Fong all over again. If Asagitatsu goes up, where would I run to?"

"My uncle would say you should try." Gold eyes were haunted. "Who knows. You might get a miracle."

If his voice were any more bitter, she could have used it to tan silk. "You don't believe in miracles, do you?" Xiu said quietly. "You're the one Agni and La picked to face down spirits, and you don't believe they'd help us when we deserve it?"

"If spirits gave us what we deserved, there wouldn't be a Fire Lord." Pale gold cut at her. "Unless you think the world deserves this war."

She didn't know what to say to that. "My family would say we lost faith in the Avatar-"

"Don't. Don't do that to Aang," Zuko bit out. "He's a kid. Sometimes he's a stupid kid. But he tries, he never asked for any of this, and it is not his fault he was frozen in an iceberg for a century while the world went to hell." He knuckled the side of his brow, creasing the dark circles under his eyes. "There's plenty of stuff that is his fault. This war isn't."

And if he was thinking about that, after what everybody agreed had been a downright vicious family fight... "You think your uncle blames the Avatar for the war?"

"I think Uncle thinks he can find somebody to blame," Zuko snarled. "Because if it's somebody's fault, then everything that happens means something, and he can make it right with one heroic sacrifice-" Fists clenched, fiery daggers blazing for one brief instant. "I wish I could believe in spirit-tales. The way Uncle does. But even when he fought a haima-jiao to save Aunt Amaya, he thought that was the will of the spirits, too."

"But..." The protest died on her lips, as Xiu tried to fit together what she felt with what she knew. "The Great Spirits are different."

"The Great Spirits are more powerful." Zuko gave her a frustrated look. "That doesn't make them different. Agni favors the Fire Nation; Guanyin favors Earth. Tui and La watch out for Water. The Autumn Lord still looks after people who listen to the wind. But they're still spirits, and they want what they want. Deserve has nothing to do with it." His shoulders slumped. "I'm not a hero. I'm not even a good nephew. Just a great name too stubborn to lie down and die. I'm probably not even good at that, I could be wrong..."

Teruko cleared her throat.

"Well, I could be," Zuko grumbled. "I'm wrong a lot."

Aha. Here we go, Xiu thought. "So what if you are?"

Zuko's eyes were bleak as the Great Divide. "Then I left him to face Fire Lord Ozai alone."

Okay, fate worse than death. Get him thinking. "Oh, sure," Xiu said bluntly. "Alone. With all those waterbenders up at the North Pole, including that Master Pakku. Captain Jee says the guy's known for waterspouts. And the Southern Water Tribe fleet; what's left of it, anyway. And all those Earth Army guys they managed to sneak out of the Fire Nation. Really, really alone." She swallowed, and got ready to duck. "And if he's wrong, then he left you alone."

"...I know."

The quiet answer prickled the hairs on the back of Xiu's neck. "You know," she echoed blankly. "But-"

"That's how it always is," Zuko said, still quiet.

Which was the same I hurt, go figure, moving on, she saw in the mirror. After dealing with Grandmother. "Yeah," Xiu sighed. "Fighting with family sucks." She shook her head, and shook out embroidered silk. No wonder the Wen family had asked for the old-fashioned firethorn design. If anybody needed protection from the sickness-spirits that snuck in when people got depressed, this prince did. "Not everybody leaves, you know. And even if you're angry at someone - that doesn't mean you don't love them." She held out the robe. "Somebody said the lord of Dragons' Wings should have some good robes. Not the ones that got hit by lightning."

For a moment he just blinked at her, like she'd slapped him with an ice-octopus. Shifted his shoulders, and shrugged. As if it really, really didn't matter. Really. "I liked those robes," Zuko grumped, reaching out to feel the thick silk. "One present, courtesy of Azula."

"Present?" Xiu choked.

"Proof I could take the toughest bending the Fire Princess could throw at me, and walk away alive," Zuko smirked at her. "That's a heck of a present."

And he's smiling? "Next time, just ask for some rock candy," Xiu managed.

"Heh." Zuko sighed, looking at least a little less like he was about to bite nails in two. "Well, at least nobody's dead yet." He stared at the horizon, as if he expected airships to sail into view on wings of thunder. "In my family, that's never a sure thing."

Mai glanced out the window of the house Ty Lee's sort-of-relatives had scrounged for them, taking in the deceptive peace of the caldera below. There was the palace, and there was the arena, and the plan Azula proposed to seize it all was enough to make her hands shake.

Deliberately, she stilled them. And held up the latest ledger. "Hostages we're returning to their families."

"Great names smart enough to see where my father is leading our nation, but not as lucky as Byakko." Seated by the wall, Azula stroked a file along her nails, honing them to a clean edge. "They won't all join us. They might never join us. But they'll know I could have taken their people by main force. And I didn't." She smiled, eyes distant with calculations of interest and influence. "If Long Feng had given the Dai Li a choice, he wouldn't have lost them."

Mai nodded, and turned the page. "Hostages we're hanging onto."

"Clan heads I wouldn't trust as far as the Avatar's pet could throw them." Azula's face darkened. "Some of them are profiting too much from a war to see any possible value in peace. Others think we can't lose. So they won't bother to plan for what happens if we can."

She just had to poke the dragon, Mai realized. She couldn't resist. "The Avatar didn't do so well the last time he was here."

"The Fire Navy didn't do so well the last time they went North," Azula shot back, eyes half-lidded with lazy amusement. "Father will win, or he'll lose. If he loses, the Fire Nation is mine by right. If he wins - the initiative I've shown in taking the capital he left undefended demonstrates that I am the proper heir."

Mai kept her face still, seeing that faint flash of hurt in gold eyes. "And if he decides it's not initiative, it's treachery?"

"Then we have a civil war." Azula's face went cold, and her voice had a hard edge. "Bad as that would be, it might save us all."

Mai thought that over, turning a globe of the world in her mind. "You think the Fire Nation will miss the Avatar. Again."

"I think that Admiral Zhao wasn't stupid, and my brother was more determined than Father ever admitted." Azula tapped a nail against the arm of her chair, testing the point. "Father's more likely to kill the airbender than capture him. In which case, we're likely to get a Water Tribe Avatar raining ice down on our heads. But not right away. They'll have to find her. Train her. Mold her. If we've torn ourselves to pieces in the meantime - the Water Tribes hate heat, and the Earth Kingdom hates water. And Water likes to see its enemies suffer. If the only reports they have of us are how we're killing each other, they'll stand back and let us do it." Gold eyes narrowed. "Those of us who survive will be stronger. And more... we'll know how to wait."

It made a vicious kind of sense. Still... "That won't stop them from sending troops in to help us kill each other off," Mai pointed out.

"Oh, I hope they try." Azula's smile could have cut glass. "There's nothing as easy to tear apart as allies who hate each other. And they will hate each other, Mai. Without the strength of our navy to rule the seas, pirates will spread and multiply. They'll raid and loot wherever and whoever has treasures to be stolen. Earth Kingdom, Water Tribes - by the time the next Avatar is recognized, they'll hate each other more than they could ever hate us. Let them try to meddle in our domains. They'll be double-crossing each other within days." She flexed her fingers, nails gleaming. "And if by some chance they don't... I'm sure we can find ways to make it look as though they did."

Mai almost put the ledger down. Thought better of it. "You're looking forward to this."

"I'd rather look forward to winning." Azula frowned. "But Zuko's a horrible liar. If he says this Face-Stealer spirit wants all humans dead, he believes it. Better a live guerilla than a dead great name." She shrugged. "And speaking of spirits..."

Mai turned another page. "Fire Sages who can be bribed or intimidated for your declaration."

"Far too many, for the health of our nation." Azula's eyes narrowed. "After we're done with them... I wonder how many we can persuade to look into reports of man-eating warehouses?"

Mai shivered. That was an old, scary legend. "Somebody's reported a man-eating warehouse?"

"Not yet."

Well. That was an answer right there.

Azula leaned back in her chair, setting her file aside as she watched Mai's reaction. "I have to admit, I've been meaning to ask. You don't approve of all my methods, or my plans. So why are you still here?"

Now we come to it. Mai closed the ledger. "Two reasons," she said clearly. "First, after what you did to set me up with Zuko, your idea of a good boyfriend sucks. I'm going to make sure you end up with a guy who really is strong enough to be your consort." She paused, deliberately. "And who's not my brother."

Azula had drawn back on herself, fixing her with an unnerving stare. "Consort?" Lips pulled back from white teeth, before she forced them into a vicious smile. "My own mother thought I was a monster. Do you really think she'd ever want to see my children?"

"You were a monster," Mai acknowledged. "You don't have to be one now." She shrugged, thick cloth sleeves rustling as if they were innocent fabric, never giving away the senbon strapped inside. "And just because you have them, doesn't mean you have to raise them. Foster them out, with people whose loyalty you hold. That way you can do your job as the Fire Lord, then sweep in at the end of the day and terrify them into doing their homework." She let a hint of a smile glimmer on her face. "You know you'd like that."

For two slow heartbeats, Azula was silent. "Foster them. Like onmitsu."

"Why not?" Mai focused her will into keeping her voice steady. Azula was better now. More stable, and a lot more likely to think twice before she lit someone on fire. But Lady Ursa was still a delicate subject. "You shouldn't put them with onmitsu. They'll be strong in Fire. They'll need someone who can be loyal to them. But if you're afraid you'd hurt them-

"I would." Azula's voice was quiet, as she glanced aside. "You know I would. I hurt everything around me."

"My parents say that part of being a good governor is knowing what you can't do. Find that out, and then find people who can do it. And take them into your service to do it right." Mai inclined her head; governor's daughter to crown princess. "Have heirs to follow you. Train them. But if you think you'd hurt them," the way you were hurt, "then you're not a monster. A monster wouldn't care." She shrugged; Ty Lee would have bounced over and given Azula a hug, but the airbender was off helping Dai Li charm some of Azula's first cautious supporters. A friendly ear would have to do. "Loyalty. Love. They're not a fuzzy-headed idiot on the beach preening over his girlfriend. They're about giving the people important to you what they need. Give your heirs that. Tell them why later."

Azula's gaze flicked to hers, then slid aside. "What if... staying away doesn't make a difference?"

They both knew it was possible. Even likely. The line of Sozin was brilliant, ruthless, and cruel. And more than a little mad.

Mai took a deep breath, and stood straight. "Then we go kidnap a water-healer to help them," she said flatly. "Zuko told you there would always be somewhere you could go for help. Drop a coded message in the right place, and I bet he'd be willing to go missing for a few days."

"He would, wouldn't he?" Azula shook her head with fond exasperation. "You said, two reasons."

Better be honest. "I hate being bored," Mai stated. "I'd rather stare down flames than be bored. It kills me, like no wind kills Ty Lee." She raised her eyebrows. "Life around you is a lot of things, but it's never boring."

A knock at the chamber door, and Agent Bolin slipped into the room. "Princess." He offered a scroll. "Delun didn't decode it, but he says it came by way of Foggy Swamp."

"Foggy Swamp?" Mai frowned as Azula took the scroll. "We don't have agents there."

"We don't," Azula agreed, eyeing the scroll from all angles before she touched the wax. "But Grandfather does."

One sharp nail sliced away the wax. Azula unrolled the first few inches, reading-

"Oh."

Cold. Not a really bad cold, not when he could move air to keep him as toasty as he wanted. But ever since he'd learned to waterbend, cold had been something Aang noticed. Like a rising thermal, or cracks in hanging stone.

He walked through snow-white Northern Tribe streets, trying not to notice how many people were looking at him. Maybe if he just kept walking, he'd get where he needed to go without people asking too many questions. Though it was going to be a couple days yet before the Comet and he could really use a snack-

"Avatar Aang." Chief Arnook's hair was streaked with gray that hadn't been there a few months ago. "Our coast-watchers have reported Southern Tribe boats headed for our city. What's going on?"

Fire Lord Ozai's not the real enemy. "I need to talk to your shamans," Aang said, wishing he still had an airstaff to cling to. "And then... I need to visit the Spirit Oasis."

Chapter End Notes

It's a well-known fact that abusers and violent offenders were generally abused themselves. See the evening news on any particularly gruesome crime, and sooner or later the talking heads will explore the perpetrator's "deprived childhood". What's less well-known is the facts assembled by sociologists and psychologists determined to look at all abused children, not just the ones that end up in court. What they've found, you probably won't hear on the news, because it's just not bloody enough.

About three-quarters of abuse victims go on to never abuse anyone.

Three out of four. People who come from the most horrible backgrounds, the worst traumas one human being can inflict on another. Made even more horrific because the abuse was perpetrated by people they should have trusted. And yet these survivors pick themselves up, and go on, and refuse to do unto others what was done unto them.

A lot of them do have problems, and they know it. While they might not go to the lengths Mai's suggesting here, getting help as a parent, if you're scared, is not a bad idea at all.

Chapter 87

"Ah; now this is what summer's supposed to be." Pakku peered through narrowed eyes at the full force of a polar sun, letting it warm him down to the bone. "I'll never get used to the hours you keep down near the equator. Day and night almost the same year-round - it's enough to drive a man to thin ice."

"Hmph."

Which was about as much response as he'd been able to get out of Iroh in days. It was starting to wear. Old, bitter, and cynical was his job. He'd earned it. "You're starting to make me look cheerful. Quit that."

Iroh didn't glance at him, as sailors finished tying the ship up.

Pakku sighed. "After all, if your nephew's wrong, he's safe. And your wife is safe. Which is more than I can say for most of my kin." He frowned, for once shading his eyes from the full glare of summer as they started down the gangplank. Is that-? It is. "Besides. From what I've seen, Prince Zuko and Avatar Aang in the same place aren't just a recipe for disaster. They're a whole kitchen with ten cookbooks and a feast getting ready."

Startled, Iroh looked.

Ha! I win.

"Master Pakku." Aang tried not to sigh in relief too obviously, as Chief Arnook nodded to the arriving masters. He wasn't surprised, exactly; he'd already run into Jeong Jeong and Master Piandao and Bumi of all people, who'd just cackled at him and said there was dirt under some of the snow. You just had to dig for it. Oh, and Fire Sage Shiyu. Poor guy. Chief Hakoda said he'd had an awful trip. "General Iroh. Boy, am I glad you're here. Sozin's Comet is going to be... well, soon. And I think we've got to pull this off in the Spirit Oasis before it's over." Before all the firebenders lost that extra power the Comet would give them. Koh was a water spirit. His rule over the drowned showed that. And if worst came to worst and Koh just wouldn't listen...

Well. He was going to need all the fire he could get.

"Hmm," Iroh mused, following him into the heart of the city. "Yes; if my brother interrogated some of the survivors of the invasion fleet, he may have guessed the importance of the Oasis." He drew a mountain-deep, cleansing breath. "And now we are gathered to face him." Gray brows drew down. "Those who would come, at least."

Pakku sighed, one quiet puff of frost.

Um. Aang gulped. Face Ozai?

Well, maybe, he thought, worried. If he gets past Sokka and the others. He might; they've got Appa, but he's only one bison and even if Katara's incredible with water-blades they're going to have so much fire...

It's going to be bad. Really bad. I wish I was there! But I'm the Avatar. This is where I've got to be.

And I trust Sokka. He'll figure out a plan. I know he will.

"Let us find higher ground," Iroh stated. "I need to see what we will be defending."

"Didn't get a good enough look last time?" Pakku said dryly, a wave of strong arms lifting ice to raise them to the nearest rooftop.

"I fear I was a bit preoccupied." Reaching under his cloak, Iroh drew out a collapsed spyglass. "You are here," he nodded to Aang. "As I said you would be."

Pakku eyed the frosty parapets, as if he were thinking of bending a bit of slush down someone's neck.

"Sozin's Comet will touch our skies within hours. Which means..." Iroh pulled the spyglass out, and turned toward the southeastern horizon. And waited.

Aang frowned. And crossed his arms, because he wasn't going to fidget.

Wriggling his toes wasn't fidgeting, either. Even an airbender could get a little cold.

...Okay, whistling was fidgeting, but come on. They'd been here forever, and Iroh was just watching. "What are you looking for?"

"My brother's fleet," Iroh said dryly.

Oh. Okay, kind of... no. Not okay. "So... why are you looking that way?" Aang said warily.

"It is the way the wind will carry over the ocean from Onsenzakura. The nearest Fire Colony on the Northern coast," Iroh said, a bit testily.

"Um." Aang chewed his lip. "I don't know where Onsenzakura is, but I fought them in the high wind-road, way out over the ocean. If they're heading here, they're going to be coming..." He felt the sky's breath sinking from above, and angled himself almost due south. "That way."

"...Hah." A near soundless breath, from Pakku. "I'll have to remember that boy. No manners at all, but it seems three years at sea taught him something."

Iroh was looking at both of them as if they'd started speaking lemur. "But why would Ozai strike from that direction when his primary objective is-"

"I'm not the one who sees the spirit world, but I'd say your brother's primary objective is power," Pakku said sourly. "He threw away his wife for it. He may have murdered your father for it. He definitely tossed away his own heir when the boy challenged him in council-"

"Zuko never meant it as a challenge," Iroh said firmly. "He had no plans to break loyalty to my brother, even after..." He paled.

"Iroh?" Aang asked, worried. That wasn't a good look. That wasn't even a Bumi "we just did something utterly crazy and it's gonna hurt" look.

"My brother has never concerned himself with spirits." The words were barely louder than a breeze. "His concern was with the binding of loyalty, for it holds our people to him; and while Avatar Kyoshi's decree stands none can work against the Fire Lord's will and survive..."

Oh. Oh, he knew this, he'd been listening to Sokka. Temul was angry and awful and stomped all over anyone she didn't like, but she was a dragon-child and she didn't lie. "Unless there's a great name willing to stand up to the spirits for them," Aang nodded. "Like Shidan. And Master Piandao."

And-

"Zuko," Iroh breathed.

Zuko chafed his arms, watching stars fade away over the southern mountain peaks in the twilight before dawn. It was summer, even here in the mountains it wasn't truly cold...

Darkness, against the vanishing stars. Rounded and long and so many of them, lit by the briefest flashes of fire to warm night-chilled gases.

"...I really, really hate being right."

Chapter 88

It's the thin light before dawn. The stars have vanished into the faint, flat light that shuts away evening, holding a place for the sun.

Only on this day, the sun doesn't step in first. This day - as it did a century ago, as it will a hundred years from now - something else catches the sky on fire. The heavens turn red, as if a thousand forests blazed, and every soul born of dragon's blood feels the burning in their veins.

Sozin's Comet has returned.

The irony is - at least at Asagitsutsu - the firebenders who would ordinarily notice it the most care the least. Anyone of Sozin's line, and anyone even near one of Sozin's line, is terribly busy. A little matter of two sides trying their level best to kill each other.

"What a petty little place."

General Zhu Zhing stalked the bridge of the Fire Lord's flagship as they sailed over the southern mountains, staring down at the rag-tag little harbor and its ramshackle clutter of ships and hovels. You couldn't call the structures that lined the dirt trails buildings; shaped stone and green lumber and uncouth mixes of who-knew-what.

Not much to burn, Zhu Zhing thought, scowling as he scanned the site for any sign of the renegade prince he meant to destroy. Barely enough to make an example with.

Though the flames they were going to loose on this place should sear away the little wooden fishing boats and char right down through the soil. And that would be the end of that. What the fire didn't kill, winter would.

The only thing barely interesting about the valley was that it was already on fire. So to speak. There were flames coming up everywhere, even from the harbor itself. It wasn't entirely alien, not to a general who'd overseen the gas-fields at Nara, but it did make the neck-hairs twitch. This was supposed to be Earth Kingdom land, yet it dared to breathe pure fire.

...No. There was one more interesting thing, nagging at the back of his mind as they sailed onward. The sharpness of the valley edges under greenery, the faintest taste of sulfur in the air, the steaming little island in the middle of fiery waters-

It's a caldera.

It can't be a caldera, it's too big! How could there even be a caldera in the Earth Kingdom-?

The general did not look behind him. He could feel the Fire Lord's gaze boring into his back, assessing his readiness. Testing his will, to strike down those once considered of royal blood.

He will not find me wanting.

Zhu Zhing hadn't earned his exalted rank by discounting what was in front of his eyes. If this was a caldera, it was a lair of Fire, not of Earth, and the outlaw prince had picked better ground to stand than any spy had dreamed of reporting. Best to strike quickly, and be done with it. "Prepare to-"

Blue-white lumps arced up from the ground and harbor, dotted with darker specks like sesame seeds on a rice ball.

Ice. So they do have a waterbender. Pathetic. "Fire!"

From platforms below each airship, flames roared out. Blazed toward the ice. Engulfed it-

Fwoom.

"Evasive man-"

The blasts cut Zhu Zhing off mid-shout, shockwaves rippling through air. The cabin rattled around them like dry peas in a pod, knocking some men from their feet and sparking a host of damage reports. He felt the gasbags overhead shudder against their lightmetal cage.

And at that, they were lucky. He saw flames spreading on two airships behind them, eating hungrily at the waterproofed crimson fabric protecting the gasbags.

That was natural gas! In ice?

Against his will, his gaze flicked back toward their lord and commander.

For a heartbeat, that handsome face was still as stone.

A ruby shadow in red and gold, Fire Lord Ozai strode forward. "Step aside."

Teo shivered, and made sure to breathe through his nose. The silk scarf wrapped around his throat helped keep the worst of the chill at bay, and the faint taste of sulfur said Asagitatsu's steam wasn't far below, but the air up here was still cold.

Brimstone tickled his nose. Teo wrinkled it to stifle any sneeze. Fire Nation airships were quiet. Much quieter than his father's war balloon, with its constant gusts of gas-fed flame to heat the air. And Ozai's fleet had people on board who weren't bending or flying the ships. Lookouts, specifically watching for, say, a crazy group of benders on a sky bison. The only advantage his gliders had was silence.

Well, that and some dabs of blue paint. He really hadn't wanted to repaint the gliders. Paint was weight. And wings were supposed to be visible. In case you got in trouble.

"If your friends can see you, so can your enemies."

When they got out of this, Teo was going to ask Auntie Changchang to sit down with Zuko and have a nice, long chat about the world being a place most people got through without anybody trying to kill them.

But that would be then, and this was now, and Ozai's fleet of airships was terrifying. Even if there weren't quite as many as they'd counted through spyglasses less than an hour ago. Teo thought he'd seen the distant blob of red divide in half; some turning more north and west, bows rising to catch the fastest winds north...

Focus. We're only going to get one free shot.

But it was kind of hard to concentrate, with fire-ice sailing up and fire blazing down and tendrils of flame writhing like octopi in midair. Even with a few hundred feet of altitude between him and the flames, his toes clenched at the thought of dropping any further down.

Yet that little twitch made his stomach seem to settle. He wasn't going to walk again. Healer Amaya had laid that out in sober, blunt phrases. Along with just as sober, blunt praise for his father and the village that he'd even survived. Most people who got their hips busted up the way he had - didn't.

But even if he couldn't stand, he could move his feet. And that had opened up more options with his glider than he'd ever hoped for.

Like, say, using his feet to steer, while his hands reached to the wind and bent.

Teo wagged his wings at the dozen gliders behind him, and stooped toward his target. Felt as much as saw them peel off into pairs; he didn't know how Air Nomads flew, but that was what worked, flying with a wingman in case you lost the updraft-

The comet's red light played over painted wings, turning irregular blue splotches meant to blend with the clouds to stark, flat gray.

...Oh, no.

And it wasn't the wind putting that chill down his spine. He'd seen their gliders in the sky just yesterday, he knew that paint should have made them all but invisible in the air...

And now they weren't. Now, all the Fire Lord's men had to do was look up.

Teo gulped. Took a deliberate breath. Yeah. And if they'd looked up before we painted the wings, we'd be in the same fix. Everybody knows we're taking an awful risk. And they came anyway. We can still do this, if we move fast. I've got to trust them.

Only three people behind him were benders, but they were all gliders. And slime bombs were good for more than just knocking people off mountains.

Aim... there!

One rudder, splatted right in the guide-wires. That should make things interesting.

Especially after this. Teo swooped back up into the sky again, reaching out to scoop and push.

Wind gusted at his touch, shoving the gunked rudder into a hard left. Metal groaned, squealed-Snapped.

Just one wire. Teo grimaced, turning to get a good view. Darn. They've still got some control.

But the airship was wallowing in the wind, now. And it wasn't the only one. At least four more were drifting out of formation. Two others were sinking fast, charred holes gaping over rings of blackened metal and rippling gas bags.

They damped the fires. Darn it-

He twisted his wings in a whoosh of wind and strained muscles, flames close enough he smelled burnt hair. I think they know we're here.

Altitude was life. Up and up and-

Ehuang's on fire!

But Ke was on her wing, using a backdraft to damp the flames while he guided her out of the fray. Teo took a deep breath, and headed toward another curve of rising red...

Smaller curve. Much closer than he thought. War balloon.

Teo jinked right, as if he'd meant to go after the next airship all along. Swallowed hard, and whispered to the wind. "Good luck."

"Sokka? Breathe."

"Yeah." Sokka gulped, hanging onto the war balloon's basket for dear life as gliders swooped, slime-bombs splatted, and fire writhed in every direction. "Breathing's good... why didn't somebody tell me this was a stupid plan?"

Leaning back to make sure no sparks had eaten into their balloon, Suki snickered. And if it was a little grim, well - he couldn't blame her. "If I remember right, someone did."

Ah. Yeah.

Hard to believe it'd only been a few days ago that he and Zuko had been glaring at lists of supplies and little airship models scattered over a map of Dragons' Wings. Zuko had a bit of steam trailing from his nose, they both had hands stained with ink, and there were piles of balled-up paper gathering in drifts in the corners of the room.

"No way," Sokka had said, grudging every word. "There's just no way we can fight them head-on. We're going to have to do something..." He waved his hand, searching for the right words.

Zuko sighed. "Stupid."

Suko straightened in his chair, putting on his best Ba Sing Se mock-affronted air. "I was going to say incredibly brilliant and daring."

Zuko nodded once. "Which is code for stupid."

"More or less," Sokka admitted.

Dark humor glinted in gold eyes. "At least we have the world experts on that."

Sokka gave him a look askance. "We do?"

Zuko had just smirked.

"Oh yeah." Sokka had taken a breath; more like a gulp, not that he was ever, ever going to admit it. "Us."

Now he had to remind himself to breathe. To keep it together, just keep going, and definitely not look at what was and wasn't burning below them. War balloons weren't exactly easy to maneuver, but they were angling up into the shadow behind the lead airship's cabin and the firebender's platform under it. Gingerly, he took over the furnace and flaps and got them closer, waiting for Suki's nod of close enough.

There was still way too much air between them and the wires outside the rear door when she did. Suki balanced on the basket edge for barely a blink, then flipped across. Grabbed hold, pulled herself up in one tight curl, and blew him a kiss.

He reddened under the helmet. She was just so awesome at this...

Suki's rope almost smacked him in the face.

He grabbed on, tying the balloon to the airship so they'd have a getaway plan. That was his story and he was sticking to it, even if the real reason was so he could have half a chance at looking maybe as awesome getting over there.

Which was going to be tricky. Water Tribe fur and leathers, he could pull all kinds of stunts in. Fire marine armor was a little more stubborn about acrobatics.

At least this isn't like that mess with Hahn.

Heh. No. Sergeant Kyo had shaken down his squad for the best-fitting armor they could borrow. Maybe Navy armor didn't look quite like Army stuff, but at least it wasn't eighty years out of date. If they were in and out fast - it should give them the moment of surprise they needed for this raid.

Which... wasn't exactly a raid, darn it. And if he didn't like it, Aang was never, ever going to feel right about what he and Suki were about to do-

But that's why we're up here. Sokka braced himself, and launched for the door. So Aang doesn't have to do this.

Ow. Hard metal - ack, feet were slipping off the ledge...

Suki caught his arm and hauled him in, hanging on until he got rope wrapped around one fist and nodded. "Fancier than I thought."

Huh. Gold trim around the doors. Which tweaked at Sokka's nerves, even as he edged up to look through the tiny view-slit in the door. He'd been on Zuko's own ship, briefly, and while there were a few tapestries and other kinds of fancy stuff around, the one thing the Wani and the Suzuran did not look like was fancy...

He couldn't see much of the inside. But what he could see matched the feel of metal moving under him; a door being opened under the main cabin, so a firebender could venture out onto the firing platform below.

Huh. Why are they doing that when Teo's people are up above-?

"Sokka." Suki's voice caught his attention like a hook in his ear. "Look down."

Down? Down was a sway of his stomach and a silent prayer that the Moon would look after poor idiot Water Tribe warriors who had the bad luck to be bouncing around in the middle of the sky. Down was where Zuko's guys were tossing up fire-ice, with bits of rock stuck in so the earthbenders could play along with everybody else. And where they were dodging any fire shot down from above; though he'd heard a few interesting whooshes that meant wave-style firebending was getting a workout-

Down... wasn't as far down as it should be.

Oh boy.

Ducking back to the door, he could see the firebender vanish out onto the platform. And hear the fire roaring down, impossibly far down...

Far enough to set masts on fire.

We've got to get in there!

One good thing about airships. Nobody'd thought about locking the door.

Where's a hurricane when you need one?

Perched halfway up the caldera wall on their friendly rock, Zuko focused his spyglass and stared at the sky. One thing to plot with Sokka how an airship attack would have to come to Dragons' Wings, if it came at all. A different beast entirely to stare at blood-black airships sailing out of a fiery sky. His heart was beating fast as a rabbiroo's. There didn't seem to be enough air.

Given the fire curling and crashing through the sky, being flung down by the Fire Lord's firebenders and deflected by his own, it was possible there wasn't.

Good thing there's a wind, or this could get ugly.

Katara was working with Sergeant Kyo's team closer to the harbor, keeping fire away from critical areas as she threw her will behind stand against the Fire Lord. Toph was close to her, flipping around rocks and helping Shirong keep a hold of himself; earthbenders never had a power-up like dawn to worry about, much less a firestorm like Sozin's Comet, and the Dai Li yāorén was as close to coming apart at the seams as Zuko had ever seen him. His family could have helped, but the Wens were with Huojin's fledgling Guard force, helping civilians stay out of sight and safe hidden in the ancient ruins.

Let them stay safe, Zuko hoped; thinking of his aunt, and his people, and a stubborn distant cousin fighting to master earth and spirit-healing. If we lose, the world's going to need a lot of yāorén.

I'm not going to let us lose. "Lieutenant Teruko!"

"Sir!" A quick snap of a salute.

The angle of the airships was good. Not perfect, a little more west would have been better. But it'd do. "Second line, now!"

She nodded, waving patterned war fans. Across the caldera, from a dozen little stone shelters and Suzuran, mirrors flashed back Acknowledged-

With a vrump of catapult cables loosed, obsidian shards knifed through the sky.

Too late, Zuko saw the war balloon tethered to the rear of the flagship.

Oops.

Great. He'd just killed Sokka's ride.

Volcanic glass tore through airship envelopes, peppering gasbags with holes. One of the fire-wounded airships seemed to shudder, balloon collapsing like whipped cream left in hot sun. Others sprouted sudden streams of water, dumping ballast to maintain altitude.

Ooo. Please let Katara see that-

Zuko froze, any orders he might have passed to Teruko lodged like ice in his throat. It was high. And far away. But with a spyglass he could see the flagship's cabin. And a glint of pale gold.

I can't. He's still my father, I can't-!

"The ballast." Zuko coughed, trying to get words through a rebellious throat. "The ballast is water." Water or powdered rock, that'd been their best guess. And flying over the ocean, water would be the easiest to drop or scoop up. A waterbender would have to know it was there to do damage with it, and what waterbenders at the North Pole knew anything about airships? "Pass the word. Tell people to get creative."

A firebender throwing rocks. Ozai narrowed his eyes as the airship lurched, officers shouting a flurry of orders through speaking tubes as the crew tried to compensate for torn gasbags. Steel clamps held steady through the shocks, keeping one of the glass viewports open; clear air, to let cold fire strike without grounding in steel. As soon as he found the right target. I expected more of you, brother.

He'd expected fire, lightning, and devastation. The Dragon of the West had earned his title. Even if this battle would end in Iroh's utter, final defeat.

Instead, he saw slapdash aim and haphazard defenses, with his beloved elder brother nowhere to be seen.

It must be a trap.

Why else would his traitorous son be out in plain view, as if daring them to strike at him?

I always knew you despised me, Iroh. But to use the nephew you claimed to prize as bait - you must truly loathe us all.

Not that he'd hesitate to strike Zuko down. Some lessons had to be learned in blood and fire. Given Zuko hadn't learned the proper respect the last time... this would be a very final lesson.

You seduced your own sister into defying my will. I don't know how you accomplished that, but your death will be swifter than you deserve.

He would strike the boy down. The cold fire would be ready in a heartbeat. As soon as he knew where Iroh was.

Eyes half-closed, Ozai reached out with inner fire. Read the flow of orders. Find the center of loyalty...

It was hard to be certain, with flames billowing like crimson silk, tossed by winds of bending will. But the patterns of mirror-flash and signal fans centered... there.

Impossible.

Zuko was the center; fire banked like hot coals, only flaring when he twisted a cone of fire to splash harmlessly onto scorched stone. Iroh's brilliant flame was nowhere to be found.

No. He has had everything he wished of life. He will not rob me of this!

Two could play at that game. Iroh had already lost a son to overconfidence.

And now, Ozai breathed deeply, readying himself to wrap negative jin about Zuko to call the lightning to him, he will lose a nephew, as well...

Metal screeched behind him. His bodyguards started, and moved-

Red armor was fighting red armor. One young woman with a fan... and one young man with an infamous black blade.

The battlefield might be clouded with smoke, but this was clear as dawn sun. Assassination. Low War.

Traditional tactics. Honored tactics, in their way; the weapons of the onmitsu, the wandering sword, the lord of a small domain desperate to save his people from a greater foe. The way Fire Lord Azulon had thought sufficient for his second son... but not his first. No; Prince Iroh was meant for greater, grander things than that. Grandeur that had led Iroh and his army to fail at Ba Sing Se... where Azula and two girls had gained utter victory.

Ozai's lip curled in a smirk as he shook out his fingers. Lightning inside the cabin would be unwise. So, Zuko. You are Ursa's son, after all.

The sky burned over the palace arena, clouds dark coals in fiery scarlet. Crackles of storm-glow danced on roof ridgelines, sparks flying to join the blue flames wreathing a delicate fist.

Around the boundaries, nobles and servants shifted like a red tide; a few motes of gold eyes burning with approval, others dark with frowns. One or two of the braver stood like islands against the storm, studiously aloof. Those were the ones not glancing toward the sparking rooftops, where there might or might not be onmitsu hidden.

Those are the ones I want.

A lash of flame, and her opponent and soon to be ex-general crashed to the ground. Singed, but from the rise and fall of his chest, still breathing. Barely.

Azula straightened, breathing deliberately even, blue flames flickering around her. "Are there any others who would claim they have a right to the Dragon Throne?"

Wind moaned past them, fluttering sparks and silk. The most impassive barely moved a finger to deflect flames from eating into scarlet threads.

She didn't let her eyes linger on them, scanning all the crowd. "Apparently some of you weren't listening the first time. You will follow me." Her hand flicked open, as if casting sparks to the wind. "Or you and all your households will flee the Caldera, today, and serve Fire Lord Ozai by preparing your domains against invasion. The Avatar's allies have scouted our defenses once. They will be back."

She stood with calculated ease, even as the fire raged inside to burn, devour, kill. Breathed lightly, eyes clear and calm, as if she could wait all day.

When the Comet passes, we're all going to crash...

Which was what made now the breaking point. They'd follow, or leave - or gather enough stupidity to come at her all at once, dueling customs be damned. Mai was hidden with senbons ready to throw, and her Dai Li were blending in with the walls just waiting to raise stone shields in front of her... but this was Sozin's Comet. If they tried to defend her from mass firebending, they'd only kill themselves trying-

"Byakko knows the true heir to the Dragon Throne."

She knew that voice. She could be lost, she could be insane; she could be a hundred years drowned, and she would still know that voice.

Tall and elegant, paired dao at her side, Ursa stepped out of the shadows.

Nobles flinched back like doused flames, indrawn breaths a gust of wind. Byakko never spoke of it, but all knew the western domain had stood against Sozin's line for a century.

Sozin's line. But not me.

Azula smiled.

"They're late," Master Piandao observed from Pakku's crafted ice tower on the walls around the Spirit Oasis, shading his eyes to peer at the ominous red balloons sailing in from the sea, "but it looks like the Fire Nation made it to the party after all."

I wish they hadn't. Aang tried not to grimace. Because that was kind of a horrible thing to wish, that Ozai and all his airships were somewhere else hurting people instead of coming after the Northern Water Tribe...

But he could almost feel Sokka tapping Boomerang on his arrow and telling him not to be stupid. He didn't want the Fire Army to be here? Nobody sane wanted the Fire Army showing up anywhere. They were here, and he was going to do something about it.

...Well, kind of. Not exactly what people had in mind, probably.

But Sokka would say do it. Katara would tell me to believe in myself. Toph would punch me in the arm and say it was about time. And Zuko...

Zuko would understand. That was the scary part. Zuko didn't want to fight these guys, either. He just would. If he had to.

And I probably will have to. There's just something I've got to do first.

"My brother approaches." Iroh inclined his head. "And the masters of the White Lotus stand ready to aid the Avatar, in any way that you have need of."

Aang tried not to shiver. He wasn't cold; not cold outside, anyway. But he wasn't the kid who'd fallen out of an iceberg anymore, and he'd seen Master Piandao frown as he slipped down to ground level. Iroh might be offering as a White Lotus master, but he was still a firebender. And the Fire Nation always meant more than they said.

In any way. A great name didn't say things like that. From what Temul had thumped them all with, domain lords were responsible to their people and their land first. Helping somebody else always had limits, and polite firebenders always worked in a hint what those limits were. You didn't give help without limits, not unless-

He's trying to offer me his loyalty.

And Aang remembered what Sokka had told him, about the way loyalty tugged and pulled and hurt people of fire caught between their lord and doing what they felt was right. How Sokka sometimes thought he felt just whispers of Shu Jing's people, wanting the lord of their domain. And how domains on separate islands would, had to, get into arguments that needed to be settled - and if the Fire Lord had to be loyal to both sides...

Aang swallowed. Temul tried to tell Kyoshi. She was killing the Fire Lords. But she wouldn't listen. "No. I'm sorry. But - that's not the kind of help I need."

In the background, Master Pakku twirled an icicle between his fingers, mustaches canted to the side in sour interest.

Iroh cleared his throat. "I did say we stand ready to aid you-"

"No. You said you were going to help the Avatar. And that's what's wrong." Aang shook his head, wishing this was just a bad dream from Sokka's attempt at cooking. "The Avatar's the spirit of the whole world. You can't help the whole world! It's too big! Even the Great Spirits don't always agree all the time about how the world should work. How could you get in the middle of that, and not go crazy? Like Sozin-"

Iroh's expression was thunderous.

"Like Fire Lord Sozin did," Aang said bluntly. He stepped back, and crossed determined arms. "I'm not a firebender yet. I don't get loyalty. But I know it's not something you give to somebody just because that's what you think you should be doing. And it's not something you should ever give when what you're giving it to can't give it back." He swallowed, throat dry. "I'm trying. But I can barely look after myself half the time. I can't be a, a great name."

Snow rumbled up like an upside-down avalanche, and Bumi cackled out of the sudden hole. "He's got you, Iroh. Fair and square."

"You know him?" Aang blurted out. Looked between them, and Pakku, and Master Piandao's subtly arched eyebrows. "All of you know each other!"

"Of course!" Bumi hauled himself out of the earth, brushing snow off dark blue and white robes. "All old geezers know each other. You get to be our age, you realize who's worth keeping around to play a good game of Pai Sho. No matter what element they are."

"You..." For a moment, air seemed to leave his lungs.

This? Has gone way too far. We need some air... we need some Truth around here! "You've got a really funny idea of helping!"

"Eh?" Bumi looked surprised.

"The White Lotus is supposed to help the Avatar?" Aang said in disbelief. "I was in Omashu. Remember? You gave me a crazy test and said goodbye. I met you-" Aang squinted at Jeong Jeong, almost out of sight behind some snow, "and you told me to get lost. I came up to the North Pole looking for a waterbending master, found you," he eyed Pakku, "and guess what? You thought girls shouldn't fight, so you wouldn't train Katara when she'd already been training me. She worked out her own moves at the South Pole, by herself, without any help! She taught me when nobody wanted to help the Avatar. And you didn't think she was worth training, and you wanted to throw me out when I tried to help her!"

Piandao was stifling a laugh behind his hand.

"This isn't funny!" Aang insisted. "Maybe you were trying to keep Temul from killing me, but you never said anything about anyone out there who could help me. And you," he rounded on Iroh. "If you always wanted to help the Avatar, why didn't you tell Zuko?"

Iroh sighed. "He was loyal to his father-"

"Yeah? And? So? He trusted you," Aang shot back. "Didn't you ever maybe think that if helping the Avatar would help the whole world, that meant the Fire Nation too? And maybe if you told him that, he would have believed you? He got me away from Zhao when the Yu Yan caught me! If you'd just told him what you wanted to do, and why-" He flung up frustrated hands. "If that's what you call help, things got really strange the last hundred years!"

A faint red flush painted Iroh's face.

"The thing is, I think I get it," Aang admitted. "You felt like things were your fault. Like... I felt the whole war was mine. But it's not. And none of us can fix it alone." He looked up and south, at long shapes of red. Soon, way too soon, they'd be here.

And he was already tired. Why hadn't Master Gyatso said truth could be so hard?

Maybe 'cause I never had to hit people with the grown-up ones before.

Well, he just needed to heft one more. "You want one big battle to fix the world?" He pointed toward the burning sky. "There you go. I'll try to help when I'm done. But I'm the Avatar." He sat down by the Spirit Oasis, ready to meditate his heart out. "And right now, my enemy is here."

The first mirror that ever existed, was Fire and Water.

The spirit world was a maze. But flames on water could thin the boundary; mixing and melding to thin the walls, and open a way through.

Holding her breath, Makoto eeled into salt water.

Carefully. Move carefully.

There were bodies in the water, after all. No few of them with ill intent toward anything that still breathed, Koh's ally or not.

So don't breathe. Yet.

Fire was discipline. And discipline held, even when she swam near stony vaults pierced with holes. Through those holes a few errant bubbles trickled, melting from trapped ice with an odd translucence that wasn't quite air.

Well, well, well. Someone's found a way to store fire-ice. What... intriguing possibilities.

Her great-grandson, most likely. More Byakko trickiness. And oh, why, why had that vicious cleverness not chosen her side? What had humans ever done for any of her children? Even that turncoat Iroh - and where was he, she could sense he was not here - had lost all he cared for to the Earth Kingdom. Yet he played at helping those who would only destroy him-

Ahhh. Fiery eyes gleamed in the depths. So. He is not here... because he is with the Avatar.

No wonder the drowned about her moved but limply, without true purpose. Her ally's control must be... disturbed.

Avatar against Face-Stealer. That should be an interesting fight.

Heh. From a distance, perhaps. She already knew what the outcome would be. Kuruk had failed; did Aang truly think he could do better? Even with one of her own children at his side?

You followed the Avatar, and left your fledgling alone. How thoughtful of you, Iroh. Grandson and great-grandson, meeting again after so long.

A Fire Lord with an entire nation's loyalty to back him, against a yāorén with a few desperate followers and the interest of Asagitatsu. The balance in this fight could tip in favor of either side...

So I shall weight the scales.

She knew every artifact that sang to the spirits in the White Lotus vaults; she'd seen them place it all, before they'd fought her off in the wake of Asagitatsu's eruption and sealed themselves in. She knew how their own thirst for knowledge had led to many of their members' destruction...

And now it can lead to more.

Like a kadhait, she surfaced just long enough to take a breath, then dove to dance in the waves and bubbles and flames.

I'm so cold.

Katara took a moment to rub the gooseflesh on her arms; dragging the fear front and center so she could face it, rather than letting it spread from her to everyone her water brushed near. It was okay to be afraid. Only a moron wouldn't be afraid with the fires and screams and flying rocks-

And water moving where it shouldn't be.

In the archive? She curved seawater into ice to shield herself and the earthbenders from an airship's gout of fire, the concave arc reflecting flames and force to explode in the luckless firebender's face. She winced at the scream, even as the rest of her barrier flashed into water and steam-

Two swift jabs froze it into a hail of icy drizzle, pattering off her allies instead of seizing them with a drowning wave. Katara took a breath, and reached out to gather up scattered water. "Toph! Any ideas?"

"I was thinking sludge!" Another burst of flames pounded against the rocks Shirong had curved over both earthbenders. Toph grinned in their shadow, and crumbled black stone under her to powder with a scrunch of her toes. "If we can slap together some mud walls-"

"Then even if they bake it, they still have to break it!" Katara grinned. "Let's do it!" She moved her hands in a gathering swirl, plucking up tiny bits of salty ice from wherever they'd landed. Frozen drops had gone everywhere...

That's probably what happened. Someone just tossed water in the wrong places. Sorry about any scrolls left in there, but - as long as it's not the drowned, it's not a problem.

In empty eye sockets, blue flames bloomed.

Chapter 89

Her hands were shaking.

They're trying to burn us alive, Katara told herself, in a brief moment of stillness between roaring flames. Anybody would be shaking.

Toph's slurry-shields were awesome. On any other day, they would have worked. But the sky was red and flames came down like lava on the fortune-teller's village and they didn't have Aang to blow it all away.

Fire hit the latest wall like a meteor. Seared clay shattered-

Crumbled to stinging flecks on Shirong's fist and Toph's pointed fingers. The little earthbender was letting him handle most of the flying debris, slapping her hands to shoot dust into Katara's rising wave.

And up!

Another slurry-shield. Keeping them and the archers and fire-ice flingers in one sweaty piece. For now.

Other fighters hadn't been so lucky. Two wooden ships had burned to the waterline, and Captain Jee's Suzuran had even more holes than the old freighter had started with. In some places metal glowed cherry-red, before it suddenly went dark in a shimmer of heated air.

Lieutenant Sadao, Katara realized. Had to be; she could see Zuko pulling a bigger version of that shift of heat just yards away, a flow of arms and feet that made the air around them cool enough to breathe again, snaking that shimmer up and around an airship's gantry-

Metal went white, bending with a scream of tortured steel.

It won't be enough. It won't be, it can't be, we're all going to die-

Katara swiped sweat out of stinging eyes, and yanked on her own hair to stop despair in its tracks. What was wrong with her? They were holding out. They had to hold out. Sozin's Comet only lasted one day...

And in that day, the Air Nomads perished.

No. No! I'm not going to quit. I'm not going to give up! Sokka needs me, everyone needs me - I will never turn my back on people who need me-!

In the water, something white gleamed.

The back of her neck prickled. A spirit!

Which had to be a good thing. They were fighting fire, anything from the ocean had to be help...

From the shore near the vault, a serpentine wake streaked across the harbor, waves cresting white as bone. Breaking through those waves were patches paler yet, like fish bellies in the moonlight.

Oh, no...

Not help. Not help at all.

It was one thing to hear Gran-Gran's stories of the Ocean's claim to the drowned. Something else to see dead flesh breach the surface, blind eyes turning toward the shore. To know that they were coming, they were coming for anything that breathed, and there was nothing she could do.

Yes. There is.

The despair was real. The fear was real; she felt its fingers gripping everyone around her, freezing the will to fight, to defy Ozai, to live.

It's real. But it's not mine!

This time, she knew what to do.

Dig deep. Find the tides in your own blood. Feel the true pull of the Moon, away from haunted water.

Reaching into the well of her soul, Katara called up anger.

Fire on the ice. The stench of burning flesh. Grief on Dad's face, on Sokka's face ...

Once this anger had almost torn her tribe apart.

This time, I'm going to save them.

The little waterbender thinks she can fight. Makoto slipped through the waves, calculating her options. The sea serpent lich might be impossible to control, but it'd been all too easy to rouse. All she'd had to do... was whisper.

Kurage-onibi. Come to me...

Flickering wisps and tendrils of light, the jellyfish-spirits had hastened to her call. All the spirits here knew of Asagitatsu's restless sleep. Now they felt the battle raging, threatening to wake the caldera in one mighty roar that would slay mortal and spirit alike. And one of Asagitatsu's own blood called them.

Blue-white stinging tentacles had drifted with purpose, scribing calligraphy in the depths. "What do you seek, dragon of Asagitatsu?"

Her claws had slashed the water, strokes of violet-blue luminescence. "I would restore water to Water. Bring the touch of the sea to the human-cave above, to the bones Ocean well knows. Do this, and I shall see Asagitatsu's wrath appeased."

Translucent bells had tipped toward her; acceptance.

Like a rumbling of flames, Makoto laughed. Foolish spirits. Alone, she might not tip the scales enough to hold the caldera to her will. But with Koh as her ally?

Fear, little Avatar. First I finish the humans here. Then I come for you!

Show no fear. Show no emotion at all.

Aang climbed the Spirit World's mountain slope to the cave, feeling Roku and Yangchen like hands on his shoulders. "Koh. We need to talk."

"My, my." A rustling of countless feet. "Such a short span of days since the last time you came calling. Why, if this happens again, I might almost think-"

A chitinous form coiled down from the ceiling, topped by a hauntingly lovely Water Tribe face.

"-That you missed me."

Drowned. Of course. Zuko kept heat moving, kept the flames off them, trying not to think too hard about what might happen if some of the venting flames blew out for a few minutes... long enough for gas to build up. Because the day just keeps getting better.

Yet in an odd, teeth-bared way, the day had gotten better. Because yes, the drowned were in Koh's power. But the harbor was in Asagitatsu's. It had to be taking a lot of power to overcome the volcano's resistance to the restless dead. He could feel Asagitatsu fighting it, in the way vented gases burbled and blazed. He could feel her fury prickling along the back of his neck, making every firebender in range jittery as over-boiled tea.

Koh's throwing his own power against us. And what does Uncle always say? If the enemy's closing with you, he's already lost!

This place, these people, this time - here was what Koh thought his greatest threat.

We have to hold. Less than a day left of Sozin's Comet. And the vents are taking the pressure off; if we can just keep the caldera steady a little longer, Asagitatsu won't go off for another thousand years. We have to hold!

And to do that... he had to do something about the drowned. Sergeant Kyo's team was good, but even Katara and a band of marines couldn't hold them back alone.

Agni, I hope the ice-throwers can keep the bombs off us just a little longer...

Tingzhe Wen pressed one palm to the ground inside the ancient ruin, feeling the earth tremble in echo of the fires roaring over the caldera. Asagitatsu was shuddering in her sleep, angry as a soul caught in someone else's nightmare.

Aren't we all.

He looked around his family, and beyond at the other civilians who hadn't headed up the mountain with the gliders. Everyone seemed to be calm. Well, as calm as could be reasonably expected, hiding out in the caldera wall and hoping that if Asagitatsu went up, it'd hold again this time.

No one's bleeding, and Huojin hasn't had to draw on anyone. I'll take it.

At least that odd silvery glow from one of the more buried rooms had stopped. Min had raised a stone wall to block the way, and stood fast to keep anyone from going down there. He was still at the tunnel entrance, keeping watch; and for once, Tingzhe had absolutely no intention of arguing with his headstrong son. The spirits were meddling enough around here already.

One day. We just have to survive one day.

He held Meixiang's hand, watching her stroke Jinhai's hair. Looked up at his beautiful, stubborn, determined daughters; Suyin with her knife, and Jia with her satchel of earth-healing scrolls. "We're going to be all right."

We have to believe.

"I know what you're doing, Koh. And it has to stop."

"Oh? Does it?" The spirit's mask slipped away to the fanged baboon, cackling. "Have you seen where you are, young Avatar? This isn't the living world, where mountains crack at your bidding. This is the realm of spirits! You have no more power here than a dying weed. Or even... a human."

Aang nodded, face carefully blank. Funny. It was hard not to show fear. But it was even harder not to show sadness. "And that's why you're angry. You don't think the Avatar Spirit should have become a human, do you?"

Like a susurrus of waves, the restless legs stopped.

Patient. I've got to be patient. He's been angry a really, really long time.

"Ah." Koh's mask shifted to an old man's careworn face, long mustaches wavering in chill wind. "But who am I to tell the spirit of the world what is not wise?"

Don't smile. Don't flinch. "I'm not sure. Why don't you tell me if I'm right?" Pause. Breathe, but don't smile. "You're the first of the World Spirit's children."

"Well, well, well."

Oh, that didn't sound like a happy laugh, not at all...

"Do you have any idea..." The centipede body coiled. "What it's like to always be the child of a child?"

Delayed by children. Ozai's eyes narrowed. Intolerable.

The Kyoshi Warrior's fighting skills weren't unexpected, even as she tore through his guards with fan and sword. No one faced his daughter and lived to tell of it by accident. But the Water Tribe boy-

The pulse of fire let him scramble ungracefully aside, just before the cabin's floor erupted in fiery metal shards.

Ozai sidestepped a last few tumbling bits of steel, fixing the edges of the holes in his memory. For once, he wasn't sad to see red armor falling broken...

A red helmet did spin into the empty sky, tearing hairs from a dark wolf-tail. But the boy himself teetered on bent metal for a hand-flinging heartbeat, then flailed his sword forward, throwing himself back to safety with an ungainly improvisation so familiar, Ozai wanted to snarl.

Piandao. You have much to answer for.

Oh, but the swordsman's own teachings could be this child's fatal flaw. One of Water, taught to go to war by Fire? The spirit in that body had to be unsettled. Uncertain of himself. Weak, in a way a chieftain's son would never expect.

You fight for a scattered, dying tribe. I strike with the will of a nation!

"So the Southern Water Tribe serves as an outcast prince's assassins," Ozai stated, cool and level as if he faced the boy from his own throne, instead of circling knife-edged gaps over an abyss. "Who would think he would sink so low, to hide behind the very barbarians we've destroyed?"

"Oh, were you aiming at Zuko?" The sword was too busy batting fire away to shrug, but the boy's voice did it for him. "Darn. We should have waited one minute more."

"A greater failure than I even imagined." One step more sideways, and breathe. "Taking such as you for allies; only my wife's blood could be that idiotic. Water could never be loyal!"

The comet's power was flame under his feet, launching him across the gap in one burst of fire-

"We can't be loyal?" The swordsman wove across the edges of metal, sliding away from his strike with a shriek of steel on armor. "You're the idiot, Ozai. You wouldn't know loyalty if it bit you. Oh wait, it did. Azulon thought you were a menace. Your son wants you dead. Even your crazy fire-breathing daughter ran for it!"

One leather-wrapped hand snatched at an overhead grab bar, yanking the swordsman up into a feet-against-against-the-bulkhead crouch. "We don't have a lot of idiots at the South Pole. So I just wanted to get a good look." Blue eyes were hard and ready. "You don't know about loyalty. You don't know about anything that doesn't fit your plan to burn everything you can't control. You don't know-" Fingers loosed, moved. "-Zuko's really good at throwing stuff right back in your face!"

Ozai ducked, as something angled and sharp whickered through the air, sailing out the opened porthole. And let his lips curl in a smile, as fire flickered around his fingers. "You missed."

"If I could go back in time eleven centuries, I'd kick myself." Langxue cursed under his breath as he worked on burned and frightened gliders, glaring at the mountainside that hopefully hid them from the firefight over Asagitatsu. He wanted to be there. He ought to be there. But if Aang was gone and Dragons' Wings fell and everything went wrong... airbending had to survive. Or the world would be out of balance forever.

And even with a mountain in the way, he could still feel that cold snaking through the harbor, rousing the drowned with each undulating wave. "Should have smashed that skeleton when I had the chance!"

"Skeleton?" Saoluan said numbly. Shook herself, and held her flask to the lips of their latest groaning patient where she shuddered on a stretcher. "Here, Ehuang. Takes some of the edge off."

"Gnrgh... landed wrong..." The girl coughed, and tried to get up anyway, twisted leg or not. "Need to get back up there. Teo's still up there!"

"Teo said you come down, you come down." Saoluan screwed the cap back on her flask, and gripped the girl's leg as Langxue moved in with water-wrapped hands. "Okay. Count to three for me? One, two-"

"Aaaugh!"

Langxue sank his will into the water of muscle and tendons, using blood and chi to seal jagged edges of bone back into their proper place. "Now. Cast."

Ehuang mumbled a few very unladylike curses, as one of the earthbender farmers from down the mountain molded clay around her shin and hardened it to slate. "You said on three!"

"No, I said count to three," Saoluan said firmly. "I'm not going to lie to a Temple kid."

"Oh." Ehuang blinked, woozy from the sudden drop in pain as water-healing numbed her. "'Kay..."

Saoluan almost dragged Langxue back from the stretcher, even as he looked around for any burns people had missed. "What skeleton!" she hissed.

Langxue raised an eyebrow.

"That skeleton?" From the way her eyes widened, Saoluan was probably as pale as her war-paint. "Guanyin's merciful veil... what do we do?"

"From here?" Langxue said wryly. "I'd have to spirit-walk. With Asagitatsu on edge, that's kind of the opposite of safe-"

Something flared in his heart, like one candle blazing on a moonless night. "Spirit-fire."

"The prince?" Saoluan whistled. "Is it going to be enough?"

One yāorén wielding spirit-flames, against all the drowned a revenant sea serpent could loose from the waters. One spirit-bender; even if he was a dragon-child, even if he was the caldera's lord.

And he's not, Langxue realized, chilled. He should be. But the volcano's wavering. Like it's listening to someone else-

Oh. Of course.

Eleven hundred years, and she's still killing. "We didn't dunk her in the spirit-ocean deep enough," Langxue snarled.

"Dunk who?" Saoluan persisted.

"Makoto!" And if Koh's ally was here-

Where is that face-stealing bastard?

"What you're doing is wrong."

"Is it?" A hissing inhale, like a snake-roach in a bad mood. "Even you would have to admit I don't want more than I'm owed, Avatar." Shadows seemed to shift like waves, as Koh flexed endless toes. "After all, you say the Air Nomads don't seek revenge. Yet you've helped so many humans chase after theirs. Jet. Chief Hakoda. Every Earth and Water soldier who set foot on a beach of Fire. Temul of Shu Jing; you let her have your friend Sokka, and she holds his spirit still. And that lovely woman Hama... who hated every child of fire that breathed, and herself most of all." Koh's voice dropped, a whisper of wind through dead leaves. "You let her have her revenge, little Avatar. You let her taint your precious little waterbender... and then you let her die."

No! Aang thought desperately. No, that's not true-

But it could be true. The way Koh saw it. Which made him no better than the ancient spirit, just going after what he wanted no matter how it hurt everyone around him...

No. That's not true. Think. Remember what you learned!

"Air Nomads don't seek revenge," Aang said plainly. "But revenge isn't what you're doing, Koh. Vengeance is awful, but it's supposed to have a purpose. It's supposed to make people stop." He took a breath. "But they can't stop if you don't tell them what they did wrong."

"Foolish child! They know-"

"No, they don't." He had to stay calm. He had to. "Asagitatsu killed Avatar Yangchen because she was there. And you set that up, I know you did, you and Makoto. And you watched while it killed everybody who cared about Yangchen, and I bet you thought that was really funny. All these humans knowing they were going to die, because they tried to help the Avatar put the world back together. Because they cared about her." Aang had to wet his lips. "And I bet you thought that was just - just fair. They got to hurt the way you do, all the time. Only they got to die, and forget. And you don't."

The mask-face was back, mouth opening slowly to bare gleaming fangs.

"You got them all killed," Aang got out, mouth dry. "And when they died - no one else remembered who you were. Who you really were. So nobody knew why you wanted revenge for Kesuk dying." He squared his shoulders. "And if they don't know why - they can't stop."

"That," a long, chuckling laugh, "is not my problem."

"Dad?" Min had slipped away from the tunnel entrance to crouch beside them, apparently convinced most benders would rather focus on strengthening their shelter than tearing down one spirit-blocking wall. "I'm sorry."

"You are, are you?" Tingzhe gave him a sidelong glance, and knew the glowstones gave enough light to catch his fond smile. "Humor an old professor, and tell me why?"

Min stared at him, incredulous. Suyin and Jia traded glances; Jia hid her smile with one graceful hand, while Suyin turned back to polishing her knife. Beside him, Tingzhe could feel Meixiang's shoulders shaking with silent laughter, as Jinhai abandoned chewing on a piece of jerky long enough to roll his eyes and give his big brother a look of older people are weird.

"It's been a very busy few months," Tingzhe said dryly.

"...I guess it has." Min looked his little brother in the eye. "Are you doing okay, shrimp? Agent Shirong says the Comet's really pushy."

"It is." Jinhai shuddered. "It's like dawns all piled up on top of each other in the middle of the night." He bit down on the jerky again. "Just wish it'd go away."

The earth rumbled, like something gnawing at Tingzhe's bones. He touched his wife's arm, and rose. "It will, Jinhai. We just need to be patient."

"I hate being-!" Jinhai looked around at other nervous families, and shrunk into Meixiang's arms. "...I don't want to be patient."

"Right now, neither do I," Tingzhe said plainly. "Practice your breathing. It might help." He followed Min back nearer to the tunnel, away from other embarrassing ears. "So. It has been a tumultuous few months..."

It was hard to tell in the green light, but he was fairly sure that darkening of Min's cheeks was a blush.

"Are you still worried about Ba Sing Se?" Tingzhe shook his head, and looked the young man in the eye. "You did what you thought best in very difficult circumstances. I wish I'd told you more, so you'd known more of what we were all getting into. But you did try."

"But I didn't do what was right." Min glanced aside, as if it was easier to get the words out by not looking at them. "I thought that as long as we was safe, it didn't matter what happened to anyone else. It wasn't my problem. They were the ones who brought the problem. And... I was wrong."

"Hmm." Tingzhe nodded, as if this were as serious as the fires threatening to crash down on all their heads.

And it is. How you make your choices, is how you live your life. I want my son to make the right choices. For all our sakes.

"And then I thought... I had to make up for... all the pretending," Min got out. "For Mom, and Jinhai, and... even Suyin."

Ah. Yes. "I can see why you felt you had to," Tingzhe stated. "I haven't always been the most honest of men, have I? We were always good citizens of Ba Sing Se." He nudged up his glasses. "Unfortunately, there was always a difference between being a good citizen and being an acceptable one."

"Yeah," Min admitted. "But - I was still wrong. We're Wens. That should have been enough. I should have let it be enough." His shoulders drooped. "I'm sorry... what?"

Tingzhe caught himself eyeing his son, and chuckled. "Well. If I know a young man of the Wen family - and I've known a few by now - you wouldn't be apologizing if you hadn't thought of some way to show you were serious."

"I - um..." Min brushed his hands over green sleeves. "You remember that excavating trick you showed us with rust, how you can find it where metal kind of falls apart into earth?"

"I believe I do," Tingzhe said, intrigued. He couldn't imagine what archaeology had to do with here and now, outside of a bit of a dig in reverse if something did bury them away from the surface. Perish the thought.

"Agent Shirong showed me the firebombs Captain Jee had on the Suzuran, so we'd know it if we felt one in the ground that didn't go off," Min said in a rush. "And I looked at the fuse. It's like a little firework."

Tingzhe adjusted his glasses. "Well, yes; I suppose that would make sense-"

"Fireworks are made with black powder. With coal," Min emphasized. "What if we yank the coal bits away from everything else?"

Tingzhe let out a low whistle. "How quickly can we get to the watchtower?"

Sharp as obsidian, the black blade whispered past Ozai's cheek.

Just close enough.

The boy was good. The boy was strong. But at the end of the day he was still a barbarian Water Tribe child, half-trained and half-grown.

Ozai wrapped burning fingers around a thinner wrist, and squeezed.

Bones crunched. Sweet and acrid scents of burning hair and flesh drifted up, as a black sword tumbled from numbed fingers.

Ah. Now this is war. "Pity. With a few more years, you might have been a dangerous opponent." And how convenient that the Water Tribesman was trying to cling to consciousness. This wouldn't have been nearly as much fun without a mind awake enough to feel the pain of burning alive.

"Sokka!"

"Suki!" The boy thrashed in his grip, trying to drive knees into his ribs; failing that, trying to bite. How uncivilized. "Just hit him already!"

"I doubt she will." Ozai smiled, and shrugged his arm, so the boy could feel his feet dangle over empty air. "That's why you'll always lose. Your kind don't know how to make necessary sacrifices." He breathed in smoky air. "And you never know when you've walked right into a trap."

As they had. Yes, five of his airships were burning as they fell. Yes, others were staggered and shaken. But there were still half a dozen converging on Zuko's exposed position, the iron casings of bombs gleaming dully as they fell through the Comet-lit sky...

Crump.

Iron smashed against an earthbender's wall of mud, crumpling like paper.

What?

Another crump, iron flattening like a feather. And another, and another...

"Steel's always been the Fire Nation thing, right?" The boy's left hand fumbled at the ragged edge, searching for a hold. "Ships. Coal platforms. Wall-boring drills." White teeth showed against dark lips, stained with blood. "So what are you going to do when metal bends?"

Impossible. No one bends metal. It's some kind of trick, it can't be-

"Sokka!" The Warrior was spinning, trying to get past his last guard, her armor slashed and seared. "Don't!"

Grabbing the edge, the boy yanked down.

Fool.

Ozai let himself fall through the air, releasing seared flesh with a smirk as he braced his chi and rose on blazing heels. The boy was already plummeting fast, blue eyes widening-

A whirring whicker in the air.

Thock.

Black.

The stink of wet and singed fur. Leather and wood, smashed into his nose to the point of pain. And a reassuring, low rumble, that told him the solid weight hurtling him through the air was going to stay there.

Sokka pried himself up off Appa's saddle edge with his left hand, just in time to catch a familiar v-shape of carved wood and bone tumbling away.

Fire Lord, two. Boomerang - win.

Flames snuffed out like a candle, as red and gold fell through the comet-lit sky.

"Don't feel bad," Sokka muttered under his breath. "Zuko fell for that one, too."

Dark as blood, silk struck phosphorescent water-

Sokka's eyes widened, and he jerked his gaze away, wishing he could bury himself in Appa's fur. Wishing, for one desperate moment, he was as blind as Toph.

Too late.

Dead hands in the water. Empty eye sockets. Snapping teeth.

...I am never, ever telling Zuko.

"It is your problem, Koh," Aang said steadily. "I'm the bridge between the living world and the spirits. I'm the one who sorts things out, so people and spirits can live together. And I'm telling you right now, your whole twisted game is over. You know they don't know what they did. You know there are humans who'd try to fix it if they did know what was wrong. And you didn't tell them. That means you're wrong." He crossed his arms, not flinching. "It's over. Now."

Like a shooting star, a fire in her heart flared and vanished.

No...

No warmth. No comforting force of a will to power twinned with Makoto's own, a will that had faced neglect and indifference and burned all the stronger, conquering, ready to take what his elder brother would never give.

No!

Emptiness. Her clan was gone. All of her blood who willed the humans' destruction were gone. This... this was not what Koh had promised.

He lied.

She knew he lied to Avatars. Taunted and teased them, enjoying all their frail human memories didn't know. She'd known he was lying to Wan Shi Tong, promising the owl all the knowledge ancient blood had hidden away, treasures the spirit hungered for yet could not touch alone. And she'd known the owl was a fool to think that was anything but a lie; that knowledge was born of human hands, and Koh hated everything with a drop of human blood.

But not my kin. Koh swore he would never touch them!

And - he hadn't.

He lied to me!

Shrieking, Makoto soared from the bloody waves. A beat of her wings and Koh's own borrowed power split the waters, pouring away from hastily shaped stone vaults.

Fire-ice. The fools created their own doom.

Like called to like. And even with her traitorous great-grandson's will tugging at the flames, she was still Asagitatsu's dragon.

Heart a blaze of cinders, Makoto spat fire.

Something's happened.

He could feel the yank of a strong hand on his thorn-embroidered collar, hear a marine's calculated curses as Lieutenant Teruko hauled him out of the front lines. And that was wrong, he needed to be there, the Drowned were boiling out of the water everywhere, salt lines weren't holding them back, his people needed him fighting-

But he'd seen a flash of sky-blue wings, washed to gray by the Comet's light. Felt the fires roar up in the harbor - and then everything had blurred.

Ground's shaking.

Not blurred. Double vision.

Caldera overlapped with caldera. The drowned were moaning. His people were shouting, fighting for their lives.

Asagitatsu was screaming.

"...Not listening!" Toph's voice, carried on the caldera's rumbles. Green robes overlapped with green light, as if the earthbender had roots into rock like a spirit-tree. Behind her was a moon-glow of blue, fierce as a storm. "Get him back, he can't fight if he can't even see straight-"

"Makoto." Zuko gripped Teruko's arm, hoping she heard him. Hoping anybody heard him. "She's going for Asagitatsu's heart. We've got to stop her!"

The marine's voice was distant, washed over by screams like waves on the shore. "Sir, dragon... out there... no chance to get to the island..."

"No." Zuko swallowed, throat dry. "Not in this world." He blinked, trying to focus on flesh and bone, instead of the chi-push of the Comet and Asagitatsu's demanding scream. Tried not to shake at what he knew he was going to have to do. "Look after me."

Reaching inward, he fell away from the world.

"Oh no, little Avatar." It was almost a purr. "No. It's only just begun."

Chapter 90

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

A cold wind seemed to blow through Azula's soul, even with Ursa's hand on her shoulder. The throne room's flames flickered, faded-

Went out.

Azula let a breath sigh out of her, as her mother stifled a moan that mingled sorrow and weary relief. She didn't know what to do. She didn't know what to feel.

I never know what to feel. What else is new?

It was like scraping your knees in a fall you saw coming. It hurt, but it wasn't surprising. From the intelligence Mai and Ty Lee had assembled, and the generals Azula herself had made sweat, Fire Lord Ozai had taken the airship fleet north with the expressed intent of ending the "Water Tribe menace" once and for all.

Right, Azula thought dryly. Because that worked so well the last time.

Admittedly, it was summer, and Sozin's Comet was here. Fire would never be stronger. But if the Northern Tribe really did have the giant water spirit monsters some of the classified reports had mentioned, and the Avatar were anywhere in the vicinity...

Game, set, and match.

It hurt. It wasn't fair. She didn't want this to be real.

But not wanting her brother to be an idiot had almost killed both of them. Not wanting Ty Lee to be bound to an Air Nomad's stupidity had almost killed her. And not wanting Mai to ever, ever leave her had almost driven away one of the few people who'd ever called her a friend.

I am the trueborn heir of Fire Lord Ozai. What I want... isn't as important as what my people need.

Azula straightened her shoulders, and looked at her little court; airbender, noble girl, and the Fire Lord's widow. "Summon the Fire Sages." There was steel in her soul. But the next words hurt. "Fire Lord Ozai is dead."

Ivory bones curved up into the sky, water knitting around them like sinew and flesh. Cold light gleamed in huge eye sockets, puffed like a whale's breath from the top of the skull.

It's as big as a great whale, Katara realized, heart drumming like storm waves on the shore. The whale-killers, the legends... the wolves of the sea...

Legends she'd never heard, until Master Pakku had picked up a drum one long night and chanted an ancient story. And she'd thought it could only be a story. There wasn't anything in the sea that could hunt down a whale and tear it apart. Only humans did that.

Bone claws struck the harbor, and a razor wave sliced toward Suzuran.

No!

Katara slapped air to send it off-course, stiffened it with her will to make the wave ice. She'd seen plenty of Fire Nation attacks; if seawater struck steel that was already heated red-hot-

Some did.

Metal screamed like the dying.

"There you are, tide-child."

Silence, in the blue lightning-flickers of eyes. She couldn't hear the fires. She couldn't hear the screams. There was just the endless quiet of the deep, like slipping down through storm waves to clear, dark water...

No! Aang didn't let us drown then. I won't let us drown now!

Fire and steam vents and an over-the shoulder roll taking him behind a jagged lump of basalt-

Zuko held his breath as the fire and heat went past, unwilling to risk a sword of flame burning his lungs to ash. He'd pestered Langxue with questions about the spirit-shore any moment they'd both had time, but far too often the younger yāorén's answer had been I don't know.

Could Makoto's breath of fire shred him from the inside out? He didn't know. Could she kill him here? Yes.

I'm not going to die that easily.

Flame hot enough to melt rock gave him his own weapons. He swirled a ball of molten glass between two hands, flung-

Blue wings beat hard, lifting Makoto clear of golden glass. She swooped... and tumbled sideways, caught in a gust of sudden steam.

Zuko was moving anyway, eyes on the shaking ground while he listened to the sky. Everything was as red-lit here as it would be in the real world, but hotter than it had ever been since they'd come to Asagitatsu's caldera. Hot enough to make his head swim; almost too hot to breathe, even when there wasn't fire coming at him...

A shimmer was his only warning. He dodged cracked earth as it crumbled, yanking his left arm even farther back; and never mind it screwed up his balance, if that was what he thought it was-

Augh!

Not burned; though he'd feel like he had the mother of all close calls tomorrow, and if there was a hair left on his arm that hadn't gone up in smoke, it was probably praying not to be noticed.

Superheated gas. Oh, joy. Guess I should just be glad it isn't on fire...

A beat of wings.

He held still even as it grew louder, trying to place exactly where he was.

It looks a little like the shore away from the harbor. If it decided to get set on "furnace". But I can't see the water, and there's a whole freaking volcano where the island cone should be-

Oh.

Rock groaned, tearing beneath his feet. He dodged right, letting the up-thrust take Makoto's next breath.

This is Asagitatsu. The way she used to be, before she killed an Avatar.

"I know you're wrong." Aang held a mask's gaze, face still with an effort that felt worse than trying to earthbend all of Ba Sing Se. "You know you're wrong. So why are you doing this?"

The chuckle was loud and long and shook his bones like an avalanche of ice. "Because I can."

"Okay."

He wasn't going to smile. He was not going to smile, even though the startled look on Koh's face was priceless.

"That's all I wanted to know," Aang said simply. "If that's how you want to play... then I guess you can't complain when I do this." He breathed in, and out.

Everything is connected.

And if that was true - then even here in the spirit world, he could reach out to his friends. "Katara? Go get 'em."

Sound was the crackle of the flames. The grit of stone on stone as Toph smashed waterlogged bodies. The wail of the wind, the roar of her own heart beating-

My heartbeat. My blood. Nobody bends it but me!

It felt like swimming through swamp muck. But Katara took her stance, and raised arms heavy as lead. Not a flowing movement, but hard and sharp and solid as the strikes she'd made half a year ago, screaming at Sokka and shattering an iceberg.

Ice groaned out of fire-dotted waters, catching bones in a glacial pincer.

Laughter echoed in her skull, as bone-claws tore rivulets of water from her trap. "You can't fight water with water!"

"I'm not." One deliberate step forward. Two. Not Master Pakku's stance. More the precise steps she'd seen Toph use, through long months of trying to save the world.

I'm not fighting water. I'm fighting the sea. The dark sea, that tries to suck you under and give nothing back. And the only escape from that is... land.

"Hey Toph!" Katara's grin was sharp and hard as an ice shelf. "Ever see a mountain made out of ice?"

She squeezed her hands together, ice groaning against struggling bones.

What glaciers do best, is grind.

Lava and rumbling and darkness; between the smoke and the cracking, shifting basalt shooting up and falling underfoot, it was like trying to run blindfolded through the Catacombs-

Fire lanced out of the sky.

Except the Catacombs didn't have flying dragons in them.

Zuko dodged behind what had been a towering pine. Now it was just another crackling tree of fire, like the rest of the forest that had once clothed Asagitatsu's mountain. It shattered in Makoto's blast, a whirl of cinders and flaming limbs cascading down like rabid fireworks.

Great. I need cover from my own cover. Zuko rolled, beating out sparks on his robe, trying not to swear. Though between the moan of tortured rock and the high scream of fiery gasses tearing free from the lava, even a dragon would have a hard time hearing him.

How can she do this? Asagitatsu was her mountain, and the mountain's screaming. If we don't do something she's going to kill everything-

But he already knew how. He'd lived with Azula.

Dark dragons only care about what's theirs. I took Asagitatsu away from her.

Killing everything might be just what Makoto wanted.

I've got to stop her. I've got to get Asagitatsu to listen.

I have to get to the heart of the mountain.

Not that that looked possible, with an enemy that owned the sky-

A howl tore at his ears, as he dodged behind an uplifting ridge.

...And maybe the sky's not too happy about that.

Serpentine blue arced in a wingover, shimmering like a mirage as Makoto dodged a sudden updraft from the rent stone.

He had to dive away from the ridge himself, before the pure heat radiating from new stone cooked him like an egg. He could redirect heat if he were standing still, but given he couldn't stand still he had to move or be air-crisped royal fire flakes-

Wait a minute.

Feeling the heat through his robes, Zuko smirked.

We're going to make it, Min chanted to himself, clapping stone blocks together to squash drowned bodies as his father delicately yanked the coal and sulfur out of bomb after falling bomb. We have to make it...

But it was like trying to fight the sea. So many bloated fingers. So many grinning skulls. So much armor, dripping slime and seaweed. He could see other fighters holding against the tide closer to the shore, little knots of stone and fire and steel... but they were human, and tiring. And their enemy was already dead.

Guanyin, please... don't let them get past us...

The world was on fire, and it wasn't enough.

Make them burn. Makoto beat her way through volcanic gusts, seared wings no match for the grief and fury tearing her heart. Make them pay...

It wasn't enough, for the child of her child. It could never be enough.

But if Shidan's get had drained off some of the pressure under the mountain, they hadn't drained off nearly enough. Prod the spirit to erupt, and the north would burn.

If she could only reach it.

A year ago this flight would have been over in moments. No other dragon held a claim on Asagitatsu's heart. None would dare.

But now the mountain itself fought her; cinders burning her eyes, brimstone eating at her lungs. Angry and in pain, the volcano-spirit still knew who'd bound it to slumber unknowing. And who'd awakened it, granting Asagitatsu the right to choose.

Damn all yāorén!

Powerful creatures; yet they were crippled by their own youth. They'd had no time to learn the ways of the spirit-shore. She'd seen to that. It'd taken three of them to beat her last time. This time... she scented only one.

Shidan's cub.

The boy who'd turned on his own blood. The whelp who'd dared to wrest Asagitatsu's will away from hers.

You... you laid this trap for the blood of my blood.

I will kill you, little yāorén.

She had to. Asagitatsu might not erupt while another will begged her to spare his clan. Or she might only erupt slowly, fitfully, granting the humans about her caldera some slim chance to escape.

That, Makoto would never allow.

Below, a bit of red fluttered from rock to rock, trying to keep to cover as a dragon-child sought Asagitatsu's heart.

Clever. But not clever enough.

Snarling, Makoto twisted into a dive.

If this doesn't work, I am so dead.

Zuko shot a few precise bolts of flame; the tiny fire-darts that would burn a hole through a bow, or even pierce armor with a needle of fire. Flame-darts that flew high and far...

And fizzled out, at least a hundred feet below blue claws.

Now run!

Dragons knew how far they could breathe. Which was - for a dragon Makoto's age - much farther than a teenage firebender could bend. A firebending master like Iroh might have been able to reach her. Maybe.

And now she's sure about that - oh, shi-!

He dove into a roll as thin basalt cracked under him, almost trapping his foot between grinding rocks and lava. He didn't think his ankle was broken, but the way it was screaming at him he couldn't be sure-

He spun as he rolled, a sweep of one hand curling Makoto's next breath away and over him.

Move, keep moving, don't stop!

Mountain firebending would have stopped there, only deflecting the flames. He turned with them instead, ignoring seared skin, scooping up fire and lava-heat and the watery shimmer of superheated air tearing up into the heavens...

Toph had held a mountain rooted with her own stubborn will. He just had to get a mountain's rage to reach out and swat the sky.

And if there's one thing I can do - it's annoy anything.

The heat he scooped up chilled the lava, like an ice-needle stabbing into an abscess. He felt Asagitatsu yelp.

Then lava and flames roared from rent basalt, a torrent of flaming gases arching toward the sky.

It was like bending burning leaves. Only much.

Much.

Hotter...

Gyaahhh!

The heat was like diving into lava. She was an ancient dragon, she could survive that - but not unprepared.

How did he - how could he-?

Eyes were shut against the flames; nostrils sealed against gases that would have boiled her from the inside out. But she was a dragon, she could feel her own fire in the heated air. Vertigo wouldn't kill her. And the heat wouldn't have time to kill her.

Blood boiling, Makoto almost chuckled. Kill a dragon with flame? What did he think he was? Oh, he could hurt her. And she would have to retreat. For now.

Silly yāorén. You gave me my own escape.

Superheated air. Air so hot it reflected.

Claws sliced an arc, and the sky became a mirror.

Trailing smoke, the blue dragon hit shimmering air. And vanished.

I don't believe it. I don't - after all that, she - argh!

He took deep breaths. And tried not to choke on the sulfur in the air. He couldn't help seeing red - Sozin's Comet, there was red light everywhere - but he could try to hang on and think.

So she got away. She's hurt, and she's out of the spirit-shore. She won't be back here in a hurry. That means we've got time-

Basalt splintered under his feet. Zuko jumped, rolled; half-rolled back, an acid bite of brimstone the only hint before another vent tried to barbecue him. Got halfway to his feet, and crouched there, trying to figure out which way to run as the mountain itself howled in agony.

...Just, not very much of it.

It burned, like ice in a cut. It tried to steal Katara's breath, like hailstorm air. It was bone and age and hatred, for the human-lives who'd kept it dry and powerless to kill...

I am the last Southern waterbender. Katara moved trembling hands past each other, a hairs'-breadth at a time. I am proof... that the world... will not kill us!

Ice closed, like a mountain falling. Groaned, still sliding. Blue light danced along its surface, like storm-fire on a ship's mast-

Sparked, and died.

An ivory powder of bone dusted out, and blew into fiery wind.

Hands shaking, Katara wiped the sweat off her brow. Gone. It's gone. Now we just have to-

Out of the water, more dripping hands reached.

Oh boy...

Quiet.

...Well, mostly quiet. If you didn't count the splitting rock, and thunder-rumble of magma, and screaming gas vents.

She's got to be in here somewhere... "Asagitatsu!" Zuko called to the wind. "Brave lady! Mountain-heart! Your people call to you! They seek you, to do you justice!"

Basalt grated over itself. Here, there, everywhere.

No. I can't fail. People need me! "Please," Zuko whispered to the wind. "Help me find you. Help me help you."

At his feet, rock broke open, sparks flying-

In a hissing vent, a familiar blue flame bloomed.

Zuko caught the tiny flame in his hand, gladly feeding it with his own strength. "Can you take me to her?"

Flame ebbed and brightened; a silent nod.

It wasn't that much farther.

The great dragon lay in a broken field of lava, burnt and bleeding. Filmy eyes blinked at him, as her scaly hide writhed with the forces within.

She's going to blow. We didn't have enough time, the Comet's too close...

No. He'd come this far. He was not giving up now. He knew fire and water. He knew how to make them work together.

Now I just need to get them apart.

A red dragon and a white. He pictured them in his mind. Reached out to Asagitatsu's massive head, and beyond to the fire and water within...

You don't have to be apart forever. Just - fly in tandem.

Fire and water and chi. All he needed to heal, was here.

The volcano's spirit tilted her head, and breathed.

The world was warm.

Not hot. Not burning. Just warm all over, like Toph was standing in the sun. Warm and suddenly quiet; as if the drowned suddenly couldn't sense who to attack, because the whole world was holding its breath...

So still.

The ground thrummed under her feet, like burbling magma had suddenly calmed and settled into one steady flow. There was a crackling far away across the water, from the cone of Asagitatsu; but it was a measured crackling, like a watched fire, as the pressure under her feet spoke of hot stone there pushing up and up...

Something pulsed in the rock, like a shudder of hot mud.

Uh-oh. "Everybody, get down!"

Toph yanked Shirong down with her, as every vent blazed at once.

Spirit-flames. Teruko stared, wide-eyed, as heatless white fire leapt from vents to defenders to lurching dead bodies. Where the flames passed, the wounded took a second breath, and the dead crumbled into pure gray ash.

The ground was still shaking under everyone's feet, but her heart soared. This wasn't the jagged, deep quakes of an oncoming fire-cloud eruption. These quakes were shallow, steady; matching the pulse of hot black lava pushing up out of Asagitatsu's cone.

We did it. Frost and ice it, we did it! It's an earth eruption, not water-lava. Oh, Agni...

"...Ow."

She almost missed it in the sheer noise of a hundred beleaguered defenders striking back. But the spirit-flames leaping to swords and stones and armor were letting them all beat back the drowned, enough for her to take a moment for the wobbly young lord trying to sit up.

He looks terrible.

Singed hair, and coughing, and suspiciously reddened skin on his left hand. But he was alive. Which was more than you could say about a lot of people after a spirit-walk. "Sir!"

"Makoto's down," Zuko got out. Coughed again, and blinked at the chaos around them. Smirked in satisfaction, as waterlogged bodies vanished in steam and white flames-

And swore like a sailor as yet another airship bomb hurtled at them, deflected at the last minute by somebody's hastily-raised block of basalt. "I don't believe it. They're still shooting at us?"

Teruko wanted to sit on him. He was pale, chilled, and who knew what else walking with the spirits had cost him.

But he won't stay down. Not while we're in trouble.

She dropped him a wink instead. "No rest for the wicked, sir."

"Oh, hell." Her commander creaked to his feet, familiar scowl on his face. "We already got through a volcano, a dragon, and the Face-Stealer's little army." His good eye narrowed. "Might as well make it a clean sweep."

Asagitatsu's fires were long miles away, but Aang could still feel them. Hot. Clean. Burning away the loss and pain tying the drowned to Koh, deflating the Face-Stealer's stolen power in a clatter of chitin.

Fangs gnashed, never quite touching him, as Aang held his face immobile. "This... doesn't matter," Koh hissed, coiling endless legs. "I am old, and powerful, and wronged. You can't stop me!"

"Yes, I can," Aang said flatly. "If you're going after humans for killing the Avatar - and that's kind of screwed up, given you've been trying to do the same thing - I'm the one who got wronged. I get to say who takes revenge for me. And who doesn't. And I don't need revenge." The airbender crossed his arms, decision final. "Because I forgive them."

Koh's eyes glowed, hateful red. "They wronged the entire spirit world-!"

"And how much did the Avatar wrong them, wrong every spirit, when Kesuk went crazy?" Aang said sternly. "They did the best they could. That's what humans do. If fire's not wrong when it burns people, and water's not wrong when it drowns them, then humans aren't wrong for trying to fix things." He paused, just long enough to let the next words sink in. "Because they can."

Reports from Chief Arnook's runners said the Avatar was still by the Spirit Oasis, eyes glowing. Hopefully, that was a good sign.

Iroh looked over the battlefield - ice and soot and water sloshing through the city where it shouldn't - and hoped it was a very good sign. They'd brought down most of the airships, between the White Lotus and a host of Northern waterbenders. And once any ship came within a few hundred feet of the ice, he and Jeong Jeong could sear enough of the gasbags to make sure it stayed down. Piandao was fighting alongside the Northern Tribe's warriors against those who made it to land, and that was all the better; no few soldiers who saw the legendary swordsman bearing down on them surrendered on the spot.

But there were still some airships flying, and so many of the folk he'd fought beside were burned and bleeding...

His head came up. Something in the battle had shifted.

Through clouds of smoke and ice-mist, he saw an airship banking south.

Can it be?

First one. Then two, and finally a half-dozen survivors. Sooty, bedraggled, limping as the wind pushed them... the airships rose, and sailed away.

Brushing back sweat-damp hair before it could freeze, Iroh saw Chief Arnook stalk through the snow toward him. "Is it over?" the weary chief asked.

"It may be." Iroh stroked his beard, conscious of the soot staining it. "It will be some hours before the comet is fully gone. I would keep a watch on the walls, in case they decide on a second assault... but for now, one might consider sending those of spiritual power to Avatar Aang's side, in case he may need our aid." He inclined his head to the chief. "Which is where I intend to go."

"I am sure he will appreciate your presence." Arnook's gaze looked over ruins of ice and smoke, unutterably weary.

"Speak plainly," Iroh requested. And did his best to soften it with a smile. "Avatar Aang has had words with the White Lotus on the keeping of secrets. And we are allies."

"For now," the chief agreed. "But if the Fire Nation is gone... I expect you soon will be, as well."

Iroh nodded, slow and deliberate. "An expectation? Or a hope?"

"You, and Avatar Aang, have done your best to defend us." The chief's smile was sad. "But this is the home of the Moon and Ocean, the stronghold of Water. If you'd never come here, would the Fire Nation have dared to attack us?"

"They would have," Iroh said gravely.

"I believe you. But... my heart is not so wise." Arnook looked up, to the red-black sky. "It will take my people years to recover from this."

Ruined houses. Ruined lives. Nothing Iroh hadn't seen before, in long years of campaigning.

But they were never my people's houses, Iroh realized. My duty as a general was to take and hold our enemies' land. Never to care for it afterward.

As Zuko cared for Dragons' Wings. He had seen the aftermath of Fire Nation assaults across the Eastern Continent. He had known what Ozai's attack would do to his people.

And he would not leave them to face that alone.

The chief sighed, voice almost soundless. "I know this war isn't the Avatar's fault. Yet a part of me still wishes he'd never come."

And Iroh knew that tired rub of knuckles across a knotted brow. He'd seen it from his nephew, on too many late watches to remember. On too many days, chasing the Avatar.

I'm tired. Beyond tired. I just want the world to go away.

But people need me. I can't stop. Not yet.

Even when he'd been laying siege to Ba Sing Se, Iroh couldn't remember ever being that tired.

Be well, Zuko. I will return. And when I do - I think it is high time that you spoke, and I listened.

"Suki, jump!"

She landed in the saddle behind him with an oof, and a few muttered swears that would have had Gran-Gran washing her mouth out with snow. Frankly, Sokka didn't blame her. Landing on Appa from the air was never fun. Add in that the big guy hated fire, and there was all kinds of fiery mayhem and ominous airships to dodge.

Sokka patted the base of a horn, trying to keep his voice calm. "Good job, buddy."

Suki gripped the edge of the saddle, smudges all over her face and scorch marks across borrowed armor. "What do we do now?" she called up to him, as the half-wrecked airship they'd swooped away from lurched to the windward. "We can't just tell them the Fire Lord's dead!"

Good point. Though some of them would know he was dead. Sokka could feel it in the way he breathed easier, like getting out of smoky air.

I'm going to have a long, long talk with Dad.

Right now, though, he was going to use this. Half the airship fleet was still sailing, but in tatters. Anybody high enough in the command chain to be loyal to Ozai had just suddenly come unmoored. Drifting. And Dragons' Wings was on fire but still stubbornly there, the drowned collapsing in white flames, steam pouring from a hundred vents, and ice and rocks and fire sailing up whenever a good target got in range.

Asagitatsu's still here. It's the height of the comet, the time when she should be erupting - and we're all still here.

They're beaten. They just don't know it yet.

"C'mon buddy!" Spying circling specks above, Sokka tugged the reins up and left. "Yip yip!"

"Sokka!" Teo called from under painted wings; the wind seemed to carry the words right to their ears. "We're out of bombs-"

"We don't need bombs!" Sokka jerked a thumb back toward tattered gasbags. "All they need is one more push!" He held the reins one-handed, sketching the flight path in the air the way he'd seen Aang do before the gliders had first driven the Fire Nation off their mountain. "What do you think?"

Teo nodded, and wagged his wings to gather the few gliders still flying into formation. "I think you'd better take the lead. Appa pulls a lot of air!"

"Yeah, he does!" Grinning, Sokka guided the sky bison around, watching wings fan out at the corners of his vision.

"What are we doing?" Suki looked at him, and the airships, and the blood-glittering sea beyond the arc of Asagitatsu's harbor. "They sail the wind. Like ships! We're going to be fighting the land breeze-"

"And we've got a whole volcano to do it with!" Sokka clenched a fist, feeling the hot air funneling up and in front of them like the mother of all dust-devils. "Push 'em into the sea, guys!"

They were a tsunami of air. An avalanche of steam. And nothing could stand against them.

"This changes nothing!"

"I don't know; I kind of think it changes everything." Aang took a deep breath, and drew himself up in Master Gyatso's best laying-down-the-law sternness. "Asagitatsu's not going to blow. The Fire Nation isn't going to burn down the world. And the rest of the world isn't going to wipe out every firebender. I'm going to make sure of it."

Ape-lips pulled back in a fanged snarl. "Whatever you may claim for the World Spirit, there's no way you can stop human revenge." Clawed legs flexed, reaching spider-slow toward him. "Little Avatar..."

"Yes, there is." Aang covered his fist with his palm; bowing as a Temple Elder would, to pass on unpleasant news. "The world's been out of balance a long time. I can't fix all of it now. Maybe it'll take my whole life. But there are two things I can fix. Kyoshi's decree is over! Anyone born of Fire can give their loyalty wherever they choose to! And you..." Aang straightened, fixing the Face-Stealer with his best Wang Fire glare, and never mind if that was showing emotion. He was the Avatar, and for once the World-Spirit was going to get off its spiritual duff and act like a teacher. "You are going to go to your room!"

In a sulfur-cloud of black smoke, Koh fell.

Out of cinders, blue scales gleamed. Claws reached. Stone rattled.

"I knew you'd come out somewhere."

Wings rustled under the ash, struggling to gain room to fly-

"Eleven hundred years." The young yāorén looked down on his enemy with ancient eyes. "No more murders in the dark. Ever again."

Langxue reached out to steamy wind, and struck.

Chapter End Notes

Zuko is a Reluctant Hero; Aang is The Messiah. That means Aang gets to save the world.

Zuko just gets to save his part of it.

...And darn it, if the Messiah doesn't believe in violence, he should find a way to save the world without using violence. And yes, that does include not beating up the leader of the bad guys. Even if he doesn't kill them.

Chapter 91

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Smoke hazed the horizon, as it had for days. Hakoda could taste it as his ships edged past ever-burning fires and the occasional bit of wreckage to ease through the throat of the harbor. Looks like the stone dock came out the worst, he thought, raising his spyglass to eye cracked and seared rock crumbling in various precarious places. I would have thought the wood would fare worse, but somehow they fire-proofed it... Oooof.

The glass let him focus on Suzuran's scarred side; he had to shake his head that the ship was still afloat. "What happened to them?"

"Fire and ice." Iroh settled his hands deeper in red sleeves, eyes haunted. "I have seen such wounds before, on ships of old."

"Ozai didn't send everybody to the North." Aang bit his lip, and gripped the railing a little harder. "You're sure we can anchor out here, away from the dock? I know ships drift a little, and there are all these fires..."

"There are a lot of them." Hakoda took another look across the stretch of water he'd picked as an anchorage. "But they're predictable. We'll have enough room."

"Good. Because... I'm not going on shore."

Iroh sighed. "Aang. The war is over-"

"This doesn't have anything to do with the war." Aang squinted past him toward the charred and green slopes, shaking his head. "I beat Koh by telling him I was going to fix things. And if I'm going to fix things between the Fire Nation and everybody else, I need to make sure people keep their promises. And that means I have to keep mine. Zuko doesn't want me in his domain. I'm staying out of it." He let out a slow breath, ruffling the water. "But if you could give him my regards... oh, heck, I don't even know the right Fire Nation way to say that. Just - he wants me out, I'm out. I just want to know if everybody's okay..." He brightened, as a shadow moved with the wind. "Appa! Down here, buddy!"

Hakoda shaded his eyes to study the full saddle, and chuckled. "Looks like you'll know soon enough."

"Ooo, why does war have to be so messy!" Fuming, Suyin dunked yet another tunic into the washtub. Shook soapy water off her hands, and heaved a sigh. "Okay, go for it."

Jia rubbed her palms against each other, back and forth. In the tub, a shaped stone spire moved to her will, sloshing water and cloth in a steady motion.

Suyin grinned, and set to work checking through the next load for any spots that needed a little extra soap. No more scrubbing and scrubbing and scrubbing. This is the best idea ever.

Jinhai flopped down by their garden wall; up, but not shaped and pretty yet, in the wake of putting too many buildings back together. "I'm bored."

"So am I," Jia said happily. "No volcanic rumbles under us, no airships over us, no emergencies in the healing wing, no restless spirits swarming up out of the sea to attack us. Everything's very, very boring."

Jinhai scowled at both of them, and rolled his eyes. "...Girls are so weird."

"Yeah?" Suyin dried off her hands, and picked up the little pile of leather she'd left safely off to one side. One pouch of fern-spore powder to strap to her forearm, under her sleeve. One pair of metal thimbles, for thumb and forefinger.

Snap.

Puffs of flame, close enough to make her bratty little brother scramble backward.

Suyin grinned. "So how boring is this?"

Jinhai picked his jaw off the ground. "...How'd you do that?"

"Maybe if you ask Mom nicely, she'll tell you." Suyin winked. "Now, how about some hints on how to make this look like firebending, little brother?"

Maybe the war was over. The Avatar was out in the harbor, and nobody was shooting at each other, so with luck it was. But in case somebody hadn't gotten the word...

Anybody who comes after my little brother, has to go through me first.

"Go to your room? Seriously?" Sokka scratched at his hair, watching Aang get buried under hugs. Even Suki got in on the action, grinning like the sun rising. And there was something rattling in a shadowed corner near the railing; maybe hidden in a coiled hawser, even though anything that could be that loud shouldn't fit.

Sokka wasn't going to look that way too hard. No sense asking for trouble.

"It worked on me," Aang grinned. "I thought, why not?" His brows scrunched down. "I'm going to have to go into the Spirit World and visit him once in a while."

"Whaaaat?"

...Yep. By the way Sokka's ears were ringing, he wasn't the only one who'd yelled that.

"You don't act like somebody's teacher and then go off and leave them." Aang worked his airstaff around and around in his grip as if someone had carved on the secrets of the universe when he wasn't looking. "If the World Spirit's his parent, then..." The tips of his ears reddened. "Sometimes, when you steal apples out of the orchards, or go out riding after dark - it's because you want to be sure someone's paying attention. And - at least since Kuruk went looking for his wife - the Avatars haven't."

Sokka traded a glance with his sister and girlfriend, and saw Toph clap a hand to her forehead in pure disbelief. "Um. Aang," he said warily. "I know you think somebody ought to feel responsible for this, but..."

"What he's trying to say is, be careful." Katara touched his hand, just above white knuckles. "You just had a big fight with him, right? Then you need to give him some time to calm down and think it over anyway. So get some rest first. Then think about when you should go talk to him again."

Aang's shoulders drooped. "I wanted to talk to him..."

"How about spirit-letters?" Suki put in. "I... well, I don't write them a lot, but every year... you write them for everyone who's passed on, and burn them to send them to the spirit world. Do you think that would work?"

"Huh." The airbender chewed his lip. "But he wouldn't be able to write back. And I want him to understand."

"You can't make people understand anything," Toph shrugged. "Just look at Sparky. He had to beat his head against a stone wall forever before he started figuring things out."

"He sent you a message," Sokka stuck in, while Aang was chewing on that unwelcome fact. "They got most of the pressure out of Asagitatsu. He's not making any promises about walking on shore, but he's pretty sure as long as you don't do anything noisy, the volcano's going to ignore you."

Aang whistled, shoulders thrown back in relief. "Well, that's something. I was worried I was going to have to get off the ship, so Chief Hakoda and everybody would be okay." He grinned. "He sent a message? Awesome! Who knows? Maybe if I'm good enough at keeping a promise, Zuko and I can be friends again!"

Toph poked their airbending buddy with one small finger. "Again kind of implies you were friends before."

"Well..."

Eh, it'd been a long year for all of them. Aang had earned a rescue. "Who knows?" Sokka shrugged. "War's over. Anything could happen."

"Er, let me be sure I understand this correctly." A bit dazed, Earth King Kuei adjusted his glasses. "You want Master Sergeant Yakume to stay?"

Behind him, he could almost feel Agent Bon's carefully hidden amusement. Eshe wasn't even trying to hide her smile, gray eyes dancing as a Lower Ring Guard captain crossed his arms stubbornly - then caught himself, and sketched an awkward, unpracticed bow. "Yes, sir. Your majesty. The Guard's still short-handed and the citizens are cranky and there's no way we're getting the Fire Army out of here in a hurry even if Captain Taka does have orders. We need somebody attached to the Guard who can break Fire Nation heads legally." An Lu-shan cleared his throat. "Besides. We've got almost enough evidence to nail a bunch of smugglers who've been weighting their flour sacks with lead, and I want to catch these bastards. Um. Sir."

The Fire Army soldier was almost smoldering in his armor, knee flexed to take some of the weight off a healed leg. "Don't I get a say in this?"

Captain Lu-shan tried to look innocent. "What, you don't want to catch them?"

"That's not the point!"

Safely out of range of a kick, one of Lu-shan's street guards sighed. "Squadroom's just not the same without Huojin," Officer Yaoju said regretfully. "Your temper's almost as bad, though."

Majestic, Kuei told himself. He had to look majestic. Even if he did want to snicker. "I understand you're from Onsenzakura, Master Sergeant?"

That drew an even darker scowl. "Yes?"

"As I understand the maps, your colony is reasonably close to Dragons' Wings, by the sea route," Kuei said thoughtfully. "Ba Sing Se wants to keep close ties to our relatives there, and to the Northern Air Temple gliders. If we could establish friendly ties to people along the way... I think there's going to be a lot of trade going both ways in a few years."

"Wouldn't know anything about that," Yakume said bluntly. "I'm just a soldier."

"A soldier who's done his best to adhere to the letter and spirit of the law he was charged to enforce. Despite a lot of death on both sides." Kuei folded his hands. No giggling, he told himself sternly. "As it happens, your Captain Taka already provided a list of personnel to help... manage the withdrawal. You and Captain Sanya are on my agents' short list of Fire soldiers we can trust to handle the job. If the Guards of the Lower Ring are willing to put up with you, I'd be happy if you honored their trust." He smiled, just a little rueful. "Or I can have you shipped back to the Fire Army lines in a block with a chisel. A very small chisel."

Silence. For a moment Kuei's heart clenched; hundreds of them had sworn to him, but maybe he didn't know Fire people at all-

A snort of laughter, and Yakume shook his head. "Maybe you can hold this city after all." He inclined his head. "Good luck, your majesty. I'll try to be one less headache for you." He cut a glance at Lu-shan. "Though I can't speak for the captain."

Lu-shan sketched a quick bow to his king, and hared after the man. "Since when am I a headache, you cranky little fish-gnawer?"

"Since always, noodle-slurper..."

Eshe's smile was warm. "Should we invite them to the wedding, my bear-friend?"

Kuei covered a chuckle. "I think that might be too much for a simple soldier."

"Just a soldier," Agent Bon muttered. "Sure he is."

Kuei glanced at his betrothed, and matched her raised eyebrow.

"A simple soldier who reads Earth Kingdom law, and argues it well enough the magistrates even listen," the Dai Li shrugged. "He'll tell anyone in earshot he doesn't like us - but how many people do you know who study Fire Nation law?"

"I do," Kuei murmured, a bit lost.

"...Of course you do. Well." Bon coughed. "At least the Fire Nation is in as much of a mess as we are."

The message was written on plain military paper; not a messenger-hawk's silk or formal parchment. But the precise strokes and careful wording were a dead give-away to anyone who'd suffered through royal tutors' head-pounding efforts at education... and a stark contrast to the quick scrawls of fire-writing appearing in the heat of the flames around the Dragon Throne.

Zuko, Lord of Dragon's Wings, congratulates Lord Azula...

Zuko, Lord of Dragons' Wings, congratulates Lord Azula of Caldera City on her ascension to the Dragon Throne.

(Better you than me!)

I have been reliably informed that Avatar Kyoshi's decree binding great names to the Fire Lord has been lifted. From past experience, descriptions of events in Ba Sing Se, and information gained on the current status of the onmitsu, I have every confidence that you will be able to hold the loyalty of every lord willing to join you. I am also certain that you possess the necessary calm judgment, canniness, and swift ruthlessness of action to keep the rest on their toes.

(Make 'em sweat. They deserve every minute of it.)

You may wish to review Yamanoue no Okura's Ten Thousand Leaves. I know, poetry, meh. But there are some interesting bits in there on distinguishing punishment from consequences. One of them only motivates people for a little while. The other may actually work, long-term, to change their behavior.

(Also, try counting to ten. Backwards. Before you fry things. Anticipation makes frying things better, anyway.)

My domain is currently rebuilding from a mostly contained eruption and battle damage.

(Ask Grandfather for details on Shirotona in a Bad Mood.)

We are currently consulting with the heir of Shu Jing to establish necessary assistance from our allies. I anticipate that some aid from Byakko might be forthcoming if ships currently assigned to the blockade chose to ignore vessels flying certain flags. A repositioning of the blockade might be advisable in any event, given the current strategic situation.

(Aang's not interested in searing the Fire Nation down to the bedrock. And I think we've killed off the real firebrands among the Earth Generals, so he ought to be able to stand his ground with a little help. Think about it.

And no, I didn't say who Shu Jing's heir was. I suspect that's going to be complicated.

Besides, I know you'll get a laugh once you figure it out. I'm not going to spoil your fun.)

It will be some time before we will be in a position to offer coronation gifts suitable to your strength and bloodline. In the interim, I can only offer the gift of counsel. Take it as you will.

I understand you're looking for a consort. Healer's advice: don't worry about firebending strength. Look for a family history of mental stability. And never tell me the details.

(And if a prospective consort's family has a closet full of puppets? Do what you do best.)

"Never tell me the details?" Azula scowled at the paper. "What details?"

Mai raised a skeptical brow.

"...Those details?" Azula shuddered.

"I think we're going to have some long talks with your mother," Mai murmured.

"Mother." Azula looked away. "What am I going to tell him?"

"I'd tell him the truth," Mai said bluntly.

Now Azula raised an eyebrow.

"...We'll do a few drafts, first."

We really did it. Toph wriggled her toes in volcanic dirt, feeling the heat radiating from the ground and air around this one of many, many tiny flame-vents around the caldera. A nice, gentle heat, with earth and rock twitching a little, like a pygmy puma in its sleep. But just twitching. Not the cranky, steam-rattling-pressure-gauges fury Asagitatsu had held just a month before. One volcano, curled up and snoozing. Awesome.

"Dad, did you know the guy who takes care of Suzuran's hawks is from Shu Jing?" Sokka's voice floated over to where Toph was poking at the vent. "That's... wow. I could tell him stuff about his home town, when he hasn't been home in years to see it himself."

Chief Hakoda chuckled; Toph thought it sounded a little homesick. "Sounds like hearing about the ice down south from the army."

"There's a couple people here who probably could tell you a little, yeah," Sokka admitted. "Though Zuko didn't stick around too long- where are you going with that?"

Katara shifted under a heavy weight; pottery jars, from the feel of them. "Asiavik says Yugoda wants Amaya to have these."

"More healing supplies?" Suki whistled. "I thought everyone was getting better."

Katara cleared her throat. "Actually... he said something about seal jerky, weird cravings, and making sure Iroh stays alive."

"Oh?" Suki must have seen something Toph couldn't read through the dirt; she stifled a snicker. "Oh."

Sokka took a wary step back. "Huh?"

She was with Sokka on this one, Toph thought. What was that all about?

"Son," Hakoda said, in the tones of a man about to walk over hot coals, "you're getting to the age where a man needs to know a few things. Before he finds out the hard way."

From the drag of Sokka's heels as the two men headed off, Hakoda's grip on his shoulder wasn't taking no for an answer. "...I am so going to wish I didn't ask, right?"

Silent footsteps came up in their wake, visible by the weight of metal around them. And the snickering.

Toph poked a finger toward armor. "What's so funny?"

"Oh, just wondering how the Water Tribe version of the Talk goes," Teruko smirked. "Probably a little less dangling over open volcanoes from a shovel, and more upset brothers on ice floes in the middle of the night."

"We usually use a harpoon," Katara snickered. "Though, Gran-Gran always said to save that part for when things... well, get a little more serious." She turned, and tapped one hand near her waterskin. "You are serious about my brother, right?"

"Yeah." Suki sounded just a little surprised. "Yeah, I think I am. He's a warrior, and he's brave... and he's funny." She patted the fan in her belt. "My old aunties always said, look for a guy who can laugh at himself. That'll get you through more tough spots than a sword."

"Yeah, it will," Katara said, half to herself. "Spirits don't care about swords."

"Huh. Well, if you are serious about chasing that airbender, you might want to get that story in early," Teruko said practically. "He needs things repeated a few times." She snorted. "Not that different from a singed young recruit, I guess. He doesn't know what he doesn't know."

"Speaking of knowing..." Toph rubbed her chin between thumb and forefinger, trying to look as evil as possible. "I've got a bargain for you, Fingernails."

"Uh-oh," Suki said under her breath.

"Oh, this should be good," Katara snickered.

Teruko shifted her weight as she glanced between them, then focused back on Toph. "What kind of deal?"

"Well..." Toph rubbed her hands together. "I'll do the strap-him-to-a-rolling-boulder version for one Dai Li guy, when you get ready to chase him."

"And?" Teruko ventured.

"When I'm old enough, you point me at some good sake," Toph said firmly. "I've got some ideas for a cord that won't burn, and I'm going to need somebody who can make sure it's red..."

"One of these days," Saoluan muttered, going at her little brother's singed hair with scissors as the three of them sat on his favorite ledge, "you're going to have to tell everybody the story. Tracking down a centuries-old dragon; you're got the best drinking story and you don't even drink-"

"Ahhhchoo!"

"Ack!" Langxue ducked behind a shield of ice, almost stabbing himself on her scissors. "Watch it!"

Agent Shirong blinked blearily. Sniffled, and rubbed the bridge of his nose. "Was that... sparks?"

Still holding trimmed bits of hair, Saoluan waved the charred ends his way. "Somebody's plotting about you."

"Plotting?" Shirong sat up, instantly alert. "If you know about some kind of conspiracy-"

Saoluan almost stuck her tongue out at him. "Not that kind of plot." Hmm. If somebody finally has made up their mind to go after you... wonder if I can help?

"You've got that evil look on your face again," Langxue deadpanned.

"Me? Evil?"

One brow raised, Langxue flicked ice with his fingers, shattering it into drifting flakes he collected with a sweep of his hand. Formed two loose snowballs, and handed one to Shirong. "Here. This should make it a fair fight."

Hefted the other, and gave his big sister a considering look.

"Hey!"

Ah, the sound of yelping in the wind. Zuko smirked a little as he leaned back on one of Amaya's garden benches, watching sunlight play through the water in the rebuilt fountain, wondering who'd fallen afoul of Asahi's temper this time.

"My old bones... the wounds of war are always such a trial to mend." Iroh stretched his back with an audible pop, then settled himself on the opposite end of the bench. "One would think you might wish to corral her more thoroughly."

"When the rattle-vipers learn to stop coming into town, maybe," Zuko shrugged, folding the letter in his hand. "Better if she's the one who bites people. Asahi's not venomous."

Iroh chuckled. "Some might say otherwise." He folded his hands in his sleeves. "A letter from our new Fire Lord?"

Oh, this was going to be tricky. "From the Lord of Caldera City," Zuko stated. "She left off most of her titles." Which was an interesting balancing act.

"Hmm." From that twitch of white brows, Iroh was calculating some of the same political considerations he had. "Which allows her to address you as an honorable enemy, or even a potential ally, rather than a rebel domain."

"I don't think she knows what's going to be most advantageous yet," Zuko nodded. "So she's keeping her options open."

Iroh stroked his beard. "She means to be flexible, then? We have not seen that in a Fire Lord in... quite some time."

"Since Kyoshi," Zuko murmured.

"I would not go quite so far..."

"Let's just hope it works." Zuko eyed the paper, trying not to feel a twinge of envy. "She's offering Byakko passes through the blockade for time with Grandfather."

"Er..."

Zuko waved the paper. "The Lord of Caldera City requests that Lady Kotone of Byakko provide access to the valued council of the legendary swordsman and information-gatherer Shidan of Byakko, for our domains' mutual benefit and stability," he stated, in his best court-formal tones. And had to chuckle, despite himself. "In other words, let me talk to Grandfather, and let's find some way to do it that won't get too many people killed. Except the idiots. Who needs the idiots anyway?"

Iroh blinked. "...Oh dear."

"He must think she's better," Zuko said, half to himself. "Maybe it wasn't an act, at Boiling Rock. Maybe she can figure out how to care about people. That would be good." He let out a slow breath. "That would be really good."

"It would, indeed," Iroh said gently. "It is good to be able to care about one's family."

"I'm still sending armed ambassadors, when we get that far. It'll make her feel better if they can snarl back." Zuko gave his uncle a wry look. "What do you think about Jia Wen?"

For a moment, Iroh looked very disconcerted indeed. "She is... young."

"I wouldn't send her alone," Zuko said grumpily. "She is young. But she's got great manners, she knows how to keep her thoughts behind a smile, and she's the only earthbender I've ever heard of who got the drop on Azula. And did it when she was scared stiff. My sister's going to respect that."

"And above all, dragons wish the respect they have earned," Iroh mused. "Even the young ones." He stroked his beard again, looking into the distance. "Your sister appears to have discovered some scruples; something I was not certain my brother's daughter could do. And you, too, have grown, since you first warned me of heating river-rocks. You have become more willing to speak out, in defense of yourself and others."

"Asagitatsu's a really big rock," Zuko said wryly. "I don't know where we'd find enough charcoal to pack around her." He took a deep breath. This hurt. Not as much as finding out from Azula that their mother was in the Fire Nation, and had no intention of leaving, but it still stung. "You were right about the Fire Lord attacking the Northern Tribe."

"Gracious of you." Iroh smiled, just a little. "Right, and wrong. There is no fool like an old fool. I have spent so much time attempting to discern the spirits' will for the future, I sometimes forget the world here and now. A fault I shall have to remedy, to be a proper husband to your aunt."

"I'm sure Master Amaya will appreciate that," Zuko said warily. What now?

"Master?" Iroh waved a scolding finger. "Is that any way to refer to the mother of your cousin to be?"

...What?

He couldn't have heard that. He could not have heard that.

And what was he doing on the ground, anyway?

"Oh dear," Iroh sighed.

"Iroh!" Amaya's voice, as if from a distance. "What did you tell him?"

"Er... the good news?"

A rueful sigh, and Zuko heard her robes swish toward him. "You do realize that ever since your disastrous ferry ride into Ba Sing Se, he's been studying up on everything that can go wrong with a pregnancy?"

"Gnmph," Zuko grumbled, waving a hand in protest.

"I'll be fine." Amaya crouched down by him. "I'm a healer, we have other healers and midwives in the settlement, and you're nearly ready to move out of apprenticeship yourself-"

"Arghggsnf!" No, no, no! Don't you dare make this my mastery test!

"It'll be fine." Warm fingers carded through his hair. "You'll see. Everything will be fine."

Oh, no. Zuko closed his eyes, and tried not to groan. You just had to say that...

-The End.

Chapter End Notes

Yes, that's it. I have other ideas for things that might happen down the road in this AU, including a certain group of interstellar explorers wandering through a big stone ring down in the ruins, but this is the end of the story I wanted to tell.

...Yes, one of those big stone rings. I know people have guessed it.

(And in case anyone's wondering, Amaya has twin girls.)

Works inspired by this one, [embers \[PODFIC\]](#) by Opalsong, Escape by rockinmomoko, Frozen in Memory by rockinmomoko, Finding Family by rockinmomoko

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!